VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea.

By the assistance of God our Saviours Providence, so great a multitude of men have joyned themselves to the most Holy Church in that City which bears our * Name; that [Christianity seems] to have made its greatest progress and increase there. [r] It seems therefore very requisite that there should be more Churches erected in that City. Wherefore do you with the greatest alacrity admit of what we have Decreed. We thought fit to signifie this to your prudence, that you should order fifty Copies of the sacred Scriptures (the provision and use whereof you know to be most necessary for the instruction of the Church,) to be written on well prepared parchment by artificial Transcribers of Books, most skilfull in the Art of accurate and fair Writing; which [Copies] must be very legible, and easily portable in order to their being used. Moreover, Letters are dispatch't away from our clemency to the [s] Rationalist of the Diœceses to take care for provision of all things necessary towards the preparing of the said Copies. Let it therefore be the imployment of your care to see that the foresaid Copies be provided as soon as may be. You are also impowr'd by this our letter to make use of two publick carriages for their conveyance. For by this meanes those which are fairest Transcribed may be easiest convey'd even to our sight, to wit, if one of the Deacons of your Church be imployed in the performances hereof. Who when he comes to us, shall experience our liberality. God preserve you Dear Brother.

* He means the City of Constantinople.

[r] In Eusebius's Life of Constantine, book 4. chap. 36. (where this Letter occurs) this place is far otherwise read and pointed, than it is here; so also it is in Theodoret, book 1. chap. 16. Valef.

[s] Concerning the Rationalist and his Office, we have spoken before, in our notes on Eusebius. By [Diœceses] is meant here the Dioceses of the East. The old Romans called a certain number of Provinces (which, taken together, were under a Deputy of the Prætorian Præfecture) by this name [Diœceses.] For the Præfect of the Prætorium had under his jurisdiction many Diœceses; but the Deputies had each but one Diœcesis. This term began to be used in this sense about Constantin's time, as appears from his Letters, and from some Laws in the Cod. Theod. See Valesius's Annotations on Eusebius's Life of Constant. B. 4. chap. 36.

CONSTANT.

Another Letter to Macarius.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Macarius Bishop of Jerusalem.

So great is our Saviours love and favour that no Rhetorick seems sufficient to set forth a declaration of the present miracle. For, that the * Monument of his most holy passion, long since hid underneath the earth, should lie conceal'd for so many years space, till such time as, by the † slaughter of the common Enemy, it should gloriously appear to his servants now set at liberty, [is a matter which] does really surmount all admiration. For if all those persons that throughout the whole world are accounted wise should be convened in one and the same place with a design to speak something according to the worthiness of this matter, they would not be able after their utmost endeavours to attain to [an explication of] the least part thereof. For the * authority and greatness of this miracle doth as far transcend every nature capable of humane reason, as things that are celestial do exceed those that are humane. Wherefore this is always our chief and only aim, that as the authority of the truth doth daily demonstrate it self by new miracles, so the minds of us all should with all modesty and unanimous alacrity become more careful and diligent about an observation of the divine Law. Which in regard we judge to be manifestly apparent to all men, our desire is you should most especially be perswaded of this, that it is altogether our chiefest care, that that sacred place (which by Gods command we have unburthened of that most detestable [u] accession of the Idol, as it were of a ponderous and heavy weight; which [place] was by Gods determination made holy from the beginning, but was afterwards demonstrated to be more holy, out of which he hath brought to light the certainty of our Saviour's passion) should be beautified and adorned with magnificent and stately structures. Wherefore it does well become your prudence so to order the matter, and to make such a provision of materials necessary for this work, that not only the Temple it self may in stateliness excel all others in what place soever, but also that the other parts of it be made such, as that all the beautifullest structures in every City, may be acknowledged far inferiour to this fabrick. And as concerning the workmanship and exquisite beauty of the walls, we would have you know that we have committed the care thereof to our friend † Dracilianus, Deputy to the most excellent the Prefects of the Prætorium, and to the President of the Province. For our piety has taken order, that artificers and workmen, and whatever else they may be informed from your Prudence to be necessary for the structure, shall by their care be forthwith sent. But concerning the Pillars or Marbles, (and whatever you your self on sight of the [x] Model [of the building] shall judge to be more rich and useful,) make it your business to inform us by writing: that when we shall understand from your Letter, how many and what manner of materials you stand in need of, they may be convey'd to you from all parts. For it is but reasonable that that most admirable place of the whole world should be beautifi'd according to its dignity and worth. We desire to know of you, whether you think good to have the inner roof of the Church [y] arched, or made of any other sort of work. For if it be arched, it may also be guilded with gold. It remains therefore, that your holiness inform as soon as may be the forementioned Judges, how many Workmen, and Artificers, and what money for expences you shall want. And be you careful to return Us a speedy account, not only concerning the Marbles, and Pillars, but also concerning the arched roof (if you shall judge that to be the more beautiful work.) Dearest Brother, God preserve you. The Emperour wrote several other Epistles in a more florid stile like Orations, against Arius, and those that embraced his Opinion, and caused them to be [z] published in every City; in

CONSTANT.

[t] Constantine here terms Licinius the publick enemy, after whose destruction, he says, the sacred Sepulchre of our Lord, which had been before concealed, was discovered. Licinius was slain in the year of Christ 326, as 'tis recorded in Fast. Idat. And on that very year, when Helena came to Jerusalem, the Sepulchre of our Lord was found. By the name of the publick Enemy, the Devil might here be meant, were not this contradicted by the expressions here used. For the Devil was not then vanquished and overcome, when the Sepulchre of our Lord was cleared from the rubbish that covered it. Besides, the term [ἀναίρεσις, slaughter] is more expressive, being meant of Licinius, than of the Devil. See Valesius's notes on Eusebius's Life of Constant. book 3. chap. 30.

* Ἡ τοῦ σωτηρίου τύπου πίστις, the faith, autority, or estimation of this miracle, &c.

[u] He means the Temple built by Adrian the Emperour on Mount Calvary, in honour of Venus; which receptacle of Paganism was demolished by Helena, Constantines mother, and in the room thereof was built a magnificent Temple, at this day called The Temple of the Sepulchre; the description whereof you may see in Sandys Travels, book 3. pag. 125. &c. Edit. Lond. 1673.

† There are two Dracilianus, Deputy to the most excellent the Prefects of Laws made the Prætorium, and to the President of the Province. by Constantine extant in the Cod. Theod. (the one in Tit. de usuris, the other in Tit. de Hæreticis,) written to this Dracilianus. The former of these Laws bears this Inscription, Imp. Constantinus Aug. ad Dracilianum agentem vices Præfectorum prat. that is, Emperour Constantinus Augustus to Dracilianus Deputy to the Præfects of the Prætorium. This Law was published at Cæsarea in Palestine on the 15th of the Calends of May, when Paulinus and Julianus were Consuls. The other is said to have been published on the Calends of September, Constantinus Aug. being the seventh time and Constantius Cæsar Coss. that is, in the year of Christ 326. In which year Constantine wrote this Epistle to Macarius Bishop of Jerusalem. Further, we must remarke, that the Præfects of the Prætorium are here stiled clarissimi, most excellent. For as yet they had not received the title of Most Illustrious. Moreover, in other of Constantin's Laws, the Præfects of the Prætorium are stiled Most Excellent. Now, as the Præfects of the Prætorium were in Constantin's time allowed only the title of Most Excellent, so the Deputies of the Pratorian Præfecture had in the said Constantin's times only the title of Most Perfect given them, as the Epistle to Probianus Proconsul of Africa shews, which we meet with in Athanasius's Apology to Constantius, pag. 794. See Valesius's notes on book 3. chap. 31. of Eusebius's Life of Constantine.

[x] At this place the term [συνόψις] signifies the Model or Delineation of the Fabrick that was to be erected. It is taken in the same sense, in the Epistle of Himerius Rationalist of Alexandria to the Præfect of Mareotis; which Athanasius has recorded in his Apology, pag. 803. For after he had said, that Augustus and the Cæsars had permitted Ischyras to build a Church in his Town, he orders the Governour of that Town, that he should forthwith draw a Model of the future building, and transmit it to his Office; φρόντισον (says he) τύπων ἐν τάχει τῷ σύνοψιν ποιησαμένῳ, εἰς τὸ τάξιν ἀνενεχθῆναι. See Valesius's notes, at the book and chapter before cited.

[y] The inner roofs of Churches were commonly framed two ways. For they were either beautified with arched or embowed roofs, or else painted with Mosaick-work. Concerning the arched (or embowed) roofs, this place of Constantin's Letter is an evidence. Procopius evidences the use of the Mosaick-work, in his first book De Fabricis Justiniani, where he describes the Temple of Sancta Sophia. Now the arched roofs were usually adorned two ways. For they were either guilded with gold, or painted; which latter way was first invented by Pausias, as Pliny attests, book 35, chap. 11. Hist. Natural. See Valesius's notes, at the book and chapter before cited.

[z] Instead of [προσέθηκε, He added] the reading must necessarily be [προσέθηκε, He published.] For the Roman Emperours did usually propose to publick view those Rescripts they wrote to the Cities. Therefore, at the close of the Rescript they added this word [Proponatur, let it be published:] as we have observed in our notes on Eusebius. So Constantine, when he had wrote many Letters against Arius and his followers, commanded they should be proposed to publick view in the Forum. Of this sort was Constantin's Epistle to Arius and the Arians, which Gelasius Cyzicenus has recorded in his 3d book De Gestis Synod Nicænæ: which Epistle Epiphanius mentions in Hæres. Arian. It was written by Constantine after the Nicene Synod, and it contains the punishment of those that would not recede from Arius's wicked tenets. For at the close of that Epistle, the Emperour commands, that, if they be persons of the ordinary rank, they shall pay tribute for ten heads, besides their own Poll-money. But if they be descendants of the Curiales, (or Noble-men,) they shall be delivered to the Court and made liable to bear the publick Offices of the Decurions. This Letter therefore was like an Edict, and so ought to be publickly read and promulged. Vales.

CONSTANT. which Epistles he represents [Arius] to be an infamous person, and rebukes him sharply in an Ironical manner. Moreover, He wrote to the [a] Nicomedians, against Eusebius and Theognis: wherein he severely reprehends Eusebius's wickedness, not only for his Arianism, but also because, having formerly been a favourer of the Tyrants party, he had been a Traitor against [Him and] his affairs. He therefore advises them to elect another Bishop in his stead. But I thought it superfluous to insert his Letters concerning these matters here, because they are long. They that are desirous [to inspect them] may easily find them out, and read them over. Thus much concerning these things.

[a] The greatest part of this Epistle is extant in the first book of Theodorets Ecclesiastick History, chap. 20. it is entire in Latin, in Baronius, at the year of Christ 329; as Justinian the Emperour sent it to Pope Vigilius. Vales.

CHAP. X.

That the Emperour summoned to the Synod Acesius also, a Bishop of the Novatian Heresie.

THis great diligence and industry of the Emperour moves me to make mention of another thing, wherein his mind is declared, and how careful and solicitous he was to procure Peace. For, consulting the concord and agreement of the Churches, He [a] summoned Acesius, a Bishop of the Novatian Heresie, to appear at the Council. When the Synod had drawn up a form of the Creed, and subscribed it, the Emperour enquir'd of Acesius, whether he would also give his assent to these Articles of the Creed, and also to the determination about the Festival of Easter. He replied, O Emperour, the Synod has determined no new thing: for anciently even from the [Churches] original, and the Apostolick times, I have in this same manner received by tradition both this form of Faith, and also this time [for the observation] of the Feast of Easter. When therefore the Emperour demanded of him again, what then should induce you to be a separatist from the communion [of the Church?] he related what was done under Decius in the time of the Persecution, and recited the strictness of that severe Canon, [to wit,] that those who after Baptism had committed any such sin, as the sacred Scriptures terms a mortal sin, ought not to be admitted to a participation of the sacred Mysteries: they were indeed to be exhorted to repentance, but ought not to entertain any hopes of remission from the Priests, but from God, who only is able, and has power to forgive sins. When Acesius had spoken thus, the Emperour repli'd, O Acesius, set a Ladder, and do you alone climb up to heaven. This story neither Eusebius Pamphilus, nor any other Author has mentioned. But I had it from a person that was in no wise a lier, one who was very aged, and related what he had seen transacted in the Council. Whence I conjecture, that the same accident befell those who have omitted the mention hereof, which happens to many other Writers of History. For they usually pass over many things, either because they are ill affected towards some, or have a desire to gratifie others. Thus much concerning Acesius.

CONSTANT.

[a] Sozomen relates the same story, in his first book chap. 22. but in such a manner, that 'tis sufficiently apparent, he had it out of Socrates's History. For Socrates tells the whole story more fully and elegantly. And after he has told it, says he had it from a credible person, who lived in the times of the Nicene Council. But Sozomen begins this relation thus, Λέγεται δὲ τὴν Βασιλέα, &c. It is reported that the Empeour, &c. Nor does he confirm it by any persons authority. Besides Sozomen has in a manner stole the very words of Socrates, making some small alterations and interpositions, as Plagiaries usually do. But this story seems to me very improbable upon many accounts. First, because it is founded on the autority of no ancient writer. Secondly, neither Socrates, nor Sozomen, do say, of what City Acesius was Bishop, which was very necessary to confirm the story. Thirdly, it is not at all likely, that an Heretical Bishop should be summoned by Constantine to an Ecclesiastick Synod. For if Constantine had sent for Acesius in order to the restoring of Peace and Agreement to the Church, upon the same account he ought to have summoned the Bishops of other Heresies also to the Nicene Council. Lastly, what Socrates says, to wit, that he had this story from a very old man who was at the Synod, seems to me altogether incredible. This persons name was Auxano, a Novatian Presbyter, who was at the Synod with Acesius, and lived untill the reign of Theodosius Junior, as Socrates says chap. 13. of this book. Now from the Nicene Synod to the beginning of Theodosius's reign, there are 83 years. To which if you adde 20 (for so old Auxano must needs be when he was present at the Council) Auxano must necessarily be above an hundred years old, when he told Socrates this story. Let the Reader judge therefore, at what rate the testimony of a decrepid old Heretick is to be valued. Vales. very pretty

Concerning Paphnutius the Bishop.

NOw because we have promised before, to make mention of Paphnutius and Spyridon, it will be seasonable to speak of them here. Paphnutius therefore was Bishop of one of the Cities in the upper Thebais: he was a person so pious, that wonderful miracles were wrought by him. In the time of the Persecution one of his eyes had been cut out: The Emperour had an high esteem for the man, and frequently sent for him to the Pallace, and kissed [the place of] that eye which had been dug out. So great a piety and reverence was there in the Emperour Constantine. Let this therefore be one thing said by us concerning Paphnutius. This other (which was done by his advice for the utility and advantage of the Church, and the grace and ornament of the Clergy,) I will now relate. The Bishops had a design to introduce a new Law into the Church, to wit, that those who were in holy Orders, I mean the Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, [a] should abstain from lying with those wives which they had married during the time they were Laicks. And when a proposition was made to consult hereof, Paphnutius [b] rose up in the midst of the assembly of Bishops, and cried out with a great deal of earnestness, that such an heavy yoak ought not to be imposed upon those persons that were in sacred Orders, saying, that marriage was honourable, and the bed undefil'd; [so that they ought to be careful] least they should rather incommode the Church, by their overmuch severity. For all men [said he] cannot bear the practise of so strict and severe a continencie, nor is it likely that the chastity of every one of their wives should be preserved. (The husbands keeping company with his lawful wife he termed chastity.) It was sufficient [said he,] that they who had entred themselves into the function of the Clergy before they were married, should afterwards (according to the ancient tradition of the Church) abstain from entring into a state of Matrimony: but that no person ought to be separated from his wife, whom

S. addes [καὶ ὑποδιακόνους, and Sub-Deacons:] and so the reading is in Sozomen, book 1. chap. 23; where he tells this story concerning Paphnutius. where also what we said before is apparent, to wit, that Sozomen borrowed from Socrates. For he that addes to anothers relation, shews evidently that he wrote last. Vales.

[b] Rufinus (out of whom Socrates had the former story which he tells in this chapter concerning Paphnutius) says not a word of this speech of Paphnutius; see his first book Eccles. Hist. chap. 4. But he relates that Paphnutius was one of the Bishops in the parts of Egypt, and that he was present at the Nicene Council.

CONSTANT. whom he had heretofore married, [to wit,] whilſt he was a Laick. Thus he ſpake, though he was a man, who had not experienced what marriage was, and (as I may truly aver) never knew a woman, for from his childhood he had been educated in a * place where the ſtricteſt exerciſes of virtue and abſtinence were conſtantly practiſed, and was eminently famous above all men for his ſingular continencie. All the whole aſſembly of the Clergy were perſwaded to yield their aſſent, to what Paphnutius ſaid; wherefore they ſilenc'd all further debate concerning this point, and left it to every mans arbitrement whether he would [or would not] abſtain from keeping company with his wife. And thus much concerning Paphnutius.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Spyridon Biſhop of the Cyprians.

NOw [we come to ſpeak] of Spyridon: ſo great a ſanctity was in this perſon whileſt yet a Shepherd, that he was thought worthy to be made a Paſtor of men. He had obtained the Biſhoprick of a City in Cyprus call'd Trimithuntis: but by reaſon of his ſingular humility he fed ſheep during his being a Biſhop. There are many things related of this man: but I will only record one or two, that I may not ſeem to wander from my ſubject. One time about midnight, theeves entred his ſheepfold privately, and attempted to take away the ſheep. But God who protected the ſhepherd, preſerv'd his ſheep alſo: for the theeves were by an inviſible power faſt bound to the foulds. The morning being now come, he went to his ſheep, where finding the men bound with their hands behind them, he perceiv'd what had happened. And after he had prayed, he looſed the theeves, admoniſhing and exhorting them earneſtly, to endeavour the procuring of a livelyhood by honeſt Labours, and not by ſuch unjuſt rapine: He alſo gave them a Ram and diſmiſt them with this facetious ſaying, leaſt, ſays he, you might ſeem to have watched all night in vain. This is one of Spyridons Miracles. Another was of this ſort. He had a daughter, a Virgin, indued with her fathers piety, her name Irene. A perſon well known to her, entruſted her with the keeping of an ornament that was of great value. The maid, that ſhe might with greater ſafety keep what was depoſited with her, hid it in the earth: and within a ſhort time died. Soon after that, he who had committed this thing to her care, came [to demand it.] Not finding the Virgin, he involves her Father [in that concern,] ſometimes accuſing, another while entreating him. The old man, looking upon the perſons loſs who had entruſted his daughter as his own misfortune, went to his daughters grave, and did there begg of God, that he would ſhew him the promiſed reſurrection before the time. And his hope was not fruſtrated. For the Virgin immediately revives, and appears to her father, and having ſhew'd him the place where ſhe had hid the ornament, immediately departed. Such perſons as theſe were during the reign of Conſtantine the Emperour eminent in the Church. Theſe things I both heard from ſeveral Cyprians; and alſo read them in a book of Rufinus a Presbyter, written in Latine, out of which I have not only collected what has here been ſaid, but alſo ſome other things which ſhall a little after this be declared. CONSTANT.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Eutychianus the Monk.

I Have alſo heard of Eutychianus, a pious man, who flouriſhed at the ſame time: who although he was one of the Novatian Church, yet was admired for works of the ſame nature with thoſe [we have mentioned.] I will ſincerely confeſs who it was that gave me this account of him: nor will I conceal it, though I am ſenſible ſome will be offended with me for it. One Auxanon a Presbyter of the Novatian Church, was a perſon of a very great age: this man, when he was very young, went to the Council of Nice with Aceſius, from him I receiv'd what I have ſaid before concerning Aceſius. He liv'd from thoſe times to the reign of Theodoſius the younger, and rehearſed to me, though then very young, theſe [Memoires] of Eutychianus: he diſcours'd much to me concerning the divine Grace infus'd into him: but one thing he told me concerning him more eſpecially worthy of remembrance, which happened in the reign of Conſtantine. One of thoſe belonging to the Guard, whom the Emperour calls his [a] Domeſticks, being ſuſpected to have attempted ſome Tyrannick deſignes, made his eſcape by flight: The Emperour, highly incenſed thereat, gave order, that he ſhould be put to death, wherever he could be found: being apprehended about the mountain Olympus in Bithynia, he was ſhut up in priſon, and loaded with very heavy and painful chaines; neer theſe parts of Olympus Eutychianus then reſided, leading a ſolitary life, where he wrought many cures both upon mens bodies and ſoules. The long-lived Auxanon was with him at that time, being then very young, and was by him inſtructed in the Precepts of a ſolitary Life. Many did reſort to this Eutychianus, beſeeching him to releaſe the Priſoner, by interceding for him with the Emperour. (For the fame of the miracles wrought by Eutychianus was come to the Emperours hearing.) He readily promiſed to make a journey to the Emperour. But in regard the Priſoner ſuffered moſt acute tortures cauſed by his chains, thoſe that did ſollicit for him, reported, that his death, haſtned by [the tortures of] his fetters, would both prevent the Emperours puniſhment, and Eutychianus's interceſſion for him. Eutychianus therefore ſent to the keepers of the Priſon, and intreated them to releaſe the man. But when they anſwered that it would be a very dangerous thing for them to releaſe a criminal, he, taking Auxanon only along with him, went to the Priſon: and upon the Keepers refuſal to open the Priſon, the grace which was in Eutychianus, did there more illuſtrate it ſelf: for the Priſon doors opened of their own accord, whilſt the Keepers of the Priſon had the keyes in their cuſtody: and when Eutychianus, together with Auxanon, had entred the Priſon, and a great amazement had ſeized thoſe that were preſent, the

[a] By δικέται he means the Protectores Domeſtici, or Guards of the Body, which waited on the Emperours perſon. They were Souldiers of a ſuperiour order, who alſo had greater pay then the others. See Valeſius's notes on Amm. Marcellin. book 14. pag. 33.

CONSTANT. the chains fell from the Prisoners [members] of their own accord. Afterwards [Eutychianus] together with his companion Auxano travelled to the City heretofore named Byzantium, but afterwards called Constantinople, and being admitted into the Imperial Pallace, he freed the Prisoner from [the danger of] death. For the Emperour, having a great respect for Eutychianus, readily granted his request. This was done after [those times which we are now giving an account of.] But then, the Bishops that were present at the Synod, after they had drawn up in writing some things, which they usually term Canons, returned to their respective Cities. Moreover, I look upon it as a thing advantagious to such as are studious of History, to insert here those Bishops names (as many of them as we were able to find,) that were convened at Nice, as also [the name of] the Province and City over which every one of them did preside, and likewise the time wherein they were assembled.

[b] We perfected this place by the assistance of the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. For in the common Editions of Socrates, after these words [Ὀσιος ἐπίσκοπος Κορδύβης, Hosius Bishop of Corduba,] followed these [Βιτων καὶ Βικεντίνος, Vito and Vincentius.] But those incomparable M. SS. exhibited this place entire to us, after this manner: ὅσιος ἐπίσκοπος Κορδύβης Ἱσπανίας· ὅτως πιστεύω ὡς προγέγραπται· ἐγὼ μὲν Βίτων καὶ Βικεντῖνος πρεσβύτεροι, &c. i. e. Hosius Bishop of Corduba in Spain. I do believe as it is before written. Vito and Vincentius Presbyters of Rome, &c. This is the series of the Bishops who subscribed the Nicene Council ; which Socrates transcribed from Athanasius's Synodicon, as he himself attests hereafter. In the Greek collections of the Canons this series is wanting, nor is it extant in Dionysius Exiguus's Version. But in that ancient collection lately published at Paris, (which the Western Church heretofore made use of, before Dionysius's Version) and in Isidorus's collection, this series occurs almost in the same words. In that ancient collection the words are these: Et subscripserunt. Osius Episcopus civitatis Cordubensis, Provinciæ Spaniæ dixit: ita credo sicut superius scriptum est. Victor & Vincentius Presbyteri urbis Romæ. Alexander Alexandriæ magnæ. Alphocration, &c. i. e. And they subscribed. Osius Bishop of the City Corduba, in the Province of Spain said: I believe so, as it is above written. Victor and Vincentius Presbyters of the City of Rome. Alexander of Alexandria the great. Alphocration, &c. The words in Isidorus's Collection are almost the same. But in Athanasius's Synodicon, Eustathius Bishop of Antioch and Macarius Bishop of Jerusalem are placed after Alexander Bishop of Alexandria. Valesius.

[b] Hosius Bishop of Corduba in Spain. I do believe as is before written. [c] Vito and Vincentius Presbyters of Rome. Alexander [Bishop] of *Ægypt. [c] Athanasius makes mention of this Vito the Presbyter, in His Apologetick against the Arians, and attests, that a Roman Synod consisting of fifty Bishops (by whom he was received into communion) was convened in his Church. Valesius.

[d] In the Latine collections of the Canons, Harpocration is stiled Bishop of Naucratis, and next to him is set Adamantius Cynopolites, or Cynensis, as it is in that forementioned ancient collection. Valesius.

[e] This book of Athanasius's is not now (to my knowledge) extant. But 'tis probable that the names of the Bishops who subscribed the Nicene Council, were translated out of that book. Valesius.

[f] Παρασημείωσις (the term that occurs here) imports the notation (or expres declaration) of the time usually prefixt before publick Acts. In the Greek collection of the Canons (which Joannes Tilius first published) the notation of the time is prefixt, thus: Κανόνες τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων, τῶν ἐν νικαίᾳ συνελθόντων, ἐν ὑπατείᾳ παυλίνου καὶ ἰουλιανοῦ τῶν λαμπροτάτων· ἔτους χλς ἀπὸ ἀλεξάνδρου· ἐν μηνὶ δυσίῳ ἐννεακαιδεκάτῃ, πρὸ δεκατεσσάρων καλανδῶν ἰουλίων· i. e. The Canons of the 318. Holy Fathers, convened at Nice, in the Consulate of the most illustrious Paulinus and Julianus, on the 636th year from Alexander, on the nineteenth day of the month Desius, before the thirteenth of the Calends of July. Valesius.

the consulate of Paulinus and Julianus, on the CONSTANT. [g] twentieth day of the month of May; that was the [h] Six hundredth thirty six year from the reign of Alexander the Macedonian. Thus the Synod was concluded. We must also take notice, that after [the dissolution of] this Synod, the Emperour took his Progress into the Western parts [of his Empire.]

[g] It is otherwise in the Greek collection, which Tilius published, (see the foregoing note.)

For 'tis said that the Synod was convened on the nineteenth day of the month Desius (which the Romans call June) on the thirteenth of the Calends of July. Which is confirmed by the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, by the Chalcedon Council, and by that Latine collection which Baronius calls Cresconiana, which account I think is the truest. For, should we suppose that the Council of Nice was assembled on the twentieth day of May, there would be too narrow a space of time left for the transacting of those affairs which Constantine did after his vanquishing of Licinius. Licinius was subdued in the last Engagement at Chalcedon, in the year of Christ 324, on the 15th of the Calends of October, as 'tis recorded in Fastis Idatii, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle: on the day following Licinius (who made his escape to Nicomedia) yielded himself to Constantine the conqueror. After this Constantine made his entry into Nicomedia: whilst he continued there, and hastned to make his Progress into the Eastern parts, a messenger arrived, declaring to him the dissention of the Alexandrian Church, and of all Egypt, upon account of Arius's Opinion, and the disturbances of the Melitians, as himself attests in his Epistle to Alexander and Arius. And first he sends Hosius with his Letters to Alexandria, that he might compose those differences by his authority. But Hosius, after he had staied a little while at Alexandria, returns to Constantine without effecting his business. All this could in no wise have been done in a shorter space of time than three months. Moreover, Constantine perceiving the mischief to increase daily, resolves upon calling a general Council of Bishops, that he might thereby restore peace to the Church. Upon this account he dispatcht away Couriers throughout all the Provinces, to convene the Bishops at Nice in Bythinia. Suppose therefore, that the Couriers delivered the Emperours Letters to every one of the Bishops in the month of March: it is scarce credible, that the Bishops could come from the remotest regions, as well of the East as of the West, to Bithynia, before the month July: especially since they came by land, and not by water, as Eusebius attests, book 3. chap. 6. De Vitâ Constant. See Valesius notes on Euseb. Life of Constant. book 3. chap. 14.

[h] After these words [the Six hundredth thirty six year from the reign of Alexander the Macedonian] Leo Allat. M. S. adds these [and it was the nineteenth year from the beginning of the reign of Constantine the Emperour,] which is very true. For when Paulinus and Iulianus were Consuls, (which was on the 325th year of Christ,) the Nicene Synod was (according to Socrates's Opinion) assembled in May, it being then the nineteenth year of Constantines reign. His twentieth year began the same year, about the end of July following. Valesius.

CHAP. XIV.

That Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, Theognis Bishop of Nice (who had been banished because they were abettors of Arius's Opinion,) having afterwards sent a Libell of Repentance, and agreed to the exposition of the Faith, were readmitted to their Sees.

MOreover, [a] Eusebius and Theognis, [b] having sent a Libell of Repentance to the most eminent Bishops, were by an Imperial order recalled from exile, and restored to their own Churches:

[a] Socrates has observed no order here.

For he says, that Eusebius and Theognis were recalled from banishment almost before he had told us they were exiled. Sozomen therefore did better, who in this particular corrected Socrates's relation. For, in the first book of his History, chap. 21. he relates that Eusebius and Theognis were banisht by the Emperour Constantine a little after the Synod, and that other Bishops were put into their Sees. Then, in his second book chap. 16. he declares how they were recalled from their banishment. From which passage (that I may make this remark by the by) it may be concluded, that Sozomen wrote his History after Socrates, in as much as he corrects and amends Socrates's narration in many places. Further, Eusebius and Theognis were banisht three months after the Nicene Synod, as Philostorgius attests: and returned from their exile (as the said Philostorgius relates) in the third year after that Synod, that is, in the year of Christ 328. which account agrees exactly with the History of affaires transacted in that time. For all Historians agree that Eusebius, upon his return from banishment, entertained thoughts of confirming Arius's Opinion, and of thrusting out those that asserted the Nicene Faith. And, that his first attack was made against

Eustathius

Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch, whom he cauſed to be expell'd [from his See] by feigned calumnies, in the year of Chriſt 329, or 330. Baronius therefore did ill, to place Euſebius Nicomedienſis's return from exile on the year of Chriſt 330. Valeſ.

[b] Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 325.) reproves Socrates and Sozomen, for ſaying, that Euſebius and Theognis were baniſht a little after the Nicene Synod; and that ſome few years after (having ſent a Libell of ſatisfaction to the moſt eminent Biſhops) they were recalled from their exile. Baronius endeavours to prove, that this Libell was preſented by Euſebius to the Biſhops in the Nicene Synod. For he aſſerts, that the rule of Faith was firſt written; which Euſebius Nicomedienſis (with four other Biſhops) refuſed to ſubſcribe: but, that the ſaid Euſebius, having afterwards preſented a Libell of ſatisfaction, did ſubſcribe what had been determined [in the Synod.] But, after this, when the Synod had Anathematized Arius, Euſebius and Theognius (ſays he) would not ſubſcribe this Anathematiſm; and for that reaſon they were condemned and depoſed, by the Synod, and Amphion and Chreſtus were put into their Sees. But the Emperour Conſtantine (continues he) interceded that the ſentence might not be put in execution, and perſwaded the Synod that they ſhould admit of Euſebius and Theognius upon their preſenting a Libell of Repentance. This is Baronius's opinion. But he is out, firſt, in ſaying that there were two Libells preſented by Euſebius: for of the former Libell no body has ever made mention. Secondly, he cites no authour for what he ſays concerning Euſebius's and Theognius's deprivation and condemnation done in the Nicene Council. Conſtantine (in his Epiſtle to the Nicomedians, the latter part of which Epiſtle in Greek the reader may meet in Theodoret. Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 1. chap. 20; it occurs entire at the cloſe of Geleſius Cyzicenus's 3d book pag. 217.) ſays not that it was then done, but only ſays, that Euſebius was afraid it would be done. Laſtly, his ſaying that a Libell of Repentance was preſented by Euſebius in the Nicene Synod, is manifeſtly refuted from the Libell it ſelf. For this Libell was preſented by Euſebius, when he was in baniſhment, as is atteſted by theſe words of it, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο τῇ γεγεμμα[ι]σ- πληροφορῶν πῶ συγκατάθεσιν, ὑ πῶ ἐξοείαν βαρεως φέρογτες, ἀλλα πῶ, &c. i. e. and by this Libell do fully declare and confirm our conſent; [which we are induced to do] not becauſe we look upon our exile to be tedious, &c. Beſides, this Libell was ſent, when Arius was recalled from baniſhment; which is apparent from theſe words, Ἄ[λ]οπον δὲ, τῇ δοκεῖ[σ- εἶ] καθ' ὑμᾶς, ἀναπεκλημῶνε, καὶ ἀπολογησαμένε, &c. i. e. But it would be abſurd (ſince he that ſeemed to be guilty is recalled and has made his defence in reference to, &c. Moreover, Arius was recalled from baniſhment by Conſtantine long enough after the Nicene Synod. &c. Valeſ.

CONSTANT. those who had been Ordained in their places being removed by them; Euſebius [put out] Amphion, and Theognis [removed] Chreſtus. This is a Copy of their Libell.

[c] In as much as Euſebius and Theognius do ſay in the beginning of this Epiſtle, that they were condemned by the Biſhops; it is worth our making an inquiry, when and where they were condemned. Baronius ſays they were condemned and depoſed in the Nicene Synod. But this is contradicted by S^t Jerom's autority; who, in his Dialogue againſt the Luciferiani, does in expreſs words atteſt, that Euſebius and Theognius (with other Biſhops of the Arian faction) were admitted of by the Nicene Synod. And this he proves both from the teſtimony of thoſe that were preſent at the Synod, and alſo from the very Acts of the Nicene Synod; in which, amongſt the names of thoſe Biſhops who ſubſcribed the Synod, Euſebius and the others I have mentioned are reckoned. The ſame is atteſted by Philoſtorgius, who ſays that Euſebius was baniſht about three months after the Nicene Synod. Since therefore Euſebius and Theognius do confeſs themſelves to have been condemned by the Biſhops, and ſince 'tis manifeſt that was not done in the Nicene Synod; it muſt neceſſarily have been done in ſome other meeting of the Biſhops. The reaſon of their being exiled, Conſtantine does declare in his Epiſtle to the Nicomedians, (the latter part whereof ſee in Theodoret. Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 1. chap. 20.) For he ſays, that he baniſhed them, becauſe they entertained certain Hereticks, (whom he had commanded to be ſent to his Court from the City Alexandria,) and held communion with them. (Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 329, thinks theſe Hereticks were Melitians. But I do rather believe they were Arians: and this is expreſly affirmed by the Egyptian Biſhops, in their Synodick Epiſtle, which Athanaſius has recorded in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians.) For this reaſon therefore Conſtantine ordered a Synod of ſome Biſhops to be convened, by whom Euſebius and Theognius were condemned and depoſed, after which the Emperour baniſhed them. This is expreſly affirmed by Athanaſius (in his book De Synodis,) and by Theodoret (book 1. chap. 19. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) Valeſ.

[d] Chriſtopherſon and Muſculus omitted theſe words [ὡς᾽ κείσεως, without having our cauſe declared or defended] in their Verſion. They occur in Sozomen (book 2. chap. 16.) and Epiphan. Scholaſticus has rendred them thus: Dudum quidem ante judicium condemnati à Reverentiâ veſtrâ, patienter ferre quæ decreta ſunt a ſancto veſtro concilio debuimus; i. e. Having been ſometime ſince condemned by your Reverence before judgment, we ought patiently to bear what is decreed by your holy Council. By theſe words Euſebius ſeems to intimate, that he was condemned without being heard, and by a raſh judgment, or prejudice: to wit, becauſe the Emperour had condemned him before, who was angry with Euſebius for ſeveral reaſons, which you may meet with in Conſtantine's Epiſtle to the Nicomedians; ſee Theodoret. Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 1. chap. 20. Valeſ.

CONSTANT. But becauſe 'tis abſurd, by ſilence to give an occaſion of calumny againſt our ſelves, for this reaſon we declare to you, that we have both unanimouſly agreed to the [determination about the] Faith, and alſo (after we had made reſearches into the notion of Homöouſios,) with our utmoſt earneſtneſs laboured for Peace, having never been followers of any Hereſie. And when we had ſuggeſted whatever came into our minds upon account of the Churches ſecurity, and had fully ſatisfied thoſe that ought to be perſwaded by us, we ſubſcribed the Faith, but have not ſubſcribed the Anathematiſm; not that we had any thing to object againſt the Faith, but becauſe we did not believe the perſon accuſed to be ſuch a one [as he was repreſented to be;] having been fully ſatisfied that he was no ſuch perſon, partly from the private Letters written to us by him, and partly from the diſcourſes he made in our preſence. [e] But if your holy Council was [then] ſatisfied, we [now] make no reſiſtance, but agree to what you have determined, and by this Libell do fully declare and confirm our conſent; [which we are induced to do] not becauſe we look upon our exile to be tedious and burdenſom, but that we might avoid the ſuſpicion of Hereſie. For if you ſhall now vouchſafe to let us return to your preſence, you ſhall find us to be of the ſame Opinion with you in all points, and quietly to adhere to what you have determined: ſince it hath ſeemed good to your piety, gently to treat even * him, who is accuſed for theſe things, and to [f] recall him from baniſhment. But it would be abſurd (ſince he that ſeemed to be guilty is recalled, and has made his defence in reference to thoſe things laid to his charge,) that we ſhould be ſilent, and muſter up an argument againſt our ſelves. Do you therefore vouchſafe (as it befits your piety that loves Chriſt) to remind our Emperour moſt dear to God, to offer up our ſupplications to him, and ſpeedily to determine concerning us as ſhall be moſt agreeable to your [prudence.]

[e] The meaning of theſe words is this. If we then ſatisfied your holy Council (to wit, the Nicene) and perſwaded it to think, that we had juſt cauſe for our being unwilling to ſubſcribe the Anathematiſm, now we fully command our conſent, and are ready to ſubſcribe as well the Anathematiſm as the form of the Creed.

* Arius.

This is the Libell of Euſebius and Theognius's recantation. From the words whereof I conjecture, that they ſubſcribed the Faith which had been publiſht [in the Council;] but would not give their conſent to the depoſing of Arius: and it appears hence, that Arius was recalled [from baniſhment] before them: but although this ſeems to be ſo, yet he was forbid to enter Alexandria. Which is evident from this, [to wit] that he afterwards invented a way for his own return into the Church and the City Alexandria, by having made uſe of a counterfeited repentance, as we ſhall relate in its due place.

[f] That is attributed here to the Biſhops, which had been done by the Emperour. For the Emperour, not the Biſhops, had recalled Arius from his exile. But writers do uſually ſpeak thus; aſſigning that to the Biſhops, which was the Emperours deed; and on the contrary, that to the Emperour which the Biſhops did. So Socrates ſaid above, that the Nicene Synod forbad Arius to enter Alexandria; whenas this was the Emperours doing, as appears from his Epiſtle. Valeſ.

You ſee how much the adding of theſe two words [then and now] would enlighten this place. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

That Alexander dying after the [Nicene] Synod, Athanasius was consecrated Bishop of the City Alexandria.

[a] Socrates (as also Sozomen) Mistakes here in placing Alexander's death, and Athanasius's Ordination after Eusebius's and Theognis's return from exile. For Alexander Bishop of Alexandria dyed within five months after the Council of Nice, as Athanasius testifies in his second Apology against the Arians, where he speaks of Melitius. The same says Theodoret, in the first book of his History, chap. 26. Alexander therefore dyed in the year of Christ 325. and Athanasius was Consecrated either at the latter end of the same year, or in the beginning of the next. Vales.

[a] SOon after, upon the death of Alexander Bishop of Alexandria, Athanasius was promoted to the presidency over that Church. Rufinus relates, that this person, when he was very young, did, together with those that were his equals in age, play at a kind of an holy sport: this play was an imitation of the sacerdotal function, and of those persons order that were Clergy men. In this sport therefore Athanasius was elected Bishop, and every one of the rest of the children acted either a Presbyter, or a Deacon. This sport the children plaid at on that day, whereon was celebrated the Memory of Peter the Martyr and Bishop. Alexander Bishop of Alexandria accidentally passing by at that time, saw all their play. And, having afterwards sent for the children, he enquir'd of them what place had been allotted to every one of them in the play, supposing that from what had been done some thing might be portended [concerning each of them.] And he gave order, that the children should be educated in the Church and instructed in learning; but most especially Athanasius. Afterwards when he was come to a maturity of age, he ordain'd him Deacon, and took him along with him to Nice, that he might assist him in the disputations there, at such time as that Synod was convened. These things Rufinus has related concerning Athanasius, in his [b] books [of Ecclesiastick History:] nor is it at all unlikely that these things hapned: for many such like acts are frequently found to have been done. Thus much we have hitherto said concerning Athanasius.

[b] See Rufinus's Eccles. Hist. book 1. chap. 14. where Rufinus adds this circumstance to this story; that the boys (upon Alexanders enquiry) confessed some Catechumens had been Baptized by Athanasius, whom they had chosen Bishop in their sports. Then Alexander, having demanded of those said to be baptized, what questions they had been asked, and what answers they made, and also having examined him who had asked them the questions; found that all things had been done according to the rites of our Religion: and, after a consult with his Clergy, 'tis said, he ordered, that those boys (on whom water had been poured, after they were perfectly questioned, and had returned compleat answers) should not be rebaptized, &c. See Rufinus at the book and chapter now cited.

CHAP. XVI.

How the Emperour Constantine, having enlarged the City heretofore call'd Byzantium, named it Constantinople.

THe Emperour, after the [dissolution of the] Council spent his time in delight and pleasure. As soon therefore as he had finished the publick Festivities of his [a] Vicennalia, he forthwith imployed himself very diligently about re-edifying and erecting of Churches. This he did as well in other Cities, as in that that bore his own name. Which City, being formerly call'd Byzantium, he very much enlarged; he encompassed it with magnificent walls, and beautified with several Edifices; and having made it equal to the Imperial City Rome, [b] he named it Constantinople, and did by a Law establish that it should be call'd New Rome. Which Law was engraven on a pillar of stone, and [c] exposed to the publick view, being erected in the [d] Strategium, neer to the Emperours Statue on horseback. He also founded two Churches in the same City, the one of which he named Irêne, and the other he called the Apostles: nor did he only improve and enlarge the affaires of the Christians, as I have said, but did also subvert [the superstition] of the Gentiles. For [he took their] images [out of their Temples] and set them up in the most publick places, that they might serve to beautifie the City Constantinople: he also expos'd the Delphick Tripods openly in the Hippodrome. But it will perhaps seem superfluous to mention these things now. For they are sooner beheld with the eyes, than the relation of them can be heard. But at that time the Christian Religion was mightily propagated and increased. For the divine Providence did (amongst other things) reserve that more especially for the times of Constantine: And thus has Eusebius Pamphilus in a magnifick stile recorded the praises of this Emperour. But yet we judge it not unseasonable for us to speak briefly of them, according to our ability.

[a] That is, the Festivals for his having arrived to the twentieth year of his Empire.

[b] This place, which was corrupted and obscured by an ill distinction, we have illustrated and restor'd, by blotting out the particle δὲ; which particle is not to be found either in the Florent. or Sforti. M. S. our correction is also confirm'd by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version, who thus translates the passage, Et denominatam Constantinopolim, appellari secundam Romam lege firmavit. Vales.

[c] Instead of [παρέστησε was set, or placed] it should be [παρέστησε, was exposed, or erected. This emendation is confirmed by Epiphan. Scholasticus's Version. Vales.

[d] The Strategium was a publick edifice wherein the Strategi, (i. e. the Duumviri, the two principal Magistrates that heretofore governed the City Byzantium) were wont to sit. It is mentioned in the old description of the City Constantinople, which is prefixt before the Notitia Imperii Romani. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

How Helena, the Emperours Mother, came to Jerusalem, and having there found Christs Cross, which she had sought for a long time, built a Church.

HElena the Emperours Mother, (from whose name Drepanum, which was formerly only a Village, but made a City by the Emperour, was call'd Helenopolis) being admonished by God in her dreames, travell'd to Jerusalem. And when she found that place which was formerly Jerusalem, desolate (as the Prophet predicted) * like a lodge [set up] to preserve apples, she searched diligently for Christs Sepulchre wherein he was buried, and whence he arose, and though with great difficulty, yet by God's assistance she found it out. What was the reason of this difficulty, I will in few words explain. Those that embraced Christs Doctrine, did after the time of his Passion pay an high respect to that monument. But the Heathens who abhorred the Christian Religion, having covered the place with an heap of earth, erected thereon a Temple to Venus, and set up her image there, designing wholly to suppress the memory of that place. And this plot of theirs had for a long time succeeded. But the Emperours Mother had notice hereof. Wherefore, having thrown down the image, remov'd the earth, and wholly cleared the place, she finds three Crosses in the monument: one of them

* See Esai. 1. 8. where the Septuagint Version is, ὡς ὀπωροφυλάκιον ἐν σικυηράτῳ; which, in our English translation is thus worded, as a lodge in a Garden of Cucumbers; which rendition does exactly agree with the original Hebrew.

CONSTANT. them was that bleſſed Croſs on which our Saviour had hung: the other two were thoſe, on which the two thieves, that were crucified with him, had dyed. There was alſo found with the Croſſes Pilates Title, whereon he had written in divers Languages, and proclaim'd that that Chriſt who was crucified, was the King of the Jews. But in regard 'twas dubious which of theſe was the Croſs that was ſearched for, the Emperours Mother was not a little troubled hereat. This trouble the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, by name Macarius, ſoon eaſed her of; and by [the power of] his faith cleared the doubt. For he requeſted a ſign of God and obtained it; the ſign was this. A certain woman of that vicinage, having been oppreſſed with a tedious and laſting diſtemper, was now juſt at the point of death. The Biſhop therefore commanded every one of the Croſſes to be appli'd to her now expiring, being perſwaded in himſelf that if the woman were toucht by the pretious Croſs [of the Lord] ſhe ſhould recover. Nor was his hope fruſtrated. For the two Croſſes which were not our Lords being applied, the woman nevertheleſs continued in her dying condition; but when the third, the true and genuine Croſs was applied, the dying woman immediately recovered and was made whole. After this manner was the Croſs found out: the Emperours Mother erected over the place where the Sepulchre was, a moſt magnificent Church, and call'd it [a] New Jeruſalem, building it oppoſite to that old deſerted Jeruſalem, ſhe left there one half of the Croſs, incloſed in a ſilver caſe, as a relique to be ſeen by thoſe that ſhould deſire it. The other half ſhe ſent to the Emperour, which when he had receiv'd, being fully perſwaded that that City would be perfectly ſecure wherein ſuch a [relique] as this was preſerv'd, he hid it within his own Statue, [b] which is erected upon a vaſt Pillar of Porphyrie in Conſtantinople, in the Forum, call'd from him Conſtantin's Forum. This ſtory I have recorded as it has been related to me; but almoſt all the inhabitants of Conſtantinople do affirm it to be true. Conſtantine having alſo received the Nailes with which Chriſts hands were faſtned to the Croſs; (for his mother, having found them alſo in the Sepulchre, ſent them to him:) he ordered Bridles and a Helmet to be made of them, which he made uſe of in his Military expeditions. Moreover, the Emperour gave large ſupplies of all manner of materials towards the building of the Churches: and wrote to Macarius the Biſhop to haſten the work. The Emperours Mother, having finiſhed the New Jeruſalem, built another Church in no wiſe inferiour in ſplendour to the former, in the Cave at Bethlehem, which was the place of Chriſts Birth according to the fleſh: Beſides, [ſhe erected another Church] upon the mount, from whence he was taken up into heaven. And ſhe was ſo religiouſly and piouſly affected towards theſe things, that ſhe would pray in the womens company together with others: ſhe alſo invited, thoſe Virgins that were enroll'd in the catalogue of the Churches to an entertainment. Where ſhe her ſelf waited, and brought the meat to the Tables. Beſides ſhe was very liberal both to the Churches, and alſo to the indigent. [In fine,] having ſpent her life very piouſly, ſhe dyed about the eighteth year of her age: and her body was conveyed to the Imperial City New Rome, and depoſited amongſt the Imperial Monuments. CONSTANT.

[a] Socrates borrow'd this ſtory out of Euſebius's third book of Conſtantin's Life, chap. 33. But miſtakes in ſaying that the Church which was built over our Saviours Sepulchre by Helena, or rather by Conſtantine, was call'd New Jeruſalem. For Euſebius ſays no ſuch thing: but he only alludes to the new Jeruſalem, which is mentioned in Saint John's Revelations. See our notes on Euſeb. Life of Conſtant. book 3. chap. 33. Valeſ.

[b] Philoſtorgius does report that the people us'd to come to this Pillar with their Tapers and worſhip it; which is very ſtrange and almoſt incredible: but Theodoret does by his authority confirm it, in the firſt book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory and the laſt chapter. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVIII.

How the Emperour Conſtantine aboliſhed Gentiliſm, and erected many Churches in ſeveral places.

AFter this, the Emperour, becoming more ſolicitous about [the propagation of] Chriſtianity, abhorred the ſuperſtitions of the Gentiles: and firſt He aboliſhed the combats of the Gladiators: afterwards he placed his own Statues in the Temples. The Heathens affirming that it was Serapis that cauſed the inundations of Nile whereby the fields of Egypt were watered, becauſe there was a Cubit uſually carried into his Temple, the Emperour [a] ordered Alexander, to remove the Cubit into the Church [of the Alexandrians,] hereupon 'twas generally reported, that, becauſe Serapis was diſguſted, the Nile would not overflow; nevertheleſs, there hapned an inundation on the enſuing year, and afterwards, which alſo does continue to this day: And thus it was really demonſtrated, that the inundation of the Nile hapned not by the meanes of their ſuperſtition, but by the decree of Providence. About the ſame time, thoſe barbarous nations, the Sarmatæ and the Goths, made inroades into the Roman territories, and yet the Emperours forwardneſs in building of Churches was not in the leaſt interrupted thereby, but he made a commodious proviſion for both thoſe affairs. For, having put his confidence in the * Chriſtian Banner, he totally ſubdued thoſe his enemies; in ſo much that he took off the tribute of Gold which had been cuſtomarily paid to the Barbarians by thoſe Emperours who were his predeceſſours; and that was the firſt time that they (being aſtoniſhed at their prodigious overthrow) were perſwaded to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, by which Conſtantine had been every where preſerv'd. Again, he erected other Churches: one he built at that place called the Oak of Mambre, under which the ſacred Scriptures tell us that the Angels were entertained by Abraham. For the Emperour being inform'd that altars were erected under that Oak, and, that Pagan ſacrifices were there perform'd; by his Letter he ſeverely reproved Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea: and gave command that the altar ſhould be demoliſhed, and an houſe of prayer erected neer that Oak. He alſo gave order for the building of another Church, in Heliopolis, a City of Phœnicia, for this

[a] Chriſtophorſon and Muſculus thought that theſe words were tranſpoſed; they read them (as appears from their Verſion) thus, εἰς τὸν ἐκκλησίαν Ἀλεξανδρέων τὸ πῆχυ μεταθέναι ἐκέλευσε, [the Emperour] ordered that the Cubit ſhould be removed into the Church of the Alexandrians. But, becauſe the word [μεταθέναι] cannot be taken in a paſſive ſenſe the place muſt be otherwiſe mended: which from the Sforzian M. S. we have thus reſtored: Ἀυτὸς εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τὸ πῆχυ ἀλέξανδρον μεταθέναι ἐκέλευσεν; [the Emperour] ordered Alexander to remove the Cubit into the Church [of the Alexandrians.] Which emendation needs no confirmation. See Rufin. Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 2. chap. 23. This order of Conſtantines laſted not long. For Julian commanded that the ſame Cubit ſhould be carried back again into Serapis's Temple, where it ſeems to have continued till Theodoſius's reign, and the demoliſhment of Serapis's Temple. Valeſ.

* He means that Standard, or Banner, which the Emperour ordered to be made, in figure like to the Croſs that appeared to him in the face of the heavens. See chap. 2. of this book.

CONSTANT. this reason. What manner of Law-maker the Citizens of Heliopolis originally had, or what person he was as to his morals, I cannot certainly tell. But his disposition is sufficiently demonstrated from that City: For the Law of their country has commanded that the women should be common among them, upon which account the children amongst them could not be known whose they were. For there was no distinction betwixt the parents and the children. Their Virgins they delivered to strangers that arrived amongst them, that they might deflower them. The Emperour made it his business to abolish this custom, which had so long prevailed amongst them. For having abrogated the flagitiousness of those unclean usages by a discreet and chast Law, he brought them to know and distinguish betwixt families: And when he had built Churches, he took care that a Bishop should be ordained over them, and a sacred Clergy. Thus he reform'd the impious usages of the Heliopolites, and made them more modest and civil. After the like manner also he demolisht the Temple of Venus at Aphaca neer [the mount] Libanus, and abrogated those impudent and obscene Mysteries there celebrated. What need I relate how he expelled that Devil who pretended to utter Prophecies, out of Cilicia, commanding the house in which he lurked, to be demolished even to its very foundations. Moreover, so ardent was the Emperours love for the Christian Religion, that being about to ingage in a war with the Persians, he provided a tabernacle made of linen painted with divers colours, much resembling a Church (even as Moses did in the wilderness) and this he would have carried about with him, that so in the most desert regions he might have an Oratory ready. But this war went no further at that time: for it hapned to be immediately extinguished through the fear which the Persians had conceiv'd of the Emperour. But I think it unseasonable to relate here how diligent the Emperour Constantine was in repairing Cities, and how he turned many Villages into Cities; as for instance, Drepane, which bore his mothers name, and Constantia in Palestine, so called from his Sisters name Constantia. For our design is not to recount all the Emperours actions, but them only which belong to the Christian Religion, and those more particularly which were done about the Churches. Wherefore, the Emperours famous exploits, in regard they are of a subject different [from mine,] and require a peculiar treatise, I leave to others, that are able to commit to writing such matters. Indeed, I my self, had the Church continued undisturbed by factions and discord, had been wholly silent. For where the subject affords not matter proper for a narrative, the relators words are superfluous and useless. But in regard a subtile, vain, and insignificant craftiness in disputing hath disturbed, and at the same time also dissipated and distracted the Apostolick faith of Christianity, I supposed it requisite to commit these things to writing, that so those affaires which have been transacted in the Churches, might not be buried in silence. For the knowledge of these things does both procure great praise and commendation amongst most men, and also renders him that is well versed therein much more solid and cautious; teaching him not to fluctuate or stagger [in his sentiments,] when any vain babblings* about words and terms shall happen to arise.

CHAP. XIX.

After what manner the Innermost Indian Nations were in the times of Constantine converted to Christianity.

NOw therefore we must record, how the Christian Religion was propagated in the times of this Emperour. For the innermost Indians, and the Iberians did then first embrace the Christian Faith. But we will briefly explain, what we mean by the addition of this term, the Innermost. When the Apostles about to take their journey to the Heathens, in order to their preaching to them, had by lot divided them amongst themselves, [a] Thomas received the Apostolate of the Parthians. To Matthew was allotted Æthiopia. Bartholomew had that India assign'd to him which lyes upon the confines of Æthiopia. But this innermost India which is inhabited by several barbarous Nations, who make use of different languages, was not enlightned with the doctrine of Christianity, before the times of Constantine. What was the cause of their embracing the Christian Religion, I come now to relate. One Meropius, a Philosopher, by birth a Tyrian, made it his business to see the Country of the Indians, emulating herein [b] Metrodorus the Philosopher, who a little before him had travelled over that same Country. Meropius therefore taking along with him two youths that were related to him, who were in no wise unskilled in the Greek language, arrived in this Countrey in a Ship. And having seen what he desired, in order to his procuring necessary provisions, he put to land at a place which had a safe commodious harbour. It hapned, that a little before [his arival there] the league betwixt the Romans and Indians had been broken. The Indians therefore took the Philosopher, and those that were in the Ship with him, and put them all to death, except his two young kinsmen. Having saved the lives of the two youths, out of a compassion to their age, they presented them to the King of the Indians. He, much pleased with the young mens lookes, made the one of them, whose name was Ædesius, the Cup bearer of his Table: to the other, whose name was Frumentius, he * committed the custody of his accounts and evidences royal. Not long after this, the King dying (having left behind him a Son to be his successour, who was a minor, and his wife,) gave these two young men their liberty. But the Queen, seeing her Son left in his minority, spoke to these two persons to take care of him, till such time as he should come to maturity of age. The young men, in obedience to the Queen, undertake the management of the Kings business. But Frumentius was the chief person in managing the affairs of State. And he was very earnest in enquiring of the Roman Merchants who then came to trade in that country, whether there were any that embraced Chriſtianity to be found amongſt them. Having found ſome, and informed them who he was, he exhorted them to make choice of [c] ſome private meeting places for the performance of prayers therein, after the manner of Chriſtians. Afterwards, within ſome ſhort interval of time he built an oratory; and they, having inſtructed ſome Indians in the principles of Chriſtianity, brought them to prayers with them. But afterwards, when the young King came to a maturity of age, Frumentius reſigning to him the adminiſtration of the affairs of the Kingdom, which he had well managed, petitioned for leave to return into his own Countrey. And though the King and his mother entreated him to ſtay, yet they could not perſwade him, but being deſirous to ſee his own Countrey, he, together with Ædeſius, returned home. Ædeſius haſtened to Tyre to ſee his Parents and Kindred: but Frumentius arriving at Alexandria, related the whole ſtory to Athanaſius, [d] who was then newly dignified with that Biſhoprick; informing him of the circumſtances of his travells, and that there was good grounds to hope that the Indians would embrace Chriſtianity: [He alſo deſired him] that he would ſend a Biſhop and a Clergy thither, and that he ought in no wiſe to neglect thoſe that might be brought unto ſalvation. Athanaſius having taken into conſideration what was moſt expedient to be done, entreated Frumentius himſelf to take upon him the Biſhoprick, telling him that there was no man better quallified for it than he. Which was done. [c] Frumentius therefore, dignified with an Epiſcopate, returns again to the Indians Country, and there became a preacher of the Chriſtian Religion; he founded many oratories, and being vouchſafed [the aſſiſtance of] divine grace, he wrought many miracles, and cured many mens bodies together with their ſouls. Theſe things Rufinus ſays he heard from Ædeſius's own mouth, who was afterwards dignified with a Presbyterſhip in the Church of Tyre.

[b] This is Metrodorus the Philosopher, whom Jerome has mentioned in his Chronicon; who, returning from his travails in India, presented Constantine with many gemms and pearls, and feigned that many more of greater value were taken from him by Sapor King of the Persians: which lie of his was the occasion of the Persian war, as Am. Marcellinus attests, book 25. pag. 295. Edit. Valef. See Valesius's notes on Amm. Marcell. pag. 304.

CONSTANT.

[c] Tranſlatours underſtood not this place. For Muſculus renders it thus, Ut ſeparatis locis uterentur, that they ſhould make uſe of ſeparate places. Chriſtophorſon thus, ut loca ſeperatim ſibi ſumerent, that they ſhould take to themſelves places ſeverally. In this chapter Socrates has tranſlated Rufinus (book 1. chap. 9. Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt.) almoſt word for word; and calls thoſe τοπους ἰδιάζουσας, which Rufinus had termed Conventicula. Now Conventicula are properly private places wherein Collects, or ſhort prayers are made; and from theſe places Churches are diſtinguiſhed, which belong to the right of the publick, and are not in the power of any private perſon. Valeſ.

[d] Rufinus ſays the ſame: Tum vero Athanaſius (nam is nuper ſacerdotium ſuſceperat,) i. e. But then Athanaſius (for he had a little before undertaken the Epiſcopate, &c.) But if we conſider the matter more attentively, theſe things cannot be. For Meropius the Philoſopher is ſaid to have travelled into India, in imitation of the Philoſopher Metrodorus, who had taken a view of that Country before him. But Metrodorus, returned not from his Indian journey before the year of Chriſt 325. For at his return from India he preſented the Emperour Conſtantine with gifts which he had received from the King of the Indians, as we remarked before in note (b.) in this chapter. Which muſt neceſſarily happen after the conqueſt of Licinius. For then Conſtantine firſt received the Empire of the Eaſt. Now Licinius was vanquiſhed at the latter end of the year of Chriſt 324. Meropius therefore, in regard, following Metrodorus's example, he attempted to travell over India, muſt have undertaken this journey ſome years after him. Let us then ſuppoſe, that Meropius went into India in the year of our Lord 327. On the year following, when he ſhould have returned into his own Country, he was ſlain by the Barbarians. And Ædeſius and Frumentius, being as yet youths, were preſented to the Indian King; and one of them was made his Cup-bearer; the other was ſet over his Acts and evidences Royal. In which Offices both continued to the Kings death. Now, ſuppoſe they ſerved the King three years. After this the Indian King dies, leaving his Son very young. But the Queen his mother entreated Ædeſius and Frumentius to undertake the Government of the Kingdome, till her Son were of age. Let us alſo allow that the Kings Son was about eight years old when his father died. In as much as Frumentius returned not to Alexandria till the young King was grown a man, it is wholly requiſite that he ſhould have managed the affairs of the Kingdom at leaſt ten years. So Frumentius returned to Alexandria about the year of our Lord 341; in which year Athanaſius was not newly made Biſhop, but had held that Biſhopricck above fifteen years. From what we have ſaid 'tis apparent, that this converſion of the Indians by Frumentius happned in the Reign of Conſtantius, not of Conſtantine, as Rufinus, and others that follow him, have related. Valeſ.

[c] Athanaſius ſpeaks of this Frumentius, in his Apologetick to the Emperour Conſtantius. And a little after mentions Conſtantius's Epiſtle to Aizanas and Sazanas the Kings of Auxumis, wherein he commands them to ſend Frumentius (whom Athanaſius had ordained Biſhop of Auxumis) to Alexandria, to George Biſhop of that City, that he might receive from him the doctrine of the true Faith. Whence it appears, that Frumentius was at that time but newly ordained by Athanaſius. Now this Epiſtle was written in the year of Chriſt 356. Baronius, (in his Annotations on the Roman Martyrology.) ſays that this Frumentius Biſhop of Auxumis muſt be differenced from the other Frumentius Biſhop of the Indians. But I do aſſert, that he that was Biſhop of Auxumis, and he that is ſtiled the Biſhop of the Indians, is one and the ſame Frumentius. For Auxumis is the Metropolis of Æthiopia. Now the Æthiopians are by the ancients uſually confounded with the Indians. So Philoſtorgius calls the Homeritæ (who were the Auxumites neighbours) Indians. Alſo, the Æthiopians who are now called Abyſſines, call themſelves Indians, and do acknowledge Frumentius to have been the Apoſtle of their Nation; as Lucas Holſteinius atteſts in his notes on Baronius's Martyrology, which were lately publiſhed at Rome. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

After what manner the Iberians were converted to the Chriſtian Religion.

IT is now a fit opportunity to relate after what manner the Iberians were at the ſame time converted to Chriſtianity. A woman who led a religious and chaſt life, was, by the diſpoſal of Divine Providence, taken captive by the Iberians. Theſe Iberians dwell neer the Euxine Sea; they are a colony of the Iberians in Spain. This captive woman therefore, living amongſt the Barbarians, devoted herſelf to a Philoſophick courſe of life. For together with the ſtricteſt and ſevereſt exerciſes of Chaſtity, ſhe uſed herſelf to moſt tedious and laſting faſts, and to continued prayer. The Barbarians ſeeing this, were amazed at the ſtrangeneſs and novelty of her actions. It hapned, that * the Kings Son, being a very young child, fell ſick. The Queen, according to the cuſtom of that Countrey, ſent the child about to other women to be cured: if perchance by long experience they might know of any cure for the diſtemper. When the young child had been carried about by his nurſe, and could find no cure from any of the women, he was at laſt brought to this captive woman. She in the preſence of many women, applyed not any material remedy, for ſhe had no knowledge of any ſuch Medicines. But, having taken the child, ſhe laid him upon her own bed, which was made of hair-cloath, and only ſpake theſe words: Chriſt (ſaid ſhe) who healed many, ſhall alſo cure this child. Having added a prayer to theſe words, and invoked Gods aſſiſtance, the child immediately recovered, and from that time was very well. The report hereof was noiſed abroad amongſt the Barbarian women, it came alſo to the Queens ear; and the captive woman became more eminent. Not long after the Queen, being fallen into a diſtemper, ſent for the captive woman. She having refuſed to go by reaſon of her modeſty and baſhfull diſpoſition, the Queen herſelf was conveyed to her. The captive woman does the ſame that ſhe before had done to the child. And forthwith the ſick Queen recovered, and returned her thanks to the woman. But ſhe made her this anſwer, it is not I that do this, but Chriſt, who is the Son of that God, who made the world. She therefore exhorted the Queen to call upon

* See Rufinus, book 1. chap. 10. Eccleſ. hiſt. Rufinus does not ſay, that this child was the Kings Son; but, mulier quædam parvulum ſuum, &c. a certain woman (ſays he) carried about her ſon, &c.

CONSTANT. upon him, and to acknowledge the true God. The King of the Iberians, amazed at the suddenness of her recovery from the diſeaſe, having enquired who it was that did theſe cures, preſented the captive woman with Gifts. She anſwered, that ſhe ſtood not in need of wealth, for piety was her riches. But that ſhe ſhould accept it as the greateſt preſent, if he would acknowledge that God who was ſet forth and declared by her. With this anſwer ſhe returned his preſents. The King treaſured up her words in his breaſt. The next day this accident befell the King going out a hunting: There fell a miſt and a thick darkneſs upon the tops of the mountains and forreſts where he was hunting, ſo that their ſport was grown troubleſome, and the way impaſſable. The King being in a very great ſtraight, earneſtly implored [the aſſiſtance of] thoſe Gods whom he worſhipped: But finding he was never the better, at laſt he bethought himſelf of the captive-womans God, and calls upon him to be his aſſiſtant. He had no ſooner prayed, but the darkneſs cauſed by the miſt was diſperſed. Admiring at what was done, he returned home with joy, and having told his Queen what had befallen him, he forthwith ſent for the captive woman, and enquired of her who that God was, whom ſhe worſhipped. When the woman was come into his preſence, ſhe made the King of the Iberians to become a Preacher of Chriſt. For, having been perſwaded by this devout woman to believe in Chriſt, he convened all the Iberians that were his Subjects; and when he had related to them all things concerning the cure of his wife and his child, and alſo what had befallen him in his hunting, he exhorted them to worſhip the God of the captive-woman. Thus therefore they both became Preachers of Chriſt, the King Preached to the men, and the Queen to the women. Moreover, the King, informed by the captive woman of the faſhion of thoſe Churches amongſt the Romanes, commanded an Oratory to be built; and ordered a proviſion of all materials towards the building to be forthwith made. Therefore a Church was erected; and when they went about raiſing of the Pillars, Divine Providence attempts ſomewhat that might perſwade the inhabitants of that Country [to embrace] the Chriſtian Faith. For one of the Pillars continued immoveable. No engine could be invented, that was able to ſtir it. But the ropes were broken, and the engines torn in pieces. The work-men therefore, deſponding and quite out of heart, went away. Then was the captive womans Faith openly manifeſted. For ſhe goes by night to the place without any bodies knowledge, and there ſtayed all night, ſpending the time in fervent prayer: and by Gods Providence the Pillar was raiſed, and ſtood fixt in the air, higher than its baſis, in ſuch a manner that it did not in the leaſt touch its baſis. Aſſoon as it was day, the King, [a] well skilled in architecture, came to the building, and ſees the Pillar hanging in the air above its own baſis. Both he himſelf, and all his attendants were amaz'd at what had happened, for a little while after in their ſight the Pillar deſcended upon its own baſis, and there ſtood fixt. Hereupon they all ſhouted, cried out that the Kings Faith was true, and celebrated the praiſes of the captive-womans God. After this they believed [in Chriſt,] and raiſed up the reſt of the Pillars with great alacrity of mind: and the whole building was in a ſhort time perfectly finiſhed. Afterwards an Embaſſie was ſent from them to Conſtantine the Emperour, whereby they requeſted, that they might both in future be admitted to a confederacie with the Romans, and alſo have a Biſhop and an holy Clergy ſent to them. For they proteſted that they did ſincerely believe in Chriſt. This relation Rufinus ſays he had from [b] Bacurius, who had formerly been a Prince of Iberia: but afterwards coming over to the Romans, he was [c] made a captain within the limits of Paleſtine. At length he was advanced to the Office of a General, and did the Emperour Theodoſius extraordinary good ſervice, in the [d] war againſt Maximus the Tyrant. After this manner were the Iberians converted to the Chriſtian Religion in the times of Conſtantine.

CONSTANT.

[b] The Sfort. Florent. and Allat. M. SS. call this perſons name Bacuriw. But in Rufinus, and others, his name is, more truly, Bacurius. Zoſimus ſays he was born in that Armenia which borders on Iberia, and that he was a man without all malice, or deceit, very expert in Military affairs. But Rufinus (book 1. chap. 10. and book 2. chap. 33. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) affirms he was a Prince of the Iberi; that he was a perſon of great fidelity, very ſtudious of Religion and Truth: firſt made a Captain within the limits of Paleſtine; afterwards Comes of the Domeſticks; and laſtly that he did Theodoſius the Emperour great ſervice in his war with Eugenius. Valeſ. See Valeſius's notes on Amm. Marcell. pag. 430, &c.

[c] At this place Socrates miſtook Rufinus's meaning. For Rufinus ſays that Bacurius was a Captain, Paleſtini limitis, of the Paleſtinian limit; when he told him theſe things. But Socrates ſeems to have read in Rufinus, Paleſtini militis ducem, that Bacurius was a Captain of the Paleſtinian milice. Valeſ.

[d] Here alſo Socrates is out. For Bacurius ſerved not Theodoſius in the war againſt Maximus, but in that againſt Eugenius: as Rufinus atteſts, book 2. chap. 33. Eccleſ. Hiſt. and Zoſimus, book 4. Valeſ.

[a] Inſtead of [ἔμφρων τὶς ὤν, well ſkilled in Architecture] I had rather read [ἔμφοβος ὤν, being very anxious.] I doubt not but Socrates wrote it thus. For in Rufinus (book 1. chap. 10. from whom Socrates borrowed this relation) the words are theſe; cum ecce matutinus & anxius cum ſuis omnibus ingrediens Rex, &c. when behold the King, perplexed in his mind, coming in the morning with all his attendants, &c. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning Antonius the Monk.

IT would be ſuperfluous for us to ſay any thing concerning Antonius the Monk, who at the ſame time lived in the Deſerts of Ægypt, [or to relate] what a man he was, how he openly ſtrove with Devils, and detected all their ſtratagems and attempts; and how he wrought many miracles. For Athanaſius Biſhop of Alexandria has prevented us, having written a particular book concerning his Life: ſuch a plenty of eminent men was there, who lived at one and the ſame time, in the reign of Conſtantine.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning Manes the Author of the Hereſie of the Manichees, and whence he had his original.

BUt it is uſuall for cockle to grow up amongſt the good corn, for the envy [of the Devil] loves to lay ſnares for the righteous. Not long before Conſtantines reign, there ſprung up a kind of heatheniſh Chriſtianity, together with the true Chriſtian Religion, as heretofore falſe-Prophets aroſe up together with the Prophets, and Pſeudo-Apoſtles amongſt the Apoſtles. For in thoſe days one Manichæus attempted clandeſtinely to introduce the opinion of Empedocles the Heathen Philoſopher, into Chriſtianity. This man Euſebius Pamphilus indeed has mentioned, in the * ſeventh book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, but has not accurately

* See Euſebius Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 7. chap. 31.

CONSTANT. curately explained all things concerning him. Wherefore I judge it requiſite to ſupply what he has omitted. For thereby it will be manifeſted, who this Manichæus was, whence he came, and how he arived at ſo high a degree of audaciouſneſs. One Scythianus a Saracen, married a captive woman a native of the Upper Thebais. Upon her account he lived in Ægypt, and having been inſtructed in the Literature of the Ægyptians, he introduced the opinion of Empedocles and Pythagoras into the Chriſtian Religion: aſſerting that there were two natures, the one Good, the other Evil; (as Empedocles alſo did,) the evil nature he termed Diſcord; the good he called Friendſhip. One Buddas, heretofore named Terebinthus, was this Scythianus's Schollar. This man travelling into the Countrey of Babylonia, which is inhabited by the Perſians, told many ſtrange and prodigious things of himſelf, ſaying, that he was born of a Virgin, and educated in the mountains. Afterwards he wrote four books, one he entitled [the book] of Myſteries; another, the Goſpel; the third he called the Theſaurus, and the fourth Heads. But as he was counterfiting the performance of ſome myſterious ſacred Rites, he was thrown down headlong by the Devil, and ſo died. The woman, at whoſe houſe he ſojourned, buried him. She having poſſeſſed her ſelf of his money, bought a boy, about ſeven years old, by name Cubricus: this boy ſhe made free; and when ſhe had bred him a Schollar, ſhe died ſoon after, and left him all Terebinthus's eſtate, and the books alſo which he had written, being inſtructed by Scythianus. Cubricus, now a free-man, takes theſe goods along with him, and travelling into Perſia, changes his name, calling himſelf Manes. Where he diſtributed Buddas's, or Terebinthus's books, as his own genuine works, amongſt his ſeduced followers. Now theſe are the Subjects of thoſe books, in the words they ſeemingly aſſert the Chriſtian Religion, but [if] the opinions [contained in them be attentively conſidered] they are [neer a kin to] Gentiliſm. For Manichæus, being an impious perſon, does incite [his diſciples] to worſhip a plurality of Gods. He alſo teaches, that the [a] Sun is to be adored. Beſides, he introduces Fate, and deſtroys mans free-will. He apparently aſſerts a tranſmutation of Bodies, following herein the opinions of Empedocles, Pythagoras, and the Ægyptians. He denies that Chriſt exiſted in the fleſh, ſaying, that he was a meer * Phantaſm. He does alſo reject the Law and the Prophets: and calls himſelf the Paraclete. All which Tenets, tis manifeſt, are wholly diſagreeable to the orthodox [doctrine of the] Church. Moreover, in his Letters he has been ſo audacious as to ſtile himſelf an Apoſtle. But he met with a condign puniſhment for this impudent lie of his, [which befell him] upon this occaſion. The ſon of the King of Perſia happened to fall ſick; his Father, deſirous to ſave the life of his ſon, left no ſtone unturn'd, as the common ſaying is. Having heard of Manichæus, and ſuppoſing the wonders he did to be real and true, he ſends for him as if he had been an Apoſtle, hoping that he might preſerve his Sons life. When he was come, in a fictitious and pretended manner he takes in hand to cure the Kings ſon. But the King, ſeeing that his ſon died under his hands, clap't him in Priſon, with a deſigne forthwith to put him to death. He made his eſcape [out of Priſon] into Meſopotamia, and ſaved himſelf: But when the King of Perſia had intelligence of his abode in thoſe parts, he [cauſed him] to be brought from thence by force, and flead him alive: and having ſtuffed his skin with chaff, he hanged it up before the City gates. Theſe things, which we relate, are no forgeries of our own, [b] but we collected them out of a book we read over, [intitled] the diſputation of Archelaus, Biſhop of Caſcharum, one of the Cities of Meſopotamia. For this Archelaus ſays, that he diſputed with Manichæus face to face, and what we have written above concerning Manichæus's Life, Archelaus himſelf does relate. Thus therefore does the envy [of the Devil,] as we ſaid before, delight to entrap good affairs when in their moſt flouriſhing poſture. But, for what reaſon the goodneſs of God ſhould permit this to be done, (whether it be that he is deſirous to have the true opinion of the Church brought to the teſt and examined, and wholly to extirpate arrogancy which uſually grows up together with faith, or for what other reaſon) is a queſtion that cannot be ſolved without great difficulty and tediouſneſs: nor can it now be opportunely diſcuſt by us. For, it is not our deſign to examin [the truth] of opinions, or to make reſearches into the abſtruſe accounts of providence and the judgment of God; but, according to our ability, to compoſe a narrative of the affairs that have been tranſacted in the Churches. After what manner therefore the ſuperſtition of the Manichæans [c] ſprang up a little before the times of Conſtantine, it has been ſufficiently declared. Let us now return to [the ſeries of] thoſe times, that are the proper ſubject of the Hiſtory we deſigne.

CONSTANT.

[a] It is moſt apparent that the Manichæans adored the Sun. Libanius relates the ſame concerning them, in book 4. Epiſt. 140. wherein he commends the Manichæans that were in Paleſtine (but ſuppreſſes their name) to Priſcianus the Preſident of Paleſtine: οἱ τὸν ἥλιον ὅτου δεσπότην ὄντες, &c. i.e. Thoſe men that worſhip the Sun without bloud, and honour God with the ſecond appellation, who chaſtize their belly, and account the day of their death to be gain; are found to be in many places, but are every where few in number. They injure no man, but are moleſted by ſome. I doubt not but by theſe words Libanius means the Manichæans; for they cannot be agreeably attributed to any other perſons beſides them. But he deſignedly omitted the mention of their name, becauſe the name of the Manichæans was odious. Concerning the feigned faſts of the Manichæans, ſee Cyrill, in his ſixth Catechef. Valeſ.

* That is, he had only the form or figure of a man; was imaginarily, not really ſuch.

[b] The reading here muſt be [διαλύσῳ ἀγχελαε, out of Archelaus's Dialogue, or diſputation] which appears from the term [ἀναγνόντες, we read.] This Archelaus, Biſhop, of Meſopotamia, wrote the diſpute which he maintained againſt Manichæus, in Syriack: which being afterwards tranſlated into Greek, was in the poſſeſſion of many perſons, as Ferome atteſts, in his book de ſcriptor. Eccleſiaſt. Cyrill of Jeruſalem has mentioned this diſpute, in his ſixth Catechiſm. A fragment of this work is in my hands, wherein is contained the Hiſtory of the impious and perfidious Manichæus. But his diſputation with Archelaus the Biſhop, which was annexed to the cloſe of this Hiſtory, is wanting. In the room whereof is added Archelaus's Epiſtle to Diodorus the Presbyter. I am beholding to the eminent Emericus Bigotius for this monument, as alſo for many others. Valeſ. Valeſius has publiſhed this diſputation of Archelaus's in Latine, at the cloſe of his Annotations upon Sozomen, pag. 197, &c.

[c] In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [παρεφύη, ſprang up;] which is better than [περιεφύη, ſprang up before.] After the ſame manner Socrates expreſſes himſelf in the beginning of this chapter. 'Tis a metaphor taken from Cockle, which is wont to grow up with the Corn. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIII.

How Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, and Theognis Biſhop of Nice, taking courage again, endeavoured to ſubvert the Nicene Creed, by plotting againſt Athanaſius.

Euſebius and Theognis, being returned from exile, recovered their own Churches, having (as we ſaid before) extruded thoſe that had been ordained [Biſhops] in their places: Moreover, they acquired great intereſt and favour with the Emperour, who had an high eſteem for CONSTANT. for them, looking upon them as converts from an Heretical to the orthodox Doctrine. But they abused this favour and liberty granted them, and made more disturbance in the world then formerly they had done; incited thereto by two motives; the one [proceeded] from the Arian Heresie, with which they had been formerly infected; the other from their inveterate hatred against Athanasius; because he had so vigorously opposed them in the Synod, when the Articles of faith were discussed. First of all therefore they began to find fault with Athanasius's ordination, as if he were unworthy of a Bishoprick, and [a] as if his ordination had been performed by unfitting persons. But it was afterwards demonstrated that he was superiour to all manner of calumny: for being seated in the Bishoprick of Alexandria, he stifly and vigorously contended for the Nicene Creed: then Eusebius set all his wits at work to lay a plot for Athanasius, and to bring Arius again into Alexandria. For he supposed this to be the only way to eradicate the * Doctrine of Consubstantiality, and introduce Arianism. Eusebius therefore wrote to Athanasius that he would readmit Arius and his companions [into the Church.] [b] And in his Letter he intreated him, but openly and in publick he threatned him. But when Athanasius could by no means be prevailed with, he attempts to perswade the Emperour to grant Arius leave to come into his presence, and that he would give him a liberty of returning to Alexandria. And by what means he prevailed so far, as to effect this, I will relate in its due place. But before these things were done, there was another commotion raised in the Churches. For her own sons did again disturb the peace of the Church. Eusebius Pamphilus relates, that immediately after the Synod, Ægypt raised mutual factions within it self, but he annexes not the occasion of this division. Whence he is thought by many to have been double-tongued, because, declining to set forth the reasons [of the discords] he had resolved with himself not to assent to what had been determined at Nice. But as we our selves have found from several Letters which the Bishops wrote to one another after the Synod, the term Homoöusios disturbed some mens minds. Whilst they were busying themselves about this word, and made too curious inquiries into its import and meaning, they raised an intestine war amongst themselves. And what was done herein was not unlike a fight in the night. For neither side seemed to understand perfectly, why they reviled one another. For they that had an aversion for the term Homoöusios, look'd upon them that approved of it as introducers of [c] Sabellius's and Montanus's opinion. And therefore they called them blasphemers, as being persons that destroyed the existence of the Son of God. On the other hand, they that were maintainers of the term Homoöusios, supposing the other [their adversaries] to be introducers of [the worship of] many Gods, abominated them, as the bringers in of Gentilism. Eustathius Bishop of Antioch reviles Eusebius Pamphilus as one that adulterates the Nicene Faith. Eusebius answers, that he does in no wise infringe or Violate the Creed [published] at Nice: but accuses Eustathius, for being an Assertour of Sabellius's opinion. For these reasons every one [of the Bishops] wrote Volumes, as if it had been against most bitter enemies: And although both sides asserted, that the Son of God had a * proper, real and peculiar Person and existence, and confessed that there was one God in three Persons, yet (how it came to pass, I know not) they could in no wise agree amongst themselves; and therefore would by no means endure to be at quiet.

incomparably well explained by Dionysius Petavius, in his Dogm. Theolog. Tom. 2. De Trinit. book 4. chap. 8. Sect. 10, &c. pag. 380. Edit. Paris. 1644.

[a] I follow this reading [ὡς μὴ ἂν ἀξιωτέων γεγονυῖαν, as if his ordination, &c. For Eusebius's party found fault with the ordination of Athanasius upon two accounts; both because Athanasius was unworthy of that honour, and also because his ordination had been performed by persons unfitting. See Philostorgius. Vales.

* Τὴν τῆς ὁμοουσίου πίστιν, the faith of Homoöusios; i. e. those words in the Creed, wherein it is asserted that Christ is of the same essence or substance with the father.

[b] Socrates borrowed these words out of Athanasius's second Apology against the Arians; where Athanasius gives an account how Eusebius secretly joyned with the Melitians in a conspiracie against him, these are his very words: Τὴν μὲν ἐν ἀρχῇ πρεσβείαμπε παρῃτέπων δέξασθαί με τὸν ἄρειον· καὶ ἀσφαλῶς ἠπείλει, γεγράφων δὲ ἤξιε. Which words of Athanasius, Sozomen makes use of in his second book, chap. 18. Vales.

[c] It is hard to assign a reason, why Socrates should joyn Montanus with Sabellius. For Montanus himself made no innovations in the doctrine of the Trinity, but followed the faith of the Catholick Church; as Epiphanius attests (in Hæres. Montanist.) and Theodoret (book. 2. Hæret. Fabul.) Yet some of his disciples took away the difference of the persons, as Sabellius did; which Theodoret attests (at the place now cited) in these words: τινὲς δὲ αὐτῶν, &c. But some of them have denyed the three persons of the Godhead, in like manner as Sabellius did, saying that the father, Son, and holy Ghost are one and the same person. And hence it is, that in the Synodicall Epistle of the Arian Bishops at Sardica, Montanus is joyned to Sabellius. Vales.

* Ἑνυπόστατον καὶ συνυπάρχον. The Learned Reader will find these terms in his Dogm. Theolog. Tom. 2. De Trinit. book 4. chap. 8. Sect. 10, &c. pag. 380. Edit. Paris. 1644.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning the Synod convened at Antioch, which deposed Eustathius Bishop of Antioch: upon whose account there was a sedition raised, by which that City was almost ruined.

THerefore, having convened a Synod at Antioch, they depose Eustathius, as one who was better affected towards Sabellius's opinion, than towards what the Nicene Synod had determined. But, as some report, [he was deposed] for other reasons less commendable: which yet they have not openly declared. But this is a thing which the Bishops usually do towards all that they depose; they load them with reproaches, and call them impious persons, but annex not the reasons of their impiety. Now that they deposed Eustathius as a favourer of Sabellius's opinion (Cyrus Bishop of Beræa being his accuser,) Georgius Bishop of Laodicea in Syria (one of their number who hated the term Homoöusios) has related in that Encomium [a] he wrote upon Eusebius Emisenus. Concerning this Eusebius Emisenus we will hereafter speak in its proper place. But Georgius writes [such things as do not very well hang together] concerning Eustathius. For he reports, that Eustathius was accused by Cyrus for an assertour of Sabellius's opinion; again he says, that Cyrus was [b] condemned and deposed for maintaining the same errour.

[a] It is strange to see how notoriously translatours have been mistaken in the version of this place; they perceived not that the last word was to be expunged, as being superfluous. For whenas at first there had been a remarke set in the margin, that instead of [ἔγραψεν, he wrote] it should be otherwise written, thus [εἶπεν, he said:] afterwards this word [εἶπεν, he said] crept out of the Margin, into the Text. Vales.

[b] Whether Cyrus Bishop of Beræa did accuse Eustathius, as being a favourer of Sabellius's opinion, (as Georgius of Laodicea relates,) I know not. But what Georgius writes, to wit, that Cyrus himself was afterwards deposed because he favoured Sabellius's Heresie (i. e. because he defended the doctrine of Consubstantiality; for so these words are to be understood:) is very true. For Athanasius confirms this, in his Epistle ad Solitar. Where he reckons up in order all the Bishops thrust out by the Arians during Constantines reign. And in the first place he names Eustathius Bishop of Antioch, then Eutropius of Adrianople. Afterwards Euphration of the Balanei, the two Cymatius's, Asclepas of Gaza, Cyrus of Beræa and others; who were banished by the Emperours Edict, and others put into their places. Vales.

CONSTANT. But how can it be, that Cyrus ſhould accuſe Euſtathius, for being a Sabellian, who was himſelf a favourer of that Hereſie. It is probable therefore that Euſtathius was depoſed for ſome other reaſons. Moreover, at ſuch time as Euſtathius was depoſed, there was a very great Sedition raiſed in Antioch. And afterwards, [at the conferences] about the election of a Biſhop, there was frequently kindled ſo great a flame [of diſſention,] that it wanted but little of deſtroying the whole City, the populace being divided into two factions: one party of them contended vigorouſly for the tranſlation of Euſebius Pamphilus from Cæſarea in Paleſtine to [the See of] Antioch; the other faction was very earneſt to have Euſtathius reſtored. The whole City in general favoured the one or the other party [of the Chriſtians.] The Military forces alſo were drawn up in battel array [on both ſides] as it were againſt enemies, in ſo much that they were juſt about making uſe of their ſwords, had not God, and the fear of the Emperour repreſſed the violence of the multitude. For the Emperour by his Letters, [c] and Euſebius by his refuſal of the Biſhoprick, appeaſed that Tumult and Sedition. Upon which account the Emperour admired him greatly, and writ a Letter to him, in which he commends his prudent reſolution, calling him happy, becauſe he was judged worthy to be Biſhop not of one City, but almoſt of the whole world. It is recorded therefore that after this the See of Antioch was [d] vacant eight years. But at length, by the diligence of thoſe that plotted the ſubverſion of the Nicene faith, [e] Euphronius is ordained Biſhop. Let thus much be related concerning the Synod convened at Antioch upon Euſtathius's account. Soon after theſe things, Euſebius (who had long before left Berytus, and was now poſſeſſed of the Church at Nicomedia,) made it his buſineſs, together with his confederates, to bring Arius again into Alexandria. But, how they prevailed to effect this their deſign, and after what manner the Emperour was perſwaded to admit Arius and Euzoius into his preſence, we are now to relate.

[c] The meaning of this place is this. The Emperour, by his Letters written to Antioch, and Euſebius, by his refuſing the Biſhoprick of Antioch, appeaſed that tumult. Therefore theſe words [appeaſed the tumult and ſedition] muſt in common belong to both the preceding clauſes. Valeſ.

[d] What Socrates here ſays, concerning the vacancy of the See of Antioch eight years, after Euſtathius was depoſed, is falſe. For immediately after Euſtathius was ejected; when Euſebius of Ceſarea had refuſed that See; Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre was tranſlated to that See, in the year of Chriſt 329: as I before noted in the tenth book of Euſebius's Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, chap. 1. note (a.) Afterwards Euphronius ſucceeded Paulinus; or, as ſome will have it, Eulalius. After whom Flaccillus was advanced to the See of Antioch, who (as Athanaſius atteſts in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians) was at the Synod of Tyre. Valeſ.

[e] Sozomen ſays the ſame; and Theodorus Mopſueſtenus (apud Nicætam in Theſauro Orthodox. fidei.) Which is alſo confirmed by Georgius of Laodicea, in his encomium of Euſebius Emiſenus, Socrates quotes his words, in book 2. chap. 9. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) But Theodoret (book 1. chap. 22. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) puts Eulalius between Euſtathius and Euphronius, and ſays that he preſided but a very ſhort time. Philoſtorgius agrees with Theodoret. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning the Presbyter, who made it his buſineſs to get Arius recalled.

THE Emperour Conſtantine had a ſiſter whoſe name was Conſtantia. She had been married to Licinius who was heretofore colleague in the Empire with Conſtantine, but afterwards he became a Tyrant and was therefore put to death. She had a confident, a Presbyter, one that was a favourer of Arianiſm, who was reckoned amongſt her domeſticks. This man, prompted thereto by Euſebius and thoſe of his faction, did in his familiar diſcourſe with Conſtantia let fall ſome words concerning Arius, ſaying, that the Synod had done him wrong, and that his ſentiments were not ſuch as report repreſented them to be. Conſtantia having heard this was eaſily induced to give credit to the Presbyter. But ſhe had not confidence to declare it to the Emperour. It happened that Conſtantia fell dangerouſly ſick. The Emperour came daily to viſit her in her ſickneſs. But when ſhe was brought into ſo dangerous a condition by her diſtemper, that ſhe expected to die immediately, ſhe recommends the Presbyter to the Emperour, declaring to him his induſtry, piety, and how well affected he was towards his Government: and immediately after ſhe died. The Presbyter was [after this] made one of the Emperours greateſt confidents. And having by degrees got a greater liberty of ſpeaking, he relates to the Emperour the ſame things concerning Arius, that he before told his ſiſter; affirming that Arius had no other ſentiments than what were agreeable to the Synods determination: and that if [the Emperour] would admit him to his preſence, he would give his conſent to what the Synod had decreed: [a] Moreover, that he was falſely accuſed without the leaſt of reaſon. These words of the Presbyters ſeemed ſtrange to the Emperour. Thus therefore he anſwered [the Presbyter,] if Arius does conſent to the Synods determination, and has the ſame ſentiments with that, I will both admit him to my preſence, and alſo ſend him back to Alexandria with repute and honour. Thus he anſwered, and immediately wrote to Arius after this manner.

CONSTANT.

[a] Inſtead of [ᾧ μὴ ἀλόγως συκοφαντεῖσθαι, and that he was falſely accuſed not without reaſon] Sr. Henry Savill and Chriſtopherſon read [ᾧ δὴ ἀλόγως συκοφαντεῖσθαι, Moreover, that he was falſely accuſed without the leaſt of reaſon.] This ſtory concerning the Arian Presbyter (whom Conſtantia Auguſta recommended to her brother Conſtantine) Socrates borrowed out of Rufinus, book 1. chap. 11. Eccleſ. Hiſt. But I ſuſpect the truth of it, for theſe reaſons. Firſt, becauſe Athanaſius (who does uſually detect all the frauds of the Arians) has no where made mention of it. Secondly, in regard the name of this Presbyter is ſuppreſſed: for, if this Preſbyter were in ſo great favour and authority with Conſtantine, that, (as Rufinus relates in the book and chapter now cited,) when the Emperour died, he ſhould leave his Will, which he had written, in the hands of this Presbyter; doubtleſs, he was worthy to have had his name mentioned. But, in my judgment, Rufinus's authority is but ſmall; for he wrote his Hiſtory very careleſly, not from the Records of affaires tranſacted, but from fabulous ſtories, and relations grounded barely on report.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Arius.

It has been ſometime ſince made known to your Gravity, that you ſhould repair to Our Court, in order to your being admitted to the enjoyment of Our preſence. But we much admire, that you have not immediately performed this. Wherefore, aſcend forthwith a publick Chariot, and come with ſpeed to Our Court: That having experienced Our benevolence and care, you may return to your own Countrey. God preſerve you, beloved brother. Dated before the fifth of the Kalends of December.

This was the Emperours Letter to Arius. Here I cannot but admire the Emperours care and zeal for Religion. For 'tis evident by this Letter, that he had before frequently exhorted Arius to a * recantation, in regard he reproves him, that after his frequent writing to him, Arius had not forthwith returned to the truth. Arius therefore having received the Emperours Letters, came ſoon after to Conſtantinople. There came along

* Repentance.

CONSTANT. along with him Euzoïus, whom Alexander had divested of his Deaconship when he deposed Arius and his associates. The Emperour admits them to his presence, and asked them whether they would agree to the [Nicene] faith. They having readily given their assent, the Emperour commanded them to deliver in a Libel containing [the Articles of] their faith.

CHAP. XXVI.

How Arius, being recalled [from exile,] and having given up a Libell of Repentance to the Emperour, did therein hypocritically pretend [himself an assertour of] the Nicene Creed.

HAving therefore composed a Libell, they present it to the Emperour, the contents whereof are as followeth.

Arius and Euzoïus, to our most Religious and most pious Lord Constantine the Emperour. According to the order of your piety most acceptable to God, (our Lord the Emperour,) we do declare our Faith, and in writing profess in the presence of God, that we and all our adherents do believe as followeth. We believe in one God the Father Almighty; and in the Lord Jesus Christ his Son, who was made by him before all worlds: God the Word, by whom all things were made, that are in heaven, and that are in earth: who came down from heaven, and was incarnate, and suffered, and rose again, and ascended into the heavens, who also shall come again to judge the quick and the dead. [We also believe] in the Holy Ghost, and in the Resurrection of the flesh, and in the life of the world to come, and in the kingdom of heaven, and in one Catholick Church of God [which is spred] from one end of the world to the other. This faith we have received from the holy Gospels, the Lord saying to his disciples: Go ye and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost. [a] If we do not thus believe these things, and [if we do not] truly admit of the Father, the Son and the holy Ghost, in such manner as the whole Catholick Church, and the Scriptures (which we believe in all things) do teach, God is our Judge, both now, and in the Judgment to come. We therefore beseech your piety (O Emperour most acceptable to God!) that we being Ecclesiastical persons, and holding the Faith and sence of the Church and the holy Scriptures, may by your pacifick and religious piety be united [b] to our mother, to wit the Church; all questions and superfluous disputations being wholly taken away and suppressed: that so both we and the Church, enjoying a mutual peace and union, may joyntly offer up our usual prayers for the peaceable Reign of your Imperial Majesty, and for your whole Family.

Matth. 28. 19.

[a] After these words, there was wanting this whole clause [εἰ-μὴ τοῦτα ὕπως πι-στεύσωμεν καὶ ἀπο-δεξώμεθα ἀλη-θῶς, πα-τέρα, υἱὸν, καὶ πνεῦμα ἅγιον, If we do not thus believe these things, and [if we do not] truly admit of the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost] which we have made up from the authority of the Allatian M. S. and from Sozomen, book 2. chap. 27. Valesius.

[b] In the Kings M. S. and in Epiphanius Scholasticus, this place is pointed otherwise, thus [to our mother the Church, to wit, all questions, &c.] which distinction displeases me not. Valesius.

CHAP. XXVII.

How Arius returned to Alexandria by the Emperours order, and upon Athanasius's refusal to admit him, Eusebius's faction framed divers accusations against Athanasius before the Emperour.

ARius having thus perswaded the Emperour, returned to Alexandria. But this specious covert was not prevalent enough to suppress the silenced and hidden truth. For when Athanasius denied him reception upon his arival at Alexandria: (in regard he detested the man as an abomination:) he attempted to stir up new commotions in Alexandria, by disseminating his heresie. Moreover, at that time Eusebius did both himself write Letters, and also induced the Emperour to write, that Arius and his complices might be received [into the Church.] But Athanasius did wholly refuse to grant them reception: And he acquainted the Emperour by his Letters that it was impossible for those, who had once rejected the faith, and were anathematized, to be entirely readmitted again [to their degrees in the Church] at their return. But the Emperour, highly incensed [at this return] thus threatned Athanasius in a Letter [a].

[a] After these words, the Florentine M. S. adds these [μέρος ἐπιστολῆς τοῦ βασιλέως, part of the Emperours Letter.] Which are altogether necessary, that the Reader may understand, that not the Emperours whole Epistle, but part of it only, is here inserted. Athanasius, in his second Apology against the Arians, (out of whom Socrates took these passages) producing this Epistle of Constantines, sets these very words before it; and adds, that this Epistle was brought to Alexandria by Syncletius and Gaudentius, Officers belonging to the Imperial Palace. But, that which Socrates affirms (to wit, that Arius came to Alexandria) is not mentioned by Athanasius, nor doe I think it is true. Valesius.

Part of the Emperours Letter.

Having therefore received the knowledge of our will, doe you afford a free ingress to all such as are desirous of entring into the Church. For if we shall receive information that you have prohibited any of those that are desirous [to be united] to the Church, or have hindred their admission, We will immediately send one who shall be impowred by Our order to depose you, and banish you your Countrey.

Thus wrote the Emperour, having a regard to the good of the publick, and being unwilling that [the members of] the Church should be rent asunder. [b] For he laboured to reduce them all to a perfect union. At that time therefore the Eusebians (who were deadly haters of Athanasius,) supposing they had gotten a fair opportunity, made use of the Emperours indignation as instrumental for the execution of their own design. Upon which account they made great disturbances, labouring by that meanes to effect Athanasius's deposition from his Bishoprick: for they hoped that the Arian opinion would become absolutely prevalent by these means only, [to wit,] by a removal of Athanasius. There was therefore by a joynt consent an attack made against him by Eusebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Ursacius of Singidunum [a City] of the Upper Mæsia, and Valens of Mursa in the Upper Pannonia. These persons hire some of the [b] After these words from the Florentine, Sfortian, and Allatian M. SS. we have added this whole period [τοῦ γὰρ πάντας ὑπὸ τὸν ὁμόνοιαν ἄγειν ἐσπούδαζε, For he laboured to reduce them all to a perfect union.] which was wanting in the common Editions. Sozomen has almost the same words, in his second book at the close of chap. 22; but he has changed their order. Valesius.

CONSTANT. Melitian Hereticks, who bring in ſeveral accuſations againſt Athanaſius. And firſt they frame a complaint [againſt him] by [c] Iſion, Eudæmon and Callinicus, who were Melitians, as if Athanaſius had ordered the Ægyptians to pay a linnen garment [under the notion of tribute] to the Church of Alexandria. [d] But Alypius, and Macarius, Preſbyters of the Church of Alexandria, who were then accidentally at Nicomedia, extinguiſhed this accuſation, having informed the Emperour, that what they reported againſt Athanaſius was falſe. Wherefore the Emperour by his Letters ſharply reproved thoſe that informed againſt him: but he adviſed Athanaſius in a Letter to repair to him. But the Euſebian faction, before his arival, and in order to their preventing of it, tack another accuſation to the firſt, far worſe than the former: as if Athanaſius, * entring into a conſpiracy againſt the Emperours affaires, had ſent a little cheſt full of gold to one Philumenus. But the Emperour, having taken cognizance hereof at Pſamathia, which is the Suburbs of the City Nicomedia, and finding Athanaſius innocent, diſmiſſed him with honour; and wrote to the Church of Alexandria, that their Biſhop Athanaſius had been falſly accuſed. It would indeed have been comely and decent to have paſſed over in ſilence thoſe calumnies, which the Euſebians afterwards framed againſt Athanaſius, leſt Chriſts Church ſhould be condemned by thoſe that do not embrace his doctrine. But in regard they have been committed to writing, and expoſed to the view of all men, I therefore judged it neceſſary to treat of theſe matters as compendiouſly as may be, which [if particularized] would require a peculiar volume. Wherefore I will give a ſhort account, whence both the ſubject of the calumny it ſelf, and alſo the contrivers of the falſe accuſation had their original. [e] Mareotes is a region of Alexandria. There are in it a great many, and thoſe very populous villages, and in them many and ſtately Churches. All theſe Churches are under [the juriſdiction of] the Biſhop of Alexandria, and ſubject to his City like Pariſhes. In this Country of Mareotes there was a man, by name Iſchyras, who had committed a fact worthy of a thouſand deaths. For, whenas he had never been admitted into ſacred Orders, he [nevertheleſs] took upon himſelf the name of a Presbyter, and was ſo audacious as to perform the office of a Presbyter. This Iſchyras therefore, detected in the commiſſion of the foreſaid crime, made his eſcape thence, and arriving at Nicomedia, for refuge fled to the Euſebian faction. They, in regard of their hatred towards Athanaſius, receive him as a Presbyter; and promiſe to prefer him to the dignity of a Biſhoprick, if he would frame an accuſation againſt Athanaſius, they deriving a pretence [for this calumny] from thoſe ſtories which Iſchyras had contrived. For he gave out, that he had ſuffered moſt miſerably by an aſſault made upon him: and that Macarius running furiouſly [into the Oratory] as far as the Altar, overturned the Table, broke the myſtical Cup, and burnt the ſacred books. For this accuſation (as I have ſaid) the Euſebians promiſed him a Biſhoprick as his reward, being ſenſible that this accuſation againſt Macarius, would (together with him that was accuſed) overthrow Athanaſius alſo who had ſent Macarius. This accuſation therefore they charged him with afterwards. But before this [calumny they framed] another ſtuffed with all manner of hatred and maliciouſneſs, which we muſt now ſpeak of. Having got a mans hand (whence they had it, I know not, whether they had murdered any man and cut off his hand; or whether they had cut it off from ſome dead body, God only knows, and they that were authours of this fact,) they produced it [pretending] it to be the hand of one [f] Arſenius, a Melitian Biſhop: the hand they expoſed to all mens view, but kept Arſenius concealed. And they reported that Athanaſius had this hand in his cuſtody, and made uſe of it in the performance of ſome magical deluſions. This therefore was the chiefeſt and moſt important point of the accuſation which theſe Sycophants had forged [againſt Athanaſius.] But (as it uſually happens in ſuch caſes) other perſons accuſed him of other matters. For all thoſe who had been his enemies before, did at this time moſt eſpecially make uſe of their utmoſt force againſt him. The Emperour, having intelligence of theſe proceedings, writes to [g] Dalmatius the Cenſor, his brothers ſon, who then kept his reſidence at Antioch in Syria; that he ſhould command the perſons accuſed to be brought before him, and (after he had taken cognizance of the caſe) order them that were convicted to be puniſhed. He alſo ſent Euſebius and Theognis, that Athanaſius might be tried before them. When Athanaſius knew that he was to be ſummoned to appear before the Cenſor, he ſent into Ægypt to find out Arſenius. He had certain information that the man was concealed: but he could not apprehend him becauſe he frequently changed his lurking holes by removing from one place to another. In the interim, the Emperour ſuppreſſed the tryal which ſhould have been before the Cenſor, upon this account. Conſtantine wrote to Antioch, to Dalmatius the Cenſor, [ordering him] to hear the cauſe concerning the murder. The Cenſor therefore ſent to me, to prepare for my defence. Socrates thought that this Dalmatius

[c] We find theſe mens names in that catalogue of the Melitian Biſhops which Alexander procured from Melitius. This Iſion was Biſhop in Athribis, Eudæmon in Tanis, and Callinicus in Peluſium. See Athanaſius's ſecond Apologetick. Valeſ.

[d] Athanaſius (in his Apologetick) calls this man Apis, not Alypius. But names not the place, wherein Conſtantine took cognizance of this matter. Yet Socrates affirms it was at Nicomedia. Further, Baronius relates that theſe affaires were tranſacted in the year of Chriſt 329. But I would rather chooſe to place them on the year following. For theſe things hapned after Euſtathius's depoſition, when Euſebius and Theognius, (returned from their Exile) had procured a great authority and intereſt with Conſtantine. But what the ſame Baronius ſays (to wit, that Conſtantines Letter, concerning Arius's readmiſſion into the Church, was written to Athanaſius in the year of Chriſt 327,) is a palpable miſtake; and he diſſents from Athanaſius, whom notwithſtanding he profeſſes to follow in all things. For Athanaſius relates, that ſoon after Conſtantines Letter, and Arius's repulſe, the Melitians accuſed him of theſe crimes before the Emperour. Valeſ.

* Ἐπιβεβουλεύων τοῖς Βασιλέως πράγμασι; which words, Valeſius has thus rendred, conſpirans adverſus Principem, conſpiring againſt the Emperour.

[e] This paſſage of Socrates is very much enlightned by Athanaſius in his ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians. Whoſe words, becauſe they are miſunderſtood by his tranſlatour, I will here ſet down. Ὁ μαρεώτης χώρα τῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας ὅλη· καὶ οὐδέποτε ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ γέγονεν ἐπίσκοπος, οὐδὲ χωρεπίσκοπος· ἀλλὰ τῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας ἐπισκόπῳ αἱ ἐκκλησίαι πάσης τῆς χώρας ὑποκείνται· ἔχει δὲ ἡ πρεσβύτερον ἔχει τὰς ἰδίας κώμας, μείζονας καὶ ἀριθμῷ δέκα που καὶ πλείονας. That is, Mareotes is a region of Alexandria. In that region there never was a Biſhop, or Deputy Biſhop. But the Churches of that whole region are ſubject to the Biſhop of Alexandria. Each of the Presbyters hath peculiar Villages, (which are very great,) ſometimes ten in number, or more. From theſe words it appears, that every Village of Mareotes had not its particular Presbyter; but that one Presbyter governed ten Villages and ſometimes more. That Village, wherein Iſchyras was, in regard it was the leaſt of all, undoubtedly had neither its peculiar Church, nor Preſbyter. To that Epiſtle which all the Presbyters and Deacons of Mareotes wrote to the Synod of Tyre (which Letter is recorded by Athanaſius in the book now cited) there ſubſcribed fourteen Presbyters, and fifteen Deacons. Valeſ.

[f] This Arſenius was a Biſhop of the Melitians in the City Hypſelis which is in Thebais. In his Epiſtle, which he wrote to Athanaſius, he aſſumes to himſelf this title of honour, Ἀθανασίῳ μακαρίῳ Πάπᾳ Ἀρσενίου ἐπισκόπου ἔτι ποτὲ ὄντος μελίτιον τῆς ὑψηλιτῶν πόλεως, i. e. To Athanaſius the bleſſed Pope, Arſenius Biſhop of the City Hypſelis, one of thoſe ſometimes under Melitius. But in the catalogue of Biſhops of the Melitian faction, which Melitius delivered to Alexander, no Arſenius can be found. Valeſ.

[g] Socrates took this out of Athanaſius, in his ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians, his words are theſe; Γράφει δὲ Κωνσταντῖνος, &c. Conſtantine wrote to Antioch, to Dalmatius the Cenſor, matius was the son of Constantines brother, he that some years after was made Cæsar by Constantine. But that is a great mistake. For Dalmatius the Censor was Constantines brother, and the Father of Dalmatius the Cæsar. The Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle confirms this, who writes thus concerning Constantine, Καὶ Δαλμάτιον τὸν υἱὸν ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ Δαλματίου τοῦ κένσωρος & καίσαρος ἀνηγόρευε; i. e. and he created Dalmatius (the son of his brother Dalmatius the Censor) Cæsar. Certainly, Dalmatius the son of Dalmatius was (when these things were done which are related by Athanasius) very young, and could not sit as judge in so weighty an affair. Besides, he lived at that time at Narbona, and (together with Hannibalianus his brother) was an Hearer of Exuperius the Rhetorician. For from that City he was sent for by Constantine, and created Cæsar when very young (as Ausonius affirms in his book de Professor. Burdigal.) in the year of Christ 335. But that tryal concerning the murder of Arsenius was before Dalmatius the Censor at Antioch, (as Athanasius attests,) in the year of Christ 332, according to Baronius's opinion. Vales.

CHAP. XXVIII.

That the Emperour ordered a Synod of Bishops should be convened at Tyre, upon account of the accusations brought against Athanasius.

THe Emperour had ordered a Synod of Bishops to meet, that they might be present at the consecration of the Church which he had erected at Jerusalem. He therefore issued out an order that those Bishops [before they met there] should first be convened at Tyre, and by the by make researches into Athanasius's case: that so [all occasions of] contention being by this means wholly taken away, they might more peaceably perform the * solemnities of the Churches dedication, and consecrate it unto God. [a] This was the thirtieth year of Constantines Empire. Moreover, there were assembled at Tyre Bishops out of divers places, to the number of sixty, upon the summons of Dionysius, a person that had born the Consulship. Macarius the Presbyter was brought from Alexandria, bound in iron chains, under the custody of a guard of Souldiers. But Athanasius would not have come thither (not that he so much dreaded the accusations brought against him: for he was not conscious to himself that he was guilty of those things he was accused for: but he was afraid least they should make any innovations there in opposition to what had by common consent been approved of at the Synod of Nice.) But yet he dreaded the Emperours menacing letters. For he had written to him that if he would not come voluntarily, he should be brought by force. Therefore Athanasius also was present there, being necessitated to it.

* Τὰ ἐπιβατήρια τῆς ἐκκλησίας. Concerning the import of this word, the learned Reader may consult Scaliger. Poetic. Lib. 3. Cap. 106. Epibaterion.

[a] The Synod of Tyre was held in the consulates of Constantius and Albinus, (as Athanasius attests,) in the year of Christ 335.

This was the 28th year of Constantines Empire. His 29th year began (during the same mens consulates) on the 8th of the Calends of August, on which day Constantine celebrated his Tricennalia (i. e. the festivals for his having arrived to the 30th year of his Empire) as Idatius attests, (in Fast.) anticipating that solemnity one whole year. This anticipation of his Tricennalia has induced not only Socrates, but several others also, into a mistake. Vales.

CHAP. XXIX.

Concerning Arsenius, and his hand which was reported to have been cut off.

MOreover, Divine Providence forced Arsenius to go to Tyre. For having neglected the commands which the Sycophants, whose hireling he was, had given him, he came in a disguise, to see what would be done there. It accidentally hapned, that the servants of [a] Archelaus (who was the Consularis) heard some persons in an Inn say, that Arsenius (the person reported to have been murthered) was there kept concealed in some [Citizens] house. When they had heard this, and had taken good notice of them that spoke these words, they gave their Master an account of what they had heard. He, without the least delay, immediately searched for the man and found him: and when he had found him, ordered he should be secured. And gives notice to Athanasius not to be in the least disturbed: for Arsenius was alive and present there. Arsenius being apprehended, denied that he was [Arsenius.] But Paul Bishop of Tyre, who had formerly known him, made it appear that he was the person. Divine Providence having before hand disposed of these things after this manner, soon after Athanasius was summoned by the Synod. And when he had made his appearance, the Sycophants produced the hand, and enforced their accusation [against him.] But he * demeaned himself prudently. For he enquired of those that were present, and of his Accusers, whether any of them knew Arsenius. When a great many answered that they knew him very well, he caused Arsenius to be brought in before them, having his hands hid under his upper long garment: then he asked them again; is this the man that hath lost his hand? Hereupon, they (excepting those that knew whence the hand had been cut off) were astonished at the strangeness of the thing. For all the rest thought that Arsenius had really wanted a hand, and they expected that Athanasius would make his own defence some other way. But he took Arsenius's garment, and turning it on one side, shews the mans hand. Again, when some supposed that his other hand was wanting, he made a short stay, permitting them to continue dubious. Immediately after, without any further delay, he turned aside the other part [of his garment] and shewed Arsenius's other hand: after which he thus addressed himself to the company; Arsenius, as you see, is found to have two hands: as for the third, let my Accusers shew the place whence it was cut off.

* Σοφῶς μετῆλθε τὸ πρᾶγμα, ordered the matter prudently: this is the import of these words, if rendred literally.

[a] Rufinus, in book 1. chap. 16. of his Ecclesiastick History, says that this Archelaus was not the Consularis (or President) of Phœnicia, but the Comes of the East. Vales.

CHAP. XXX.

That Athanasius being found innocent after his first accusation, his Accusers made their escape by flight.

THese affairs concerning Arsenius having been thus transacted, they who had contrived this fraud, were reduced to a straight. But [a] Achab, (who was also called John) Athanasius's Accuser, slipt away out of the Court of judicature, and so made his escape in the tumult. Thus Athanasius cleared himself from this accusation, without making use of any * exception. For he was confident, that the bare sight of Arsenius being alive would abash the Sycophants.

[a] In Athanasius's second Apologetick, pag. 783. Edit. Paris. the words are Ἀρχάφ ὁ καὶ Ἰωάννης, Archaph, who is also called John. In the Epistle of Alexander Bishop of Thessalonica to Athanasius, he is also called Archaph. Therefore, this man had two names, he was called Archaph, by the Egyptians, which was his Countrey name: John was his Monastick name. He was a Bishop of the Melitian faction at Memphis. Athanasius relates, that he was commanded by Constantine to agree with his Arch-Bishop. Athanasius means Constantines Letter to John, which he gives an account of, at pag. 787. of *his second Apologet. CHAP. XXXI.

That Athanaſius fled to the Emperour, upon the Biſhops not admitting of his defence at his ſecond accuſation.

BUt in his diſproof of the falſe accuſations brought againſt Macarius, he made uſe of legal exceptions. And firſt he excepted againſt Euſebius and his companions, as being enemies, alledging that no man ought to be judged by his adverſaries. Afterwards he ſaid, that it muſt be demonſtrated, that Iſchyras the Accuſer had really procured the dignity of a Presbyter. For ſo it was written in the Libel of Accuſation. But when the Judges would not allow of any of theſe exceptions, Macarius's cauſe was brought in. After that the Accuſers were almoſt wearied out and quite faint, the further hearing of the cauſe was defered till ſuch time as ſome perſons ſhould make a journey into Marcotes, that they might make inquiſition upon the place concerning all matters that were doubtful. But when Athanaſius perceived that thoſe very perſons were ordered to go, whom he had excepted againſt; (for Theognis, Maris, Theodorus, Macedonius, Valens, and Urſacius were ſent:) he cried out that their proceedings were treacherous and fraudulent. For it is unjuſt [ſaid he] that Macarius the Presbyter ſhould be kept in bonds, and that his Accuſer, together with his Adverſaries the judges ſhould go; and [that this was done] for this reaſon, [to wit,] that the memorials of the Acts might be made up [in favour] of one ſide only. After Athanaſius had ſpoke theſe words aloud, and made proteſtation before the whole Synod and Dionyſius the preſident, when he ſaw that no body took notice of him, he privately withdrew. Thoſe therefore that were ſent to Mareotes, having regiſtred the Acts in favour of one ſide only, as if thoſe things had been moſt certainly true, [a] which the Accuſer had depoſed; made [their return to Tyre.]

[a] This place is imperfect, as any one may perceive. It may be made perfect, if inſtead of [ἦλθον] we make this addition [ἤλθοντο τῆς ἐπανόδου, made their return to Tyre:] which we have followed in our Verſion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXII.

That after Athanaſius's departure, he was depoſed by the Vote of the Synod.

ATHanaſius being gone away, fled immediately to the Emperour. The Synod in the firſt place condemned him in his abſence for deſerting his cauſe. But when the Acts, which had been made up in Mareotes arived, they paſſed the ſentence of depoſition againſt him; loading him with reproaches in the [a] Libel of his depoſition, but mentioned not a word how ſhamefully the Sycophants had been vanquiſhed in the accuſation of the murder. Arſenius alſo, who was reported to have been murdered, was received by them.

[a] Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon render theſe words [ἐν τοῖς καθαιρετικοῖς] thus, depoſitionis cauſas, the cauſes of his depoſition. But I ſuppoſe, that by theſe words is meant the Libel of his depoſition, or the Synodical Epiſtle concerning the condemnation and depoſition of Athanaſius. Socrates uſes the ſame term, in his ſecond book chap. 1. If any one be deſirous to peruſe a copy of theſe Epiſtles, there is extant a Synodical Epiſtle of the Council of Antioch, concerning the depoſition of Paul of Samoſata: alſo, the Synodical Epiſtle of the Council of Sardis, concerning the depoſition of Gregorius Alexandrinus, Valens, Urſacius, and other Arian Prelates. Valeſ.

He had at firſt been a Biſhop of the Melitian Hereſie: But he ſubſcribed Athanaſius's depoſition, as being at that time Biſhop of the [b] Hypſelites. And thus (which was very ſtrange) he that was reported to have been murdered by Athanaſius, being alive, depoſed Athanaſius.

[b] In Athanaſius the reading is truer, thus [ὑψηλείων πόλεως, of the City of the Hypſelites,] as we noted before. Stephanus (de Urbibus) ſays Hypſelis is a Town in Egypt; and that the inhabitants thereof are called Hypſelites. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXIII.

How the Synod, having left Tyre, came to Jeruſalem, and after the celebration of the feaſt of Dedication of the New Jeruſalem, readmitted Arius to communion.

IN the interim the Emperours Letters arrived, commanding the Synod to give their ſpeedy attendance at New Jeruſalem. And immediately with all poſſible expedition they haſtned from Tyre to Jeruſalem. Where after they had finiſhed the ſolemnities of the conſecration of the places, they [a] readmitted Arius and his aſſociates into the Church, ſaying, that they did it in obedience to the Emperours Letters, by which he had ſignified to them that he was fully ſatisfied as touching Arius and Euzoius's faith. Moreover, they wrote Letters to the Church of Alexandria, that all envy and hatred was now baniſhed, and that the affaires of the Church were in a peaceable and ſedate poſture: and that Arius, in regard by his repentance he had acknowledged the truth, was in future to be received by them, and that deſer-

[a] In Athanaſius's ſecond Apology againſt the Arians, and in his book de Synodis Arimini and Seleucia, this Synodick Epiſtle of the Jeruſalem Council is recorded; in which Epiſtle the Biſhops, who had been convened there for the dedication of Conſtantines Church, do atteſt, that they had received into communion τοὺς περὶ Ἄρειον, Arius and his followers: which they had done according to the Emperours command, who by his Letters had ſignified to them, that he himſelf knew that thoſe mens faith was true and orthodox, both from their own atteſtation by word of mouth, and alſo from the Libel of faith which they preſented to him. Which Libel Conſtantine had annexed to his Letters. Now, he means that Libel of faith, which Arius and Euzoius had preſented to Conſtantine, mentioned by Socrates before, at the 26 chapter of this firſt book; and by Sozomen, book 2. chap. 27. For when Arius had preſented a Libel of his faith to Conſtantine, Conſtantine, believing his doctrine to be agreeable to the Nicene faith, would not himſelf give his judgment concerning this matter; but remitted him to the examination of the Jeruſalem Council, as Ruſinus and Sozomen do relate. Athanaſius alſo (in his book de Synodis) affirms expreſly, that Arius and his aſſociates were received into communion by the Jeruſalem Synod: his words are theſe, ἐγὼ μὲν τὸ ἐξοικισθῆναι τὸν ἐπίσκοπον τῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας Ἀθανάσιον, γεγράφαμεν δεῖν δεχθῆναι ἄρειον καὶ τοὺς σὺν αὐτῷ, and after the baniſhment of Athanaſius Biſhop of Alexandria, writing that they ſhould admit to communion Arius and his followers, &c. But I ſuppoſe that Arius the Arch-Heretick is not to be meant here, but another Arius, his name ſake, who had been condemned by Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria, together with Arius his Ringleader. For Arius the Arch-Heretick died long before the Jeruſalem Synod, as I have evidently proved in my ſecond book of Eccleſiaſtick obſervations, chap. 2. [The Learned Reader will find three books of Eccleſiaſtick obſervations written by Valeſius, and publiſht at the latter end of the ſecond Vol. of his Greek Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorians.] Therefore, that Arius, who together with Euzoius, preſented a Libel of his faith to Conſtantine, is a different perſon from Arius the Arch-Heretick. Which may be demonſtrated by another argument. This Arius who preſented a Libel to Conſtantine together with Euzoius, was not reſtored before the Jeruſalem Synod, that is, before the year of Chriſt 335; nor joyned to the Catholick Church. For he requeſts of the Emperour in the foreſaid Libel, that all altercations being taken away by his piety, he may be united to the Catholick Church. But Arius the Arch-Heretick was recalled from exile long before, and readmitted to communion, as the penitentiary-Libel of Euſebius and Theognius doth atteſt. For Euſebius and Theognius do ſay there expreſly, that the authour of the whole controverſie (to wit, Arius) having given ſatisfaction, was entirely reſtored. Further, Euſebius and Theognius ſent that Libel to the Biſhops, in the year of Chriſt 328. as I ſhewed before. Therefore Arius the Hareſiarch muſt neceſſarily have been recalled at the beginning of the ſame year. Valeſ.

CONSTANT. vedly, as being a member of the Church. [b] [But] they obscurely intimated that Athanasius was deposed from his Bishoprick [by their saying that all envy and hatred was now banished.] Moreover, they wrote to the Emperour, informing him of the same affaires. Whilst the Bishops were transacting these things, other Letters came unlookt for from the Emperour, which signified to them that Athanasius was fled to him for refuge: and that upon his account they must necessarily come to Constantinople. Now the Emperours intervening Letter is as followeth.

[b] This place is imperfect; it is easier to pick out the meaning of it, than to correct the words. Socrates therefore would say, that the Bishops, in their Synodical Epistle, do obscurely mean Athanasius, when they say, that all envy and hatred now was banished, &c. Vales.

CHAP. XXXIV.

That the Emperour by his Letter summoned the Synod to attend him, that Athanasius's case might be accurately discussed in his presence.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to the Bishops Assembled at Tyre.

IT is indeed unknown to Us, what hath tumultuously and tempestuously been determined by your Synod. But the truth seemeth in a manner to be perverted by a certain turbulent disorder, to wit, whilst by reason of your mutual contention, which you are desirous should be insuperable, you consider not those things that are well pleasing to God. But it will [We hope] be the work of Divine Providence, to dissipate the mischiefs of this pertinacious contentiousness, after they are manifestly detected; and to make it perspicuous to Us, how great a care you that have been convened have had of the Truth, and whether you have determined the matters that have been discussed by you without any favour or malice. Therefore, all of you must of necessity with speed attend upon Our piety, that you your selves may render an accurate account of what hath been done by you. Now, for what reason we thought it requisite to write these things to you, and to summon you before our selves by this Letter, you shall understand from the sequel. As We were making our entry into Constantinople the City that bears Our name, [situate in] Our own most flourishing Countrey; (it hapned that We then rode on Horse-back:) on a sudden Athanasius the Bishop, together [a] with some Presbyters whom he had about him, approacht Us in the midst of the high way so unexpectedly, that he put Us into a consternation. For God the Inspectour of all things is our witness, that at first sight We were unable even to discern who he was, had not some of Our [servants] upon Our enquiry told Us (as it was meet) both who he was, and what injuries he had suffered. At that time We neither spoke to, nor had any discourse with him. But when he requested that he might be heard, and We had refused that, and in a manner ordered he should be removed from our presence; with a greater confidence he said, that he desired nothing else but your appearance here, that (being necessitated thereto) he might in Our presence make a complaint of his sufferings. Wherefore, in regard this seemed reasonable to Us, and a matter befitting Our times, We willingly gave order for the writing of these things to you: that all you, who made up the Synod convened at Tyre, should without delay hasten to the Court of Our piety, in order to your making a real demonstration of the integrity and unbyassedness of your determination; to wit, in the presence of Us, whom none of you can deny to be a genuine servant of God. For by the worship we exhibit to the deity, peace doth every where flourish, and the name of God is sincerely praised even by the [b] Barbarians themselves, who till this time have been ignorant of the truth. Moreover, it is manifest, that he who knows not the truth, acknowledges not God. Nevertheless, as we said before, even the Barbarians have (upon Our account who are Gods genuine servant) acknowledged the Deity, and have learned to pay a Religious worship to him, by whose Providence, as they have been really and truely made sensible, we are every where protected and provided for. Upon which account chiefly they have been brought to the knowledge of God; whom they worship out of a dread towards Us. But [c] we, who seem to have a greater esteem for, (for We will not say, to defend) the holy mysteries of his Church: We say, We do nothing else, but what belongs to discord and hatred, and (to speak plainly) what tends to the destruction of mankind. But, as we said before, come all of you to Us speedily; with a full assurance, that with our utmost vigour we will endeavour the accomplishing of this, [namely] that those things [comprehended] in the Law of God may most especially be preserved firm and unshaken (on which no reproach or ill opinion can possibly be fixt,) to wit, by dissipating, breaking to pieces, and utterly destroying the enemies of the Law, who under the covert of [Christs] holy name introduce various and different sorts of Blasphemies.

[a] In Athanasius's second Apology against the Arians (where this Epistle of Constantines is recorded) the reading is [μεθ' ἑτέρων πινῶν, together with some others.] But the reading we follow, to wit, [μετ ἱερέων πινῶν, with some Presbyters] is better; which is confirmed by Epiphan. Scholasticus. Vales.

[b] Perhaps he means the Iberians, concerning whose conversion Socrates has spoken before. Vales.

[c] In Leo Allatius's M. S. and in Athanasius, the reading of this place is [οἱ τὰ ἅγια, &c. Ye, who seem to have a greater esteem for ---the holy mysteries of his clemency.] Epiphanius Scholasticus read this passage thus also, as appears from his version: where, instead of [We, who seem, &c.] it is [ye, who seem, &c.] which is confirmed by the Florent. M. S. Vales.

CHAP. XXXV.

That, when the Synod came not to the Emperour, the Eusebians accused Athanasius, as if he had threatned, that he would prohibit the carriage of that Corn, with which Alexandria furnished Constantinople. Whereupon the Emperour, being incensed, banished Athanasius, confining him to the Gallia's.

THis Letter put those present at the Synod into a great perplexity of mind. Wherefore most of them returned to their own Cities. But Eusebius, Theognis, Maris, Patrophilus, Ursacius and Valens, going to Constantinople, would not suffer any further enquiry to be made concerning breaking the Cup, overturning the [Communion] Table, and the murthering of Arsenius: but they proceeded to another calumny, having informed the Emperour, that Athanasius had threatned to prohibit the sending of the Corn, which was usually conveighed from Alexandria to Constantinople: and that these words were said by Athanasius in the hearing of Adamantius, Anubion, [a] Arbathion and Peter, all Bishops. For a calumny hath a greater force and prevalency, when the false Accuser is a person of repute and credit. The Emperour, thus circumvented

[a] In Athanasius's second Apology, this man is called Arbetion. But it must be read with a diphthong, thus, Arbætion. For 'tis a Greek name derived from Arbætus; of which name there was a Consul in Constantius's reign, as I have observed in my notes on Amm. Marcellin. Vales.

CONSTANT. cumvented and incenſed, puniſheth Athanaſius with baniſhment, ordering him to inhabit the Gallia's. There are thoſe that ſay this was done by the Emperour, with a deſign thereby to procure a general union in the Church, in regard Athanaſius had wholly refuſed to communicate with Arius and his followers. But he lived [in exile] at Triers a City of Gallia.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Concerning Marcellus [Biſhop] of Ancyra, and Aſterius the Sophiſta.

THe Biſhops that were convened at Conſtantinople did alſo depoſe Marcellus Biſhop of Ancyra in Galatia the leſs, upon this account. There was one Aſterius a Profeſſour of Rhetorick in Cappadocia, who left the teaching of that art, and owned himſelf a Profeſſour of the Chriſtian Religion. He alſo took in hand to write books (which are extant to this day) wherein he aſſerted Arius's opinion, ſaying, that Chriſt is the Power of God in the ſame ſence that the Locuſt and Palmer-worm are in Moſes ſaid to be the Power of God, and other ſuch like [Blaſphemies] as theſe. This Aſterius was continually in company with the Biſhops, and with thoſe Biſhops moſt eſpecially that were not diſaffected to Arianiſme: Moreover, he came frequently to Synods, being very deſirous to creep into the Biſhoprick of ſome City. But he got not ſo much as a Presbyterſhip, becauſe he had ſacrificed in the time of Perſecution. He went up and down to the Cities of Syria, and [a] recited in publick the books he had made. When Marcellus underſtood this, being deſirous to [b] oppoſe him, through an over great earneſtneſs [in his confutation of him] he fell into the contrary errour. For he audaciouſly aſſerted, that Chriſt was a meer man, as Paul of Samoſata did. Which when the Biſhops then convened at Jeruſalem had intelligence of, they took no notice of Aſterius, becauſe he was not enrolled in the catalogue of the Presbyters. But they required of Marcellus, as being a Prieſt, an account of the [c] Book written by him. And when they found that he held Paul of Samoſata's principles, they commanded him to alter his opinion. He, aſhamed [of what he had done,] promiſed to burn his Book. But the convention of Biſhops being haſtily diſſolved, upon the Emperours ſummoning of them to Conſtantinople; when the Euſebians came to Conſtantinople, Marcellus's caſe was again diſcuſſed. And upon Marcellus's refuſal to burn his impious and unhappy Book according to his promiſe, the Biſhops there aſſembled depoſed him, and ſent Baſilius in his room to Ancyra. Moreover, Euſebius wrote three Books by way of Anſwer and Confutation of this Book, [of Marcellus's,] in which he manifeſtly laid open and reproved his falſe opinion. But Marcellus afterwards recovered his Biſhoprick in the Synod of Sardis, ſaying that his Book was not rightly underſtood, and therefore he was judged to favour Paul of Samoſata's Doctrine. But we will ſpeak of this in its proper place.

[a] Athanaſius (in his book de Synodis) ſays that this Aſterius ſate in the Church amongſt thoſe that were of the Clergy, and recited his books in publick. Valeſ.

[b] In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [ἀντιγράφειν, to write againſt him.] So Epiphan. Scholaſt. ſeems to have read. Valeſ.

[c] This book of Marcellus's was intitled, de ſubjectione Chriſti, concerning Chriſt's ſubjection; as Hilarius informs us, in the fragment of his book, de Synodis. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXVII.

How, after Athanaſius was exiled, Arius, being ſent for from Alexandria by the Emperour, raiſed diſturbances againſt Alexander Biſhop of Conſtantinople.

WHile theſe things were tranſacted, the thirtieth year of Conſtantines Reign was compleated. [a] Arius and his followers being returned to Alexandria, cauſed a general diſturbance in that City again. For the populace of Alexandria were very much troubled both at Arius and his Complices's return, and alſo at the exile of their Biſhop Athanaſius. But when the Emperour underſtood the perverſneſs of Arius's mind, he ordered him to be ſent for again to Conſtantinople, there to give an account of the diſturbances he had endeavoured to rekindle. Alexander, who had ſome time before that ſucceeded Metrophanes, did then preſide over the Church of Alexandria. The conflict this man had with Arius at that time, was a ſufficient proof of his piety and acceptableneſs to God. For upon Arius's arrival there, both the people were divided into two factions, and there alſo aroſe an univerſal commotion all the City over: ſome of them affirming, that the Nicene Creed ought to continue unſhaken and without any alteration; and others pertinaciouſly aſſerting that Arius's opinion was conſonant to reaſon; Alexander was hereupon reduced to a great ſtraight. And more eſpecially, becauſe Euſebius of Nicomedia had ſorely threatned him, ſaying that he would forthwith cauſe him to be depoſed, unleſs he would admit Arius and his followers to Communion. But Alexander was not ſo ſollicitous about his own depoſition, as he was fearful of the enervating of the Doctrine of Faith, which they earneſtly endeavoured to ſubvert. For looking upon himſelf as the keeper and patron of the determinations made by the [Nicene] Synod, he made it wholly his buſineſs to prevent the wreſting and depravation of thoſe Canons. Being therefore reduced to thoſe extremities, he entirely bad farwell to [the aſſiſtances of] Logick, and made God his Refuge. He devoted himſelf to continued faſts, and omitted no form or manner of praying. Now, he made this reſolution within his own mind, and what he had reſolved he ſecretly performed. Having ſhut up himſelf alone in the Church which is called Irene, he went to the Altar, laid himſelf proſtrate on the ground under the [b] holy Table, and poured forth his prayers [to God] with tears: he continued doing this for many nights and days together. Moreover, he asked of God, and received [what he had deſired.] His petition was this; that if Arius's opinion were true, he might not ſee the day appointed for the diſquiſition thereof: but, if that Faith which he profeſſed were true, that Arius (in regard he was the Authour of all theſe miſchiefs) might ſuffer condign puniſhment for his impiety.

[a] Socrates does here follow Ruſinus, who ſays that Arius (after the Synod at Jeruſalem) returned to Alexandria; and a little after that (when his devices would doe no good there) was recalled to Conſtantinople by Euſebius. But all this is falſe, as we intimated before, in regard Arius died long before the Jeruſalem Synod. Valeſ.

[b] Ruſinus (book 1. chap. 12. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) from whom Socrates borrowed this, words this paſſage thus, ſub altari jacens, lying under the altar. Sozomen tells the ſame ſtory; book 2. chap. 29. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Concerning Arius's death.

THis was the subject of Alexanders prayer. Now the Emperour, desirous to make tryal of Arius, sends for him to the Pallace, and enquired of him, whether he would give his assent to the determinations of the Nicene Synod. He, without any delay readily subscribed in the Emperours presence, making use of evasive shifts to elude and avoid what had been determined concerning the Faith. The Emperour, admiring hereat, compelled him to swear. This he also did, by making use of fraud and deceit. Moreover, the manner of artifice he made use of in subscribing was, as I have heard, this. Arius, they say, wrote that opinion he maintained in a piece of paper, and hid it under his arm-pit: and then swore that he did really think as he had written. What I have written concerning his having done this, is grounded on hear-say only. But I have collected out of the Emperours own Letters, that he swore, besides his bare subscribing. Hereupon the Emperour believed him, and gave order to Alexander Bishop of Constantinople to admit him to Communion. It was then the Sabbath day, and on the day following he expected that he should be a member of the assembly of believers. But Divine vengeance closely followed Arius's audaciousness. For, when he went out of the Imperial Pallace, he was attended by the Eusebian faction, like guards, through the midst of the City, in so much that the eyes of all people were upon him. And when he came neer that place which is called Constantines Forum, where the pillar of porphyrie, is erected, a terror [proceeding] from a consciousness [of his impieties] seiz'd Arius, which terrour was accompanied with a loosness. Hereupon he enquired whether there were an house of office neer, and understanding that there was one behind Constantines Forum, he went thither. A fainting fit seized him; [a] and together with his excrements his fundament fell down forthwith, and a great flux of bloud followed, and his small guts. And bloud gushed out, together with his spleen and liver. He died therefore immediately. But the house of office is to be seen at this day in Constantinople, as I said, behind Constantines Forum, and behind the Shambles in the Piazza: and by every ones pointing with their finger at the jakes as they go by, the manner of Arius's death will never be forgotten by posterity. This accident hapning, a fear and an anxietie seized Eusebius of Nicomedia's faction: and the report hereof quickly spread it self all over the City, nay I may say over the whole world. But the Emperour did more zealously adhere to Christianity, and said that the Nicene Faith was now truly confirmed by God himself. He was also very glad, both at what had hapned, and also upon the account of his three sons, whom he had proclaimed Cæsars: each of them was created at every * Decennalia of his Reign. The Eldest of them (called Constantine after his own name) he created Governour over the Western parts of the Empire, in the first tenth year of his Reign. His second son, Constantius (who bore his Grandfathers name,) he made Cæsar in [b] the Eastern parts of the Empire, in the twentieth year of his Reign. The youngest, called Constans he created [Cæsar] in the thirtieth year of his Empire.

CONSTANT.

* Or, every tenth year of his Empire.

[b] It should not be [τὸν δὲ πρὸς τῇ ἕωα μερῶν] but [πρὸς δὲ, &c. in the Eastern parts.] And, a little before, it must be [τῷ πάππῳ ὁμώνυμον, of the same name with his Grandfather:] as it is in the Allat. M. S. But the vulgar reading is tolerable. For the Greek term [ἐπώνυμος] is used not only to signifie him who gives his name to another; but in respect to him also, who takes his name from another. So Socrates does usually stile Constantinople ἐπώνυμον Κωνσταντίνου, a City that took its name from Constantine. Vales.

[a] In Leo Allatius's M. S. (or in Theodorus Lectors Tripertite History) this place is worded thus, [καὶ αἷμα διαχωρήματα παρεκπίπτει ἢ ἕδρα, τό τε ὑγρὸν ἅμα ἰατρῶν γαλεώδων ἀπόφυσμα παραυτίκα διὰ τῆς ἕδρας ἐξέπιπτεν, αἵματός τε πλῆθος ἐπικολάδες, καὶ τὰ λέπτα, ἅπερ ἐντέρων σωλῆνές τε καὶ πάσι; and together with his excrements his fundament slid secretly down, and that termed by Physitians the Apephthesma fell immediately through his fundament; which was followed by a great flux of bloud, and his small guts ran out, together with his spleen and liver.] Which passage is in my judgment incomparably well expressed. Nor do I doubt but Socrates wrote thus. 'Tis certain, Epiphanius Scholasticus does in part confirm this reading. Also, in the Sfortian M.S. it is [παρεκπίπτει, slid secretly down] instead of [ἐκπίπτει, fell down.] Vales.

CHAP. XXXIX.

How Constantine, falling into a distemper, ended his life.

THe Year after, the Emperour Constantine, having just entred the sixty fifth year of his age, falls sick. He therefore left Constantinople and went by water to Helenopolis, to make use of the medicinal hot springs situate in the vicinage of that City. But when he was sensible that his distemper increased, he deferred bathing. And removed from Helenopolis to Nicomedia. He kept his Court there in the Suburbs, and received Christian Baptism. He was hereupon very chearfull, and made his will, wherein he left his three sons heirs of the Empire, allotting to every one of them their part, as he had done in his life time. He left many Legacies both to [a] Rome and to Constantinople, and he intrusted his Will with that [b] Presbyter, by whose intercession Arius was recalled, of whom we spoke something * before: injoyning him not to deliver it into any mans hands, except his Son Constantius's, whom he had constituted Governour of the East. After he had made his Will, he lived some few days and then died. Moreover, none of his Sons were with him at his death. Therefore there was one immediately dispatcht into the East, to inform Constantius of his Fathers death.

[a] Concerning this gift, which Constantine by his will bequeathed to the Elder-Rome, our Eusebius is a witness; in his 4th book of Constantines Life, chap. 63. Vales.

* Chap. 25. of this Book.

[b] Socrates borrowed this out of Rufinus, book 1. Eccles. Hist. chap. 11. But this story seems to me very improbable. For who can believe that the Emperour Constantine, who then had many Bishops about him, (for so Eusebius says expressly;) as also Grandees and great Officers, should make choice of one Presbyter, an unknown person, (for his name is always concealed) to whom he might commit the keeping of his Will, when he died. Wherefore, I had rather follow Philostorgius here, who says, that Constantine delivered his Will to Eusebius of Nicomedia, by whom he had been baptized a little before. Vales.

CHAP. XL.

Concerning Constantine the Emperours Funerall.

THey that were about the Emperour, put his Corps in a Coffin of Gold, conveighed it to Constantinople, and placed it [on a bed of State] on high in the Pallace; and there they paid their honorary respects to it, and set a guard about it, as when he was alive. This course they continued, till one of his Sons came. But when CONSTANT. Conſtantius arrived out of the Eaſtern parts, he was honoured with an imperial Sepulture, and depoſited in the Church called The Apoſtles; which he himſelf had erected for this reaſon, that the Emperours and Prelates [a] might not be far inferiour to the reliques of the Apoſtles. The Emperour Conſtantine lived to the age of Sixty five years: he Reigned One and thirty years. And died in the Conſulate of Felicianus and Titianus, upon the twenty ſecond day of May: which was the [b] ſecond year of the Two hundredth ſeventy eighth Olympiad. Now, this Book contains in it the ſpace of thirty one yeares.

[a] Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred this place thus; ne Imperatores & Antiſtetes reliquiis apoſtolorum deſtituerentur, that the Emperours and Prelates might not be deprived of the Apoſtles reliques. But I cannot approve of this Verſion. For Conſtantine had depoſited no reliques of the Apoſtles in that Church. I would therefore rather tranſlate it thus, that the Emperours and Prelates there to be buried, might not be far inferiour to the Apoſtles reliques; but might be affected with the ſame degree of honour with them. Which interpretation Euſebius confirms, in book 4. chap. 40. Concerning the Life of Conſtantine. Valeſ.

CONSTANT. [b] Socrates miſtakes here. For in the conſulate of Felicianus and Titianus (which was the year of Chriſt 337) on the eleventh of the Calends of June (i. e. on the 22[d] of May) the fourth year of the 278[th] Olympiad was current. Which may be demonſtrated by moſt evident reaſons. But Socrates ſeems to have made uſe of a corrupt Copy of Euſebius's Chronicle, wherein the year of the Olympiad was erroniouſly ſet. But, at this place of Socrates, we ought rather to read The third year. For Socrates ſays, that this firſt book of his Hiſtory contains the ſpace of One and thirty years. For he begins from the beginning of Conſtantines Reign, who, as he ſays, reigned One and thirty years. The beginning of his Reign he places on the firſt year of the 271 Olympiad, as we ſaw before. Now from this year to the ſecond year of the 278[th] Olympiad there are but thirty years, including therein the two terms. Wherefore, there muſt neceſſarily be a miſtake in this place of Socrates. Valeſ.

THE

CHAP. I.

The Preface, wherein he gives an account, why he made a new Edition of his Firſt and Second Book.

CONSTANTIUS.

RUfinus (he that wrote an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory in the Latine tongue,) has erred concerning [the notation of] the times. For he ſuppoſes, that what was done againſt Athanaſius, hapned after the death of Conſtantine the Emperour. He was alſo ignorant of his baniſhment into the Gallia's, and of ſeveral other things. We having at firſt followed Rufinus [as our authour,] wrote the firſt and ſecond book of our Hiſtory according to his authority. But from the third to the ſeventh Book we have made a collection of ſome paſſages, partly out of Rufinus, and partly out of various other authours, and related others from thoſe which do yet ſurvive; and ſo have compleated our work. But when we had afterwards procured Athanaſius's Books, wherein he laments his own calamitous ſufferings, and how he was baniſht by the calumny of the Euſebian faction; we thought it more expedient to credit him (who had ſuffered theſe hardſhips) and thoſe who had been preſent at the tranſacting of theſe matters; rather then ſuch as have followed conjectures [in their relations] thereof, and for that reaſon have been miſtaken. Beſides, having gotten [ſeveral] Letters of perſons at that time very eminent, to our utmoſt ability we have diligently traced out the truth. Upon which account we have been neceſſitated * entirely to dictate again the firſt and ſecond Book [of this work,] making uſe [nevertheleſs] of thoſe paſſages, in the relation whereof Rufinus hath not forſaken the truth. Moreover, notice is to be taken, that in our former Edition we had not inſerted Arius's Libel of depoſition, nor the Emperours Letters; but had onely ſet forth a bare relation of the affairs tranſacted, that we might not dull our Readers by a prolixe and tedious narration. But in regard that this alſo was to be done in favour to you (a O ſacred man of God, Theodorus!) that you might not be ignorant of what the Emperours wrote in their Letters, nor of what the Biſhops (changing that faith by little and little) promulged in divers Synods: wherefore, in this latter Edition we have made ſuch alterations and inſertions as we judged to be neceſſary. And, having done this in the firſt Book, we will alſo make it our buſineſs to do the ſame in that now under our hands, we mean the ſecond. But we muſt now begin [the following ſeries of] our Hiſtory.

* That is, to make a new Edition of, &c.

CONSTANTIUS.

a Our Euſebius has given the ſame title to Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre, at the beginning of the tenth book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſt. whoſe Example Socrates here follows. Who this Theodorus was, to whom Socrates dedicated his Hiſtory, is uncertain. For I cannot think that Theodorus Biſhop of Mopſueſtia is here meant. Valeſ.

CHAP. II.

How Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia with his accomplices, earneſtly indeavouring to introduce Arius's opinion again, made diſturbances in the Churches.

THE Emperour Conſtantine being dead, Euſebius [Biſhop] of Nicomedia, and Theognis Biſhop of Nice, ſuppoſing they had now gotten a very ſeaſonable opportunity, made uſe of their utmoſt diligence and attempts to expell the * Homoöuſian faith, and introduce Arianiſm in its ſtead. a But they [ſuppoſed] it impoſſible for them to effect this, if Athanaſius ſhould return [to Alexandria.] Moreover, in order to their forming and carrying on of their deſign in this matter, they made uſe of that Presbyters aſſiſtance, who had a little before been the cauſe of Arius's being recalled from baniſhment. But, how this was effected, we muſt relate. That Presbyter [we have mentioned] preſented Conſtantines laſt will and commands, which he had received from the Emperour at his death, to the Emperours ſon Conſtantius. He having found that written in the Will which he was very a This place is imperfect, and faulty. It may be made good not inconmodiouſly, thus; ἀνεχόρησε δὲ τότε σωπήσαι ὡς ἂν μὴ δύναιντο, εἰ γνοίησαν Ἀθανάσιον; but they underſtood that they could not effect this, if Athanaſius ſhould return. Valeſ.

CONSTANTIUS.

deſirous of; (for by the Will the Empire of the Eaſt was committed to him) had an honorary reſpect for the Presbyter, allowed him a great liberty of ſpeaking, and ordered he ſhould freely and with confidence come into the Palace. This liberty therefore being allowed [the Preſbyter,] made him in a ſhort time well known both to the Empreſs, and alſo to her Eunuches. The principal perſon of the Emperours Bed-chamber at that time was an Eunuch, whoſe name was Euſebius. The Presbyter perſwaded this perſon to embrace Arius's opinion. After which, the reſt of the Eunuches were prevailed with to be of the ſame opinion. Moreover, the Emperours wife alſo, by the perſwaſion of the Eunuches and this Presbyter, became a favourer of Arius's Tenets. Not long after, this queſtion came to [the hearing of] the Emperour himſelf. And by degrees it was ſpread abroad, firſt amongſt [b] thoſe that were of the milice in the Palace; and afterwards it was divulged amongſt the multitudes of the [Imperial] City. Thoſe of the Bed-chamber together with the women diſcourſed concerning this opinion in the Imperial Palace: and in the City, throughout every private family, there was a logical war waged. Moreover, the miſchief ſoon ſpread its ſelf over other Provinces and Cities. And (like a ſpark) this controverſie taking its riſe from a ſmall beginning, excited the hearers minds to a moſt pertinacious contention. For every perſon that enquired the reaſon of the diſturbance, immediately had an occaſion of diſputing given him; and at the very interim of his making an enquiry, he reſolved upon entring into a wrangling diſpute. By this contention all things were ſubverted. Theſe [alterations] were ſtarted in the Eaſtern Cities only. For the Cities of Illyricum, and thoſe [ſcituated] in the Weſtern parts [of the Empire] were in that interim at quiet: for they would by no means diſanull the determinations made at the Nicene Synod. When therefore this miſchief, thus kindled, increaſed and grew daily worſe and worſe, Euſebius of Nicomedia and his faction began then to think the diſturbance of the Vulgar to be their gain. For [they were in hopes] of being enabled by this means only, to conſtitute a Biſhop of Alexandria, that ſhould be of the ſame opinion with them. But Athanaſius's return at that time to Alexandria prevented this their deſign, who came thither fortified with one of the Auguſtus's Letters, which Conſtantinus the younger (who bore the ſame name with his Father) ſent from Triers a City in Gallia to the people of Alexandria. [A Copy of] which Letter I have here ſubjoyned.

[b] Chriſtophorſon rendred theſe words [τοῖς χρὶ τὰ βασίλεια στρατόμβοις] thus, Imperatoris ſatellites, the Emperours guards: which is ill tranſlated. For by this term all the Palatini are meant; not only the Protectores, the domeſtici, and the reſt of the Scholares, (ſee Valeſius's notes on Amm. Marcellin. pag. 31. &c.) but the Miniſteriani, and Scriniarii alſo. For this was termed the Palatine Milice. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

How Athanaſius, confiding in the Letter of Conſtantine the Younger, returned to Alexandria.

CONSTANTINUS CÆSAR, to the people of the Catholick Church of the Alexandrians.

CONSTANTIUS.

IT has not, We ſuppoſe, [a] eſcaped the knowledge of your ſacred mind, that Athanaſius an interpreter of the venerable Law, was therefore ſent into the Gallia's for a time, leſt (in regard the barbarity of his blood-devouring Enemies and Adverſaries continually menaced his ſacred head with imminent danger,) he ſhould undergo incurable miſchiefs through the perverſeneſs of wicked men. In order therefore to his fruſtrating of this [barbarity,] he was ſnatcht out of the Jaws of thoſe perſons that deſigned his ruine; and enjoyned to live under our diſtrict, in ſuch a manner that, in that City wherein he was ordered to make his reſidence, he ſhould abound with all manner of neceſſaries: although his moſt eximious virtue, having put its confidence in the divine aſſiſtances, eſteems as nothing the troubles of a rougher fortune. Wherefore, although Our Lord and Father Conſtantinus Auguſtus of bleſſed memory had determined to reſtore this Biſhop to his own * See, and [return him] to your moſt amiable piety: yet in regard, being prevented by humane chance, he died before the accompliſhment of his deſire; We being his ſucceſſour, thought it agreeable to fulfill the mind of that Emperour of ſacred memory. [Moreover,] how great a reverence and reſpect he has procured from us, you ſhall know from himſelf, as ſoon as he ſhall come into your preſence. Nor is it a wonder that We have done any thing in favour to him: for both the repreſentation of your love, and alſo the aſpect of ſo great a perſonage moved and exited Our mind hereto. May the Divine Providence preſerve you deareſt brethren.

* Place.

[a] Inſtead of [ἀποπεφευγέναι εἰς γνῶσιν] I read [ἀποπεφευγέναι γνῶσιν,] as it is in Athanaſius's ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians. Cæſar Baronius, (in his Annals,) Dionyſius Petavius, (in his Rationarium Temporum,) Blondellus, (in his book de Primatu Eccleſiæ,) and others do relate, that Athanaſius was recalled from baniſhment, in the year of Chriſt 338, to wit, the year after Conſtantines death; who, perceiving the foreſaid prelate to be preſſed on every ſide by the calumnies of his adverſaries, had for a time baniſhed him into the Gallia's. But I do maintain, that Athanaſius was reſtored in the year of Chriſt 337, when Felicianus and Titianus were Conſuls in that very year, wherein Conſtantine died: which I can make evident, as I ſuppoſe, by a moſt demonſtrable argument. For Athanaſius (in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians, pag. 805.) relates, that he was releaſed from his baniſhment and reſtored to his Country by Conſtantine the younger, who alſo wrote a Letter in his behalf to the populace and Clergy of the Alexandrian Church. This Letter [as Socrates does here, ſo] Athanaſius there recites: the inſcription of it is this; Conſtantinus Cæſar, to the people of the Catholick Church of Alexandria. The ſubſcription of this Letter is thus, dated at Triers the fifteenth of the Calends of July. As well the inſcription, as ſubſcription of this Letter, does atteſt what I ſay, to wit, that Athanaſius was releaſed from his exile ſoon after the death of Conſtantine the Great, in the year of Chriſt 337. For if he had been reſtored on the year following, then Conſtantine the younger would not have called himſelf Cæſar, but Auguſtus. Nor would Athanaſius have been reſtored by Conſtantine the younger, but by Conſtantius, to whom was allotted the Eaſtern part of the Empire. Wherefore, in regard Conſtantine ſtiles himſelf only Cæſar in that Letter, and ſince Athanaſius atteſts, that he was reſtored by Conſtantine the younger, 'tis apparent, that that was done, before the ſons of Conſtantine the elder were by the Souldiers proclaimed Auguſti. For, upon Conſtantines death, there was a certain interregnum; and the Roman world continued without an Emperour almoſt three months; untill the brethren (who under the name of Cæſars Governed divers Provinces) had met together, in order to their making a diviſion of the whole Roman Empire. Conſtantine died on the eleventh of the Calends of June, and on that very year there were three Auguſti proclaimed, to wit, Conſtantinus, Conſtantius and Conſtans, on the fifth of the Ides of September; (as it is recorded in the Old Faſti, which Jacobus Sirmondus publiſhed under the falſe name of Idatius. This is that which Euſebius writes in his fourth book of Conſtantines Life, chap. 71, to wit, that Conſtantine retained his Empire after his death, and that all Reſcripts and Edicts bore his name, as if he had been yet alive. For this reaſon therefore Conſtantine the younger ſtiles himſelf Cæſar only, in his Letter to the Alexandrians, in regard he was not yet proclaimed Auguſtus. For the Letter was dated on the fifteenth of the Calends of July. But he was created Auguſtus (together with his brethren) on the fifth of the Ides of September. Moreover, at that time (whilſt the brothers were ſtiled Cæſars only) Conſtantinus Junior was the chief in Authority, becauſe he was the eldeſt brother. See Valeſius's firſt book of Eccleſiaſtick obſervations on Socrates and Sozomen. chap. 1.

Upon

CONSTANTIUS.

Upon the confidence of this Letter Athanasius comes to Alexandria, and the people of Alexandria most willingly received him. But as many as were followers of Arius's opinion, entred into a combination and conspired against him: hereupon continual Seditions arose, which gave an occasion to the Eusebian faction of accusing him before the Emperour, because upon his own inclination and award (without the determination of a general Council of Bishops) he had returned and taken possession of the [Alexandrian] Church. And they made so great a proficiency in their calumnies, that the Emperour, being incensed, expelled him out of Alexandria. But, how that was effected, I will a little after this relate.

CHAP. IV.

That upon Eusebius Pamphilus*'s death*, Acacius succeeded in the Bishoprick of Cæsarea.

During this interval of time, Eusebius (who was Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine, and had the sirname of Pamphilus) departed this life, and Acacius his Scholar succeeded him in that Bishoprick. This Acacius published many other books, and also wrote [particularly] concerning the Life of his Master [Eusebius.]

CHAP. V.

Concerning the death of Constantine the Younger.

Not long after this, the Emperour Constantius's brother, (who bore the same name with his Father,) Constantine the younger, invading those parts [of the Empire] that belonged to his younger brother Constans, and ingaging with his Souldiers, is slain by them, in the Consulate of Acindynus and Proclus.

CHAP. VI.

How Alexander Bishop of Constantinople, at his death, proposed Paulus and Macedonius to be elected into his Bishoprick.

At the very same time, the City Constantinople was involved in another tumult (which followed on the neck of those [disturbances] we have before related,) raised upon this account. [a] Alexander, who presided over the Churches in that City, [a Prelate] that had couragiously opposed Arius, departed out of this life, after he had spent twenty three years in that Bishoprick, and had lived ninety eight years compleat, having ordained no body [to succeed] in his place. But he commanded those to whom the power of electing belonged, to make choice of one of those two whom he should name. And if they were desirous of having one that should be both skillfull in teaching, and also of an approved piety and uprightness of life, [he advised them] to make choise of Paulus, one that he had ordained Presbyter; a person that was a young man indeed in respect of his age, but old in understanding and prudence. But if they would rather have one commendable for an external shew of piety only, they might elect [b] Macedonius, who had long since been made a Deacon of that Church, and was now grown aged. Hereupon there happened a great contest concerning the Ordination of a Bishop, which very much disturbed that Church. For the people were divided into two * factions; the one side adhered to the Arian opinion; the other embraced the determinations made at the Nicene Synod. And as long as Alexander continued alive, the † Homoousian party prevailed; the Arians disagreeing, and contending daily amongst themselves concerning their own opinion. But after Alexanders death, the success of the peoples contest was dubious. Therefore, the Homoousian party proposed Paulus to be ordained Bishop: but those that embraced Arianism, were very earnest to have Macedonius elected. And in the Church called [c] Irene (which is near that Church now named The Great Church, and the Church of Sophia,) Paulus is ordained Bishop; in which [election] the suffrage of Alexander, then dead, seemed to have prevailed.

[a] Socrates mistakes here, (and all those that follow him,) in placing the death of Alexander Bishop of Constantinople on the Consulate of Acindynus and Proclus, in the year of Christ 340. In the second book of my Ecclesiastick Observations upon Socrates and Sozomen [The Learned Reader will meet with Valesius's Ecclesiastick Observations on Socrates and Sozomen, at the close of Valesius's second Volume of the Greek Ecclesiastick Historians; he may find this matter discussed at the first chapter of the second book of those Observations.] I have by most evident arguments demonstrated, that Alexander Bishop of Constantinople died in the Reign of Constantine the Great, and that Paul succeeded him, during the Reign of the said Constantine. Baronius, who places Alexanders death on the year of Christ 340, does manifestly contradict himself. For he says, that the Synod of the Bishops of Egypt (which was summoned to confute the calumnies brought against Athanasius by the Eusebian faction,) was convened in the year of Christ 339. But those Bishops do expressly attest, in their Synodick Epistle, that at that very time Eusebius had left Nicomedia, and had lept into the Constantinopolitan See. 'Tis needless to quote the words of that Epistle here, in regard they are produced by Baronius himself, at the year of Christ 340. Now, if Eusebius had gotten the See of Constantinople in the year of Christ 339. Alexander must necessarily be supposed to have been dead before this year. Vales.

[b] This person was afterwards promoted to the degree of Presbyter under Paul Bishop of Constantinople, and accused his own Bishop, as Athanasius relates, in his Epistle ad Solitar. Vales.

* Parts.

† That is, those that owned Christ to be of the same substance or essence with the Father.

[c] There were two Churches of this name in Constantinople, the one called the Old, the other the New Irene; as it is recorded in the Life of Paul the Constantinopolitan Bishop, which Photius relates in his Bibliotheca. Moreover, the Old Church called Irene was contiguous to the Great Church, which was afterwards named Sophia: nor had it separate Clergy-men; but the Clergy of the Great Church by turns ministred in that Church. The Emperour Justinian informs us of this, in the third Novell. In the old description of Constantinople, which is prefixt before the Notitia Imperii Romani, this is called the Old Church, and 'tis placed in the second ward of the City together with the Great Church. The Church Irene (to wit, The New Irene,) is recounted in the seventh ward of that City. Socrates hath made mention of The Old Irene, in his first Book, chap. 37. It is termed the Church of Saint Irene, after the same manner that the Church Sophia is called Saint Sophia; not that there was a Virgin, or Martyr, called by that name. Vales.

CHAP. VII.

How the Emperour Constantius ejected Paulus who had been Ordained Bishop: and, having sent for Eusebius from Nicomedia, entrusted him with the Bishoprick of Constantinople.

But the Emperour, arriving not long after at Constantinople, was highly incensed at this Ordination [of Paulus.] And having convened a Council of Bishops that embraced Arius's opinion, he vacated Paulus's [Bishoprick.] And he translated Eusebius [a] from Nicomedia, and constituted him Bishop of Constantinople. When the Emperour had performed these things, he went to Antioch.

[a] The Alatian M.S. inserts some words here, after this manner: Ἐυσέβιον δὲ ἐκ τῆς νικωμηδείας καὶ περὶ ἐαυτὸν μεταστήσας, τῆς μεγαλοπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεδείκνυσι; i. e. and having through Eusebius's own ambition removed him from Nicomedia, he constituted him Bishop of the Great City [Constantinople.] Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

How Euſebius aſſembled another Synod at Antioch of Syria, and cauſed another form of Faith to be publiſhed.

BUt Euſebius could by no means be at quiet: but (as the common ſaying is) moved every ſtone, that he might effect what he had deſigned. Therefore, he procures a Synod to be aſſembled at Antioch in Syria, under a pretence of dedicating a Church, which [Conſtantine] the father of the * Auguſti had begun to build: (after whoſe death, Conſtantius his ſon finiſhed it, in the tenth year after its foundation was laid:) but in reality, that he might ſubvert and deſtroy the Homoöuſian Faith. At this Synod there met ninety Biſhops, [who came] out of divers Cities. But Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who had ſucceeded Macarius, was not preſent at that Synod, [a] having conſidered with himſelf that he had been before induced by fraud to ſubſcribe Athanaſius's depoſition. Neither was Julius Biſhop of Rome the Great preſent there: nor did he ſend any body to ſupply his place. Although the Eccleſiaſtick Canon doth order, that the Churches ought not to make Sanctions contrary to the Biſhop of Romes opinion. This Synod therefore is convened at Antioch (the Emperour Conſtantius himſelf being there preſent,) in the [b] Conſulate of Marcellus and Probinus. This was the [c] fifth year from the death of Conſtantine the father of the Auguſti. At that time [d] Placitus, ſucceſſour to Euphronius preſided over the Churches in Antioch. The Euſebians therefore made it their principal buſineſs to calumniate Athanaſius, [ſaying] in the firſt place, that he had done contrary to that Canon, which they had then conſtituted, becauſe he had recovered his Epiſcopal dignity without the conſent of a general Synod of Biſhops. For, returning from his exile, he had upon his own arbitrement and award ruſhed into the Church: [ſecondly,] that a tumult being raiſed at his entrance, [e] many had loſt their lives in that Sedition; and that ſome perſons had been ſcourged by Athanaſius, and others brought before the ſeats of Judicature. Moreover, they produced what had been done againſt Athanaſius in the City of Tyre.

* That is, he means Conſtantius, and Conſtans, ſons to the Emperour Conſtantine the Great; who had a little before this been proclaimed Auguſti. Conſtantine, the other ſon of Conſtantine the Great, was now dead. See chap. 5. of this book.

[a] The particle [ὡς] muſt be expunged here; and the whole clauſe read in this continued form; having conſidered with himſelf how he had been circumvented that he might ſubſcribe Athanaſius's depoſition. For Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem, had, together with Paul and the reſt, ſubſcribed Athanaſius's depoſition, in the Council of Tyre. In regard of his ſorrow for doing this, he refuſed afterwards to be preſent at the Council of Antioch; as Sozomen relates, in his 3d book chap. 6. neer the end. Valeſ.

[b] Athanaſius (in his book de Synodis) ſet forth the time of this Council by theſe notes: ἦσαν δὲ οἱ συνέλθοντες, &c. Thoſe Biſhops that met at the dedication were ninety in number; [they were convened] in the Conſulate of Marcellinus and Probinus, in the tenth Indiction, the moſt impious Conſtantius being there preſent. Valeſ.

[c] In the Conſulate of Marcellinus and Probinus, on the eleventh of the Calends of June was compleated the fourth year from Conſtantines death. The Synod of Antioch therefore was convened after this day, if it be true which Socrates here ſays, to wit, that it was convened in the fifth year after Conſtantines death. Valeſ.

[d] In Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion, this perſons name is truer written, thus, Flaccillus. Nor is he otherwiſe called, in Pope Julius's Epiſtle to the Biſhops convened in this Synod of Antioch. This perſon had been preſent before, at the Council of Tyre, and had with the Arians conſpired againſt Athanaſius, as the Epiſtle of the Egyptian Biſhops to Dionyſius the Comes doth inform us, which Epiſtle Athanaſius has recorded, in his ſecond defence againſt the Arians. Euſebius of Cæſarea dedicated the books he wrote againſt Marcellus, to this ſame Flaccillus. But, inſtead of Flaccillus, he is almoſt every where called Placitus: only in the following chapter, the Allatian M.S. terms him Flaccillus. Valeſ.

[e] Theſe calumnies of the Euſebians are incomparably well refuted by the Egyptian Biſhops, in their Synodick Epiſtle, which Athanaſius records, in his ſecond defence againſt the Arians. Valeſ.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning Euſebius Emiſenus.

AFter the framing of theſe calumnies, they propoſed one to be made Biſhop of Alexandria, and in the firſt place [they named] Euſebius Emiſenus. Who this perſon was, Georgius of Laodicæa, one that was preſent at this Synod, informs us. For he ſays (in the Book he wrote concerning his Life) that this Euſebius was deſcended from noble perſonages of Edeſſa in Meſopotamia: and that from his childhood he [a] Learned the ſacred Scriptures: that he was afterwards inſtructed in the Grecian literature by a Maſter who then lived at Edeſſa; and in fine, that he had the ſacred Scriptures interpreted to him by Patrophilus and Euſebius; the latter of which perſons preſided over the Church in Cæſarea, and the former over that in Scythopolis. After this, when he came to Antioch, it hapned that Euſtathius, being accuſed by Cyrus of Berœa, was depoſed, as being an aſſertor of Sabellius's opinion. Wherefore Euſebius afterwards lived with Euphronius, Euſtathius's ſucceſſour. Afterwards, that he might avoid being made a Biſhop, he betook himſelf to Alexandria, and there ſtudied Philoſophy. Returning from thence to Antioch, he converſed with Flaccillus, Euphronius's ſucceſſour, and was at length promoted to the See of Alexandria by Euſebius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. But he went thither no more, becauſe Athanaſius was ſo much beloved by the people of Alexandria. He was therefore ſent to Emiſa. But when the Inhabitants of that City raiſed a Sedition at his Ordination, (for he was reproacht, as being a perſon ſtudious of, and exerciſed in the Mathematicks,) he fled from thence, and went to Laodicæa, to Georgius, who hath related ſo many paſſages concerning him. When this Georgius had brought him to Antioch, he procured him to be ſent back again to Emiſa by Flaccillus and Narciſſus. But he afterwards underwent another accuſation, for being an adherent to Sabellius's principles. Georgius writes at large concerning his * Ordination. And in fine adds, that the Emperour, in his expedition againſt the Barbarians, took him along with him, and that miracles were wrought by him. But hitherto we have recorded what Georgius hath related concerning Euſebius Emiſenus.

[a] Sozomen (in his third book chap. 6.) explains this paſſage in Socrates; where he ſpeaks thus concerning Euſebius Emiſenus: ἐκ νέας δὲ ἐπὶ πλεῖστον χρόνου τῶν ἱερῶν ἐμμελῶν λόγων, &c. i.e. from his childhood (according to the cuſtom of his own Country) he learned the ſacred Scriptures by heart. Therefore the boys of Edeſſa got by heart the books of ſacred Scripture, according to the uſage of their Anceſtours. Indeed, Eccleſiaſtick Writers do atteſt, that the Edeſſens were moſt ardent lovers of the Chriſtian Religion. Valeſ.

* Or Reſtauration, or, Election.

CHAP. X.

That the Biſhops convened at Antioch, upon Euſebius Emiſenus's refuſal [of the Biſhoprick] of Alexandria, Ordained Gregorius, and altered the expreſſions of the Nicene Faith.

BUt when Euſebius, who had been choſen Biſhop of Alexandria at Antioch, was afraid to go thither, they then propoſed Gregorius to be Ordained Biſhop of Alexandria. And having done this, they altered the * Creed, finding finding fault indeed with nothing [that had been determined] at Nice; [a] but in reality [their design was] to subvert and destroy the Homoöusian Faith, by their continual assembling of Synods, and by their publishing sometimes one, sometimes another form of the Creed; that so by degrees [all persons] might be [b] perverted to the Arian opinion. Moreover, how these things were done [by them,] we will manifest in the procedure of our History. But the Epistle they published concerning the Faith runs thus.

* Or, the Faith.

[a] Instead of these words [but in reality their design was to subvert.] the Allat. M. S. has these [but giving the beginning to a pretext by their continual, &c.] and so Epiphan. Schol. read it, as from his Version appears. Vales.

[b] In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [fall into.] Vales.

We have neither been Arius's followers: (for how should we that are Bishops be the Followers of a Presbyter?) Nor have we embraced any other Faith, than what was from the beginning set forth. But, being made inquirers into, and examiners of, his Faith, we have [c] admitted and entertained, rather than followed, him. And this you will understand from what shall be said. For we have learned from the beginning to believe in one supream God, the maker and preserver of all things as well intelligible as sensible. And in one only begotten Son of God, subsisting before all ages, existing together with the Father that begat him; by whom all things visible and invisible were made: who in the last days, according to the Fathers good pleasure, descended, and assumed flesh from the holy Virgin, and when he had compleatly fulfilled all his Fathers will, he suffered, and arose, and ascended into the heavens, and sits at the right hand of the Father: and he shall come to judge the quick and dead, and continues a King and God for ever. We believe also in the holy Ghost. And (if it be requisite to add this) we also believe the Resurrection of the flesh, and the life everlasting.

[c] How these words are to be understood, I have advertized the Reader, in the second book of my Ecclesiastick Observations, chap. 2. for we must not suppose, that the Arch-Heretick Arius himself was admitted and entertained in the Jerusalem Synod, but his followers only. For Arius himself was dead long before. Should any one maintain, that these words of the Bishops of the Antiochian-Council are to be understood of Arius himself, then I will answer, that the Jerusalem Synod is not meant here, but some other more ancient Synod, which admitted Arius to communion: for the Eusebian party had done that before the Synod of Jerusalem, as Athanasius attests, in his book de Synodis, not far from the beginning. Vales.

Having written these things in their first Epistle, they sent them to [the Bishops] throughout every City. But, when they had continued sometime at Antioch, condemning as it were this [their former] Epistle, they again publish another, in these very words.

Another Exposition [of Faith.]

Agreeable to Evangelick and Apostolick tradition, We believe in one God the Father Almighty, the Framer and Maker of all things. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son, God, by whom all things were made: begotten of the Father before all worlds, God of God, Whole of Whole, Only of Only, Perfect of Perfect, King of King, Lord of Lord: the living Word, the Wisedom, the Life, the true Light, the way of Truth, the Resurrection, the Shepherd, the Gate: immutable and inconvertible: the most express image of the Father's Deity, * Substance, Power, Council, and Glory: the First begotten of every Creature: † Who was in the beginning with God, God the Word, according as 'tis said in the Gospel: and the word was God, by whom all things were made, and in whom all things have subsisted. Who in the last days came down from heaven, and was born of the Virgin according to the Scriptures. And was made man, the mediatour of God and men, the Apostle of our Faith, and the Prince of life, as he himself says, * For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. Who suffered for us, and rose again for us the third day, and ascended into the heavens, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father. And he shall come again with Glory and Power, to judge the quick and dead. And [we believe] in the holy Ghost, who is given to believers in order to their Consolation, Sanctification, and Perfection: according as our Lord Jesus Christ commanded his disciples, saying, † Go ye, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost: to wit, of the Father being truly the Father, and of the Son being truly the Son, and of the holy Ghost being truly the holy Ghost: which terms are not simply, or insignificantly * made use of, but they do accurately manifest the proper and peculiar Person, Glory, and Order of each of those that are named. So that they are three in Person; but in consent One. [d] We therefore holding this Faith, in the presence of God and of Christ, do anathematize all manner of Heretical and ill opinions. And if any one shall teach (contrary to the sound and true Faith of the Scriptures,) saying, that there is, or was, a time, or an age, [e] before the Son of God [was begotten;] let him be Anathema. And if any one says, that the Son is a Creature, as one of the Creatures, or that he is a * Branch, as one of the Branches; and [shall not hold] every one of the foresaid points according as the sacred Scriptures have set them forth: or if any one Teaches or Preaches any other thing than what we have received, let him be Anathema. For we do truly, and [f] clearly, believe and follow all things delivered by the Prophets and Apostles in the sacred Scriptures.

† Matt. 28. 19.

* Placed.

[d] After these words [we therefore holding this faith,] in Athanasius's book de Synodis (where this form of faith occurs) these are added [καὶ ἐξ ἀρχῆς καὶ μέχρι τέλους ἔχοντες, and holding it from the beginning to the end:] which ought not to have been omitted. Hilarius (in his book de Synodis) has translated this form of the Creed into Latine; in which Version of his these words occur. Vales.

* Or an Off-spring, or, a Fœtus.

[e] I corrected this place by the assistance of the Florentine M. S. wherein it is written thus [πρὸ τῆς τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς Θεοῦ, before the Son of God.] The Verb [γεγονέναι, was begotten] which preceded, is to be understood here. In Athanasius's book de Synodis, the reading is [πρὸ τῆς γεννηθῆναι, before he was begotten.] But our reading pleases us better, because it comes neerer the sense of the Arians: who asserted that the Son of God was made. Vales.

[f] In the Allat. M.S. the reading is [καὶ ἐμφόβως, and with fear:] 'Tis so also in Athanasius, and in Hilarius's Version. Vales.

Such were the Expositions of the Faith, [published] by those at that time convened at Antioch: to which also Gregorius (although he had not then made his entry into Alexandria, yet) subscribed as Bishop of that City. The Synod at that time assembled in Antioch, having done these things, and made some other Canons, was dissolved. The state of the publick affairs in the Empire hapned to be disturbed at the very same time also. A nation (they are called The Franci) made an incursion into the Roman territories in Gallia. At the same time also, there were terrible earth-quakes in the East: [g] especially at Antioch, which City was shaken thereby [continually] for the space of one whole year.

[g] No; Antioch was by a special priviledge free from this earth-quake. For 'tis recorded in those incomparable Fasti Consulares, (which Sirmondus has published under the name of Idatius;) in these words: Marcellino & Probino Coss. His consulibus pugna facta est cum gente Francorum à Constante Augusto in Galliis. Et ipso anno terræ motus fuit ad orientem per totum annum præter Antiochiam: i. e. in the consulate of Marcellinus and Probinus, there was a fight between the nation of the Franci and Constans Augustus in the Gallia's. And in the same year there was an earthquake in the East throughout the whole year except at Antioch. Vales.

CHAP. XI.

That, upon Gregorius's arrival at Alexandria [guarded] with a Military force, Athanasius fled.

WHen these things were done, [a] Syrianus the Captain (with the armed Souldiers under his command, being in number five thousand,) brought Gregorius to Alexandria. Those in that City who were favourers of Arius's opinion, assisted the Souldiers. Moreover, after what manner Athanasius, being expelled out of the Church, escaped being taken by them, I think fit to relate. It was now [b] Evening, and the people lodged in the Church all night, a communion being expected. The Captain came, and having put his Souldiers into a fighting posture, environed the Church on every side. Athanasius seeing what was done, made it his chiefest care, that the people might in no wise be damnified upon his account. And having commanded the Deacon to give the people notice of going to prayers, after that he gave order for the recitation of a Psalm. And when there was a sweet harmony made by reason of the peoples singing of the Psalm together, all the congregation went out through one of the Church doors. Whilst this was doing, the Souldiers stood still without striking a stroak: and so Athanasius escaped unhurt in the midst of those that sang the Psalm. Having secretly made his escape after this manner, he hastned to Rome. Gregorius was then put into possession of the [Alexandrian] Church. But the people of Alexandria, unable to bear what had been done, burnt that, called Dionysius's Church. Thus far concerning these things. But Eusebius having done what he had a mind to do, [c] sent an Embassage to Julius Bishop of Rome, entreating him to become Judge of those matters relating to Athanasius, and that he would call for a disquisition of the controversie before himself, in order to his taking cognizance thereof.

[a] In this place Socrates mistakes, who confounds what was done at Georgius's installation with those things transacted at Gregorius's arival. Indeed Syrianus brought Georgius to Alexandria, as Athanasius attests, in his Epistle ad Solitar. and in his Apologetick to Constantius the Emperour; and in his Apology concerning his own Escape, when Syrianus pursued him. But these things happened a long while after this, to wit, in the year of Christ 356. Gregorius, concerning whom Socrates speaks here, was brought to Alexandria by Balacius the Captain, and Philagrius Prefect of Egypt, as Athanasius relates, in his Epistle Ad Solitar. But Athanasius departed from Alexandria before their arival, and went to Rome, whither he had been invited by Pope Julius's Letters. Vales.

b Socrates borrowed this out of Athanasius's Apology concerning his own escape, about the close of it. Where Athanasius's words are these: νῦξ μὲν γὰρ ἤδη ἦν, καὶ τῶν λαῶν τινες ἐπαννύχιζον τεσσαρακοστὴν συνάξεως, i. e. it was now night, and some of the people lay in the Church all night, a communion being expected. But in his Apologetick to the Emperour Constantinus, he shews manifestly that Syrianus made this irruption in the night, and not in the evening, as Socrates here says. Vales.

c Our Socrates does mistake here also. For Eusebius of Nicomedia did not send Embassadours to Pope Julius, to incite him against Athanasius, after the Council at Antioch, but a long time before. But when the Presbyters sent by Athanasius had confuted Eusebius's Embassadours in all points before Julius, at length Eusebius's Messengers referred the decision of the whole matter to Julius. Julius therefore, according to the request of the Embassadours, wrote Letters, both to Athanasius, and also to Eusebius and the rest of Athanasius's adversaries, by which he invited them to an Ecclesiastick judicature at Rome. But this was done before the Council at Antioch, as Athanasius informs us, (in his second Apologetick against the Arians,) and Julius Bishop of Rome (in his Epistle to the Bishops convened in the Council of Antioch.) This Epistle of Julius's, Athanasius has inserted at the 739th page of his works, Edit. Paris. 1627. Moreover, Socrates's relation here may be refuted also by these arguments. For, if these things had been done after the Council at Antioch, not only Eusebius, but the whole Synod would have sent an Embassy, and Letters, to Julius. Besides, it would have been altogether ridiculous and unseemly, after the matter was determined in a Council, and put in execution, (Athanasius being now expelled, and Gregorius put into his See,) to write to Julius, that he would be judge, and remove the controversie in order to its being discust before him; as if the matter were still wholly undetermined. Sozomen (book 3. chap. 7.) has followed Socrates's mistake in this relation. Vales.

CHAP. XII.

How, after Eusebius's death, the people of Constantinople restored Paulus to his See again. And that the Arians made choice of Macedonius.

BUt Eusebius could never understand what Julius had determined concerning Athanasius. For having survived the Synod some small time, he dyed. Wherefore the people of Constantinople introduce Paulus into the Church again. But at the same time the Arians ordain Macedonius, in the [a] Church dedicated to Paul. And this was done by those, who formerly had been assistants to Eusebius that disturber of all things, but were then his successours in power and authority. These are their names, Theognis of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Theodorus of Heraclea in Thracia, Ursacius of Singidunum in the Upper Mysia, Valens of Mursa in the Upper Pannonia. Indeed, Ursacius and Valens changing their opinions afterwards, delivered their penetentiary Libel to Julius the Bishop, and having consented to the Homoousian opinion, were admitted to communion. But at that time they were hot maintainers of the Arian Religion, and * framed no trivial commotions against the Churches. One whereof was that made by Macedonius in the City of Constantinople. For from this intestine war amongst the Christians there hapned continual Seditions in the City, and many persons, oppressed by the violence of what was done, lost their lives.

[a] In the old description of Constantinople this Church is mentioned; where 'tis called Paul's Church, and 'tis placed in the seventh ward of the City. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the slaughter of Hermogenes the Lieutenant-General, and how Paulus was for that reason turned out of the Church again.

BUt, what was done came to the hearing of Constantius the Emperour, who then made his residence at Antioch. Therefore he orders Hermogenes the Lieutenant-General, (whom he had sent into the coasts of Thracia,) that he should incidently pass through [Constantinople,] and turn Paulus out of that Church. He arriving at Constantinople, disturbed the whole City, by endeavouring to cast out the Bishop by force. For there immediately followed a Sedition amongst the people, and all persons were ready to defend [the Bishop.] But when Hermogenes with much earnestness endeavoured to expell Paulus by his Military forces, the populace being exasperated (as in such like cases it usually happens,) made a more inconsiderate and rash attack against him. In the first place they set his house on fire. Then, having [a] drawn him about by the heels, they killed him. These things were done in the Consulate of the Two Augusti, Constantius being then the third, and Constans the second time Consul. At the same time, Constans, having vanquished the nation of the Franci, made them enter into a league with the Romans. But the Emperour Constantius being informed of Hermogenes's

[a] Ammianus Marcellinus had at large described this Sedition of the Constantinopolitans, in those books of his History which are lost. But he has by the by mentioned it in his 14th book pag. 23. Edit. Paris. 1636. Libanius means this tumult in his Oration entitled Βασιλικὸς, and says it was a most violent Sedition. It hapned in the third Consulate of Constantius, and in Constans's second; which was the year of Christ 342, as it is recorded in Fast. Idat. Vales. See Valesius's Annotat. on Amm. Marcellinus page 47.

mogenes's murder, rode poſt on horſe-back from Antioch, and arrived at Conſtantinople: out of which City he expelled Paulus. He alſo puniſhed that City, taking away more than forty thouſand [buſhels] of that bread-corn daily diſtributed, which was his fathers donation [to thoſe Citizens.] For before that time, neer eighty thouſand [[b] Buſhells] of wheat, brought thither from the City of Alexandria, were beſtowed [amongſt the inhabitants of that City.] Moreover, he differed the conſtituting of Macedonius Biſhop of that City. [c] For he was incenſed againſt him, not only becauſe he had been ordained contrary to his will, but alſo in regard upon account of the Seditions raiſed betwixt him and Paulus, Hermogenes his Lieutenant, and many other perſons had been ſlain. Having therefore given him permiſſion to gather aſſemblies of the people in that Church wherein he was ordained, he departed again to Antioch.

[b] It is doubtful, whether Socrates meanes here buſhells of Bread-corn, or loaves of bread. The Author of the Life of Paulus Biſhop of Conſtantinople (which occurs in Photius's Bibliotheca, pag. 1421. Edit. David. Hoeſchell. 1611.) ſuppoſed, that in this place loaves were meant. For thus he ſays: ὧν δὲ τὸ ὅλον τῆς δωρεᾶς, ἡμερήσιοι ἄρτοι μυριάδες ὀκτώ· i. e. the whole donation was, eighty thouſand loaves daily [diſtributed.] But I am rather of opinion, (and ſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus underſtands it,) that Buſhells are meant. For the term [σίτου of wheat] imports buſhells of wheat, rather then loaves. Beſides, how could eighty thouſand loaves be ſufficient for that multitude of Citizens which inhabited Conſtantinople? ſhould any one wonder at this vaſt quantity of bread-corn uſually diſtributed every day, let him hear Eunaplus (in the Life of Ædeſius, pag. 38. Edit. Comm. 1596. thus: ἐν δὲ τῇς καθ' ἡμᾶς γενεᾶς, &c. i. e. But in our age, neither the ſhips loaden with corn which come from Ægypt, nor that vaſt quantity of wheat, brought out of all Aſia, Syria, Phœnicia, and the reſt of the Provinces (upon the conſideration of tribute) is ſufficient to fill and ſatisfie that drunken multitude of people, which Conſtantine (by empiying of other Cities) hath tranſported to Byſantium. Concerning this preſcript about bread-corn for the ſupply of Conſtantinople, (appointed by Conſtantine of bleſſed memory, and afterwards increaſed by Theodoſius,) See the ſecond Law in Cod. Theod. de frumento urbis Conſtantinop. Valeſ.

[c] From the Authority of the Allat. M.S. this place is to be amended, thus; ὠρμίζετο γὰρ καὶ καθ' ἑαυτὸν, ὁ μόνον ὅτι φθόνῳ γνώμων, &c. For he was incenſed againſt him, not only becauſe he had been ordained, &c. Thus alſo the reading is in the Life of Paulus Conſtantinop. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIV.

That the Arians, having removed Gregorius from [the See of] Alexandria, put Georgius into his place.

[a] Socrates miſtakes here alſo. For Gregorius (who was created Biſhop of Alexandria in the Synod of Antioch) held that Biſhoprick ſix years, untill the Council of Serdica: in which he was depoſed, and excommunicated, as it is related in the Synodical Epiſtle of that Council. And when he had ſurvived this ſentence about ſix months, he died, as Athanaſius atteſts, in Epiſtol. ad Solitar. Theodoret has corrected this miſtake of Socrates's and Sozomen's, in book 2. of his Eccleſ. Hiſt. Georgius was made Biſhop of Alexandria by the Arians long after Gregorius, in the year of Chriſt 356. Valeſ.

AT the ſame time the Arians [a] removed Gregorius from [the See of] Alexandria, [b] as being a perſon odious, both upon account of his burning the Church, and alſo becauſe he was not zealous enough in defending their opinion. Into his See they ſent Georgius, a perſon born in Cappadocia, who had gotten the repute of being a very skillfull maintainer of their tenets.

[b] This place was corrupted by a tranſpoſition of the words; which gave tranſlatours an occaſion of miſtaking here. But the words might have been eaſily put into their order, after this manner; ὡς μισούμενον διὰ τὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐμπρησμὸν· ἐν τοιούτῳ δὲ καὶ ὅτι, &c. as being a perſon odious, both upon account of his burning the Church; and alſo becauſe, &c. Socrates does here aſſign two reaſons, why the Arians deprived Gregorius of his Biſhoprick. The firſt is, becauſe Gregorius was a perſon hated by all men, upon account of his burning Dionyſius's Church; which Socrates has mentioned before; Athanaſius alſo takes notice of it, in Epiſt. ad ſolitar. The other reaſon is, becauſe he ſeemed not zealous enough in defending their opinion. The ſame is confirmed by Sozomen, book 3. chap. 7. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

How Athanaſius and Paulus, going to Rome, and being fortified with Biſhop Julius's Letters, recovered their own Secs again.

MOreover, Athanaſius with much difficulty at laſt gat over into Italy. Conſtans the youngeſt of Conſtantin's ſons had then the ſole power in the Weſtern parts [of the Empire,] his brother Conſtantine having been killed by the Souldiers, as we have before related. [a] At the ſame time alſo Paulus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, Aſclepas of Gaza, Marcellus of Ancyra a City of Galatia the leſs, and Lucius of Adrianople, having been accuſed, one for one thing, another for another, and driven from their Churches, arrived at the Imperial City Rome. They acquaint therefore Julius Biſhop of Rome with their caſe. He (in regard the Church of Romes priviledge is ſuch,) fortified them with his Letters wherein he made uſe of a great deal of liberty, and ſent them back into the Eaſt, [b] reſtoring to each of them his own See, and ſharply rebuking thoſe who had inconſiderately depoſed them. They, having left Rome, and confiding in Biſhop Julius's Letters, poſſeſs themſelves of their own Churches, and ſend the Letters to thoſe whom they were written to. Theſe perſons having received [Julius's Letters,] lookt upon his reprehenſion as an injury and reproach to them. And having aſſembled themſelves in a [c] Synod called at Antioch, they moſt ſeverely rebuke Julius in a Letter written by the joynt conſent of them all, making it apparent, that it ought not to be determined by him, if they ſhould have a mind to expell ſome [Biſhops] from their Churches. For [they ſaid] that they did not make any oppoſition, when Novatus was by * them ejected out of the Church. Thus wrote the Eaſtern Biſhops in anſwer to Julius Biſhop of Rome. But in regard, upon [d] Athanaſius's entry into Alexandria there hapned a diſturbance, cauſed by thoſe who were adherents to Georgius the Arian; upon which diſturbance there followed (as they ſay) Seditions and ſlaughters of men: and [becauſe] the Arians aſcribe the infamy and blame of all theſe miſchiefs to Athanaſius, as being the authour thereof; it is requiſite that [a] After the murder of Hermogenes the Emperours Lieutenant-General. Conſtantius put Paulus into iron chains, and baniſht him to Singar a Town of Meſopotamia, whence he removed him afterwards to Emiſa, as I have remarked out of Athanaſius, in my ſecond book of Eccleſiaſtick obſervations, chap. 6. Therefore, what Socrates here ſays is falſe, to wit, that Paulus was at Rome at the ſame time that Athanaſius was there. Indeed, Marcellus Biſhop of Ancyra was at Rome together with Athanaſius, as we are informed from Julius's Letter to the Eaſtern Biſhops; which is alſo aſcertained from Marcellus's Libel which he preſented to Julius. But Julius ſpeaks not a word concerning Paulus in his foreſaid Epiſtle; whom he would doubtleſs have mentioned, had he been then at Rome with Athanaſius and Marcellus. Valeſ.

* The Church of Rome, ſee Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 6. chap. 43.

[b] Julius reſtored not one of the forementioned Biſhops, not Athanaſius himſelf, to his own See. For, in the Roman Synod, wherein Athanaſius's and Marcellus's cauſe was diſcuſt, Athanaſius was only pronounced innocent, and admitted to communion by Julius and the reſt of the Biſhops. But againſt Athanaſius's accuſers, who refuſed to make their perſonal appearance in judgment, nothing was determined; as I have obſerved out of Athanaſius in my firſt book of Eccleſiaſtick Obſervations. Nor was Athanaſius, Marcellus, Aſclepas, or Lucius reſtored before the Synod of Serdica. Valeſ.

[c] After the Roman Synod, wherein Athanaſius was pronounced innocent, when Julius had ſent a Letter by Gabianus the Comes to the Eaſtern Biſhops, who had met in a Synod at Antioch at ſuch time as the Church was dedicated; (ſee chap. 8. of this book,) the Eaſtern Biſhops, in order to their anſwering of this Letter, were convened again at Antioch in the year of Chriſt 343. And they wrote back an elegant and ſharp Letter to Julius, the ſenſe whereof Sozomen relates, book 3. chap. 8. Valeſ.

[d] What Socrates here ſays, to wit, that Athanaſius returned at that time to Alexandria, is falſe. For Athanaſius went not back to that City, till after the Council at Serdica, that is, till after the year of Chriſt 348. Valeſ.

that we ſpeak briefly concerning theſe things. Indeed, God, the Judge of truth it ſelf, only knows the true cauſes hereof. But, that ſuch accidents do frequently and uſually happen, when the multitude is divided into inteſtine factions, is a thing not unknown to prudent perſons. In vain therefore do Athanaſius's ſlanderers attribute the cauſe hereof to him; and eſpecially Sabinus a Biſhop of the Macedonian Hereſie. Who (had he conſidered with himſelf, how great miſchiefs the Arians have wrought againſt Athanaſius and the reſt that embrace the Homoöuſian Faith, or [e] how many complaints the Synods convened upon Athanaſius's account have made thereof, or what Macedonius himſelf, [f] that Arch-heretick, has practiſed throughout all the Churches) would either have been wholly ſilent; or, if he had ſpoken any thing, [g] would inſtead of theſe [reproaches] have highly commended [Athanaſius.] But now, having [deſignedly] paſſed all theſe things over in ſilence, he falſly accuſes the affairs [done by Athanaſius.] Nor has he made the leaſt mention of that Arch-heretick [Macedonius,] being deſirous wholly to conceal his tragick and audacious villanies. And (which is much more wonderfull,) he has not ſpoken ill of the Arians, whom notwithſtanding he abhorred. But the ordination of Macedonius (whoſe hereſie he was a follower of,) he has ſilently concealed. For had he mentioned that, he muſt neceſſarily have recorded his impieties, which thoſe things done at that ordination do ſufficiently demonſtrate. But thus much concerning this perſon.

CHAP. XVI.

That the Emperour ſent an order by Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium, that Paulus ſhould be ejected and baniſhed, and that Macedonius ſhould be enſtalled Biſhop in his See.

MOreover, the Emperour Conſtantius (reſiding at Antioch) being informed that Paulus had taken poſſeſſion of his See again, was highly incenſed at what was done. He therefore wrote an order, and ſends it to [a] Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium, who had a greater power than the other Governours of Provinces, and was ſtiled the ſecond perſon from the Emperour; that he ſhould eject Paulus out of the Church, and introduce Macedonius into it in his room. Philippus therefore the Præfect being afraid that the multitude would raiſe a tumult, attempted to circumvent Paulus by ſubtlety. He keeps the Emperours Order concealed in his own poſſeſſion: and, pretending to take care of ſome publick affaires, he goes to the publick Bath, called Zeuxippus. Thither he ſends for Paulus with a great ſhew of reſpect and honour, [acquainting him] that he muſt neceſſarily come to him, and he came. After he was come upon his being ſent for, the Prefect immediately ſhews him the Emperours Order. The Biſhop patiently bore his being condemned without having his cauſe heard. But the Prefect, fearing the rage of the multitude that ſtood round; (for great numbers of perſons had flocked together about the publick Bath, [whoſe meeting there was cauſed] by the report of a ſuſpicion) orders one of the Bath doors to be opened, [b] through which Paulus was carried into the Imperial Palace, put into a ſhip provided for that purpoſe, and forthwith ſent away into baniſhment.

CONSTANTIUS.

The Prefect commanded him to go to [c] Theſſalonica the chief City of Macedonia, wherein Paulus had had his original extract from his Anceſtours: in that City [he ordered him] to reſide, and gave him the liberty of going to other Cities alſo, [to wit] thoſe in Illyricum: but he forbad his paſſage into the Eaſtern parts [of the Empire.] Paulus therefore being (contrary to expectation) caſt out of the Church, and at the ſame time alſo [driven] from the City, was immediately carried away. But Philippus the Emperour's Preſect went forthwith from the publick Bath into the Church. Macedonius was with him, being * thrown into his preſence by an engin as it were; he ſate with the Prefect in his chariot, and was expoſed to the view of all men: they were ſurrounded by a Military guard with their ſwords drawn. [Upon ſight hereof] a dread forthwith ſeized the multitude: and all of them, as well the Homoöuſians as the Arians flockt to the † Church; every one earneſtly endeavouring to get in thither. When the Prefect together with Macedonius came neer the Church, an irrational fear ſeized both the multitudes, and alſo the Souldiers themſelves. For, becauſe the perſons preſent were ſo numerous, that there could be no paſſage made for the Prefect to bring in Macedonius, the Souldiers began to thruſt away the crowd of people by violence. But when the multitude wedged together in a crowd, could not poſſibly retire by reaſon of the places narrowneſs; the Souldiers, ſuppoſing that the multitude made a reſiſtance, and deſignedly ſtopped the paſſage, made uſe of their naked ſwords, as if they had been engaging an Enemy, and began to cut thoſe that ſtood in the way. There were deſtroyed therefore, as report ſays, about three thouſand one hundred and fifty perſons: ſome of whom the Souldiers ſlew; others were killed by [a] Socrates (as alſo Sozomen) is miſtaken here. For Paulus was by Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium baniſhed not to Theſſalonica, but to Cucuſus, and was there ſtrangled by the Arians; as Athanaſius informs us, in his Epiſt. ad Solitar. But theſe things hapned a long while after this, to wit, when Conſtans Auguſtus was dead, in the year of our Lord 350, or 351. as Baronius will have it, who long ſince perceived this errour of Socrates's. Further 'tis eaſie to confute Socrates out of Athanaſius. For Athanaſius relates, that Philippus (after he had baniſhed Paulus and cauſed him to be cruelly murdered by the Arians) was within leſs than a year depoſed from his Prefecture, deprived of his goods, and ended his life miſerably. Now, Philippus was Conſul in the year of Chriſt 348: and on the year following he bore the Office of Præfect of the Prætorium, as may be collected from the Laws extant in the Theodoſian Code directed to him. The ſame Philippus was after this ſent Embaſſadour by Conſtantius to Magnentius, a little before the fight at Murſa, as Zoſimus relates in his ſecond book. Which hapned in the year of Chriſt 351. Let us therefore ſuppoſe that Philippus died on the year following, which was the year of Chriſt 352. Then Paulus might have been baniſhed by him in the year of Our Lord 351; which is Baronius's opinion. And from this year Macedonius's preſidency over the Conſtantinopolitan Church muſt be begun. Valeſ.

[b] At this place there was wanting this whole line [δι' ἧς ἐπὶ τὰς βασιλικὰς αὐλὰς ἀπηχθείς, through which [Paulus] was carried into the Imperial Palace] which I have made good from the Florentine and Sforzian M. S. In Leo Allatius's M.S. there is ſomething more added here, after this manner: συνελαλύθεισαν περὶ τὸ δημόσιον ἐν φήμης ὑποψίᾳ συλλεγῆναι, ἐκφερχθῆναι διὰ τὸ πεφράχθαι πάσας ταῖς ἐξόδοις τὸν δήμον, μίαν τῆς λιτρᾶς θυρίδα κελεύσῃ, δι' ἧς ἐπὶ τὰς βασιλικὰς αὐλὰς ἀχθεὶς ὁ Παῦλος, &c. i. e. They had flockt about the publick Bath, being gathered together there by the report of a ſuſpicion; becauſe the people environed all the paſſages out, he ordered one of the Bath doors to be opened, thorough which Paulus was conveyed into the Imperial Palace, &c. Valeſ.

[c] How Philippus could baniſh Paulus to Theſſalonica, I ſee not. For Socrates relates theſe things as done whilſt Conſtans was yet living, and before the Council of Serdica. But at that time Theſſalonica was under the Government of Conſtans Auguſtus. How therefore could Philippus (who was Præfect of the Prætorium to Conſtantius) baniſh Paulus to Theſſalonica, and permit him to live in the Cities of Illyricum; but wholly forbid him entring into the Eaſtern parts [of the Empire?] Valeſ.

by the crowd. After such brave exploits as these, Macedonius, as if he had done no mischief at all, but were clear and guiltless of what had happened, was seated in the Episcopal Chair by the Prefect, rather than by the Ecclesiastick Canon. Thus therefore did Macedonius and the Arians take possession of Churches by so great and numerous slaughters of men. At the same time also, the Emperour built [d] The great Church, which is now called Sophia. It was joyned to that Church named Irene, which, being before a little one, the Emperours Father had very much beautified and enlarged. And both of them are to be seen at this present time, encompassed within one and the same wall, and called by the name of one Church.

[d] This Great Church was consecrated by Eusebius Bishop of Constantinople, (he that before had been Bishop of Nicomedia) if we may credit Cedrenus. For at the ninth year of Constantius he writes thus: καὶ συνελεύσεσιν τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ μεγάλην ἐκκλησίαν ὑπὸ κωνσταντίου, &c. i. e. And Eusebius consecrated the Church of God, called the Great Church, which was finished by Constantius, according to the order of Constantine the Great in his Will. And he brought the reliques of the holy Martyr Pamphilus, and those of his companions, Theodulus, Porphyrius, and Paulus, from Antioch, and deposited them therein. But Cedrenus mistakes in his notation of the time. For if this consecration were performed by Eusebius of Nicomedia, it must be placed on the third or fourth year of Constantius, at which time Eusebius governed the See of Constantinople. The same Cedrenus relates, that this Church, being afterwards ruined, and re-edified by Constantius, was consecrated by Eudoxeus. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

That Athanasius, being afraid of the Emperours menaces, returned to Rome again.

AT the same time, there was another false accusation patcht together against Athanasius by the Arians, who invented this occasion for it. The * Father of the Augusti had heretofore given a yearly allowance of Bread-corn to the Church of Alexandria for the relief of those that were indigent. It was reported by the Arians, that Athanasius had usually sold this Bread-corn for money, and had converted the money to his own gain. The Emperour therefore, having given credit to this report, threatned Athanasius with death. He, being made sensible of the Emperours menaces, made his escape, and absconded. But when Julius Bishop of Rome understood what the Arians had done against Athanasius, having also received Eusebius's Letter who was now dead, he [a] invites Athanasius, to come to him; being informed of the place where he lay concealed. At the same time arrived the [b] Letter, which those [Bishops] that before that had been convened at Antioch, wrote to him.

* Constantine the Great.

[a] Socrates does here confound all things, and repeats the same things twice, as if they had been done again. For he says that Athanasius fled to Rome twice. The same is asserted by Baronius (in his Annalls,) by Petavius (in his Rationarium Temporum,) and by Blondellus (in his book de primatu.) But we have sufficiently refuted this mistake, in our first book of Ecclesiastick Observations, chap. 6. Socrates makes the same mistake, in his asserting that Paulus Bishop of Constantinople came twice to Rome. Moreover, Julius received Eusebius of Nicomedia's Letter, before that Council of Antioch, which was held at the consecration of the New Jerusalem, as we remarked before. And at the same time he invited Athanasius and his adversaries to Rome, in order to the discussion of their cause, as 'tis manifest from Athanasius's relation. Vales.

[b] The Bishops who had been convened at Antioch at the consecration, having received Julius's Letter written to Eusebius of Nicomedia, (in which he invited him and the rest of the Eusebians to Rome, in order to the having their cause discussed there on a set day, whereon a Council was there to be held:) detained Julius's messengers (Elpidius and Philoxenus,) beyond the day appointed. Then, after they had held their Synod, they dismissed the messengers, and give them a Letter to Julius. Upon receipt whereof he wrote back that famous Letter, which Athanasius hath inserted, in his second Apology against the Arians; pag. 739, &c. Edit. Park. 1627. Vales.

Another [c] Letter also was sent to him by the Bishops in Egypt, informing him, that those things objected against Athanasius were false. These Letters so directly contradicting one another having been sent to Julius, he returned an answer to those [Bishops] convened at Antioch, wherein he [d] blamed them, first for the bitterness of their Letter; then [he told them] they had done contrary to the Canons, because they had not called him to the Synod; it being commanded by the Ecclesiastick Rule, that the Churches ought not to make Sanctions contrary to the Bishop of Rome's Sentiment. [He complained] also, that they had clandestinely adulterated the faith. And moreover, that what was heretofore done at Tyre, had been fraudulently and corruptly transacted, in regard the memorials of the Acts done at Mareotes had been made up of one side only. Further, that what had been objected concerning Arsenius's murther, was apparently demonstrated to have been a false accusation. These, and such like passages as these, Julius wrote at large to the [Bishops] convened at Antioch. Moreover, we had inserted here the Letters to Julius, and his answer also; had not the prolixity thereof hindred that design of ours. But Sabinus, a follower of the Macedonian Heresie, whom we have mentioned before, has not put Julius's Letters into His collection [of the Acts] of Synods. Although, he has not left out that [Epistle] written from those [convened] at Antioch to Julius. But this is usually done by Sabinus. For, such Letters as either make no mention at all of, or reject the term Homoousios, those [Epistles, I say,] he carefully inserts. But the contrary hereto he voluntarily and on set purpose omits. Thus much concerning these things. Not long after this, Paulus pretending a journey to Corinth, arrived in Italy. Both the [* Bishops] therefore make their condition known to the Emperour of those parts.

[c] He means the Synodical Epistle, which the Bishops of Egypt wrote to all the Bishops every where: which is inserted in the first place by Athanasius in his forecited Apology, pag. 722. Edit. ut prius. Julius speaks concerning this Synodical Epistle, in that letter he wrote to the Eastern Bishops convened at Antioch: ἔγραψαν δὲ καὶ πλεῖστοι, &c. Moreover, many Bishops (says he) wrote from Egypt and from other Provinces, in defence of Athanasius. Vales.

[d] I read [ἐμέμψατο, he blamed] not [ἐπέμψατο, he sent:] Sr Henry Savil hath mended this place, in the margin of his Copy, and made it agreeable to our reading. In the Alat. M. S. this place is written thus: ἐπεμέμφετο πρῶτον μὲν τὸ ἐπαχθὲς τῆς αὐτῶν ἐπιστολῆς; i. e. in the first place he found fault with the bitterness of their Epistle. This Letter of Julius's is still extant, preserved for us by Athanasius, in his second Apology against the Arians: pag. 739, &c. Edit. ut Prius. In that Letter Julius reprehends the insolency and pride, which the Eastern Bishops had used in their Letters to him. But, that which Socrates here adds (to wit, that Julius complained, because they had not invited him to the Synod: and that it was the Ecclesiastick rule, that nothing should be determined in the Church without the Bishop of Rome's consent:) is not to be found in that Letter. Indeed, Julius complains in that Epistle, because the Eastern Bishops (upon their receipt of his Letter, wherein he invited them to the Synod at Rome,) disregarding this his invitation, had ordained Gregorius Bishop in Athanasius's See. But he says not one word concerning this Ecclesiastick Rule or Canon. And yet Sozomen (chap. 3. book 10. Eccles. History) says the same that Socrates does here. Vales.

How the Emperour of the Weſtern parts requeſted of his brother, that ſuch perſons might be ſent, as could give an account of [the depoſition of] Athanaſius and Paulus. And, that they who were ſent publiſhed another form of the Creed.

BUt the Emperour of the Weſtern parts, being informed of * their ſufferings, [a] ſympathized with them. And he ſends a Letter to his brother, ſignifying his deſire to have three Biſhops ſent to him, who might give an account of Paulus's and Athanaſius's depoſition. [b] The perſons ſent were Narciſſus the Cilician, Theodorus the Thracian, Maris the Chalcedonian, and Marcus the Syrian. Who being arrived, would in no wiſe admit of a congreſs with Athanaſius. But, having ſuppreſſed the Creed publiſhed at Antioch, and patched up another form, they preſented it to the Emperour Conſtans; the words whereof were theſe.

But the reading may be [δυσπαθεῖ was very much troubled at:] which emendation is the beſt. Valeſ.

[b] Some few months after the Synod at Antioch which was held at the Dedication; the Eaſtern Biſhops made another form of the Creed, and ſent it to Conſtans Auguſtus, and to the Weſtern Biſhops, by Narciſſus, Theodorus, Maris, and Marcus, as if it had been dictated by the Synod at Antioch. So Athanaſius atteſts in his book de Synod. Arimin. and Seleuc. This therefore happned in the year of Chriſt 342. Socrates does evidently agree with Athanaſius. For he ſays, that thoſe meſſengers ſent by the Eaſtern Biſhops ſuppreſſed that form of the Creed compoſed by the Antiochian Synod, and inſtead thereof produced another, which themſelves had made. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning the large Explanation [of the Faith.]

[a] THe ſpace of three years being compleatly paſſed after theſe things, the Eaſtern Biſhops having again aſſembled a Synod, and compoſed another [form of] Faith, ſend it to thoſe in Italy, by Eudoxius at that time Biſhop of Germanicia, Martyrius and Macedonius who was Biſhop of Mopſueſtia in Cilicia. This [form of the] Creed, being written a great deal more at large, and containing many more additions than thoſe forms publiſhed before, was ſet forth in theſe very words.

[a] Athanaſius (in his book de Synodis) ſays the ſame: his words are theſe: Ἐπὶ τέτοις ὡσαυτῶς μεταγνόντες, συλλέγουσι πάλιν τὸ συνέδριον ἑαυτῶν ὧν ἔτη τρία, &c. i. e. Afterwards, repenting as it were [of what they had done,] they again aſſemble a Synod of their own party, three years after. And they ſend Eudoxius, Martyrius, and Macedonius of Cilicia, and ſome other perſons with them, into the parts of Italy; who carried along with them a prolixe [form of] faith, &c. Baronius (in his Annals) ſays, that this ſecond Council of Antioch (wherein that prolixe form of faith was promulged) was convened in the year of Chriſt 344. And he thinks that he proves this from Athanaſius and Socrates. But, in my judgment, he is much miſtaken. For firſt, this expreſſion of Athanaſius's [ἔτη τρία, after three years] ſignifies the fourth year, not the third. For it denotes, that three years were now paſt. In this ſenſe alſo Socrates underſtood the paſſage in Athanaſius; in regard he ſays [τριετῆς δὲ ἐν τῷ μέσῳ διαδεδομένῳ χρόνῳ. i. e. the ſpace of three years being compleatly paſſed after theſe things. Since therefore that Synod of Antioch which had been convened at the Conſecration, was held in the year of Chriſt 341; this ſecond Antiochian Synod ought more truly to be placed on the year of Chriſt 345. Secondly, Athanaſius does not ſay, that the ſecond Antiochian Synod (wherein the large form of Faith was compoſed,) was aſſembled three years after that Synod at the conſecration had been convened there: but he ſays, it was aſſembled three years after Narciſſus, Theodorus, Maris, and Marcus had brought that new form of Faith to Conſtans Auguſtus, pretending it to have been compoſed at Antioch. Now, he ſays that this was done ſome few months after the Antiochian Synod held at the Conſecration. From whence that which I have ſaid is made apparent; to wit, that that Council (in which the large form of Faith had been compoſed,) was convened in the year of Chriſt 345; not in the year 344, as Baronius would have it. Valeſ.

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, the Creator and maker of all things, * Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. And in his only begotten Son Jeſus Chriſt, *our Lord, begotten of the Father before all ages. perpetual, shall continue unto infinite ages. For he sitteth at the right hand of the Father, not only in this present world, but in that also which is to come. We believe likewise in the holy Ghost, that is, in the * Paraclete. Whom [Christ] having promised to the Apostles, after his ascent into heaven he sent him, † That he might teach them and bring all things to their remembrance. By whom also those souls that sincerely believe in him are sanctified. But those who assert that the Son [existed] of things which are not, or of another substance, and not of God, and that there was a time or age when he was not, the holy Catholick Church hath determined to be aliens [from it.] In like manner also, those that affirm there are three Gods, or that Christ is not God before [all] ages, or that he is not Christ, or the Son of God, or that the same Person is the Father, Son, and holy Ghost, or that the Son is not begotten, or that the Father begat not the Son of his own will and pleasure; [these persons] the Holy and Catholick Church Anathematizes. For neither is it safe to assert, that the Son [existed] of things which are not: in regard this is no where declared concerning him in the divinely inspired Scriptures. Nor have we learned, [that he had his essence] from any other pre-existing substance besides the Father, but that he was truly and genuinely begotten of the Father only. For the divine Word teacheth, that there is one unbegotten [principle which is] without beginning, [to wit] the Father of Christ. Nor must they (who without authority of Scripture doe dangerously assert this [proposition,] there was a time when he was not) preconceive in their minds then any foregoing interval of time, but God only who begat him without time. For both times and ages were made by him. [c] Nor must it be thought, that the Son is without an original, or unbegotten as the Father is. For no Father, or Son can properly be said to be co-inoriginate and co-unbegotten. But we have determined, that the Father, being alone without an original and incomprehensible hath incomprehensibly and in a manner to all men imperceptible begotten: but that the Son was begotten before ages, and that he is not unbegotten like the Father, but hath a beginning, [to wit,] the Father who begat him. * For the head of Christ is God. Nor, although we acknowledge three things and persons, [to wit,] of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost, according to the Scriptures; do we therefore make three Gods. For we know, that there is one only God, perfect of himself, unbegotten, inoriginate, and invisible, [that is,] the God and Father of the only begotten, who of himself only hath his own existence, and who only does abundantly and freely give existence to all other things. But, although we do assert that there is one God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who only is unbegotten; we do not therefore deny Christ to be God before ages, as the Followers of * Paul of Samosata do, who affirm that after his incarnation he was by a promotion deified, whereas by nature he was a meer man. For we know that he (although he hath been made subject unto the Father and unto God, yet nevertheless) was begotten of God, and is by nature true and perfect God, and was not afterwards made God of * man: but was for our sakes made man of God, and that he hath never ceased to be God. Moreover, we abominate and anathematize those who falsely stile him the bare and meer word of God, [and affirm] that he has no real existence, but hath his Essence in another: one who le [terming him] as it were that word called by some [d] The Word outwardly uttered by the mouth; at another, as it were the mental or internal Word: being of opinion, that before ages he was not Christ, nor the Son of God, nor the Mediatour, nor the Image of God: but that [e] he was made Christ, and the Son of God, from such time as he took our flesh from the Virgin four hundred years agoe. For from that time they assert Christ to have had the beginning of his Kingdom, and that it shall have an end after the consummation and the judgment. Such manner of persons as these are the followers of Marcellus and Photinus the Ancyro-Galatians: who reject the eternal existence and deity of Christ, and his endless Kingdom, (in like manner as do [f] the Jews,) upon a pretence of seeming to constitute a monarchy. For we understand him to be, not barely The word of God outwardly uttered by the mouth, or his mental or internal Word, but the Living God the Word, and subsisting of himself; and the Son of God, and Christ: who existed with his Father and was conversant with him before ages, not by fore-knowledge only, and ministred unto him at the Creation of all things whether * visible or invisible: but is the Word of God really subsisting, and is God of God. For it is he to whom the Father said, * Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: who in his own Person appeared to the Fathers, gave the Law, and spake by the Prophets; and being at last made man, he manifested his Father to all men, and reigns unto perpetual ages. For Christ hath attained no new dignity: but we believe him to have been perfect from the beginning, and in all things like unto his Father. We also deservedly expel out of the Church those who affirm, that the Father, Son, and holy Ghost are the same Person, impiously supposing the three names to mean one and the same Thing and Person; because by an incarnation they make the incomprehensible and impassible Father subject to be comprehended, and to suffer. Of which sort [of Hereticks] are those termed amongst the Romans [g] Patropassians, but Instead of [ὡς τὸ προφορικὸν ῥῆμα λεγόμενον] it should be [ὡς τὸν προφορικὸν, &c. and ὡς τὸν ἐνδιάθετον] as it is in the Allat. M. S. and in Athanasius, in his book de Synodis. By [λόγῳ προφορικῷ] Philosophers mean That word which is uttered by the mouth. Hilarius calls it Verbum prolaticum. To which is opposed [ὁ ἐνδιάθετος λόγος,] which modern Philosophers do term the word of the mind. Vales.

[b] This was the opinion of the Arians. The Easterns explain this sentiment of theirs better hereafter, to wit, that the Father may be understood to have begotten the Son willingly, without compulsion. Vales.

[c] In Robert Stephens's Edition of Socrates (Fol. 197. Edit. Paris. 1594.) these words [ὅτε μὴ συναΐδιον τὸν υἱὸν τῷ πατρὶ εἶναι, νομιστέον, i.e. Nor must it be thought, that the Son is without an original, or unbegotten as the Father is] are wanting. The said Robert Stephens's Edition does in the following words also differ something from this Copy of the Creed here. Athanasius has inserted this whole Creed, in his book de Synod. Arimin. & Seleuc. pag. 896, &c. Edit. paris. 1627. Athanasius's copy and this in Valesius's Edition of Socrates do agree: whom we have followed in our Version.

[d] By these words the Eastern Bishops mean, the Heresie of Marcellus Ancyranus, who asserted that Christs Kingdom began from his nativity; about four hundred years before that time; making use of a certain number for an uncertain. The Synodick Epistle of the Eastern Bishops at Sardica informs us hereof; which Epistle Hilarius has inserted, in his fragments. For these are their words in that Letter: Exstitit namque temporibus nostris Marcellus, &c. i. e. For there hath risen up in our days one Marcellus of Galatia, the most execrable pest of all Hereticks, who with a sacrilegious mind, and impious mouth, and a wicked argument, will needs set bounds to the perpetual, eternal, and timeless Kingdom of our Lord Christ, saying, that he began his reign 400 years since, and shall end it at the dissolution of this present world. Vales.

[e] We made good this place, by adding the word [ἰουδαίοις, the Jews:] which is not in Robert Stephens's Edit. but it occurs in Athanasius, and in the Allat. M. S. Vales.

[f] The Heresie of the Patropassians (or Patripassians) was very ancient, and far diffused. Tertullian (Adv. Prax. cap. 1, and 2.) chargeth this Heresie upon Praxeas. The same was maintained by Hermogenes, whence they were termed Hermogeniani. After whom Noetus maintained the same, who (says Epiphanius) lived 130 years before his time: (See Epiphan. Heres. 57.) From Noetus they had the name of Noëtiani; and from Sabellius, Noëtus's disciple, they were called Sabelliani. After whom succeeded Priscillianus in the same Heresie; from him they

For the ſacred Scriptures do teach us, that the one and alone-only-begotten Son was genuinely and truely begotten. But, although we do aſſert, that the Son is of himſelf, and that he doth live and ſubſiſt in like manner as the Father doth; yet we do not therefore ſeparate him from the Father, imagining in our minds in a corporal manner any ſpaces or intervalls of place between their conjunction. Concerning the Synod at Serdica.

a This confeſſion of faith (for ſo Athanaſius calls it) the Embaſſadours of the Eaſtern Biſhops preſented to the Weſtern Prelates aſſembled at Millaine. For ſome Biſhops together with the Presbyters of the Church of Rome had gone thither, to intreat Conſtans Auguſtus, that he would write to his brother Conſtantius about the aſſembling of a General Synod, in order to the determining of thoſe diſſenſions in an Eccleſiaſtick Judicature, which had been raiſed in diverſe Churches: thus we are informed by Athanaſius in his Apology to Conſtantius. Moreover, when the Eaſterns had preſented this draught of the Creed to thoſe of the Weſt, they requeſted them to ſubſcribe it. But the Weſtern Biſhops made anſwer, that, as to what belonged to the Articles of Faith, the Nicene Creed was to them ſufficient, to which nothing was to be added, nor any thing to be taken from it. And as concerning the condemnation of thoſe Hereticks who were diſallowed of in that confeſſion, they requeſted of the Eaſtern Biſhops Embaſſadours, that they would in the firſt place condemn the Arian Hereſie. But, upon their refuſal to do that, the Eaſtern Embaſſadours being angry went away from the Council; as Liberius relates, in his Epiſtle to the Emperour Conſtantius, in theſe words: Quæ eſt pax, Clementiſſime Imperator, &c. What peace is there, moſt Gracious Emperour, whenas there are four Biſhops of their party, Demofilus, Macedonius, Eudoxius, and Martyrius, who above eight years ſince, when they would not condemn Arius's Heretical opinion at Millaine, departed from the Council in anger? notwithſtanding, the Weſtern Biſhops condemned Photinus's Hereſie in that Synod. But they pronounced no ſentence againſt Marcellus, becauſe he had before been judged clear from all manner of Hereſie in the Roman Synod. In the ſame Synod Urſacius and Valens (who had lain under a ſuſpicion of being Arians) having preſented a Libel wherein they condemned Arius's perfidiouſneſs and Photinus's Hereſie, were admitted to communion, as the Synodick Epiſtle of the Ariminum Council informs us. The ſame is atteſted by Urſacius and Valens themſelves, in another Libel afterwards preſented to Julius Biſhop of Rome, in theſe words: Item Anathema dicimus, &c. Alſo we anathematize thoſe, who deny, that Chriſt is God and the Son of God from all eternity, according to our former Libel, which we preſented at Millaine, &c. We thought good to be more large in theſe remarks of ours concerning the Millaine Synod, becauſe the memory thereof is very obſcure in the Eccleſiaſtick Annals. Dionyſius Petavius is the firſt perſon that hath taken notice of this Synod, who (in his diſſertation de duplici Synodo Sirmienſi) hath made many very learned obſervations concerning this Synod. But he has miſtaken the year whereon it was convened. For he ſays it was held in the year of Chriſt 347, a little before the Council of Serdica. Which can in no wiſe be true. Therefore Jacobus Sirmondus (in his ſecond Diatriba, which he wrote againſt Petavius) has in this particular deſervedly reproved him. Baronius (who affirms that the long draught of the Creed (which Socrates has recorded in the foregoing chapter) was drawn up at the Antiochian Synod in the year of Chriſt 344,) places this Embaſſie of the Eaſtern Biſhops and the Millaine Council on the ſame year alſo. But Sirmondus (in the forementioned Diatriba) aſſignes this Council to the year of Chriſt 346. Which opinion is in my judgment the truer. For, in the firſt place, Athanaſius (in his Apologetick to Conſtantius,) relates, that on the fourth year after his coming to Rome he was by Conſtans Auguſtus ſummoned to Millaine, whither ſome Biſhops were then gone. Now Athanaſius came to Rome in the year of Chriſt 341. Secondly, Hilarius (in fragmentis) relates, that the Millaine Synod (wherein Photinus was condemned) was held two years before Urſacius and Valens offered their Libel of ſatisfaction to Julius Biſhop of Rome. For after he has recorded that Libel, Libel, he addes these words, Hæc Epistola post biennium missa est, quàm hæresis Photini a Romanis damnata est, i. e. this Letter was sent two years after the Romans had condemned Photinus's Heresie. Since therefore Ursacius and Valens wrote that Letter in the year of Christ 349, as Petavius attests; the Millain Council must needs have been celebrated on the third year before that: that is, on the year of Christ 346. For that expression [post biennium, two years after] imports thus much, to wit, on the third year after that; which Petavius did not consider. Vales.

CONSTANTIUS. Empire,] both because [b] they were unskilled in the Greek language, and also in regard they understood not these things, admitted not of them; saying, that the Nicene Creed was sufficient, and that there was no necessity of making any further disquisitions But when, upon the * Emperours writing again, (ordering that Paulus and Athanasius should be restored to their own Sees,) no thing could be done further in that affair: (For there was a continued Sedition amongst the Populace:) Paulus and Athanasius requested that another Synod might be convened, that both their cause, and also the matters of faith, might be determined by an * Oecumenicall Synod: and they made it apparent, that they had been deposed for no other reason but this, that the Faith might be subverted. Another Oecumenicall Synod therefore is summoned [to meet] at Serdica (which is a City of Illyricum,) by the determination of the two Emperours; the one of them requesting this by his Letters, and the other (to wit, the Emperour of the East) readily complying with him. [c] It was then the eleventh year from the death of the Father of the Augusti: Rufinus and Eusebius were Consuls, at such time as the Synod at Serdica was assembled. About three hundred Bishops of the Western parts met there, as [d] Athanasius attests. But from the Eastern parts Sabinus says there came but seventy, amongst which number Ischyras, Bishop of Marcotes was recounted, whom they who had deposed Athanasius, Ordained Bishop of that Country. Some of them pretended infirmity of body: others [e] complained of the shortness of the time that was set, laying the blame thereof upon Julius Bishop of Rome: although there had passed a year and six months, after such time as the Synod had been summoned, and during which space Athanasius made his abode at Rome, expecting the meeting of the Synod. When therefore they were all convened at Serdica, the Eastern Bishops refused to come into the presence of the Western, saying, that they would not enter into discourse with them, unless they would banish Athanasius and Paulus from the convention. But when Protogenes Bishop of Serdica, and Hosius Bishop of Corduba (which is a City in Spain, as we said before) would by no means suffer [f] Paulus and Athanasius to be absent [from the Synod, the Eastern Bishops] went away immediately. And returning to Philippopolis, a City of Thracia, they made up a Synod apart by themselves. Wherein they openly anathematized the term Homoüsios: and having [g] inserted the [h] Anomoian opinion into their Epistles, they sent them about to all places. But the Bishops at Serdica in the first place condemned them for deserting [the Council.] Afterwards they divested Athanasius's Accusers of their dignities. And having confirmed that form of the Creed published at Nice, and rejected the term * Anomoios, they made a more manifest publication of [the term] † Homoüsios: concerning which they wrote Letters, and (as the others did) sent them about to all places. Moreover, both parties were of opinion, that they had done what was right and true; the Eastern Bishops [thought so,] because the Western [Prelates] had approved of and entertained those persons whom they had deposed: and the Western Bishops [were of that opinion,] because they who had deposed these persons, fled away before their cause had been discussed, and because * they were the preservers and defenders of the Nicene Faith, but † these had been so audacious as to adulterate it. They therefore restored [i] Paulus and Athanasius to their Sees; as also Marcellus [Bishop] of Ancyra [a City] in Galatia the || first: He had been deposed a long time before, as we have made mention in our foregoing || book:

[b] Baronius does deservedly blame Socrates here, for his saying that the reason why the Western Bishops rejected this draught of the Creed was, because they understood not the Greek tongue. As if there were not then many in Italy who were well skilled in the Greek language. Moreover, Theodorus Lector has with good reason found fault with this cause of their refusal. For, instead of Socrates's words here, he has substituted these; διὰ τὸ ψεῦδηλον τῆς ἀσεμνίας, because of its manifest blasphemy. Vales.

* He means Constans.

* General.

[c] From the consulate of Felicianus and Titianus, (which was in the year of Christ 317,) to the consulate of Rufinus and Eusebius which was in the year of our Lord 347,) there are Ten years compleat. Therefore, if the Council of Serdica was convened in the eleventh year after Constantine's death, it must of necessity have been assembled after the twenty second day of May. Vales.

[d] Athanasius does not say, that about three hundred Bishops of the Western Churches met at the Council of Serdica. He only says this, that as well those who were present at the Council of Serdica, as those who subscribed the Synodick Epistle afterwards sent to them; also those who before the Council at Serdica had written Synodick Epistles in his behalf, out of Phrygia, Asia, and Isauria, were in all three hundred and fourty. This passage of Athanasius's occurs in his second defence against the Arians, pag. 768; Edit. Paris. 1627. Moreover, the same Athanasius (in his Epistle ad Solitar. pag. 818.) does expressly attest, that the Bishops, who met at the Council of Serdica, as well those out of the Western as the Eastern parts, were no more than 170. His words are these: συνήχθησαν τόποι, &c. There met therefore, both from the East, and from the West, at the City of Serdica, 170 Bishops, neither more nor less. In the Mogunt. Edit. after the Canons of the Synod of Serdica, there is this note; & subscripserunt, &c. i. e. and all the Bishops of divers Provinces and Cities subscribed, being in number 121. Vales.

[e] In this place Socrates seems to have been mistaken, in referring those things to the Council of Serdica, which belong to the Roman Synod. For when Julius had invited the Eastern Bishops to a Synod at Rome, that Athanasius's case might there be inquired into; the Eastern Bishops refused to come thither, pretending, amongst other reasons, the narrowness of the time set; as Julius informs us in his Epistle to the said Eastern Bishops, recorded by Athanasius, pag. 744. Indeed Socrates's following words, to wit [although there had passed a year and six months, after such time as the Synod had been summoned, and during which space Athanasius made his abode at Rome, &c.] doe manifestly confirm what I have said. For Athanasius, invited by Julius's Letters, came to Rome; where he abode a whole year and six months expecting his adversaries, and the Synod which had been summoned at Rome. Julius attests this, in his forequoted Epistle, pag. 748. Vales.

CONSTANTIUS.

[f] Paulus Bishop of Constantinople was not present at the Synod of Serdica, as Theodoret attests, (book 2. chap. 5. Eccles. Histor.) which is also confirmed by the Synodick Epistle of the Eastern Bishops at Serdica, which occurs in Hilarius's Fragments, at pag. 434. Edit. Paris. 1631. Vales.

[g] Instead of [ἐπιστολὰς συγγράψαντες, having written Letters] the reading in the Alex. M. S. is truer; which is thus [ἐπιστολαῖς ἐγγράψαντες, having inserted in their Letters.] But what Socrates here says, (to wit, that the Eastern Bishops at Serdica established the opinion of the Anomoiani (see the following note in this chapter) in their Synodick Epistle,) is altogether false. Their Synodick Epistle is extant in Hilarius's Fragments, at pag. 434. Edit. Paris. 1631; and at the end of it there is a confession of faith added. In which confession there is nothing which in the least favours of the Anomians opinion. The said Hilarius, relating (in his book de Synodis) the same draught of the Creed published by the Eastern Bishops at Serdica, owns it as Catholick, and explaines it. And Hilarius is so far from believing that they disseminated the Anomians opinion; that he affirms them to have obstructed that opinion on every side. His words are these: Ex omni autem parte, &c. But on all sides, whithersoever sollicitude could turn it self, the passage is stopt up by the wit of the Hereticks, lest it should be Preacht, that there is any diversity or unlikelineſs in the Son [from the Father.] Vales.

[h] The Anomoians were such as asserted, that the Son had a substance or essence different from, or unlike to the Father.

* That is, different, or unlike.

† Co-essential, or consubstantial.

* The Western Bishops.

† The Eastern Bishops.

[i] In the Synodick Epistle of the Counsil of Sardica (which occurs in Theodoret B. 2. c. 8. Eccles. Hist.) there is not the least mention of Paulus. Vales.

CONSTANTIUS.

but then he used his utmost diligence † to get the sentence revoked which had been pronounced against him; declaring that the expressions of the book written by him were not understood, and that he therefore lay under a suspicion [of maintaining] Paul of Samosata's opinion. But you must take notice that Eusebius Pamphilus confuted Marcellus's book in a discourse against him, comprized in [k] three entire books which he entitled Against Marcellus. He quotes Marcellus's own words [in those books,] and in his discourse against them maintanes, that Marcellus does assert (in like manner as Sabellius the Libyan and Paul of Samosata did) that the Lord [Christ] is a meer man.

† Ἀναπαλαῦσαι, to renew the combat with the sentence which, &c.

[k] These three books (the Title whereof is De Ecclesiastica Theologia adversus Marcellum) of Eusebius's are at this day extant. There are prefixt before them two books, entitled κατὰ μαρκέλλου, that is, Against Marcellus; wherein he reproves his designe, malice, and envy. Eusebius attests (in the close of his second book against Marcellus) that he wrote these books by the order of those Bishops who had condemned Marcellus in the Constantinopolitan Synod. Further, it is uncertain whether or no Socrates had ever seen those two former books against Marcellus, in regard he has made no mention of them. Vales.

CHAP. XXI.

An Apology for Eusebius Pamphilus.

BUt in regard some have attempted to reproach this person, (I mean Eusebius Pamphilus) as if he were an Assertor of Arius's opinion in the books he hath published; I judge it not unseasonable to say something concerning him. In the first place therefore, he was present at, and consented to, the Nicene Synod, which determined that the Son was coessential with the Father. Moreover, in his third * Book concerning the Life of Constantine, he says word for word thus: But the Emperour incited them all to an unity of mind, until he had at that time reduced them all to be of the same mind and to have the same sentiments in relation to all those points, concerning which they had before disagreed. In so much that at Nice they did all perfectly agree in the [points] of Faith. Since therefore Eusebius, making mention of the Nicene Synod, does say, that all things about which they disagreed were composed, and that they were all brought to be of one and the same mind and opinion; how can any persons judge him to be a maintainer of Arius's opinion. The Arians also themselves are mistaken, in their supposing him to be a favourer of their Tenets. But some body will perhaps say, that in his writings he seems to † Arianize, in regard he always says [a] By Christ. To whom we answer, that Ecclesiastick Writers have frequently made use of this Expression, and many other such like, which do signifie the dispensation of our Saviours Humanity. And before all these [Writers] the Apostle Paul hath made use of these very expressions; and he was never thought to be the Teacher of a perverse opinion. Moreover, in regard Arius has been so audacious, as to stile the Son a Creature like unto one of those other [Creatures made by God;] hear what Eusebius saith (in his first book against Marcellus,) concerning this; these are his very words: He only, and no other, hath been declared to be, and is, the only begotten Son of God, upon which account they are deservedly to be reprehended, who have audaciously stiled him a Creature, made of nothing like the rest of the Creatures. For how should he be a Son? How should he be Gods only begotten, who is entitled to the very same nature with the rest of the Creatures, [b] and would be one of those common Creatures, in regard he (like them) is made a partaker of a Creation from nothing? But the sacred Oracles do not instruct us after this manner concerning him. Then, after the interposition of some few words, he continues, Whosoever therefore doth determine that the Son is made of things which are not, and that he is a [c] Creature produced out of nothing, that person hath forgotten, that he bestows upon him a name only, but in reality he denies him to be a Son. For he that is made of nothing, cannot truly be the Son of God, nor can any thing else which is made [be his Son.] But the true Son of God, in regard he is begotten of him as of a Father, ought deservedly to be stiled the only begotten and beloved of the Father. And therefore he must be God. For what can the offspring of God be else, but most exactly like to him that hath begotten him? A King indeed builds a City, but he begets not a City: but he is said to beget, not to build, a Son. And an Artificer may be said to be the Framer, not the Father, of that which he hath made. But he can in no wise be stiled the Framer of the Son who is begotten by him. So also, the Supream God is the Father of his Son: but he is justly to be called the Maker and Framer of the world. And although this saying may be once found * somewhere in the Scripture, The Lord created me the beginning of his ways in order to his works, yet we ought duly to inspect the meaning of those words, (which I will explain afterwards;) and not (as Marcellus doth) subvert a principal point [asserted by] the Church upon account of one word. These and many other such like expressions Eusebius Pamphilus utters, in his First Book against Marcellus. And in his Third Book [of that work,] the same Authour, declaring in what sense the term Creature is to be taken, says thus. These things therefore having been after this manner proved and confirmed, the consequence is (agreeable to all things explained by us before,) that these words also, The Lord created me the beginning of his ways in order to his works, must have been spoken [concerning the same person.] But, although he says he was created, yet he must not be so understood as if he should say that he had arrived to what he is from things which are not, and that he also was made of

CONSTANTIUS.

[a] Socrates means those Doxologies, that occur at the end of Eusebius's Sermons; which Eusebius doth always put into this form: Glory be to the unborn Father by his only begotten Son, &c. This may plainly be seen in those Tracts of Eusebius's, which Jacobus Sirmondus hath published. For example, in the end of his first book against Sabellius, these are his words: Gloria uni non nato Deo, &c. i.e. Glory be to the one unborn God, by the one only begotten God the Son of God, in one holy Spirit, both now, and always, and throughout all ages of ages. Amen. And so concerning the rest. Also, in the Oration Eusebius made at the Consecration of the Church at Tyre, (which occurs at the Tenth book of his Eccles. Histor. chap. 4.) we meet with the same clause, at the close of that Speech; δι' ὃν αὐτῷ ἡ δόξα, &c. by whom be Glory to him. For so we have worded that place, agreeable to three of our M.SS. Further, 'tis manifestly known, that the Arians attributed this preposition [per quem, by whom] to the Son, upon this design, that they might make him subject to the Father. See Theodoret upon the first chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. Vales.

[b] Before these words there is a whole line wanting, (which (from the First Book of Eusebius de Ecclesiastica Theologia, Chap. 9.) is thus to be made up: πώτη γὲ ἀδελφὸς ἂν τόπον γένοιτο μᾶλλον, ἢ καὶ δὲ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ· ἅμα τε πολλῶν ἕνεκα ἕτερον εἶς. i.e. For by this means he would be their brother, rather than the Son of God: and would be one of those common Creatures, &c. Vales.

[c] Instead of [ϖεϱιγϛάμμιον] the reading should be [ϖεϱιγϛόμμιον, produced] as Eusebius words it, at the place before cited. It should also be [γϛιϛὸν] not [γϛυηϛὸν.] For these two words, although they are distinguished but by one Letter, yet do very much differ in their significations. For the term [γϛυηϛὸν] signifies that which is born; but [γϛιϛὸν] imports that which is made. Vales.

of nothing in the same manner with the other creatures; which some have perversely supposed: but [he speaks this] as being a person subsisting, living, preexisting, and being before the foundation of the whole world; having been constituted the Ruler of the universe by his Lord and Father: the term Created being in that place used instead of Ordained or Constituted. Indeed, the Apostle hath in express words stiled the Rulers and Governours amongst men a Creature; saying, * Submit your selves to every Ordinance of man for the Lords sake, whether it be to the King as Supream: or unto Governours, as unto them that are sent by him. And the Prophet (where he saith, † Prepare to invoke thy God O Israel. For behold he that firmeth the thunder, and createth the Spirit, and declareth his Christ unto men.) hath not taken the word Created in such a sense as to signifie That which hath been made when as before it was not. For God did not then Create his Spirit, when he declared his Christ to all men by him. || For there is no new thing under the Sun. But [the Spirit] was, and did subsist before. But he was sent at such time as the Apostles were gathered together, when (like thunder) * There came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind: and they were filled with the holy Ghost. And thus they declared Gods Christ amongst all men, agreeable to that Prophesie, which saith. † For behold he that firmeth the thunder, and createth the spirit, and declareth his Christ unto men: The term Createth being made use of, instead of Sendeth, or Constituteth: and the word Thunder in another manner signifying the Preaching of the Gospel. And he that saith, || Create in me a clean heart O God, said not that, as if he had had no heart before: but he prayed, that his mind might be made perfectly pure within him. After the same manner this is spoken, * For to make in himself of twain one new man, instead of to conjoyn. Consider also, whether or no this saying be of the same sort, † Put on that new man, which after God is created: and this, || Therefore if any man [be] in Christ, [he is] a new creature: and whatever other [expressions] of this sort may be found by him that diligently searcheth the divinely inspired Scripture. You need not wonder therefore, because in this place * The Lord created me the beginning of his ways, the term Created [is used] metaphorically, instead of Ordained or Constituted. After this manner Eusebius discourses in his Books against Marcellus. We have produced his words here, upon their account, who have attempted causelessly to raile at and revile this person. Nor can they demonstrate, that Eusebius doth attribute a beginning of Essence to the Son of God, although they may find him frequently making use of the expressions of dispensation: especially, because he was a great Emulator and Admirer of Origens Writings, wherein such as are able to understand Origens Books, will find [this] every where [asserted, to wit,] that the Son is begotten of the Father. Thus much we have said by the by, upon their account who have attempted to reproach Eusebius.

CHAP. XXII.

That the Synod of Serdica restored Paulus and Athanasius to their Sees, and that, upon the Eastern Emperours refusal to admit them, the Emperour of the West threatned him with War.

BUt the [Bishops,] as well those convened at Serdica, as they who made up a particular Synod by themselves at Philippopolis [a City] of Thracia, having performed whatsoever each party thought requisite to be done, returned to their own Cities. [Thence forward] therefore the Western Church was severed from the Eastern: and the boundary of communion between them, was the mountain called [a] Soucis, which parts the Illyrians from the Thracians. As far as that mountain there was a promiscuous communion, although their Faith was different. But they [b] communicated not with those who lived beyond it. Such was the confusion of the Churches affaires at that time. Soon after this, the Emperour of the Western parts acquaints his brother Constantius with what had been done at Serdica, and entreats him to restore Paulus and Athanasius to their own Sees. But when Constantius made demurrs to what he had written, the Emperour of the Western parts in another Letter gave him his choice, [to wit,] that he should either admit Paulus and Athanasius to their own former dignities, and restore their Churches to them; or else (if he did not this) he must look upon him to be his Enemy, and expect a War.

[a] In our Annotations on the twenty first book of Amm. Marcellinus, we have long since remarked, that this mountains name should be Soucis; and that hereby is meant the streights of the Succi, which Amm. Marcellinus describes in his twenty first book pag. 189. Edit. Paris. 1635. Philostorgius mentions the same streights, (in book 3. Eccles. Hist.) and calls them στένας, i. e. Succi; being scituated between Dacia and Thracia. He describes them thus: δίοδοι εἰσὶ στεναὶ μεγάλων ὀρῶν, &c. i. e. They are streight passages of vast mountains, which are crouded together on each side into one place, in such a manner that they seem to embrace one another. He means the two mountains, Hæmus and Rhodope, which arising from different places, make an angle in that place, and do as it were kiss one another. Which gave the Ancients an occasion of feigning Hæmus to be a young man, and Rhodope a maid, and that heretofore they fell in love with one another. You may meet with the story in Ovid. Metamorph. book 6. at the beginning. Busbequius (in 1 Epist. Legat. Turci.) says that the Turks do now call this narrow passage Capi deruent, i. e. the Gate of narrownesses. Vales.

[b] These words must have a favourable sense put upon them; and are not so to be understood, as if Socrates should have said, that after the Synod of Serdica the Western Bishops held no communion with the Eastern. For in the Synod of Sirmium (which was convened by the Western Bishops against Photinus two years after the Synod at Serdica) the Western Bishops sent their determinations to the Eastern, upon account of preserving a communion. And the Eastern Bishops wrote back to them, as Hilarius informs us, in his Fragments. Thus therefore Socrates's words here must be understood: to wit; after the Synod of Serdica the Western Bishops did (not readily and rashly, but) with a great deal of cautiousness communicate with the Eastern. Vales.

The [c] Letter he wrote to his brother was this.

[c] Constans Augustus's Letter to his brother Constantius, which is here recorded by Socrates, is in my judgment not to be looked upon as genuine. For Athanasius makes no mention of this Letter: and Paulus's name (which is extant in it) doth upon good grounds render it suspicious. For at that time Paulus enjoyed his Bishoprick: neither was he present at the Synod of Serdica; nor restored by the determination thereof; as we shewed before. Wherefore, if this Letter of Constans's be genuine, it muſt neceſſarily have been written before the Council of Serdica. Laſtly, Conſtantius's firſt Letter to Athanaſius (which Socrates has inſerted in the following chapter) evidently ſhews this to be a forged Letter. CHAP. XXIII.

That Conſtantius, being afraid of his Brothers menaces, by his Letters ordered Athanaſius to appear, and ſent him to Alexandria.

THE Emperour of the Eaſt underſtanding theſe things, was reduced to a very great ſtreight. And having forthwith ſent for moſt of the Eaſtern Biſhops, he made them acquainted with the option his brother had propoſed to him, and enquired of them what was to be done. They made anſwer, that it was better [for him] to grant Athanaſius the Churches, than to undertake a Civil War. Wherefore the Emperour, being neceſſitated thereto, ſummoned Athanaſius to appear before him. At that very interim the Weſtern Emperour ſends Paulus to Conſtantinople, accompanied with two Biſhops and other honorary proviſions, having fortified him both with his own Letters, and alſo with thoſe from the Synod. But whilſt Athanaſius was yet fearful, and in doubt whether he ſhould go to Conſtantius or not: (For he was afraid of the treacherous attempts of the Sycophants:) the Eaſtern Emperour invited him [to his Court] not only once, but a ſecond and a third time; as it is evident from his Letters, the contents whereof, being tranſlated out of the Latine tongue [into the Greek,] are theſe.

Conſtantius's Epiſtle to Athanaſius.

CONSTANTIUS VICTOR AUGUSTUS, to Athanaſius the Biſhop.

Our indefatigable piety hath not neglected you during your being deprived of your native habitation, whilſt you wanted your goods, and wandred up and down in deſert and impaſſable places. And although We have too long deferred the acquainting you by Letters with the purpoſe of Our mind, expecting you would of your own accord have come to Us, and requeſted a remedy for your troubles: yet becauſe peradventure fear hath hindred that purpoſe of your mind, We have therefore ſent to your Gravity, Letters filled with indulgence, that you ſhould haſten to make your ſudden appearance in Our preſence without fear; whereby you might enjoy your deſire, and, having made experiment of Our humanity, be reſtored to your own habitation. For upon this account we made a requeſt for you to Our Lord and Brother* Conſtans Victor Auguſtus, that He would grant you the liberty of coming, to the end that being reſtored to your Country by both Our conſents, you ſhould have this pledge and aſſurance of Our favour.

CONSTANTIUS VICTOR AUGUSTUS, to Athanaſius the Biſhop.

Whilſt we made Our reſidence at Edeſſa, (your Presbyters being preſent there,) We were pleaſed, by ſending a Presbyter to you, to haſten your coming to Our Court, to the end that after you were come into Our Preſence, you might go immediately to Alexandria. But, in regard a conſiderable ſpace of time is now paſt, ſince your receipt of Our Letter, and you have not yet come; We therefore took care to put you in mind by this, that you ſhould now haſten to make your ſudden appearance in Our Preſence, that ſo you may be reſtored to your own Country; and obtain your deſire. And that you might be moſt fully certified hereof, We have ſent Achetas the Deacon, from whom you may underſtand both the purpoſe of Our mind, and alſo that you ſhall readily obtain what you deſire.

Athanaſius having received theſe Letters at Aquileia, (for [c] there he abode after his departure from Serdica,) haſtned immediately to [d] Rome. And having ſhown the Letters to Julius the Biſhop, he cauſed great joy in the Roman Church. For they ſuppoſed, that the Emperour of the Eaſt had now given his aſſent to their Faith, in regard he invited Athanaſius to come to him. But Julius wrote this Epiſtle to the Clergy and Laity in Alexandria concerning Athanaſius.

[c] After the Synod of Serdica, Athanaſius made his abode firſt at Naiſſus in Dacia. In which City he received the Letters written to him by Conſtans Auguſtus. Afterwards, he left Naiſſus, and went to Aquileia, as he himſelf atteſts, in his Apologetick to Conſtantius. pag. 676. Valeſ.

[d] Athanaſius relates the reaſon of this journey of his to Rome in his Second defence againſt the Arians; to wit, that he might take his leave of Julius the Biſhop, and the Roman Church, by whom he had been ſo kindly entertained. For that is the meaning of theſe words of Athanaſius: Ἐγὼ δὲ ἀξιάσας, ἀνῆλθον εἰς τὸ ῥώμην σωπατίξας τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ϗ τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ· i. e. But I, upon receipt of theſe Letters, went to Rome, to bid the Roman Church and the Biſhop farwell: For the term [συνσάντας] ſignifies valedicere, to take leave of, or to bid farewell: as we have obſerved and proved in our Annot. on Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine; book 3. chap. 21. Valeſ.

The Epiſtle of Julius Biſhop of Rome, to thoſe of Alexandria.

Julius to [e] the Biſhops and Presbyters, and Deacons, and to the Laity inhabiting Alexandria, his beloved Brethren, health in the Lord.

[e] In the Allat. M.S. and in Athanaſius (in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians) theſe words [the Biſhops and] are wanting. Inſtead hereof Epiphanius Scholaſticus ſeems to have read [Julius the Biſhop to the Presbyters, &c.] which reading Chriſtophorſon hath followed. Valeſ.

I alſo rejoyce with you, beloved Brethren, becauſe you now ſee before your eyes the fruit of your Faith. For that this is truly ſo, any one may ſee in our brother and fellow Biſhop Athanaſius: whom God hath reſtored to you, upon an account both of his purity of life, and alſo of your prayers. Hence it is apparent, that you have continually offered up to God prayers which were pure and full of charity. For, being mindfull of the Celeſtial promiſes, and [f] of the courſe of life tending thereto, which you have been inſtructed in by the Doctrine of our fore- foresaid Brother; you certainly knew, and (according to that true Faith which is implanted in you) were apprehensive of this, that your Bishop could not be perpetually seperated from you, whom you carried in your pious minds, as being continually present. Wherefore, I need not make use of many words in this my Letter to you. For your Faith hath prevented whatever could have been said by me: and by the grace of Christ those things have been fulfilled, which you in common prayed for and desired. I rejoyce therefore with you, (for I will say it again,) because you have preserved your souls inexpugnable in [your defending of] the Faith. Nor do I any whit less rejoyce with my Brother Athanasius, because (although he hath undergone many sharp afflictions, yet) he was not one hour unmindfull of your love, and your desire. For although he seemed to have been withdrawn from you for a time, yet he was continually conversant with you in spirit. And I am of opinion, Beloved, that all the trialls and troubles which have hapned to him, are not inglorious. For both your, and his Faith hath thereby been made known, and approved amongst all men. For, had not so many and great afflictions befell him, who would have believed, either that you should have had so great a respect and love for so eminent a Bishop, or that he should have been adorned with such excellent virtues, by reason of which he is in no wise to be defrauded of his hope in the heavens? He hath therefore obtained a testimony of confession every way glorious, both in this, and in the world to come. For after his many and various sufferings both by Land and Sea, he hath trodden under foot all the treacheries of the Arian Heresie; and after his having been frequently assaulted and brought into danger through envy, he hath despised death, being guarded by Almighty God, and our Lord Jesus Christ: hoping that he should not only avoid his Enemies Plots, but also be restored in order to your consolation, bringing back to you greater Trophies by reason of your being conscious [of having done what was just and good.] Upon which account he hath been rendred glorious even as far as the ends of the whole earth, being approved for his [integrity of] life, undauntedly persisting in the defence of his resolution of mind, and Celestial Doctrine, and evidently declared by your constant and perpetual judgment to be intirely beloved by you. He returns therefore to you now far more bright and glorious, than when he departed from you. For, if the fire tries and refines pretious metalls, I mean Gold and Silver, what can be said of so eminent a Personage according to his worth, who having vanquished the fire of so great afflictions, and so many perills, is now restored to you, having been [g] declared innocent, not by our determination only, but by that of the whole Synod? Receive therefore (Beloved Brethren) with all Divine Glory and joy your Bishop Athanasius, [h] together with those who have been his fellow sufferers. And rejoyce, in that you enjoy your desires, who have nourished and quenched the thirst of your pastour, hungring (if I may so speak,) and thirsting after your piety, with your comfortable writings. For you were a consolation to him during his abode in strange Countries: and you have cherished him with your most faithfull souls and minds, whilst he was Persecuted, and assaulted with treacheries. Indeed, I rejoyce already, whilst I consider and foresee in my mind the joy of every one of you at his return, and the most pious meetings [which will be given him] by the populace, and the glorious solemnity of those which will be assembled, and what manner of day that will be, wherein our brother shall make his return: when forepast calamities shall have an end, and his pretious and wish't for return shall unite all persons in an alacrity of mind [expresst by] the highest degree of joy. Such a joy as this does, as to the greatest part of it, reach even as far as us, to whom Heaven, ('tis manifest) hath granted this favour, that we should be able to come to the knowledge of so eminent a Personage. It is fit therefore, that we should close this Letter with a prayer. May God Almighty, and his Son our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ afford you this perpetual grace, rendring you the reward of your admirable Faith, which you have demonstrated towards your Bishop by a glorious testimony: that better things may await you and your posterity both in this, and in the world to come, which * Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entred into the heart of man: the things that God hath prepared for them that love him, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom Glory be to Almighty God for ever and ever, Amen. I wish you good health, beloved Brethren.

* 1 Cor. 2. 9.

Athanasius confiding in these Letters, went into the East The Emperour Constantius received him not then with an incensed mind. But upon the suggestion of the Arians, he attempted to circumvent him. And speaks to him thus. You have indeed recovered your See by the Synods determination, and our consent. But, in regard there are some of the people in Alexandria, who do [i] refuse to hold communion with you, suffer them to have one Church in the City. To which requeſt Athanasius immediately made this return, and says, It is in your power, O Emperour, to command and do what you will. I also ask and requeſt this favour of you, which I desire you would grant me. When the Emperour had readily promised him to grant it, Athanasius forthwith added, that he desired to receive the same favour, that the Emperour had required should be granted him: for he also requested that throughout every City one Church might be allowed to those who refused to communicate with the Arians. When the Arians understood that Athanasius's opinion would [k] incommode [their party,] they made answer that that business was to be deferred till another time: but they permitted the Emperour to do what pleased him. Wherefore, the Emperour restored Athanasius, Paulus, and Marcellus to their own Sees: as also, Asclepas of Gaza, and Lucius of Adrianople. For they also had been received by the Synod of Serdica; Asclepas [was received] upon his exhibiting the Acts, whereby it was manifest, that Eusebius Pamphilus (together with many others) having taken cognizance of his cause, had restored him to his dignity, and Lucius, because those that accused him were fled. Therefore, the Emperours Edicts were sent to their Cities, giving order that they should be readily admitted. Upon Basilius's being turned out of Ancyra, and Marcellus's entrance into that City, there was no trivial disturbance made, which gave those that were his adversaries an occasion of reproaching him. But the Gazites willingly received Asclepas. In Constantinople, Macedonius did for some small time give place to Paulus, and convened assemblies by himself seperately, in a private Church of that City.

[i] This passage Socrates had from Rufinus. There is no mention of it in Athanasius Vales.

[k] The reading must be [ἀλυσιτελῆ, incommode;] which emendation Rufinus confirmes, (book 1. chap. 19. Eccles. Hist.) and so doth Epiphanius, in his Version. Vales.

[Τῆς πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἀγωγῆς,] which I like not. For it must be [πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἀγωγῆς, of the course of life tending to them;] that is, to the promises. Or else the reading may be [τῆς πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἀγάπης, of your mutual love:] which reading Epiphan. Scholastic. followed. Vales.

[g] Instead of [ἀποδεχθεὶς received] in the Allat. M.S. and in Athanasius, the reading is [ἀποδειχθεὶς declared:] which I account the better reading. Vales.

[h] In the Allat. M.S. the reading of this place is thus: μὴ τάτε ἢ οἵπνες αὐτῷ ἢ ἅμα τοσούτων πόνων κοινωνοὶ γενόμενοι, and together with him as many as have been partakers of so great labours with him. The reading in Athanasius is almost the same. But our Copies and Epiphanius Scholasticus do confirm the common reading. Vales.

CONSTANTIUS.

City. But, in behalf of Athanasius, the Emperour wrote to the Bishops, to the Clergy, and to the Laity, that they should willingly receive him. Moreover, he gave order by other Letters, that what had been enacted against him in the Courts of Judicature, should be abrogated. The contents of his Letters concerning both these Particulars are these.

Constantius's Letter, in behalf of Athanasius.

VICTOR CONSTANTIUS MAXIMUS AUGUSTUS, to the Bishops and Presbyters of the Catholick Church.

The most Reverend Bishop Athanasius hath not been deserted by the Grace of God. But although he was for a short time subjected to humane tryal, yet he hath received a just sentence from Divine Providence which inspects all things: having been restored, by the will of God, and our determination, both to his own Country, and Church, over which by Divine permission he presided. It was meet, that what is agreeable hereto should be performed by our clemency. That so, all things which have heretofore been determined against those who have held communion with him, should now wholly be forgotten, and that all suspicion [entertained] against him should in future cease, and that the immunity, which those Clergy men that are with him did heretofore enjoy, should (as it is meet) be confirmed to them. Moreover, We thought it equitable to make this addition to Our Indulgence in favour of him, that all persons belonging to the sacred order of the Clergy might understand, that security is granted to all those that have adhered to him, whether they be Bishops, or Clerks: and a firm union with him shall be a sufficient testimony of every ones good resolution of mind. For, what persons soever (making use of a better judgment, and becoming followers of a sounder opinion,) shall embrace his communion, We have ordered, that all such shall enjoy that indulgence (according to the * Likeness.  Pattern of the preceding providence) which We have now granted agreeable to the will of God.*

Another Letter sent to the Alexandrians.

VICTOR CONSTANTIUS MAXIMUS AUGUSTUS, to the populace of the Catholike Church in Alexandria.

In regard We make [1] your good Government Our aim in all things, and knowing that you have for some time been deprived of an Episcopall Providence, We have thought good to send back to you again Athanasius the Bishop, a person well known to all men for his sanctity of life and moral honesty. When you shall have received this person according to your usual manner, and as it is meet; and shall constitute him your assistant in your prayers to God; make it your business to preserve continually a Concord and Peace, befitting your selves, and gratefull to Us, according to the Sanction of the Church. For it is disagreeable to reason, that there should be any dissention or faction raised amongst you, contrary to the felicity of Our times. Our desires and wishes are, that you may be wholly freed from this mischief. And We exhort you to persist continually in your usual prayers to God, making use of him your Prelate and your assistant, as was said before. That so this resolution of yours being conveyed to the [m] ears of all men, even those Gentiles as yet * enslaved in the erroneous worship of Idols, may with the greatest alacrity hasten to the knowledge of the sacred Religion, (most dear Alexandrians!) We therefore again exhort you to persist in what hath been said before. Do you willingly receive your Bishop, sent to you by Gods Decree and Our determination, and look upon him as worthy to be embraced [n] with your whole souls and minds. For that doth both become you, and is also manifestly agreeable to Our Clemency. And that all manner of [o] disturbance and occasion of Sedition may be taken from such as are endowed with malevolent and factious mindes, We have by Our Letters given order to the judges amongst you, that they should render all those liable to undergo the penalty of the Laws, whom upon inquiry they shall find to have been Seditious. Taking therefore into your consideration these two things, both Gods and Our determination, and also the care we have taken about your agreement, and the punishment [we have commanded to be inflicted] upon those that are disordered; make it your chief business to have a diligent regard to whatever doth become and agree with the Sanctions of the sacred Religion, and with all reverence to honour the * foresaid [Prelate,] that so you together with him may offer up prayers to the supream God and Father, both for your Selves, and also for the good Government and Concord of mankind in general.

[m] I doubt not, but instead of [εὐχὰς prayers] it should be [ἀκοὰς, ears, or hearing:] and so we have rendred it. Vales.

* Or, eminently addicted to.

[n] In the Allat. M.S. and in Athanasius, the reading here is [πάσῃ ψυχῇ καὶ γνώμῃ with your whole souls & minds.] Vales.

[o] Instead of [πᾶσαν ἀναστασιὼν all manner of consutation] the reading in the Allat. and Sforzian M.SS. is [ἀναστασὶν πᾶσαν, all manner of disturbance.] Vales.

* Athanasius.

An Epistle concerning the abrogating what had been enacted against Athanasius.

VICTOR CONSTANTIUS AUGUSTUS, to Nestorius. And in the same Copy, to the Presidents of [p] Augustamnica, Thebais, and Lybia.

If any thing be found to have been heretofore done to the detriment and injury of those who communicate with Athanasius the Bishop, Our Will is that that be now wholly abrogated. For Our Pleasure is, that those of his Clergy should again have the same immunity, which they formerly had. And We command, that this Order of Ours be kept: that so (Athanasius the Bishop having been restored to his Church,) they who communicate with him may have the same priviledge which they always had, and which the other Clergy-men now have: whereby their affairs being thus setled, they also may rejoyce.

[p] In the Allat. M.S. it is Augustonica: in Athanasius it is called Augustamnica. The name of this Province is usually written divers ways. For some term it Augustamnica, others Augustanica: so I found it written in many both Greek and Latine M.SS. Others called it Augustonica, to wit, from Augustus's Victory. In the subscriptions of the Bishops, who approved of Acacius's draught of the Creed, (which the Reader will meet with at the fortieth chapter of this second book,) whose names Epiphanius has recorded, (in Heref. Semiarian.) we read amongst others; Πτολεμαῖος ἐπίσκοπος Θμούεως Αὐγουστονίκης, i.e. Ptolemæus Bishop of Thmuis [a City] of Augustonica. Vales.

CHAP. XXIV.

That Athanasius, passing through Jerusalem in his return to Alexandria, was received into Communion by Maximus, and convened a Synod of Bishops which confirmed the Nicene Faith.

ATHanasius the Bishop being fortified with these Letters, passed thorow Syria, and came into Palestine. And arriving at Jerusalem, he made known to Maximus the Bishop, both what what had been done in the Synod of Serdica, and also that Constantius the Emperour had consented to their determination: and he makes it his business to have a Synod of Bishops convened in that City. Maximus without any delay sent for some of the Bishops in Syria and Palestine: and having constituted a Synod, he also restored to Athanasius communion, and his [former] dignity. Moreover, this Synod [a] wrote to the Alexandrians, and to all the Bishops in Egypt and Libya, declaring to them what had been Determined and Decreed concerning Athanasius. Upon which account, those who were Athanasius's enemies egregiously derided Maximus, because he had before deposed Athanasius; but then altering his mind again, (as if nothing had been done before,) he gave his suffrage for Athanasius, and restored to him communion and his dignity. Ursacius and Valens (who had before been hot maintainers of Arianism,) understanding these things, having at that time rejected their former industry [in asserting that opinion,] went to Rome. And presented a penitentiary Libel to Julius the Bishop, after which they embraced the Homoöusian Faith. And having written Letters to Athanasius, they professed they would in future hold communion with him. Ursacius therefore and Valens were at that time in such a manner vanquished by Athanasius's prosperous success, that (as I said) they gave their consent to the Homoöusian Faith. But Athanasius passed through Pelusium in his journey to Alexandria. And he admonished all the Cities through which he passed, to have an aversion for the Arians, and to embrace those that professed the Homoöusian Faith. He ordained also in some of the Churches. Which gave beginning to another accusation against him, [b] because he attempted to ordain in other [Bishops] Dioceses. Such was the posture of Athanasius's affaires at that time.

[a] This Epistle of the Jerusalem Synod is extant in Athanasius's second defence against the Arians; together with the names of those Bishops who subscribed to that Synod. But we may here by the by take notice of the Bishop of Jerusalems authority, who (although he was no Metropolitane yet) summoned the neighbouring Bishops to a Synod, without the permission of the Bishop of Cæsarea. Vales.

[b] Socrates speaks here concerning the Ordinations performed by Athanasius in Egypt. For he says that was done after he arrived at Pelusium; which is the first City of Egypt to those that come out of Syria. If this be so, that opinion can no ways be maintained, which some now a days assert, to wit, that all Ordinations (as well of Bishops as of Presbyters) throughout Egypt belonged to the Bishop of Alexandria: But we have sufficiently refuted this opinion in our Third Book of Ecclesiastick Observations published at the close of our Annotations on Socrates and Sozomen. Vales.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning the Tyrants Magnentius and Vetranio.

But in the interim a disturbance in no wise trivial seized the publick affaires of the Empire. It is necessary that we should give a summary account only concerning it, by running over the chief heads thereof. When the * Builder of the City Constantinople was dead, his three Sons succeeded him in the Empire, as we have mentioned in our First Book. [a] But you must know, that together with them reigned their Cousin-german, whose name was Dalmatius of the same name with his own Father. After he had been Colleague with them in the Empire some small time, the Souldiers slew him; Constantius neither [b] commanding him to be murdered, nor yet forbidding it. After what manner Constantinus Junior (invading those parts of the Empire which belonged to his Brother,) was also slain in an engagement with the Souldiers, we have more than once mentioned * before. After his slaughter, the Persian War was raised against the Romans, wherein Constantius performed no action that was fortunate. For, there hapning an [c] Engagement by night about the limits of the Romans and Persians, the latter seemed then for some little time to have been Conquerours. At the same time, the posture of the Christians affaires was little less sedate: but upon Athanasius's account, and by reason of the term Homoöusios, there was a War throughout the Churches. During this state of affaires, there arose a Tyrant in the Western parts [of the Empire,] one Magnentius. Who by treachery slew Constans the Emperour of the Western parts, residing at that time in the Gallia's. After which there was a mighty Civil War kindled. For the Tyrant Magnentius conquered all Italy, he also reduced Africa and Libya under his own Dominion, and had possession even of the Gallia's. In Illyricum likewise, at the City Sirmium, another Tyrant was * set up by the Souldiers; his name Vetranio. Moreover, Rome was involved in a disturbance. For [d] Constantine had a Sisters Son, by name Nepotianus, who being guarded by a party of the Gladiatours, had by violence seized upon the Empire. This Nepotianus was slain by Magnentius's Forces. But Magnentius himself invaded the rest of the Western Provinces, and made all places desolate.

* Constantine the Great.

[a] The emendation of this place (which is very corrupt in Robert Stephens's Edition) we own to the Allat. M. S. where the reading is [ἴσθι δὲ ὅτι συμβασιλευσι τούτοις ἀνεψιὸς αὐτῶν, ὁ ὁμώνυμος Δαλματίῳ τῷ ἰδίῳ πατρί· i. e. But you must know, that together with them reigned their Cousen-german, whose name was Dalmatius of the same name with his own Father.] See Socrat. book 1. chap. 27. note (g.) The Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. alter not the Vulgar reading here. But the reading of the Allat. M. S. is evidently confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Only he calls Dalmatius Constantius's Cousin-german by the mother's side. But Dalmatius was Constantius's Cousin-german by the Father's side; for he was son to Dalmatius, Constantine the Great's Brother. Vales.

CONSTANTIUS.

[b] Eutropius relates the same: Dalmatius Cæsar (says he,) Haud multò post oppressus est factione Militari, Constantio patruele suo fiente potius quàm jubente: i. e. Not long after, Dalmatius Cæsar was slain by a faction of the Souldiers, Constantius his Cosin-german by the Father's side suffering, rather than commanding, it. Vales.

* See Socrat. book 2. chap. 5.

[c] He means the fight by night between the Romans & Persians, at Singar, a fortress of Mesopotamia, wherein the son of Sapor King of Persia was slain: but the Romans had a very great slaughter made amongst them, as Amm. Marcellinus relates, book 18. pag. 122. Edit. Paris. 1636. See our Annotations on that passage; pag. 156. This Engagement hapned in the year of Christ 348, when Philippus and Salias were Consuls; as Idatius relates, in his Fasti. Vales.

* Or crept up by the Souldiers means.

[d] In the Greek the reading is [Constantius had a Sister's Son, &c.] But it must be [Constantine had, &c.] For Nepotianus was Son to Eutropia Constantin's Sister; as Victor tells us, in his Epitome: and, as we are informed by Eutropius, Epiphanius Scholasticus's reading agrees with our emendation; but he mistakes in calling Nepotianus [fratruelem Constantini, i. e. Constantin's Brothers Son,] in regard he was his Sisters Son. Vales.

CHAP. XXVI.

How, after the death of [Constans] the Western Emperour, Paulus and Athanasius were Ejected out of their own Sees again. And, that Paulus, after his being carried into banishment, was slain. But Athanasius made his escape by flight.

A Confluxe of all these mischiefs hapned almost at one and the same time. For these things were done on the fourth year after the Synod

CONSTANTIUS

Synod at Serdica in the [a] Conſulate of Sergius and * Nigrinianus. Upon the relation hereof, the whole Roman Empire ſeemed to be devolved upon Conſtantius only: who being proclaimed [b] Emperour in the Eaſtern parts, was wholly intent in making preparations againſt the Tyrants. In the interim, Athanaſius's adverſaries, ſuppoſing they had gotten a very ſeaſonable opportunity, did again frame moſt horrid falſe accuſations againſt him, he having not yet entred Alexandria: they inform the Emperour Conſtantius, that he would ſubvert all Egypt and Libya. That which made the greateſt addition to their calumny was, that Athanaſius had Ordained in other [Biſhops] Dioceſſes. Athanaſius arriving at Alexandria during this troubleſome poſture of affaires, aſſembled a Synod of Biſhops in Egypt. Who by an unanimous conſent made the ſame determinations with thoſe convened at Serdica, and with that Synod aſſembled at Jeruſalem by Maximus. But the Emperour, who had long before embraced the Arian opinion, wholly altered all things which he had a little before decreed. And in the firſt place, he gave order, that Paulus the Biſhop of Conſtantinople ſhould be baniſhed, who was ſtrangled by thoſe that carried him into baniſhment, at [c] Cucuſus in Cappadocia. Marcellus alſo being ejected, Baſilius was again put into poſſeſſion of the Church of Ancyra. Lucius of Adrianople was bound in iron chaines, and died in Priſon. Moreover, what was reported concerning Athanaſius made ſo prevalent an impreſſion upon the Emperour, that he fell into an unmeaſurable rage, and gave order that he ſhould be ſlain whenever he could be found: and together with him, [d] Theodulus and Olympius, Prelates of Churches in Thracia. But Athanaſius was not ignorant of what Orders the Emperour had given. But, having been made ſenſible thereof before hand, he betook himſelf to flight again, and ſo avoided the Emperours menaces. The Arians calumniated him for this his eſcape, eſpecially Narciſſus Biſhop of Neroniades a City of Cilicia, Georgius of Laodicæa, and [e] Leontius who then preſided over the Church at Antioch. This Leontius, when he was a Presbyter, was diveſted of that dignity, becauſe he lived continually with a woman whoſe name was Euſtolium, and endeavouring to conceal the ſuſpicion of his unclean converſe with her, he cut off his own genitalls; after which he was converſant with her, with a greater confidence and liberty, in regard he wanted thoſe things upon account whereof he had fallen into that ſuſpition. But by the Decree and diligence of the Emperour Conſtantius he was promoted to the Biſhoprick of the Antiochian Church after Stephanus, who had before ſucceeded Flaccillus. Thus far concerning this perſon.

[a] The ſame is recorded in Idatius's Faſti; in theſe words: Sergio & Nigriniano Coſſ. his Conſulibus Conſtans occiſus eſt in Galliis à Magnentio, & levatus eſt Magnentius die 15. Kal. Februar. Et Vetranio apud Sirmium Kal. Martii. Eo anno, & Nepotianus Romæ tertio Nonas Junias. Et pugna magna fuit cum Romanis & Magnentianis: i. e. Sergius and Nigrinianus being Conſuls, Conſtans was ſlain in the Gallia's by Magnentius, and Magnentius was ſet up on the 15th of the Kalends of February. And Vetranio at Sirmium on the Kalends of March. On the ſame year, Nepotianus alſo at Rome on the third of the Nones of June. And there was a great battel between the Romans and Magnentians. The ſame is recorded in the Alexandrian Chronicle; but there, theſe paſſages are placed on the Conſulate of Limenius and Catullinus, when as they hapned on the year following. Which was the year of Chriſt, 350. Valeſ.

* Or Nigrianus.

[b] Conſtantius was long before Emperour of the Eaſt. But when Conſtans was dead, who Governed the Weſtern Empire; he was by the Souldiers ſtiled Emperour of the whole Roman world. Valeſ.

[c] In the Florent. M. S. this Towns name is written with a double ſ, thus Cucuſſus. Valeſ.

[d] Olympius was Biſhop of Aenum a City of Thracia: Theodulus was Biſhop of Trajanople, as Athanaſius atteſts, (in Epiſt. ad Solitar.) He mentions the ſame Biſhops, in his Apologetick de Fuga Sua, pag. 703. But theſe paſſages are prepoſterouſly related by Socrates. For they were not done before the Magnentian war, as Socrates ſays, but when that war was ended, in the year of Chriſt 356; as Baronius hath truly remarked. Valeſ.

[e] This perſon has a great elogue given him in the Alexandrian Chronicle, at the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus: which commendation was taken out of ſome Semi-Arian writer. Athanaſius doth every where ſpeak ſharply concerning this Leontius. His crafty diſpoſition is incomparably well deſcribed by Theodoret; book 2. chap. 24. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVII.

That Macedonius, having got poſſeſſion of the See [of Conſtantinople,] did much miſchief to thoſe that in opinion diſſented from him.

MOreover, at that time Macedonius was put into poſſeſſion of the Churches in Conſtantinople, Paulus being diſpatcht in the foremention'd manner. And having procured a very great intereſt in the Emperour, he raiſed a war amongſt the Chriſtians, not inferiour to that waged by the Tyrants at the ſame time. For, having by his perſwaſions induced the Emperour to countenance him with his aſſiſtance in deſtroying of the Churches, he procured whatever wicked acts he had a mind to doe, to be eſtabliſhed by Law. From that time therefore an Edict was publickly p opoſed throughout every City. And a militar y force appointed to ſee the Emperours Decrees put in execution. Thoſe who aſſerted the Homoouſian Faith, were driven not only out of the Churches, but from the Cities alſo. At firſt indeed they made it their buſineſs to expell them only. But afterwards, the miſchief growing worſe and worſe, they betook themſelves to a forcing of them to communicate with them, being very little ſollicitous about the Churches. And this forcible conſtraint was nothing inferiour to that heretofore made uſe of by them, who neceſſitated the Chriſtians to worſhip Idolls. For they made uſe of all manner of ſcourgings, various tortures, and proſcriptions of their goods. Many were puniſhed with exile. Some died under their tortures: others were murdered, during their being led away to baniſhment. Theſe things were done throughout all the Eaſtern Cities, but more eſpecially at Conſtantinople. This inteſtine Perſecution therefore, being but ſmall before, was much increaſed by Macedonius, after he had gotten the Biſhoprick. But the Cities of Achaia and Illyricum, and the Weſtern parts of the Empire, continued as yet undiſturbed, in regard they both mutually agreed, and alſo retained the Rule of Faith delivered by the Nicene Synod.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning what was done at Alexandria by Georgius the Arian; from Athanaſius's own relation.

BUt what [Villanies] Georgius during the ſame time committed at Alexandria, you may underſtand from Athanaſius's own relation, who was preſent at, and a ſufferer in thoſe [miſeries.] For, in his Apologetick concerning his own flight, he ſpeaks word for word thus concerning what had been done there. For they came from thence to Alexandria, making ſearch for me again, that they might murder me. And what hapned then was worſe than that they had done before. For on a ſuddain the Souldiers ſurrounded surrounded the Church, and instead of going to prayers, there hapned a fight. After this, Georgius (sent by them out of Cappadocia,) arriving in Lent, increased those mischiefs which he had learn't from them. For after Easter-week, the Virgins were cast into Prison: the Bishops, bound in chaines, were led away by the Souldiers: the houses of Orphans and Widdows were plundered, and the stock of Bread-corn [was pillaged:] they broke into houses. And the Christians were carried out [to burial] in the night. The houses were sealed up: and the brethren of those that were Clergy-men, were in danger upon their brethrens account. These things were horrid: but those afterwards committed were much more horrid. For the week after the holy Pentecost, the people, after they had fasted, went out to the Cœmetery to pray, because they all abominated Georgius*'s communion. But that Villanous wretch understanding this, instigated* Sebastianus the Captain, who was a Manichæan, against them. He with a company of Souldiers, carrying Armour, naked Swords, Bows, and Darts, made a violent attack upon the people on the very Lords day. And finding some few at their prayers (for most of them were gone away by reason of the time of the day;) he did such exploits as became the Arians to have performed amongst them. For having kindled a fire, he set the Virgins close to it, forced them to say, that they professed the Arian Faith. But when he perceived they were not to be vanquished, and that they despised the fire, he afterwards stript them, and beat them on the face in such a manner, that for a time they could scarce be known. And having seized fourty men, he beat them after a new and unusual manner. For he forthwith cut Rods from off Palm-trees, which yet had their pricks on them, and flea'd their backs after such a manner, that some of them by reason of the pricks that stuck in their flesh, were forced to make frequent use of Chirurgions: others of them, not able to endure [the pain,] died. Immediately he took all the rest, that were left, and together with them a Virgin, and [a] banished them into Oasis the Great. Moreover, they would not at first suffer the bodies of those that were dead to be given to their relations: but casting them forth unburied, they hid them as they thought good, that they might seem not to know of so barbarous a cruelty. And this these madmen did, having a blindness upon their minds. For, in as much as the Relations of those that were dead, rejoyced upon account of their confession, but mourned because their bodies lay unburied; their impiety and barbarity was so much the more plainly detected and divulged. Soon after this, they carried away into banishment out of Egypt and both the Libya*'s these Bishops,* Ammonius, Thmuis, Cajus, Philo, Hermes, Plinius, Psenosiris, Nilammon, Agatho, Anagamphus, Ammonius, Marcus, Dracontius, Adelphius, another Ammonius, another Marcus, and Athenodorus: and these Presbyters, Hierax, and Dioscorus. And they treated them so cruelly in their conveying them into banishment, that some of them died in the journey, and others in the very place of their exile. They [b] drove away more then thirty Bishops. For it was their earnest desire, according as Ahab did, wholly, if possible, to destroy the truth. Thus much Athanasius hath related in his own words concerning the Villanies committed by Georgius at Alexandria. But the Emperour marcht his Army into Illyricum. For the necessity of the publick affaires required his presence there; more especially, because Vetranio was proclaimed Emperour there by the Souldiers. Being come to Sirmium, he made a League with Vetranio, after which he discoursed with him, and brought affaires to such a pass, that those Souldiers, who had proclaimed Vetranio, revolted from him to Constantius's side. Having therefore deserted Vetranio, they cried out that only Constantius was Augustus, King and Emperour. No mention was made of Vetranio in their acclamation. Vetranio, becoming sensible immediately hat he was betrayed, laid himself prostrate at the feet of the Emperour. Constantius took his Imperial Crown and Purple from him, and treated him kindly, exhorting him to lead a more sedate and quiet life in the habit of a private person. For [he told him] that a life void of disquietude was much more sutable for a man of his years, than to have a name full of care and sollicitude. Such was the conclusion of Vetranio's affaires. But the Emperour ordered, that he should be allowed an ample revenue out of the publick tribute. Afterwards he wrote frequently to the Emperour whilst he made his residence at Prusa in Bithynia, declaring to him, that he had been the Authour of the greatest happiness to him, in that he had freed him from cares, and the troubles that accompany a Crown: and said, that he himself did not do well, because he would not enjoy that happiness which he had bestowed upon him. Thus far concerning these things. At the same time, the Emperour Constantius, having created Gallus, his Fathers Brothers Son, Cæsar, and given him his own name, sent him to Antioch of Syria, designing that he should guard the Eastern parts. Whilst he was making his entry into Antioch, the [c] Sign of our Saviour appeared in the East. For a Pillar in the form of a Cross appearing in the heavens, struck the beholders with a great amazement. The rest of his chief commanders he sent against Magnentius, at the head of a very great Army. In the interim, he himself made his residence at Sirmium, expecting the issue of affaires.

CONSTANTIUS.

[a] In Athanasius the reading is [ἐξώσεσαν they banished.] But in the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. the reading (which I like better) is [ἐξώσεσον he banished.] To shew, that this is to be understood of Sebastianus the Captain of Egypt, who then adjudged matters in a detestable course. Moreover, all these things are (as I have said) related in a preposterous manner by Socrates; in regard they were done in the year of Christ, 356. Vales.

[b] The reading is the same in Athanasius. But in Theodoret (book 2. chap. 14. where this passage of Athanasius's is inserted) the reading is [They murdered.] Vales.

[c] The same is recorded in Idatius's Fasti, after the Consulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, in these words: His Coss. Levatus est Constantius Cæsar Id. Martii, & apparuit in Oriente Signum Salvatoris die 3. Kal. Februar. Lunæ 28. i.e. During these mens Consulate Constantius [Gallus] was created Cæsar on the Ides of March, and the Sign of our Saviour appeared in the East, on the third of the Kalends of February, on the 28th of the Moon. But the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle says this Sign was seen in the East, on the Nones of May, about the day of Pentecost. To whom agrees Cyrillus, Philostorgius, and Cedrenus. And Socrates seems to confirm the same in this place. For he saith, that this Sign appeared in the East, when Gallus Cæsar entred Antioch. Now Gallus was created Cæsar on the Ides of March, as (besides Idatius) the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle doth affirm. Vales.

CHAP. XXIX.

Concerning Photinus the Arch-Heretick.

MOreover, at that time Photinus who presided over the Church in that * City, did more openly divulge that opinion which he had invented. Wherefore, when there arose a disturbance occasioned thereby, the Emperour ordered, that that a [a] Synod of Biſhops ſhould be convened at Sirmium. Therefore, there met together in that City, of the Eaſtern [Biſhops,] [b] Marcus of Arethuſa, [c] Georgius of Alexandria, whom the Arian party (having removed Gregorius, as we ſaid * before,) put into his See; alſo Baſilius (who preſided over the Church at Ancyra, Marcellus having been ejected,) Pancratius [Biſhop] of Pelucium, and [d] Hypatianus of Heraclea. Of the Weſtern Biſhops, [there met there] Valens [Biſhop] of Murſa, and Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spain (a perſon eminently famous at that time) was preſent againſt his will. Theſe [Prelates] being convened at Sirmium, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, (in which year, by reaſon of the tumults cauſed by the Wars, no Conſul publiſhed the ſolemn [e] Shews and Playes uſually exhibited at their entrance upon their Conſulate,) and having upon examination found, that Photinus aſſerted the opinion of Sabellius the Libyan and Paul of Samoſata; they immediately depoſed him. And this determination of theirs was by all men, both then and afterwards, approved of as good and equitable. [f] But thoſe [Biſhops] who ſtayed behind [at Sirmium] did that which was not gratefull to all men.

* See chap. 14. of this book.

[a] It is not agreed amongſt the Learned, in what year the Synod of Sirmium (wherein Photinus was deprived of his Biſhoprick) was held. Socrates and Sozomen affirm it to have been celebrated after the Conſulate of Sergius an Nigrinianus: in which year, by reaſon of the diſturbances cauſed by the Civil War, there were no Conſuls in the Eaſt; but in the Weſtern parts Magnentius Auguſtus was Conſul with Gaiſo. Baronius (in His Eccleſiaſtick Annalls) aſſerts, that that Synod was convened in the year of Chriſt 357; when Conſtantius Auguſtus was the Ninth time Conſul, and Julianus Cæſar the Second time. But Dionyſius Petavius (Firſt in his Animadverſions on Epiphanius, and Secondly in his diſſertation de duplici Synodo Sirmienſi,) doth by moſt evident arguments demonſtrate, that the year of that Synod is truly aſſigned by Socrates, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, which was the year of Chriſt 351. I know Jacobus Sirmondus hath written two books, wherein he has endeavoured to maintain Baronius's opinion againſt Dionyſius Petavius. But, in regard he himſelf did not publiſh thoſe books, that is an evidence ſufficient, that at length he acknowledged his own opinion to be falſe. Valeſ.

[b] The Biſhops here named by Socrates, ſate not in that Synod of Sirmium, which was convened againſt Photinus, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, in the year of Chriſt 351: but in that other Synod, which was convened there when Euſebius and Hypatius were Conſuls, in the year of Chriſt 359, a little before the Council of Ariminum: which Latter Synod at Sirmium did alſo ſet forth that draught of the Creed, which was afterwards recited at Ariminum; before which the Conſuls names were prefixt. And this is evidently made out by Germinius, in his Epiſtle to Valens, which is recorded in Hilarius's Fragments; and by Epiphanius, in Hereſ. Semiarian. In the former Sirmium-Synod, aſſembled againſt Photinus, the Eaſtern Biſhops only were preſent: this is atteſted by Hilarius, in his book de Synodis, and by Vigilius Biſhop of Tapſis in his Fifth Book againſt Eutyches. Valeſ.

[c] Georgius was not at this time (viz. after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus) Biſhop of Alexandria. For he was created Biſhop there in the eighth Conſulate of Conſtantius Auguſtus, and in the Firſt Conſulate of Julianus Cæſar, which was in the year of Chriſt 356. Wherefore, he could not ſit in the former Sirmium Synod, which depoſed Photinus in the year of Chriſt 351. The ſame muſt be ſaid of Hoſius alſo, who at that time lived under Magnentius's juriſdiction: nor was he as yet baniſhed to Sirmium. Valeſ.

[d] Theodorus continued to be Biſhop of Heraclea in Thracia in the year of Chriſt 356, as it is manifeſt from Athanaſius's Circular Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Egypt and Libya, pag. 290: which Epiſtle Athanaſius wrote in the year of Chriſt 356, after Georgius's entrance into the See of Alexandria. Wherefore, Hypatianus muſt neceſſarily have been made Biſhop of Heraclea after the year 356. Sozomen hath made mention of the ſame Hypatianus, book 6. chap. 7. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Valeſ.

[e] Socrates here means by ὑπαθείας, the Ludi Circenſes, which the Conſuls, exhibited at their entrance upon their Conſulate: which by the Latines is termed Conſulatum dare. Some Conſuls, beſides the Ludi Circenſes, entertained the people with Scenical Plays, and with hunting of wild beaſts in the Amphitheatre. Valeſ.

[f] At this place we follow the Sfortian M. S. in which Copy this paſſage is more fully expreſt, thus: Οἱ δὲ ὑπομείναντες ἔπραξαν ὅπερ ἦν πᾶσιν ἦν ἄριστον; i. e. But thoſe [Biſhops] who ſtaid behind, &c.] Incomparably well in my judgment. Indeed, that draught of the Creed, which was publiſhed in the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus, is approved of by Hilarius, (in his book de Synodis,) as being Catholick: but Athanaſius (in his book de Synodis Arimini & Seleuciæ) condemns and rejects it, in the ſame manner with the other Creeds compoſed by the Arians. Nor do Hilarius and Athanaſius diſagree with one another concerning this one form of the Creed, but about other draughts of it alſo; for example, about the Antiochian draught. For Hilarius confeſſeth that the Eaſtern Biſhops had good reaſon to compoſe new forms of the Creed, when new Hereſies aroſe againſt the Church. But Athanaſius doth maintain, that thoſe new draughts of the Creed were craftily compoſed by the Arians, with a deſign to deſtroy the Nicene Creed. Further, that this place of Socrates, inſtead of [ὃ πᾶσιν ἦν ἄριστον, that which was not beſt for all men] I had rather read [ὃ πᾶσιν ἦν ἄρεστον, that which was not grateſull to all men.] And ſo I have rendred it. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXX.

Concerning the [forms of the] Creed publiſhed at Sirmium, in the preſence of the Emperour Conſtantius.

FOr, as if they would condemn what they had heretofore determined concerning the Faith, they again compoſed, ratified, and publiſhed other *draughts of the Creed: [a] one whereof was dictated in the Greek tongue by Marcus of Arethuſa: [b] two more were drawn up in the Latine tongue, which neither agreed one with the other (either in the expreſſions, or in the compoſure,) nor yet with that Greek one, which the Biſhop of Arethuſa dictated. Moreover, the one of thoſe Creeds drawn up in Latine, I will here ſubjoyn to that compoſed by Marcus: the other (which they afterwards recited at [c] Sirmium,) we will ſet at it's proper place, where we ſhall declare what was done at Ariminum. But you muſt know that they were both tranſlated into the Greek language. The draught of the Creed dictated by Marcus, runs thus.

* Or, other explanations concerning the Faith.

[a] Socrates (and with him Sozomen,) is here doubly miſtaken. Firſt, becauſe he ſuppoſed, that there were three forms of the Creed drawn up in the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus; whereas there was one form only compoſed in that Synod; which (beſides Socrates) is recorded by Athanaſius, pag. 500. and by Hilarius, in his book de Synodis 338. Edit. Paris. 1631. Secondly, in regard he aſſerts, that that form of the Creed, which was publiſhed in the Greek tongue at the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus, was dictated by Marcus of Arethuſa. Marcus of Arethuſa did not dictate that form I have mentioned, but another; before which the Conſuls names were prefixt, and which was afterwards recited at Ariminum, as Nicholaus Faber hath already obſerved (in the Preface he wrote to Hilarius's Fragments) from Germinius's Epiſtle. We muſt therefore diſtinguiſh between the three Synods of Sirmium, each of which publiſhed their form of the Creed. The firſt was convened againſt Photinus, in the year of Chriſt 351. The ſecond was aſſembled in the year of our Lord 357: wherein the Blaſphemie of Hoſius and Potamius was compoſed. The third was celebrated when Euſebius and Hypatius were Conſuls, in the year of Chriſt 359; wherein that Creed was drawn up, which Marcus of Arethuſa dictated. Valeſ.

[b] Inſtead of [ἀλλὸν another] the reading muſt be [ἀλλὸς δὲ, the other two, or two more] as it is in the Allat. M. S. For Socrates here recounts three draughts of the Creed compoſed at Sirmium; the two latter whereof he ſaith were written at firſt at Latine, and afterwards tranſlated into Greek. Which in my judgment is not true. I grant indeed, that that Creed, which by Hilarius is termed Hoſius's Blaſphemie, was at firſt publiſhed at Latine. But the other, which had the Conſuls names prefixt before it, was undoubtedly at firſt dictated in the Greek tongue. For he that dictated it, (viz. Marcus of Arethuſa) and the reſt of the Biſhops then aſſembled were almoſt all Græcians. Laſtly, the ſubſcriptions of the Biſhops, who ſubſcribed this form, are extant in Greek, in Epiphanius (in Hæreſ. Semiarian.) Valeſ.

[c] Without doubt it muſt be [Ariminum,] not [Sirmium:] which reading Epiphan. Scholaſticus followed, as appears from his Verſion. See chap. 37. of this ſecond book. Valeſ.

We believe in one God the Father Almighty, the Creatour and Framer of all things: * Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named: *and in his only begotten Son, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, born of the Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, by whom all things, which are in the Heavens, and which are upon the Earth, viſible and inviſible, were made. carnate, and born of the holy Virgin, and was Crucified and died, and was buried, and arose again from the Dead on the third day, and was taken up into Heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father, and shall come at the end of the world to judge the quick and dead, and shall render to every man according to his works. Whose Kingdom being perpetual continueth unto infinite ages. For he is sitting on the right hand of the Father, not only in this present world, but in that also which is to come. And [We believe] in the holy Ghost, that is, the Paraclete; whom [our Lord,] (having promised he would send him to the Apostles after his ascent into the heavens, that he might teach and put them in mind of all things,) sent. By whom also those souls, which have sincerely believed in him, are sanctified. But those who affirm, that the Son [exists] of things * which were not, or of another substance, and not of God, and that there was a time or an age when he was not, the Holy and Catholick Church hath certainly known to be Aliens [from Her.] We say it therefore again, if any one doth affirm the Father and the Son to be two Gods, let him be Anathema. [d] And if any one, affirming Christ to be God the Son of God before ages, shall not profess him to have ministred to the Father in order to the framing of all things, let him be Anathema. If any one be so audacious as to say, that the Unbegotten, or part of him, was born of Mary, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say that the Son was of Mary according to prescience, and that he was not with God, born of the Father before ages, and that all things were made by him, let him be Anathema. † If any one shall affirm the Essence of God to be † dilated or contracted, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm the dilated Essence of God to make the Son, or shall term the Son the enlargement of his Essence, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm the internal or outwardly-uttered Word to be the Son of God, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm the Son who was [born] of Mary to be man only, let him be Anathema. If any one asserting him that was [born] of Mary to be God and man, shall understand the unbegotten God himself, let him be Anathema. If any one shall understand this Text, * I am the first God, and I am the last, and besides me there is no God, (which is spoken in order to the destruction of Idolls, and those which are not Gods) in the same sense which the Jews take it in, [to wit, as if it were spoken] upon account of the subversion of the only begotten God before ages, let him be Anathema. If any one hearing these words, † The word was made flesh, shall suppose that the Word was changed into flesh, or that he assumed flesh by having undergone any change, let him be Anathema. [e] If any one hearing that the only begotten Son of God was crucified, shall assert that his Deity underwent any corruption, or passion, or mutation, or diminution, or destruction, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father spake not these words, † Let us make man to the Son, but shall assert that God himself spake to himself, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that it was not the Son who appeared to Abraham, but the unbegotten God, or part of him, let him be Anathema. [f] If any one shall say, that it was not the Son who as a man wrestled with Jacob, but the unbegotten God or part of him, let him be Anathema. If any one shall understand these words, † The Lord rained from the Lord, not of the Father and of the Son, but shall say that God rained from himself, let him be Anathema. For the Lord the Son rained from the Lord the Father. [g] If any one hearing [these words] The Lord the Father and The Lord the Son, shall term both the Father Lord, and the Son also Lord, and saying, The Lord from the Lord, shall assert that there are two Gods, let him be Anathema. For we place not the Son in the same degree with the Father, but [understand] him to be inferiour to the Father. For neither did he come down to [h] Sodom without his Fathers will. Nor did he rain from himself, but from the Lord, that is from the Father, who hath the supream authority. Nor does he sit at his Fathers right hand of himself, but he hears the Father, saying, * Sit thou at my right hand, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father Son and holy Ghost are one Person, let him be Anathema. If any terming the holy Ghost the Paraclete, shall call him the unbegotten God, let him be Anathema. If any one does say that the Paraclete is no other [Person] than the Son, (as the Son himself hath taught us; for he has said, † The Father, whom I will ask, shall send you another Comforter,) let him be Anathema If any one shall say, that the Spirit is part of the Father and of the Son, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost are three Gods, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that the Son of God was made like one of the Creatures, by the will of God, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Son was begotten against the will of the Father, let him be Anathema. [i] For the Father was not forced by a physical necessity, nor did he beget the Son as if he were unwilling: but as soon as he was willing, he has declared that he begat him of himself without time and without passion, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that the Son is unborn and without a beginning, affirming as it were that there are two [Principles] without a beginning and unborn, and so making two Gods, let him be Anathema. For the Son is the Head and Beginning of all things. * But the Head of Christ is God. For thus we piously refer all things by the Son to One who is without a beginning

CONSTANTIUS.

* Are not.

[d] Hilarius seems to have read otherwise. For in his book de Synodis, where he records this Creed, he renders this passage thus: & siquis, &c. and if any one affirming one God, but shall not profess Christ to be God the Son of God before ages, &c. Vales.

† Enlarged.

* Esai. 44. 6.

† John 1. 14.

[e] In the Allat. M. S. and in Athanasius's book de Synodis, this Anathema is thus worded: εἴ τις τὸν μονογενῆ υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐσταυρωμένον ἀκύρων, τὴν θεότητα αὐτοῦ φθορᾶν ἢ πάθῳ, &c. and we have rendred it accordingly: after the same manner Hilarius read this passage, as from his Version appears. Vales.

† Gen. 1. 26.

[f] This whole Anathematism was omitted here: it occurs in Athanasius's and Hilarius's Copy of this Creed; and therefore we inserted it. Vales. The Learned Reader will find it in Robert Stephens Edit. also.

† Gen. 19. 24.

[g] This Anathematism is differently worded in all the Authours (we have seen) wherein this Creed occurs. Valesius says, that he has published it according to the reading of the Florent. and Sfortian M.SS. which Copies we have followed in our English version: where it is thus worded in the Greek: εἴπῃς ἀκύρων κύριον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν κύριον, καὶ κύριον τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱὸν εἴπῃ, καὶ κύριον ἐκ κυρίου λέγων δύο λέγει θεούς, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω. The reading in Robert Stephens is different from this; and so is that in Athanasius, pag. 901: where 'tis thus worded: εἴπῃς ἀκύρων κύριον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν κύριον, καὶ κύριον, τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱὸν· ἐπεὶ κύριος ἐκ κυρίου, δύο λέγει θεούς, &c. Hilarius has translated otherwise, as appears from his Version, at pag. 339. Edit. Paris. 1631. His words are these: Siquis dominum & dominum patrem & filium, quasi dominum a domino intelligat: quia dominum & dominum duos dicat deos: Anathema sit. Thus variously is this Anathematism represented. The Learned Reader may take the liberty (as we have done,) to follow which Copy he pleases.

* Psal. 110. 1.

[h] We follow the reading in Hilarius, and in Athanasius; where it is [ἐπὶ σόδομα to Sodom.] In Robert Stephens the reading is [ἔτε γὰρ κατέλθεν εἰς σῶμα, For neither did he descend into the body.]

† See John 14. 16.

[i] Here we follow the reading in Athanasius, which is thus: ὁ γὰρ βιασθεὶς ὁ πατὴρ, &c. For the Father was not forced, &c. which reading is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus, and by Hilarius. Vales.

that a [a] Synod of Biſhops ſhould be convened at Sirmium. Therefore, there met together in that City, of the Eaſtern [Biſhops,] [b] Marcus of Arethuſa, [c] Georgius of Alexandria, whom the Arian party (having removed Gregorius, as we ſaid * before,) put into his See ; alſo Baſilius (who preſided over the Church at Ancyra, Marcellus having been ejected,) Pancratius [Biſhop] of Pelucium, and [d] Hypatianus of Heraclea. Of the Weſtern Biſhops, [there met there] Valens [Biſhop] of Murſa, and Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spain (a perſon eminently famous at that time) was preſent againſt his will. Theſe [Prelates] being convened at Sirmium, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, (in which year, by reaſon of the tumults cauſed by the Wars, no Conſul publiſhed the ſolemn [e] Shews and Playes uſually exhibited at their entrance upon their Conſulate,) and having upon examination found, that Photinus aſſerted the opinion of Sabellius the Libyan and Paul of Samoſata ; they immediately depoſed him. And this determination of theirs was by all men, both then and afterwards, approved of as good and equitable. [f] But thoſe [Biſhops] who ſtayed behind [at Sirmium] did that which was not grateſull to all men.

* See chap. 14. of this book.

[a] It is not agreed amongſt the Learned, in what year the Synod of Sirmium (wherein Photinus was deprived of his Biſhoprick) was held. Socrates and Sozomen affirm it to have been celebrated after the Conſulate of Sergius an Nigrinianus : in which year, by reaſon of the diſturbances cauſed by the Civil War, there were no Conſuls in the Eaſt ; but in the Weſtern parts Magnentius Auguſtus was Conſul with Gaiſo. Baronius (in His Eccleſiaſtick Annalls) aſſerts, that that Synod was convened in the year of Chriſt 357 ; when Conſtantius Auguſtus was the Ninth time Conſul, and Julianus Cæſar the Second time. But Dionyſius Petavius (Firſt in his Animadverſions on Epiphanius, and Secondly in his diſſertation de duplici Synodo Sirmienſi,) doth by moſt evident arguments demonſtrate, that the year of that Synod is truly aſſigned by Socrates, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, which was the year of Chriſt 351. I know Jacobus Sirmondus hath written two books, wherein he has endeavoured to maintain Baronius's opinion againſt Dionyſius Petavius. But, in regard he himſelf did not publiſh thoſe books, that is an evidence ſufficient, that at length he acknowledged his own opinion to be falſe. Valeſ.

[b] The Biſhops here named by Socrates, ſate not in that Synod of Sirmium, which was convened againſt Photinus, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, in the year of Chriſt 351 : but in that other Synod, which was convened there when Euſebius and Hypatius were Conſuls, in the year of Chriſt 359, a little before the Council of Ariminum : which Latter Synod at Sirmium did alſo ſet forth that draught of the Creed, which was afterwards recited at Ariminum ; before which the Conſuls names were prefixt. And this is evidently made out by Germinius, in his Epiſtle to Valens, which is recorded in Hilarius's Fragments ; and by Epiphanius, in Hereſ. Semiarian. In the former Sirmium-Synod, aſſembled againſt Photinus, the Eaſtern Biſhops only were preſent : this is atteſted by Hilarius, in his book de Synodis, and by Vigilius Biſhop of Tapſis in his Fifth Book againſt Eutyches. Valeſ.

[c] Georgius was not at this time (viz. after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus) Biſhop of Alexandria. For he was created Biſhop there in the eighth Conſulate of Conſtantius Auguſtus, and in the Firſt Conſulate of Julianus Cæſar, which was in the year of Chriſt 356. Wherefore, he could not ſit in the former Sirmium Synod, which depoſed Photinus in the year of Chriſt 351. The ſame muſt be ſaid of Hoſius alſo, who at that time lived under Magnentius's juriſdiction : nor was he as yet baniſhed to Sirmium. Valeſ.

[d] Theodorus continued to be Biſhop of Heraclea in Thracia in the year of Chriſt 356, as it is manifeſt from Athanaſius's Circular Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Egypt and Libya, pag. 290 : which Epiſtle Athanaſius wrote in the year of Chriſt 356, after Georgius's entrance into the See of Alexandria. Wherefore, Hypatianus muſt neceſſarily have been made Biſhop of Heraclea after the year 356. Sozomen hath made mention of the ſame Hypatianus, book 6. chap. 7. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Valeſ.

[e] Socrates here means by ὑπαθείας, the Ludi Circenſes, which the Conſuls, exhibited at their entrance upon their Conſulate : which by the Latines is termed Conſulatum dare. Some Conſuls, beſides the Ludi Circenſes, entertained the people with Scenical Plays, and with hunting of wild beaſts in the Amphitheatre. Valeſ.

[f] At this place we follow the Sfortian M. S. in which Copy this paſſage is more fully expreſt, thus : Οἱδὲ ὑπολειφθέντες ἔπραξαν ὅπερ ἦν πᾶσιν ἥδιστον ; i. e. But thoſe [Biſhops] who ſtaid behind, &c.] Incomparably well in my judgment. Indeed, that draught of the Creed, which was publiſhed in the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus, is approved of by Hilarius, (in his book de Synodis,) as being Catholick : but Athanaſius (in his book de Synodis Arimini & Seleuciæ) condemns and rejects it, in the ſame manner with the other Creeds compoſed by the Arians. Nor do Hilarius and Athanaſius diſagree with one another concerning this one form of the Creed, but about other draughts of it alſo ; for example, about the Antiochian draught. For Hilarius confeſſeth that the Eaſtern Biſhops had good reaſon to compoſe new forms of the Creed, when new Hereſies aroſe againſt the Church. But Athanaſius doth maintain, that thoſe new draughts of the Creed were craftily compoſed by the Arians, with a deſign to deſtroy the Nicene Creed. Further, that this place of Socrates, inſtead of [ἥδιστον ἦν ἅπασιν, that which was not beſt for all men] I had rather read [ἥδιστον ἦν ἀρεστὸν, that which was not gratefull to all men.] And ſo I have rendred it. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXX.

Concerning the [forms of the] Creed publiſhed at Sirmium, in the preſence of the Emperour Conſtantius.

FOr, as if they would condemn what they had heretofore determined concerning the Faith, they again compoſed, ratified, and publiſhed other * draughts of the Creed : [a] one whereof was dictated in the Greek tongue by Marcus of Arethuſa : [b] two more were drawn up in the Latine tongue, which neither agreed one with the other (either in the expreſſions, or in the compoſure,) nor yet with that Greek one, which the Biſhop of Arethuſa dictated. Moreover, the one of thoſe Creeds drawn up in Latine, I will here ſubjoyn to that compoſed by Marcus : the other (which they afterwards recited at [c] Sirmium,) we will ſet at it's proper place, where we ſhall declare what was done at Ariminum. But you muſt know that they were both tranſlated into the Greek language. The draught of the Creed dictated by Marcus, runs thus.

* Or, other explanations concerning the Faith.

[a] Socrates (and with him Sozomen,) is here doubly miſtaken. Firſt, becauſe he ſuppoſed, that there were three forms of the Creed drawn up in the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus ; whereas there was one form only compoſed in that Synod ; which (beſides Socrates) is recorded by Athanaſius, pag. 500. and by Hilarius, in his book de Synodis 338. Edit. Paris. 1631. Secondly, in regard he aſſerts, that that form of the Creed, which was publiſhed in the Greek tongue at the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus, was dictated by Marcus of Arethuſa. Marcus of Arethuſa did not dictate that form I have mentioned, but another ; before which the Conſuls names were prefixt, and which was afterwards recited at Ariminum, as Nicholaus Faber hath already obſerved (in the Preface he wrote to Hilarius's Fragments) from Germinius's Epiſtle. We muſt therefore diſtinguiſh between the three Synods of Sirmium, each of which publiſhed their form of the Creed. The firſt was convened againſt Photinus, in the year of Chriſt 351. The ſecond was aſſembled in the year of our Lord 357 : wherein the Blaſphemie of Hoſius and Potamius was compoſed. The third was celebrated when Euſebius and Hypatius were Conſuls, in the year of Chriſt 359 ; wherein that Creed was drawn up, which Marcus of Arethuſa dictated. Valeſ.

[b] Inſtead of [ἄλλην another] the reading muſt be [ἄλλας δύο, the other two, or two more] as it is in the Allat. M. S. For Socrates here recounts three draughts of the Creed compoſed at Sirmium ; the two latter whereof he ſaith were written at firſt in Latine, and afterwards tranſlated into Greek. Which in my judgment is not true. I grant indeed, that that Creed, which by Hilarius is termed Hoſius's Blaſphemie, was at firſt publiſhed in Latine. But the other, which had the Conſuls names prefixt before it, was undoubtedly at firſt dictated in the Greek tongue. For he that dictated it, (viz. Marcus of Arethuſa) and the reſt of the Biſhops then aſſembled were almoſt all Græcians. Laſtly, the ſubſcriptions of the Biſhops, who ſubſcribed this form, are extant in Greek, in Epiphanius (in Hæreſ. Semiarian.) Valeſ.

[c] Without doubt it muſt be [Ariminum,] not [Sirmium :] which reading Epiphan. Scholaſticus followed, as appears from his Verſion. See chap. 37. of this ſecond book. Valeſ.

We believe in one God the Father Almighty, the Creatour and Framer of all things : * Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named : and in his only begotten Son, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, born of the Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, by whom all things, which are in the Heavens, and which are upon the Earth, viſible and inviſible, were made. Who is the Word, and the Wiſedom, and the true Light, and the Life. Who in the laſt days was for our ſakes incarnate, earnate, and born of the holy Virgin, and was Crucified and died, and was buried, and arose again from the Dead on the third day, and was taken up into Heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father, and shall come at the end of the world to judge the quick and dead, and shall render to every man according to his works. Whose Kingdom being perpetual continueth unto infinite ages. For he is sitting on the right hand of the Father, not only in this present world, but in that also which is to come. And [We believe] in the holy Ghost, that is, the Paraclete; whom [our Lord,] (having promised he would send him to the Apostles after his ascent into the heavens, that he might teach and put them in mind of all things,) sent. By whom also those souls, which have sincerely believed in him, are sanctified. But those who affirm, that the Son [exists] of things which * were not, or of another substance, and not of God, and that there was a time or an age when he was not, the Holy and Catholick Church hath certainly known to be Aliens [from Her.] We say it therefore again, if any one doth affirm the Father and the Son to be two Gods, let him be Anathema. [d] And if any one, affirming Christ to be God the Son of God before ages, shall not profess him to have ministred to the Father in order to the framing of all things, let him be Anathema. If any one be so audacious as to say, that the Unbegotten, or part of him, was born of Mary, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say that the Son was of Mary according to prescience, and that he was not with God, born of the Father before ages, and that all things were made by him, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm the Essence of God to be † dilated or contracted, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm the dilated Essence of God to make the Son, or shall term the Son the enlargement of his Essence, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm the internal or outwardly-uttered Word to be the Son of God, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm the Son who was [born] of Mary to be man only, let him be Anathema. If any one asserting him that was [born] of Mary to be God and man, shall understand the unbegotten God himself, let him be Anathema. If any one shall understand this Text, * I am the first God, and I am the last, and besides me there is no God, (which is spoken in order to the destruction of Idolls, and those which are not Gods) in the same sense which the Jews take it in, [to wit, as if it were spoken] upon account of the subversion of the only begotten God before ages, let him be Anathema. If any one hearing these words, † The word was made flesh, shall suppose that the Word was changed into flesh, or that he assumed flesh by having undergone any change, let him be Anathema. [e] If any one hearing that the only begotten Son of God was crucified, shall assert that his Deity underwent any corruption, or passion, or mutation, or diminution, or destruction, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father spake not these words, † Let us make man to the Son, but shall assert that God himself spake to himself, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that it was not the Son who appeared to Abraham, but the unbegotten God, or part of him, let him be Anathema. [f] If any one shall say, that it was not the Son who as a man wrestled with Jacob, but the unbegotten God or part of him, let him be Anathema. If any one shall understand these words, † The Lord rained from the Lord, not of the Father and of the Son, but shall say that God rained from himself, let him be Anathema. For the Lord the Son rained from the Lord the Father. [g] If any one hearing [these words] The Lord the Father and The Lord the Son, shall term both the Father Lord, and the Son also Lord, and saying, The Lord from the Lord, shall assert that there are two Gods, let him be Anathema. For we place not the Son in the same degree with the Father, but [understand] him to be inferiour to the Father. For neither did he come down to [h] Sodom without his Fathers will. Nor did he rain from himself, but from the Lord, that is from the Father, who hath the supream authority. Nor does he sit at his Fathers right hand of himself, but he hears the Father, saying, * Sit thou at my right hand, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father Son and holy Ghost are one Person, let him be Anathema. If any terming the holy Ghost the Paraclete, shall call him the unbegotten God, let him be Anathema. If any one does say that the Paraclete is no other [Person] than the Son, (as the Son himself hath taught us; for he has said, † The Father, whom I will ask, shall send you another Comforter,) let him be Anathema If any one shall say, that the Spirit is part of the Father and of the Son, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost are three Gods, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that the Son of God was made like one of the Creatures, by the will of God, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Son was begotten against the will of the Father, let him be Anathema. [i] For the Father was not forced by a physical necessity, nor did he beget the Son as if he were unwilling: but as soon as he was willing, he has declared that he begat him of himself without time and without passion, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that the Son is unborn and without a beginning, affirming as it were that there are two [Principles] without a beginning and unborn, and so making two Gods, let him be Anathema. For the Son is the Head and Beginning of all things. * But the Head of Christ is God. For thus we piously refer all things by the Son to One who is without a beginning

CONSTANTIUS.

* Are not.

[d] Hilarius seems to have read otherwise. For in his book de Synodis, where he records this Creed, he renders this passage thus: & siquis, &c. and if any one affirming one God, but shall not profess Christ to be God the Son of God before ages, &c. Valef.

† Enlarged.

* Esai. 44. 6.

† John 1. 14.

[e] In the Allat. M. S. and in Athanasius's book de Synodis, this Anathema is thus worded: εἴ τις τὸν μονογενῆ υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐσταυρωμένον ἀκόων, τὴν θεότητα αὐτοῦ φθορᾶν ἢ πάθη, &c. and we have rendred it accordingly: after the same manner Hilarius read this passage, as from his Version appears. Valef.

† Gen. 1. 26.

[f] This whole Anathematism was omitted here: it occurs in Athanasius's and Hilarius's Copy of this Creed; and therefore we inserted it. Valef. The Learned Reader will find it in Robert Stephens Edit. also.

† Gen. 19. 24.

[g] This Anathematism is differently worded in all the Authours (we have seen) wherein this Creed occurs. Vatefius says, that he has published it according to the reading of the Florent. and Sfortian M.SS. which Copies we have followed in our English version: where it is thus worded in the Greek: εἴπις ἀκόων κύειον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν κύειον, καὶ κύειον τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱὸν εἶπει, καὶ κύειον ἐκ κυείε λέγων δύο λέγει θεύς, ἀνάθεμα ἔςω. The reading in Robert Stephens is different from this; and so is that in Athanasius, pag. 901: where 'tis thus worded: εἴπις ἀκόων κύειον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν κύειον, καὶ κύειον, τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱὸν· ἐπεὶ κύειον ἐκ κυείε, δύο λέγειθεύς, &c. Hilarius has translated otherwise, as appears from his Version, at pag. 339. Edit. Paris. 1631. His words are these: Siquis dominum & dominum patrem & filium, quasi dominum a domino intelligat: quia dominum & dominum duos dicat deos: Anathema sit. Thus variously is this Anathematism represented. The Learned Reader may take the liberty (as we have done,) to follow which Copy he pleases.

* Pfal. 110. 1.

[h] We follow the reading in Hilarius, and in Athanasius; where it is [ἐπὶ σόδομα to Sodom.] In Robert Stephens the reading is [ὅτε γὰρ κατέλθεν εἰς σῶμα, For neither did he descend into the body.]

† See John 14. 16.

[i] Here we follow the reading in Athanasius, which is thus: ὁ γὰρ βιασθεὶς ὁ πατὴρ, &c. For the Father was not forced, &c. which reading is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus, and by Hilarius. Valef.

ning, the beginning of all things. Furthermore, we, making an accurate explanation of [their] sentiments [who profest] the Christian Religion, do assert, that if any one shall not affirm Christ Jesus to have been the Son of God before ages, and to have ministred to the Father at the framing of all things, but [shall say] that he was called the Son and Christ from such time only as he was born of Mary, and that he then received the beginning of his Deity; let him be Anathema, like [Paul] of Samosata.

k Another [Draught of the] Creed published at Sirmium in the Latine tongue, and rendred into Greek.

k Athanasius has the same words in his book de Synodis Arimini & Seleuciæ: where, after he had inserted this foregoing Creed, he adds these words concerning this which follows; Ταῦτα πάντα παρωσάμενοι, &c. Having rejected all these things, as if they had invented better, they promulge another Creed, which they wrote at Sirmium in Latine, but it was translated into Greek. But Hilarius recording this Creed in his book de Synodis, prefixes this title before it: Exemplum Blasphemiæ, &c. A Copy of the Blasphemy composed at Sirmium by Hosius and Potamius. Which title Hilarius made himself, and deservedly calls this Creed Blasphemy. Who this Potamius, here joyned with Hosius was, Marcellinus Presbyter informs us in the Supplicatory Libel which he presented to the Emperour Theodosius. Where, amongst the corrupters of the Divine and Apostolick Faith, after Arius, he in the first place names this person: his words are these: Potamius Olyssponæ civitatis Episcopus, &c. i. e. Potamius Bishop of Lisbon was at first a Defender of the Catholick Faith, but afterwards induced by the reward of a Farm belonging to the Emperours Revenue (which he was very desirous of,) he corrupted the Faith. Hosius of Corduba amongst the Churches in Spain detected this man, and repelled him as being an impious Heretick. But, even Hosius himself, summoned before the Emperour Constantius by the complaint of this Potamius, and terrified with threats, was fearfull (being old and rich) of banishment, or proscription, and so yielded to the impiety. Valesius.

In regard there seemeth to have been some difference concerning the Faith, all things were diligently inquired into and discussed at Sirmium, in the presence of Valens, Ursacius, Germinius [1] and the rest. It is manifest that there is one God the Father Almighty, according as it is declared over the whole world: and his one only begotten Son Jesus Christ our Lord [m] and God and Saviour, begotten of his Father before ages. But it must not be asserted that there are two Gods, because the Lord himself hath said, * I go unto my Father, and your Father, and to my God, and your God. Therefore he is God even of all, as the Apostle also hath taught,

* John 20.17.

† Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: Seeing it is one God who shall justifie the Circumcision by Faith. Moreover, all other things agree, nor have they any ambiguity. But whereas very many are disturbed about that term which in Latine is called † Substantia, and in Greek Ousia (that is, that it may be more accurately understood, the word ‡ Homoöusion or * Homoiousion,) these termes ought in no wise to be mentioned, nor discoursed of publickly in the Church, for this reason, and upon this account, because there is nothing Recorded concerning them in the Divine Scriptures, and in regard these things are above the reach of humane knowledge and mind of man, nor can any one declare the Son's Generation, according as it is written, || And who shall declare his Generation? For 'tis manifest that only the Father knows how he begat the Son; and again, that the Son [only knows,] how he was begotten of the Father. It cannot be doubtful to any man that the Father is greater in honour, dignity, and divinity, and that he is greater in that very name of a Father: the Son himself attesting, † The Father who sent me is greater than I. No man is ignorant that this is Catholick [Doctrine,] that there are two Persons of the Father and of the Son, and that the Father is the greater: but that the Son is made subject, together with all other things which the Father hath subjected to himself. That the Father hath no beginning, and is invisible, immortal, and impassible: but that the Son was born of the Father, God of God, Light of Light. And that no man knows his Generation, (as was said before,) but only the Father. That the Son himself our Lord and God, took flesh, or a body, that is [was made] man, according as the Angel Evangelized. And according as all the Scriptures do teach, and especially the Apostle himself, the Teacher of the Gentiles, Christ received humanity of the Virgin Mary, by which he suffered. This is the Principal Head of the whole Faith, and its confirmation, that the Trinity must be always preserved according as we read in the Gospel: † Go ye and disciple all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost. The number of the Trinity is entire and perfect. But the Paraclete, the holy Ghost, was sent by the Son, and he came according to promise, that he might Sanctifie and [n] Teach the Apostles and all Believers.

They attempted to perswade Photinus to give his * consent to, and subscribe these things, even after his deposition, promising that they would restore him his Bishoprick, in case by altering his mind he would Anathematize the opinion which he had invented, and consent to their sentiments. But he accepted not of that proposition; but challenged them to dispute. A day therefore being set, by the Emperours own appointment, the Bishops there present met, and also not a few of the [o] Senatorian Order, whom the Emperour commanded to be present at the dispute.

* See chap. 29. note (b.)

[o] Epiphanius (in Hæres. Photinian.) relates, that Photinus, after he had been condemned and deposed in the Synod of Sirmium, (for so the reading must be, not, in the Synod of Serdica.) went to Constantius, and requested that he might dispute concerning the Faith before Judges by him nominated: and that Constantius enjoyned Basilius Bishop of Ancyra to undertake the disputation against Photinus, and gave leave, that Thalassius, Datianus, Cerealis, and Taurus, who were Counts, should be Judges or auditours of that disputation. Amongst these Thalassius was the chief person in favour and authority with the Emperour (as Zosimus tells us in his second book.) And was sent Præfect of the Pretorium into the East together with Gallus Cæsar, in the year of Christ 351. He died in the year of our Lord 353, in the sixth Consulate of Constantius Augustus, and in the second of Gallus Cæsar; as Amm. Marcellinus relates book 14. Therefore the Synod of Sirmium, and the disputation

[1] These three words [καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ πάντα, and the rest] occur not in the Latine Copy of this Draught of the Creed. But they are extant in Athanasius, and in all our M. SS. Copies. Hence 'tis manifest that many Bishops were at that time convened at Sirmium. Indeed Phœbadius Bishop of Angolesm [in France,] in the Epistle he wrote against this Draught of the Creed, does expressly affirm that it was published in a Synod of Bishops. The same is sufficiently confirmed by Athanasius, in the forequoted place. Lastly, in regard Hilarius (in his foresaid book) does attest, that this Creed, after it had been dictated at Sirmium, was forthwith sent to all the Eastern and Western Bishops to be approved by them; he evidently shews it to have been dictated in a Synod. Nor can the Draught of a Creed be any where dictated but in a Synod of Bishops. Further, that Germinius here mentioned, was Bishop of Sirmium, put into Photinus's See upon his being ejected, in the year of Christ 351. Nicolaus Faber (in his Preface to Hilarius's Fragments,) says that this Germinius had before been Bishop of Cyzicum; which I do not believe. That place in Athanasius (in his Epist. ad Solitar. pag. 860; where he reproves the Emperour Constantius, because, contrary to the Ecclesiastick Canons, he would send obscure fellows, born in remote countries, to be Bishops in the Cities;) deceived that Learned man: Athanasius's words there are these: ὅτω γεηρόσιον ἀπὸ καππαδοκίας ἔπεμψεν εἰς ἀλεξάνδρειαν, &c. So he sent Gregorius from Cappadocia to Alexandria. And Germinius was by him sent from the City Cyzicum to Sirmium. From Laodicea he sent Cecropius to Nicomedia. From these words of Athanasius it cannot be concluded, that Germinius had been Bishop of Cyzicum before. Otherwise, the same must be said concerning Gregorius and Cecropius, that the latter had been before Bishop of Laodicea, and the former in Cappadocia, which, in regard 'tis evidently false in these two, cannot be said of Germinius. This Germinius was preferred to the Episcopate of Sirmium by the Arians, because he was a most eager defender of their opinion. This we are informed of by Athanasius, in his circular Letter to the Bishops of Egypt and Libya, pag. 290. Valesius.

[m] In the Allat. and Sfortian. M.SS. and in Epiphanius's Version these words [καὶ θεὸν, and God] occur; in Athanasius and Hilarius they are wanting. Valesius.

tation of Basilius against Photinus cannot fall on the year of Christ 357, as Baronius asserts. Besides, Epiphanius says further, that in Basilius's disputation against Photinus, Calicrates was a Notary, who had before been Notary to Rufinus Prefect of the Prætorium. Now, Rufinus was Prefect of the Prætorium in the Gallia's, in the sixth Consulate of Constantius Augustus, and in the second of Gallus Cæsar, as Amm. Marcellinus tells us book. 14. But, two years before he had been Præfect of Illyricum. Now, in the year of Christ 357, Anatolius, not Rufinus, bore the Præfecture of the Prætorium in Illyricum. Further, it may be evidently concluded from Germinius's being made Bishop, that the Synod of Sirmium against Photinus (wherein Photinus was ejected out of his Bishoprick,) was not held in the year of Christ 357. For, Germinius was Bishop of Sirmium, before Georgius intruded himself into the See of Alexandria upon Athanasius's Ejectment, as Athanasius relates in the Circular Letter he wrote to the Bishops of Egypt and Libya, at such time as Georgius was in possession of the Alexandrian See. Moreover, Georgius entred upon the See of Alexandria in the beginning of the year 356, as it is evident from the protestation of the Alexandrians which is extant at the close of Athanasius's Epistle ad Solitar. Seeing therefore Germinius was Bishop of Sirmium before the year of our Lord 356, Photinus also (whom Germinius succeeded) must necessarily have been deposed before this year. Athanasius (in Epist. ad Solitar. pag. 860, where he recounts the ordinations of extraneous persons made by Constantius;) does in the first place mention Gregorius's Ordination; then, Germinius's and Cecropius's; afterwards Auxentius's; and at last Georgius's. Amongst these persons, Gregorius was made Bishop of Alexandria in the year of Christ 341. Germinius succeeded Photinus in the Episcopate of Sirmium in the year 351: after he had been sent for by Constantius then residing at Sirmium, as Athanasius relates in the fore-quoted place; which the Latine Translatour has rendred ill. On the same year Cecropius was made Bishop of Nicomedia, as it may be concluded from the foresaid passage in Athanasius. Lastly, Auxentius was preferred to the Bishoprick of Millaine in the year of our Lord 355: and on the year following Georgius thrust himself into the See of Alexandria. Valef.

CONSTANTIUS.

In their presence, Basilius, who at that time presided over the Church at Ancyra, opposed Photinus, the Notaries taking their words in writing. There was a very great contest on both sides during their dispute; wherein Photinus being vanquished, was condemned. Spending the residue of his life in exile, he wrote a [p] Book in † both Languages, for he was not unskilled in the Latine tongue. He wrote also against all Heresies, asserting his own opinion only. Let thus much be said concerning Photinus. Moreover, you must know, that the Bishops convened at Sirmium were afterwards [q] displeased with that Draught of the Creed published by them in Latine. For it seemed to them, after its publication, to contain many contradictions. Wherefore, they earnestly endeavoured to get it out of their hands who had transcribed it. But, in regard many hid it, the Emperour by his Edicts ordered, that all the Copies of it should be diligently searched for and gathered up, threatning to punish those that should be found concealing of it. But his menaces were unable to suppress it when once published, in regard it had fallen into many mens hands. Thus far concerning this.

[p] In the Allat. M. S. it is [λόγους συνέγραψεν, he wrote Books] which reading is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus's version. Valef.

† That is, in Greek, and Latine.

[q] Socrates borrowed this passage out of Athanasius's book de Synodis Arimin. & Seleuciæ. But herein he mistakes; viz. what Athanasius had said concerning the third form of the Creed drawn up at Sirmium, (before which the Consuls names were prefixt,) Socrates attributes to the second, composed by Hosius and Potamius. The place in Athanasius is extant at pag. 904: but in regard of its length we forbear quoting the words here. Petavius (in his Animadversions on Epiphanius, pag. 318.) has followed this mistake of Socrates's. Valef.

CHAP. XXXI.

Concerning Hosius Bishop of Corduba.

But, in regard we have mentioned Hosius the Spaniard, as being against his will present [at Sirmium,] we must say something very briefly concerning him. For a little before, this person had been sent into [a] Banishment by the fraudulent practises of the Arians. But then, through the earnest desire of those convened at Sirmium, the Emperour sent for him, being desirous either to perswade, or else by force to compell him to give consent with those [Bishops] present there. For if this cou'd be accomplished, an evident testimony would seem to be given to their Faith. For this reason therefore, he was present (as I said,) being necessitated thereto against his will. But when he refused to give his consent, they inflicted stripes and tortures upon the old man. Upon which account he was necessitated both to consent to, and subscribe those expositions of the Faith then published. Socrates. Such was the conclusion of affaires at that time transacted at Sirmium. Moreover, the Emperour Constantius continued at Sirmium, expecting the event of the War against Magnentius.

CONSTANTIUS.

[a] I noted before, that Hosius's banishment to Sirmium, and the form of the Creed drawn up by him, are here preposterously related by Socrates. For Hosius's lapse hapned in the year of Christ 357. as Baronius has truly observed. Valef.

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning the overthrow of Magnentius the Tyrant.

In the interim, Magnentius having possessed himself of the Imperial City Rome, slew many of the Senatorian Order, and destroyed several of the Populace. But as soon as Constantius's Commanders, having got together a body of Romans, marched out against him, he left Rome, and went into the Gallia's. Where there hapned continual engagements; and sometimes one side, sometimes the other got the better. But in fine, Magnentius having been worsted about Mursa, which is a Fort of the Gallia's, was Besieged there. In which Fort such a miraculous accident as this is said to have hapned. Magnentius attempting to encourage his Souldiers disheartned at their overthrow, ascended a lofty tribunal. His men, desirous to receive him with the shouts and acclamations usually given to the Emperours, contrary to their intent diverted them to Constantius. For by a general consent they all cried out, not Magnentius, but Constantius Augustus. Magnentius looking upon this to be an * Omen of his imminent Ruine, departed immediately out of the Garrison, and fled to the further parts of the Gallia's. Constantius's Commanders followed him with a very close pursuit. Whereupon there hapned another Engagement at a place called [a] The Mountain Seleucus: wherein Magnentius being totally Routed, fled alone to Lyons a City of Gallia, three days journey distant from the Fort at Mursa. Magnentius having got into Lyons, in the first place killed his own mother. Then he slew his brother, whom he had created Cæsar; and at last laid violent hands upon himself. This was done in the sixth Consulate of Constantius, and in Constantius Gallus's second Consulate, [b] about the fifteenth of the month August. Not long after, another of Magnentius's brothers, his name Decentius, finished his own life, by hanging of himſelf. Such was Magnentius his exit. But the publick affairs of the Empire returned not to a perfect degree of tranquillity. For ſoon after this another Tyrant aroſe, by name Silvanus. But Conſtantius's Commanders quickly deſtroyed him, whilſt he was making diſturbances in the Gallia's.

[a] In the Allat. M. S. this place is called [μονοσέλευκος, Montoseleucus.] Epiphanius Scholasticus terms it The mountain Seleucus. We have the site of this place in the Jerusalem Itinerary. Valef.

[b] It is something otherwise in Idatius's Fasti: thus: in the sixth Consulate of Constantius and the second of Constantius Gallus, Magnentius killed himself in the Gallia's at Lyons, on the third of the Ides of August; and Decentius, brother to Magnentius, hanged himself on the fifteenth of the Kalends of September. In the Alexandr. Chronicle, the year of Magnentius's death is falsely set down; but the day is noted to have been on the fourteenth of the Ides of August. Valef.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Concerning the Jews inhabiting Dio-Cæſarea in Paleſtine.

AT the ſame time alſo that theſe things happened, there aroſe another inteſtine War in the Eaſt. For the Jews, who inhabited Dio-Cæſarea in Paleſtine, took Arms againſt the Romans, and overran and deſtroyed the adjacent places. But Gallus (who was alſo named Conſtantius, whom the Emperour, having created him Cæſar, had ſent into the Eaſt) ſent an Army againſt them, and Routed them. And by his order their City Dio-Cæſarea was totally deſtroyed.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Concerning Gallus Cæſar.

Gallus having done this, was unable [with moderation] to bear his proſperous ſucceſs: but immediately attempted to raiſe innovations againſt him by whom he had been created Cæſar, and he himſelf was alſo reſolved to play the Tyrant. But, whereas his deſign was ſoon diſcovered by Conſtantius: (For Gallus had upon his own authority ordered Domitianus, at that time Præfect of the Prætorium in the Eaſt, and Magnus the Quæſtor, to be ſlain, becauſe they had [a] acquainted the Emperour with his deſign.) Conſtantius highly incenſed thereat, ſent for Gallus to him. He, being in a very great fear, went unwillingly. When he arrived in the Weſtern parts, and was come as far as the Iſland Flanona, Conſtantius ordered he ſhould be ſlain. Not long after, he created Julianus, Gallus's Brother, Cæſar, and ſent him againſt the Barbarians in Gallia. Moreover, Gallus (called alſo Conſtantius) was ſlain in the ſeventh Conſulate of the Emperour Conſtantius, when he himſelf was Conſul the third time. On the year following, in the Conſulate of Arbetion and Lollianus, Julianus was created Cæſar, on the ſixth of the month November. Concerning Julianus we ſhall make a further mention in our following book. But Conſtantius having got rid of his preſent miſchiefs and diſquietudes, bent his mind again to an Eccleſiaſtick War. For going from Sirmium to the Imperial City Rome, he again ſummoned a Synod of Biſhops, and ordered ſome of the Eaſtern Biſhops to haſten into [b] Italy; and at the ſame time commanded the Weſtern Biſhops to meet there alſo. But in the interim that they were making preparation to go into Italy, this accident hapned: [c] Julius Biſhop of Rome died, having Preſided over the Church there fifteen years: Liberius ſucceeded him in his Biſhoprick.

[a] I corrected this place by the aſſiſtance of the Allat. M. S. of Sozomen, and Cedrenus. In the Allat. M.S. the reading is [ἀνεῖλε μηνύσαντας βασιλεῖ τὸν σκοπὸν αὐτῶ. He ſlew them becauſe they had acquainted the Emperour with his deſign.] Sozomen's words (book 4. chap. 7.) are almoſt the ſame. But Epiphanius, our M. SS. Copies, and the Alexandrian Chronicle retain the Vulgar reading, to wit, μὴ μηνύσας τῶ βασιλεῖ, He (that is, Gallus) having not acquainted the Emperour with his deſign of ſlaying Domitianus, &c. Valeſ.

[b] Inſtead of [ὅθι τὴν Γαλλίαν into Gallia] the reading in the Allat. M. S. is truer; which is [ὅθι τὴν Ἰταλίαν into Italy:] which reading we have followed in our Verſion. Valſ.

CHAP. XXXV.

Concerning Aëtius the Syrian, Eunomius's Maſter.

AT Antioch in Syria there aroſe another Arch-Heretick, Aëtius, ſurnamed Atheus. He had the ſame ſentiments with Arius, and maintained the ſame opinion. But he ſeparated himſelf from the Arian party, becauſe they had admitted Arius into communion. For Arius (as I ſaid * before) eſpouſing one opinion in his mind, made an open profeſſion of another with his mouth, when he hypocritically conſented to, and ſubſcribed the form of the Creed [drawn up] at the Synod of Nice, that he might deceive the then Emperour. Upon this account therefore Aëtius ſeparated himſelf from the Arians. Moreover, Aëtius had formerly been an Hereticall perſon, and a very zealous defender of Arius's opinion. For after he had been a little inſtructed at Alexandria, he returned from thence. And arriving at Antioch in Syria (for there he was born) he was Ordained Deacon by Leontius, at that time Biſhop of Antioch. Immediately therefore he aſtoniſhed thoſe that diſcourſed him with the novelty of his ſpeeches. And this he did, truſting in Ariſtotle's Categories; (that Book is ſo entitled by its Authour,) from the Rules whereof he diſcourſed, but was inſenſible of his framing fallacious arguments in order to the deceiving of his own ſelf, nor had he learned the ſcope of Ariſtotle from knowing perſons. For Ariſtotle, upon account of the Sophiſters who at that time derided Philoſophy, wrote that Exercitation for young men, and oppoſed the Sophiſters with the art of diſcourſe by ſubtile reaſonings. Wherefore the [a] Ephecticks who expound Plato's and Plotinus's works, do find fault with what Ariſtotle has ſubtilly and artificially aſſerted [in that work.] But Aëtius, having never had an Academick Maſter, ſtuck cloſe to the Sophiſmes of the Categories. Upon which account he could neither underſtand how there could be a generation [b] without a beginning, nor how he that was begotten could be coëternal with him who begat him. Yea, Aëtius was a man of ſo little learning, ſo unskilled in the ſacred Scriptures, and ſo wholly exerciſed in and addicted to a contentious and diſputative humour, (which every Ruſtick may eaſily do;) that he was not in [a] Who theſe Ephecticks were, we may know from Diogenes Laërtius: Τῶν δὲ φιλοσόφων, οἱ μὲν γεγόνασι, δογματικοὶ οἱδὲ ἐφεκτικοί. &c. Philoſophers (ſays he) were generally divided into two ſorts; ſome were termed Dogmatici, who diſcourſed concerning things as they might be comprehended: others were called Ephectici, who define nothing, and diſpute of things ſo as they cannot be comprehended. See Diogen Laërt. in *Proëm. de Vit. in the least studious in the perusal of those Ancient writers who have explained the sacred Books of the Christian Religion, but wholly rejected Clemens, Africanus, and Origen, persons expert in all manner of knowledge and literature. But he patcht together Epistles, both to the Emperour Constantius, and to some other persons, knitting together therein trifling and contentious disputes, and inventing subtile and fallacious arguments. Upon which account he was surnamed * Atheus. But although his assertions were the same with those of the Arians; yet because they were unable to understand his difficult and perplexed † Syllogismes, he who had the same sentiments with them, was by those of his own party judged to be an Heretick. And for this reason he was driven from their Church; but he himself pretended that he would not communicate with them. There are at this present some Hereticks propagated from him, [to wit,] those who were heretofore called Aëtians, but now they are termed Eunomians. For Eunomius (who had been Aëtius's Notary,) having been instructed in that [c] Heretical opinion by him, afterwards Headed that Sect. But we shall speak concerning Eunomius in due place.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Concerning the Synod at Millaine.

AT that time the Bishops met in Italy; there came not very many of the Eastern Bishops, in regard most of them were hindred from coming either by their great age, or by the length of the journey: but of the Western Bishops there met above [a] three hundred. For it was the Emperours order, that a Synod should be held at the City of Millaine. Where being met together, the Eastern Bishops requested that in the first place sentence might by a general consent be pronounced against Athanasius: that so, that having been effected, he might in future be perfectly disabled from returning to Alexandria. But when [b] Paulinus Bishop of Triers in Gallia, and Dionysius, and Eusebius, (the former of whom was Bishop of [c] Alba the Metropolis of Italy, and the latter of Vercellæ which is a City of Liguria in Italy,) were sensible, that the Eastern Bishops, by a ratification of the sentence against Athanasius, attempted the subversion of the Faith, they arose and with great earnestness cryed out, that deceit and fraud was covertly designed against the Christian Religion by what was transacted: for they said, that the accusation against Athanasius was not true, but that these things were invented by them in order to the depravation of the Faith. After they had with loud voices spoken all this, the congress of Bishops was for that time dissolved.

[a] We meet with the same number in Sozomen, book 4. chap. 9. But 'tis scarce credible that so great a number of Bishops should have been convened at this Council of Millaine: I should rather think that the copies of Socrates and Sozomen were false; and that instead of [τριακοσίους three hundred] it should be [τριακοντα thirty.] In the Epistle of the Council of Millaine sent to Eusebius Bishop of Vercellæ, there are the names of thirty Bishops only, who consented to the condemnation of Athanasius, Marcellus, and Photinus. Amongst whom some Eastern Bishops are recounted, as you may see in Baronius, at the year of Christ 355. Vales.

[b] Paulinus Bishop of Triers was not present at the Council of Millaine, but at that of Orleance, which had been convened two years before, in the year of Christ 353. See Baronius. Vales.

[c] The reading is the same in Sozomen, book 4. chap. 9. But Baronius has long since remarked, that Alba is here put instead of Millaine. For Millaine (not Alba) was the Metropolis of Italy. And Dionysius, who then opposed Constantius and the Arians, was not Bishop of Alba, but of Millaine, as Athanasius attests in his Epistle ad Solitar. Vales.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Concerning the Synod at Ariminum, and concerning the [Draught of the] Creed which was published there.

WHen the Emperour understood this, He removed * them out of the way by banishment. And resolved to convene a General Council, that so, by drawing all the Eastern Bishops into the West, he might (if it were possible) reduce them all to an agreement in opinion. But in regard the tediousness of the Journey rendred this design of his difficult, he ordered the Synod should be divided into two parts, permitting those then present to meet at Ariminum [a City] of Italy. But by his Letters he gave the Eastern Bishops order to assemble at Nicomedia [a City] of Bithynia. [a] The Emperour issued out these orders with a design to unite them in opinion. But this design of his had not a successful event. For neither of the Synods agreed amongst themselves, but each of them was divided into contrary factions. For neither could they convened at Ariminum be brought to agree in one and the same opinion: and those Eastern Bishops gathered together at Seleucia of Isauria raised another Schism. Moreover, after what manner all these matters were transacted, we will declare in the procedure of our History, having first made mention of some few passages concerning Eudoxius. For about that time [b] Leontius (who had ordained Aetius the Heretick Deacon) departing this life, Eudoxius Bishop of Germanicia a City of Syria, being then present at Rome, considered with himself that he was to make haste. And having framed a cunning discourse with the Emperour, as if the City Germanicia stood in need of his consolation and defence, he requested that leave might be granted him to make a sudden return. The Emperour foreseeing nothing [of a design,] sent him away. But he, having procured the chiefest persons of the Bedchamber to the Emperour to be his assistants, left his own City [Germanicia,] and * clancularly possest himself of the Episcopate of Antioch: immediately after which he attempted to favour Aëtius, and made it his business to assemble a Synod of Bishops, and [c] restore him to his dignity, [to wit,] his † Diaconate. But he was in no wise able to effect this, because the hatred conceived against Aëtius was more prevalent than Eudoxius's earnestness for him. Thus much concerning these things. But when the Bishops were assembled at Ariminum, Aëtius to a diaconate: but being afterwards reproved by Diodorus and Flavianus, because he had advanced a person to sacred orders who had been bred up in ill studies, and was an assertour of impious Tenets; he divested him of his Deaconship, as Theodoret relates (Eccles. Hist. book 2. chap. 24.) Eudoxius therefore, as soon as he had gotten the Bishoprick of Antioch, attempted to restore Aëtius to his former preferment. Vales.

the Eastern Prelates affirmed that they were come to the Council with a design wholly to omit the mention of the accusations against Athanasius. This desire and resolution of theirs was assisted by Ursacius and Valens, who at the beginning had been defenders of Arius's opinion: but [afterwards] they publickly consented to the term Homoüsios, by their Libel given in to the Bishop of Rome, as we said * before. For these persons always inclined to the strongest side. They were assisted by Germinius, Auxentius, Demophilus, and Caius. When therefore some were ready to propose one thing in the congress of Bishops then present, and some another; Ursacius and Valens said, that all Forms of the Creed heretofore published were to be accounted null and void; and that that last draught was to be admitted and approved of, which they had a little before published in their convention at Sirmium. Having said this, they caused a paper, which they had in their hands, to be read; [wherein was contained] another Form of the Creed (which they had drawn up before at Sirmium, but concealed it there, as I said * before) which they then made publick at Ariminum. This [d] Creed was translated out of Latine [into Greek;] the contents thereof are these.

[d] We remark't before, (book 2. chap. 30. note (b.) that this third Exposition of Faith was not translated out of Latine; but was at first dictated in Greek by Marcus Arethusius. Athanasius, who has recorded this Creed in his book de Synodis, does not say it was translated out of Latine; and yet, where-ever he produceth any monument rendred into Greek out of the Latine tongue, his continual usage is to give the Reader warning of it. Further, these words [ἡ τῆς ἐκ ῥωμαϊκῆς μὲν ἡρμηνεύθη, δεῖ δὲ ἐν τέλοις τοῖς ῥήμασι, i.e. This Creed was translated out of Latine [into Greek,] the contents thereof are these] are wanting in Robert Stephens's Edition; nor are they in Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. This Catholick Creed was published in the presence of our Lord Constantius, in the Consulate of the most Eminent Flavius Eusebius and Hypatius, at Sirmium, on the eleventh of the Kalends of June.

We believe in one only and true God, the Father Almighty, Creatour and Framer of all things. And in one only begotten Son of God, who was begotten of God, without passion, before all Ages, and before every beginning, and before all time conceivable in the mind, and before every comprehensible [e] notion: by whom the Ages were framed, and all things were made. Who was begotten the only begotten of the Father, the only of the only, God of God, like to the Father who begat him, according to the Scriptures. Whose Generation no person knoweth, but only the Father who begat him. We know that this only begotten Son of God, by his Father's appointment, came down from heaven in order to the abolishing of sin: and was born of the Virgin Mary, and conversed with the Disciples, and fulfilled every dispensation according to his Fathers will: and was crucified, and died, and descended into the Infernal parts, and set in order what was to be done there. At the sight of whom the doorkeepers of hell trembled. He arose again on the third day, and conversed with his Disciples: and after the completion of fourty days, he ascended into the heavens, and sits at the right hand of his Father. And he shall come in the last day in his Fathers Glory, and render to every man according to his works. And [we believe] in the holy Ghost, whom the only begotten Son of God Jesus Christ himself promised to send as a Comforter to mankind, according as it is written: I go away to my Father, and I will pray my Father, and he shall send you another Comforter, the spirit of truth. He shall receive of mine, and shall teach you, and bring all things to your remembrance. But, for the term * Ousia, in regard it has been used by the Fathers in a more plain and ordinary sense, and, being not understood by the people, gives an offence to many, in as much as it is not contained in the Scriptures, we thought good to have it wholly removed, and in future to make no mention at all of this term Ousia, when God is spoken of, in regard the sacred Scriptures have no where mentioned the substance of the Father and of the Son. But [f] we do assert, that the Son is in all things like the Father, as the sacred Scriptures do affirm and teach.

[f] The latter part of this Sirmian Creed is set down by Germinius in his Epistle to Rufianus, Palladius, and others, in these words: Nam sub bonæ memoriæ Constantio Imperatore, &c. For under the Emperour Constantius of good memory, when there began to be a dissention amongst some concerning the Faith; in the presence of the said Emperour, there being also present Georgius Bishop of the Alexandrian Church, Pancratius of Pelusium, Basilius at that time Bishop of Anquititum, Valens, Ursacius, and our slenderness; after a dispute had concerning the Faith untill night, when it was reduced to a certain Rule, Marcus was chosen by us all to dictate it: in which Creed it is thus written, The Son is in all things like the Father, as the divine Scriptures do affirm and teach. To which entire profession of Faith we all gave our consent, and subscribed it with our hands. Their subscriptions are extant in Epiphanius (in Hæres. Semiarian. cap. 22.) which ought to be annexed to this draught of the Creed. The same form of the Sirmian Creed is mentioned in the Exposition of the Faith at Seleucia, which Epiphanius hath recorded in the foresaid Heresie, chap. 25; in these words: ὅτι δὲ πάντη τῇ πίστει ἰσοδυναμεῖ ἡ ἐν σιρμίῳ τοῦτον ἐκτεθεῖσα πίστις, &c. i.e. Moreover, that that Draught of the Creed heretofore published at Sirmium in the presence of the piety of our Emperour [Constantius] does exactly agree with this form of the Creed, is very well known by them who have read that Creed; which was subscribed by them that were then present, to wit, Basilius, Marcus, Georgius Bishop of Alexandria, Pancratius, Hypatianus, and most of the Western Bishops. Vales.

After the reading of this paper, those who were displeased with the contents thereof, rose up and said: we came not hither because we wanted a Creed. For we keep that entire, which we have received from our Ancestours. But [we are met,] that if any innovation hath hapned concerning it, we might repress it. If therefore what hath been recited doth contain nothing of novelty in it, do you now openly Anathematize the Arian Heresie, in such sort as the ancient Rule of the Church hath rejected other Heresies, as being blasphemous. For, it has been made manifest to the whole world, that Arius's impious opinion hath been the occasion of those tumults and disturbances, which have hapned in the Church untill this present time. This proposall, being not admitted of by Ursacius, Valens, Germinius, Auxentius, Demophilus, and Caius, wholly rent in sunder the Church. For these persons adhered to what had been recited in the Synod of Ariminum. But the others did again confirm the Nicene Creed. Moreover, they derided the inscription prefixt before the Creed which had been read. And especially [g] Athanasius, in the Epistle he sent to his acquaintance, where he writes word for word thus.

[g] The passage in Athanasius here quoted by Socrates, occurs at the beginning of his Epistle de Synodis Arimini & Seleuciæ. Vales.

For what was wanting to the Doctrine of the Catholick Church as concerning piety, that disquisitions should now be made about the Faith, and that they should prefix the Consulate of the present times before that Draught of the Creed (forsooth!) which they have published? For Ursacius, Valens, and Germinius, have done that which never was done, or so much as ever heard of amongst Christians. For having composed such a form form of the Creed as they were willing to admit of, they prefixt before it the Consulate, the month, and the day of the present year, in order to their making it manifest to all prudent persons, that their Faith had not its beginning before, but now under the Reign of Constantius. For, they have written [h] all things with a respect had to their own Heresie. Besides, pretending to write concerning the Lord, they name another to be their Lord, [to wit,] Constantius. For he it was, who influenced and authorized their impiety. And they who deny the Son to be Eternal, have stiled him [i] Eternal Emperour: such bitter enemies are they against Christ, by reason of their impiety! But perhaps, the holy Prophets specifying of the time [wherein they prophesied] gave them an occasion of assigning the Consulate. Now, should they be so audacious as to assert this, they would most egregiously betray their own ignorance. For the prophesies of those holy persons do indeed contain a mention of the times. Isaiah and Hosea lived * in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. Jeremiah, † in the days of Josiah. Ezekiel and Daniel [flourish't] under Cyrus and Darius. And others prophesied in other times: but they did not then lay the foundations of Religion. For that was in being before their times, and always was, even before the foundation of the world, God having prepared it for us by Christ. Nor did they thereby manifest the times of their own Faith. For even before those times they themselves were believers. But the times [which they mention] were the times of the Promise [which God made] by them. Now, the chief and principal head of the Promise was concerning our Saviours Advent. And by way of * Addition. * Appendix those things were added which should in future happen to Israel and to the Gentiles. These were the times manifested [by them, whereby was declared] not the beginning of Faith, as we said before, but the times wherein those Prophets themselves lived and foretold these things. † He speaks Ironically. But these † Wise men in our days (whenas they neither compose Histories, nor predict future things, but) having written [these words,] The Catholick Faith was published, immediately add the Consulate, the month, and the day. And, as those holy persons wrote the History of affairs [in their age, and noted] the times of their own ministration; so these men do manifest the time of their own Faith. And would to God they had written concerning their own Faith only; (for now they first began to believe:) and had not attempted [to write] concerning the Catholick [Faith!] For they have not written, Thus we believe: but after this manner, The Catholick Faith was published. The audaciousness therefore of this design does reprehend their impiety: but the novelty of the * Expression by them invented is altogether like the Arian Heresie. For by their writing after this manner they have informed [all persons,] when they themselves began first to believe; and from what instant they are desirous their Faith should be Preached. And, according to that saying of Luke the Evangelist, * A Decree [of Enrolment] was published; (which [Edict] was not before, but it began from those times, and was published by him that wrote it:) so these persons by writing thus, The Faith is now published, have demonstrated, that the Tenets of their Heresie are novitious, and were not in former times. But, in as much as they add the term Catholick, they are insensible of their falling into the [k] impious opinion of the † Cataphrygæ: and as they did, so do these assert, [saying,] the Faith of the Christians was first revealed to us, and took its beginning from us. And, as they stiled Maximilla and Montanus, so these term Constantius their Lord and Master, instead of Christ. But if, according to them, the Faith took its beginning from this Consulate, what will the Fathers, and the blessed Martyrs do? Moreover, what will they themselves do with such persons as were catechized and instructed by them, and died before this Consulate? How will they raise them to life again, that they may root out of their minds what they seemed to have taught them, and implant in them those [sentiments,] which, as they write, are newly invented by them? To such a degree of ignorance are they arrived, being only well skilled in framing Pretexts, and they such as are undecent and improbable, and which may be presently confuted.

CONSTANTIUS.

* See Luk. 2. 1.

Thus wrote Athanasius to those of his acquaintance. Such as are Lovers of learning (after they have found out this letter) may understand the powerfull expressions therein contained. For we, having an aversion for prolixity, have inserted but part thereof here. Further, you are to take notice, that the Synod deposed Valens, Ursacius, Auxentius, Germinius, Caius, and Demophilus, because they would not Anathematize the Arian opinion. Wherefore they highly resenting their deposition, hastned forthwith to the Emperour, carrying along with them that Draught of the Creed which had been read in the Synod. And the Synod acquainted the Emperour with their determinations, by their letter: the purport whereof, being translated out of Latine into Greek, is this.

The Letter of the Ariminum Synod to the Emperour Constantius.

[1] By Gods will, and the Command of your Piety,

[1] This Letter of the Ariminum Synod is extant in Latine, in Hilarius, amongst the Fragments of his book de Synodis, pag. 451. Edit. Paris. 1631: out of whom we have transcribed it, and placed it here instead of a Version. It ought not to seem strange to any person, to see so great a disagreement between the Greek Version and the original Latine Copy of this Epistle. For this is an usual thing with Greek Translatours, as often as they render Latine into Greek; which may be easily perceived from the Emperours Rescripts, which occur in Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History. But, we need not fetch examples hereof from any other place, than from this Letter: in which do occur almost as many mistakes in the Greek translation of it, as there are periods in the Letter. But, the beginning of this Letter is commonly thus worded in Hilarius: Lubente Deo ex præcepto pietatis Tuæ credimus fuisse dispositum, &c. By Gods pleasure we believe it hath been ordered by the Command of your Piety, &c. But in the M. S. Copy made use of by Jacobus Sirmondus, the reading is thus: Jubente Deo, &c. By Gods will, &c. So the Greek Translatour reads it: whom we have followed in this place. Any one may with good reason conjecture, that [Jubente Deo, By Gods will] is written instead of [Juvante Deo, By Gods assistance.] Vales.

[h] We read [πάντα all things] as it is in Athanasius: See the forequoted passage. Vales.

[i] For this is the title prefixt before the exposition of Faith at Sirmium [Ἔκθεσις τῆς πίστεως ἣν κατὰ λέξιν ὅπως παρασχὼν τῷ δεσπότῃ ἡμῶν τῷ εὐσεβεστάτῳ καὶ νικητῇ Κωνσταντίῳ αὐγούστῳ τῷ αἰωνίῳ στέφει, &c. This Catholick Creed was expounded and published in the presence of our Lord the most pious and Victorious Emperour Constantius Augustus, Eternal Augustus, &c.] as it is extant in Athanasius, at the forequoted place. Which words I therefore annext here, because our Socrates, in his recitation of that Draught of the Creed, has omitted these titles. Indeed Constantius did so readily give credence to such flatteries as these, that speaking of himself in his Edicts and Letters, he would sometimes assert his own eternity. This is attested by Amm. Marcellinus, not far from the beginning of his fifteenth book, in these words: Quo ille (speaking of Constantius) studio blanditiarum exquisito sublatus immunemq; se deinde fore ab omni mortalitatis incommodo fidenter existimans, confestim à justitia declinavit ita intemperanter, ut ÆTERNITATEM MEAM aliquoties subsereret ipse dictando, &c. Vales.

* See Isai. 1. 1. and Hosea 1. 1.

[k] In Athanasius the reading is [εἰς τὴν ἀφροσύνην, into the madness:] which is the better reading: for he means the Montanists, to whom madness is deservedly attributed. The term here, in Socrates, is [ἀσεβοφρόνειαν, impious opinion.] Vales.

we believe Order has been taken, that we Weſtern Biſhops ſhould come out of divers Provinces to the * City of Ariminum: that the Faith of the Catholick Church might be made apparent to all men, and that Hereticks might be notified. For whilſt all of us (who entertain ſuch ſentiments as are true) could review and conſider matters, our determination was to hold the Faith which hath continued from [all] antiquity, which we have received by the Prophets, Goſpels, and Apoſtles, by God himſelf and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the preſerver of your Empire and Doner of your † ſafety. For we accounted it a thing deteſtable to maim any of thoſe matters which have been rightly and juſtly determined; and [to take away any thing] from thoſe perſons, who were Aſſeſſours in the Nicene * Treaty, together with Conſtantine of glorious Memory the Father of your Piety. Which Treaty hath been manifeſted and inſinuated into the minds of the people, and is found to have been then oppoſed to the Arian hereſie, in ſuch manner that not only that, but other hereſies alſo have thereby been vanquiſhed. From which Treaty ſhould any thing be taken away, a paſſage would be opened to the poiſon of Hereticks. [m] Therefore Urſacius and Valens ſometime lay under a ſuſpicion of [being adherents to] the ſame Arian hereſie, and they were ſuſpended from communion. They alſo begged pardon, as the contents of their Libel do manifeſt. Which they procured at that time from the [n] Council of Millaine, the Embaſſadours of the Church of Rome alſo aſſiſting. Conſtantine being preſent in this [Conſult,] in regard after a ſearching diſquiſition, that [Creed] had been drawn up, (which he believing, and being baptized, departed to Gods reſt,) we look upon it as a thing deteſtable, to make any † Mutilations therein, or in any thing to ſet aſide ſo many Saints, Confeſſours, and ſucceſſours of the Martyrs, who were compoſers of that Treaty; in regard they have kept all things [aſſerted by] the paſt Writers of the Catholick Church. And it hath continued to theſe very times, wherein Your Piety hath received the power of Ruling the World from God the Father by God and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. But [theſe] wretched men, endewed with an unhappy * Senſe, have again by a temerarious attempt proclaimed themſelves the ſetters forth of impious Doctrine: and even now they endeavour to ſhake what had been founded in reaſon. For when the Letters of Your Piety ordered that the Faith ſhould be Treated of, there was propoſed to us by the forenamed diſturbers of the Churches (Germinius, Auxentius, and Caius having joyned themſelves to them,) a new [Creed] to be conſidered of, which contained much perverſe Doctrine. But when the Creed they propoſed publickly in the Council ſeemed to diſpleaſe, their ſentiments were that it was to be drawn up otherwiſe. And it is manifeſt, that they [p] have in a ſhort time often altered theſe things. But leſt the Churches ſhould be frequently diſturbed, we have determined that the ancient ſanctions ought to be kept ratified and inviolable; and that the forementioned perſons ſhould be removed from our communion. In order therefore to the informing of Your Clemency, we have directed our Legates, who by our Letter will declare the opinion of the Council. To whom we have given this particular only in charge, that they ſhould diſpatch their Embaſſie no otherwiſe, than that the ancient Sanctions may continue firm and inviolable: as alſo that Your Wiſdom might know, that peace cannot be accompliſhed by this which the forenamed Valens, Urſacius, Germinius, and Caius have promiſed, if any thing had been * altered. For how can peace be kept by thoſe who ſubvert peace? For all Regions, and eſpecially the Roman Church hath been involved in greater diſturbances. Upon which account we beſeech Your Clemency, that You would hear and look upon all our Legates with favourable ears, and a ſerene countenance: [q] and that Your Clemency would not permit any thing to be reverſed to the injury of the Ancients, but that all things may continue which we have received from our Anceſtours, who (we are confident) were prudent perſons, and acted not without the holy Spirit of God. Becauſe, not only the believing Populace are diſquieted by that novelty, but alſo Infidels are prohibited from making their approaches to a [r] credulity. We alſo entreat, that You would give order, that as many Biſhops as are deteined at Ariminum (amongſt which there are many that are enfeebled with age and poverty,) may return to their Province; leſt the Populace of the Churches ſuffer dammage by being deſtitute of their Biſhops. But we do with more earneſtneſs petition for this, that no innovation may be made, nothing may be diminiſhed; but that theſe things may remain uncorrupted which have continued in the times of the Father of Your holy Piety, and in Your own Religious days. And, that Your holy Prudence would not ſuffer us to be wearied out, and raviſht from our Sees: but that the Biſhops with their Laity, free from diſquietude, may always attend the [putting up their] Petitions, which they * make for Your health, for Your Empire, and for peace, which may the Divinity grant You to be profound and perpetual, according to Your deſerts. Our Embaſſadours will bring both the ſubſcriptions and alſo the names of the Biſhops or Legates; as they will inform Your [s] holy and Religious Prudence by another writing.

Thus wrote the Synod, and ſent it by the Biſhops. But Urſacius and Valens having prevented their Arrival, did before-hand calumniate the Synod, ſhewing [the Emperour] the Draught of the Creed, which they had brought along with them. The Emperour, whoſe mind had been long ſince wholly addicted to the Arian opinion, was highly incenſed againſt the Synod: but had a great eſteem and honour for Valens and Urſacius. Wherefore, the perſons ſent by the Synod ſtaied a long while, being unable to get an [m] Theſe words have no very good coherence with the preceding ſentence. I conjecture that this place was tranſpoſed in the Latine Copies. Therefore, next theſe words [a paſſage would be opened to the poiſons of Hereticks,] thoſe, in my judgment, are to be placed, which follow a little after; in this manner: Conſtantine being preſent in this [Conſult,] in regard, after a ſearching diſquiſition, &c. unto theſe words [our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.] To which are to be ſubjoyned theſe [Therefore Urſacius and Valens, &c.] Valeſ.

[n] At chap. 20 of this book, note (a) we have remarkt many things concerning this firſt Synod of Millaine, wherein Urſacius, and Valens having preſented a Libel of ſatisfaction, condemned the Arian Hereſie. The ſaid perſons confirm the ſame in another Libel, which they preſented afterwards to Julius Biſhop of Rome, at Rome; in theſe words: Haereticum vero Arium &c. ſicut per priorem noſtrum Libellum, quem apud Mediolanum porreximus, & nunc & ſemper anathematizaſſe profitemur. Valeſ.

† Maimings.

[p] Theſe words are ſpoken againſt Urſacius and Valens, and their followers; who daily promulged new forms of the Creed, hereby demonſtrating that they had no certain Faith; as Athanaſius frequently objects againſt them. Valeſ.

[q] Here I followed the Greek Tranſlatour of this Epiſtle; and corrected the Latine Copy. For in Hilarius's Fragments, the common reading of this place is this [Ne vel permittat Clementia tua jura vetera convelli, that Your Clemency would not permit the ancient Laws to be reverſed.] In the M. S. Copy, which Sirmondus had ſeen, the reading is [ne vel aliquid permittat clementia tua injuriam veterum convelli.] Whence we ſmelt out the true reading, which we have expreſt in our Verſion. Valeſ.

[r] Here the Greek tranſlatour was grievouſly out; for inſtead of credulity he has rendred it cruelty. Valeſ.

[s] The Greek Tranſlatour of this Letter makes uſe of the term Θεότης, Divinity, here: but in Athanaſius 'tis ὁσιότης, Sanctity. It is improbable that the Biſhops ſhould have ſaid, The Divinity of the Emperour. Valeſ.

CONSTANTIUS.

an answer. But at length the Emperour wrote back to the Synod by those that were present, after this manner.

[t] This Letter of Constantius's, together with the answer of the Bishops at Ariminum, is extant in Athanasius's book de Synodis, near the close of it. Vales.

[t] CONSTANTIUS VICTOR and TRIUMPHATOR AUGUSTUS, to all the Bishops convened at Ariminum.

That our Chiefest care is always employed about the Divine and venerable Law, even your goodness is not ignorant. Notwithstanding, We could not hitherto see the twenty Bishops sent from your Prudence, who undertook the dispatch of the Embassie from you. For we are wholly intent upon an expedition against the Barbarians. And, as you know, 'tis fit that a mind exercised about the Divine Law, should be vacated from all care and sollicitude. Wherefore We have ordered the Bishops to expect Our return to Adrianople, that, after the publick affairs shall be put into a good and settled posture, we may at length hear and deliberate upon what they shall propose. In the interim, let it not seem troublesome to your gravity to wait for their return, in regard, when they shall come back and bring You our answer, you will be enabled to bring to a conclusion such things as appertain to the utility of the Catholick Church. When the Bishops had received this Letter, they returned an answer, after this manner.

We have received Your Clemencies Letter, (Lord Emperour Most dear to God!) wherein is conteined, that by reason of the pressing necessity of publick businesse, You could not hitherto see our Embassadours. And You order us to expect their return, till such time as Your Piety shall understand from them what hath been determined by us agreeable to [the tradition of] our Ancestours. But we do by this Letter profess and affirm, that we do in no wise recede from our resolution. And this we have given in charge to our Embassadours. We desire therefore, that with a serene countenance You would both order this present Letter of our Meanness to be read; and also gratiously admit of those things which we have given in charge to our Embassadours. Undoubtedly, Your mildness, as well as we, doth perceive, how great the grief and sadness at present is [every where,] in regard so many Churches are destitute of their Bishops in these most blessed times of Yours. And therefore, we again beseech Your Clemency, (Lord Emperour Most dear to God!) that before the sharpness of winter (if it may please Your Piety,) You would command us to return to our Churches, in order to our being enabled to * put up our usual prayers together with the people, to Almighty God, and to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son, in behalf of Your Empire, in such manner as we have always done, and now most earnestly desire to do.

* Or, perform.

After they had written this Letter, and continued together some small time; in regard the Emperour would not vouchsafe them an answer, they departed every one to his own City. But the Emperour had long before had a designe of disseminating the Arian opinion throughout the Churches. Which he then earnestly endeavouring to effect, made their departure a pretext of Contumely, saying that he was despised by them, in regard they had dissolved [the Council] contrary to his will. Wherefore, he gave Ursacius's party free liberty of doing what they pleased against the Churches. He also commanded, that that Draught of the Creed which had been read at Ariminum, should be sent to the Churches throughout Italy, giving order that such as would not subscribe it, should be put out of the Churches, and others substituted in their places. And in the first place [u] Liberius Bishop of Rome, having refused to give his consent to that Creed, is banished, the * Ursacians having substituted Felix in his place. This Felix being a Deacon in the Church of Rome, [x] embraced the Arian opinion, and was preferred to that Bishoprick. But there are some who affirm, that he was not addicted to the Arian opinion, but was by force necessitated to be ordained Bishop. At that time there all places in the West were filled with innovations and disturbances, some being ejected and banished, and others put into their places. And these things were transacted by force, and the authority of the Imperial Edicts, which were also sent into the Eastern parts. Indeed, not long after Liberius was recalled from banishment and recovered his own See; the people of Rome having raised a Sedition, and ejected Felix out of that Church: at which time the Emperour gave them his consent thereto against his will. But the Ursacians left Italy, went into the Eastern parts, and arrived at a City of Thracia, the name whereof was Nice. Wherein after they had continued some small time, they made up [y] another Synod there. And having translated that form of the Creed, read at Ariminum, into the Greek tongue, (as it has been before related,) they published and confirmed it, giving out that that Creed, which was made publick by them at Nice, had been dictated by an Oecumenicall Synod; their design being to impose upon the simpler sort of people by the likeness of the [Cities] name. For such persons were ready to think that it was the Creed published at Nicæa a City of Bithynia. But this cheat was not at all advantagious to them: for it was soon detected; and they themselves continued to be exposed to the reproach and laughter of all men. Let thus much be said concerning what was transacted in the Western parts. We must now pass to the relation of what was done at the same time in the East. And our Narrative must begin from hence.

CONSTANTIUS.

[u] Socrates is here mistaken. For Liberius was not banished, and Felix the Deacon put into his See, after the Synod of Ariminam; but long before, in the year of Christ, 356. Vales.

* That is, Ursacius's party.

[x] In the Kings M.S. (which copy Robert Stephens followed,) and in Robert Stephens's Edition, there are several words wanting in the text at this place: we have made up this chasme from the Florentine and Sforzian M.SS. after this manner [ἐν τῇ Δεκαυῶν δόξῃ παρατεθεὶς, εἰς τὸ Ἐπισκοπὴν παρελήφθη· εἰσὶ δὲ οἱ λέγοντες, ὅπως παρεσκευάσθη μὴ τῇ Δεκαυῶν δόξῃ, ᾗ i.e. embraced the Arian opinion, and was preferred to that Bishoprick. But there are some who affirm, that he was not addicted to the Arian opinion, but was by force.]

Moreover, Baronius maintaines, that Felix the Deacon, preferred by Acacius to Liberius's See, never was an Arian, but was defiled with the communion only of the Arians. Theodoret affirms the same, in the second book chap. 17. of his Eccles Hist. And so does Sozomen book 4. chap. 11. Vales.

[y] The Embassadours of the Synod of Ariminum (who were sent to Constantius,) having been corrupted by Ursacius and Valens, held a Council at Nice a Town of Thracia, on the sixth of the Ides of October, in the Consulate of Eusebius and Hypatius. In which Council they in the first place rescinded the sentence of Excommunication, which the Ariminum Bishops had pronounced against Ursacius, Valens, and the rest: and pronounced them to be, and always to have been Catholicks. Then, they published an Hæretical Form of the Creed. Part of their Acts are extant in Hillarius's Fragments, pag. 452, &c. where are recounted 14 names of those that were Embassadours. Vales.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Concerning the Cruelty of Macedonius, and the Tumults by him raised.

THe Bishops of the Arian party assumed a greater degree of boldness from the Imperial Edicts. And upon what account they attempted to convene a Synod, we will relate a little afterwards. But we will first briefly recite those

CONSTANTIUS.

thoſe things done by them before the Synod Acacius and Patrophilus having ejected Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem, placed Cyrillus in his See. Macedonius ſubverted the Provinces and Cities [a] lying near to Conſtantinople, preferring thoſe that were embarqued in the ſame wicked deſign with him againſt the Churches. He ordained Eleuſius Biſhop of Cyzicum; and Marathonius Biſhop of Nicomedia, who had before been a Deacon, placed under Macedonius: he was alſo very diligent in founding Monaſteries of men and women. But after what manner Macedonius ſubverted the Provinces and Cities which lay round Conſtantinople, we are now to declare. This perſon therefore, having poſſeſt himſelf of the Biſhoprick in ſuch a manner as is * before related, did innumerable miſchiefs to thoſe who would not entertain the ſame ſentiments with him. Nor did he perſecute thoſe only who were diſcerned [to be members] of the Church, but the Novatians alſo, knowing that they alſo embraced the Homoöuſian Faith. Theſe therefore were together with the others diſquieted, undergoing moſt deplorable ſufferings. † Their Biſhop, by name Agelius, made his eſcape by flight: But many of them, eminent for their piety, were taken, and tortured, becauſe they would not communicate with him. And after their tortures, they forcibly conſtrained the men to partake of the holy * myſteries. For they wreſted their mouthes open with a piece of wood, and thruſt the Sacrament into them. Such perſons as underwent this uſage, looked upon it to be a puniſhment far exceeding all other tortures. Moreover, they ſnatcht up the women and children, and forced them to be initiated [by Baptiſm.] And if any one refuſed, or otherwiſe ſpoke againſt this, ſtripes immediately followed, and after ſtripes bonds, impriſonments, and other accute tortures. One or two [inſtances] whereof I will mention, that I may render the hearers ſenſible of the apparent barbarity and cruelty of Macedonius and thoſe perſons who were then in power. They ſqueezed the breaſts of thoſe women who refuſed to be communicants with them in the Sacrament, between [the doors of] † Preſſes, and cut them off with a Saw. They burnt the ſame members of other women, partly with iron, and partly with eggs exceedingly heated in the fire. This new ſort of torture, which even the Heathens never uſed towards us, was invented by thoſe who profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians. Theſe things I heard from the long-liv'd Auxano, of whom I have made mention in the firſt Book. He was a Presbyter in the Church of the Novatians. And he reported that he himſelf indured not a few miſeries [inflicted upon him] by the Arians, before he received the dignity of a Presbyter. For he ſaid that he was caſt into Priſon together with Alexander Paphlagon, (who with him led a monaſtick life,) and ſuſtained innumerable ſtripes. Which tortures [as he related] he was enabled to indure: but Alexander died in Priſon by reaſon of his ſtripes. His Sepulchre is now [to be ſeen,] on the right hand as you ſail into the Byzantine Bay, which is named [b] Ceras, near the Rivers: where there is a Church of the Novatians, which bears Alexanders name. Moreover, the Arians, by Macedonius's order, demoliſhed many other Churches in divers Cities; as alſo a Church of the Novatians, ſcituate in Conſtantinople near Pelargus. Why I have made particular mention of this Church, I will here declare, as I heard it from the very aged [c] Auxano. The Emperours Edict and Macedonius's violence gave order for the demoliſhing of their Churches who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion. This Edict and Violence * threatned this Church alſo with ruine, and they were at hand, to whom the execution hereof was committed. I cannot chooſe but admire, when I reflect upon the great zeal and earneſtneſs of the Novatians towards their Church, and the kindneſs which they had for thoſe perſons, who at that time were ejected out of the Church by the Arians, but do now peaceably and quietly enjoy their Churches! When therefore they, to whom the execution hereof was enjoyned, were urgent to demoliſh this Church alſo, a great multitude of people that were Novatians, and others who embraced the ſame ſentiments with them, flock't together thither. And when they had pulled down their Church, they conveyed it to another place. This place is ſcituate over againſt the City [Conſtantinople;] the name of it is Sycæ, and 'tis the thirteenth Ward of the City. Moreover, the removal of the Church was performed in a very ſhort time, it being carried away by a numerous multitude of people with an incredible alacrity of mind. For one carried Tiles; another Stones; a third Timber. Some took up one thing, ſome another, and carried it to Sycæ. Yea, the very women and little children aſſiſted in this buſineſs, looking upon it as an accompliſhment of their deſires, and eſteeming it as a great gain, that they were vouchſafed to be pure and faithful preſervers of the things conſecrated to God. In this manner therefore was the Church of the Novatians at that time removed to Sycæ. But afterwards, when Conſtantius was dead, the Emperour Julian ordered the place to be reſtored to them, and permitted them to rebuild their Church. At which time

[a] This place is in an eſpecial manner to be taken notice of. For from it we conclude, that the Biſhop of Conſtantinople had even then a right of ordaining throughout Helleſpont and Bithynia, before the Council of Conſtantinople [was held.] The ſame is confirmed from the Acts of Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, who made Eunomius Biſhop of Cyzicum. Indeed, the Biſhops of Byzantium had a very great addition of authority and power, from the time that the Emperour Conſtantine gave that City his own name, and ordered it ſhould be equal to the Senior Rome. Alſo, Euſebius of Nicomedia, after his tranſlation to that See, brought no ſmall increaſe [of juriſdiction] to it. For he was the moſt potent Prelate of his own times. Further, the Reader is to take notice, that the reading ſhould be [τὰς γειτνιαζούσας τῇ Κωνσταντινουπόλει, lying near to Conſtantinople;] ſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus reads it. Unleſs we ſhould ſay, that the words are tranſpoſed here, (as it frequently happens in theſe books,) and that the place is thus to be conſtrued [Μακεδόνιος δὲ ἐν Κωνσταντινουπόλει τὰς γειτνιαζούσας ἐπαρχίας, &c. Macedonius in Conſtantinople ſubverted the neighbouring Provinces, &c. But Pliny calls a promontory by this name, ſcituated in that Bay. To whom agrees Amm. Marcellinus, book 22. pag. 212. *Edit. It was the uſage of the ancients to name the winds from thoſe places whence they blew. Thus, the Athenians called the North-weſt wind Scironites, becauſe it blew from the promontory Sciron; as Strabo relates. After the ſame manner therefore, that wind was by the Conſtantinopolitans called Ceratas, which blew from the promontory Ceras. Valeſ.

[c] In the Allat. M. S. and in Epiphanius Scholaſticus, this old man is called Auxonius. But at the beginning of this chapter, and in Socrates's firſt book, he is named Auxano. From this Auxano Socrates ſeems to me to have had all the ſtories throughout his Hiſtory, which he relates concerning the Novatians, of whom he tells very many. Valeſ.

time the people, in the same manner as before, carried the materialls back again, and built the Church in its former place: and having made it more beautifull and stately, they would have it called * Anastasia, a name apposite and significative. This Church therefore was afterwards erected again, as I said, in the Reign of Julian. But then both parties, as well the Catholicks as the Novatians, were after the same manner persecuted. Wherefore the Catholicks abhorred to [d] pray in those Oratories, wherein the Arians assembled themselves. But, in the other three Churches (for so many Oratories the Novatians had within the City [Constantinople]) the Catholicks assembled with them, and prayed together. And there wanted but little of their being entirely united, had not the Novatians, who observed their old injunction, refused to do that. But as to other matters, they preserved such a singular benevolence and kindness mutually, that they * were ready to die for one another. Therefore both parties were at the same time persecuted, not only in the City Constantinople, but in other Provinces and Cities also. For in Cyzicum, Eleusius the Bishop there did the same things against the Christians that were acted by Macedonius, putting them to flight and disquieting them every where. He also totally demolished the Church of the Novatians at Cyzicum. But Macedonius finished the enormous Villanies he had perpetrated, after this manner. Being informed that in the Province of Paphlagonia, and especially at Mantinium, there were very many persons of the Novatian Sect, and perceiving that so great a multitude could not be driven [from their habitations] by Eccleſiastick persons, he procured four * Companies of Souldiers to be by the Emperours order sent into Paphlagonia, that being terrified by those armed men, they might be induced to embrace the Arian opinion. But they who inhabited Mantinium, out of a zeal to [defend] their Sect, made use of desperation against the Souldiers. And many of them getting together in one Body, and providing themselves with long Hooks and Hatchets, and whatever weapon they could lay hands on, they Marched out to meet the Souldiers. An Engagement therefore hapning, many of the Paphlagonians were therein slain: but all the Souldiers (except a very few) were cut off. This I heard from a Country man of Paphlagonia, who said he was present at that action. But many other Paphlagonians do affirm the same. Of this sort were Macedonius's brave exploits in defence of Christianity, [to wit,] Murders, Fights, Captivities, and intestine Wars. But these practises of Macedonius's raised a deserved † Odium against him, not only amongst those he had injured, but amongst them also who were his adherents. Yea, the Emperour himself was offended at him, both upon this account, and also for another reason, which was this. The Church, wherein lay the Coffin that contained the body of the Emperour Constantine, was threatned with Ruine. [e] Wherefore for this reason, as well they who had entred that Church, as those that continued in it and prayed, were in a great fear. Macedonius therefore resolved to remove the Emperours bones, that the coffin might not be [f] spoiled by the ruine [of the Church.] The people understanding this, attempted to hinder it, saying that the Emperours bones ought not to be removed; in regard that would be the same, as if they were dug up again. Immediately the people were divided into two parties. The one affirmed, that no hurt could be done to the dead body by its being removed: the other side asserted it to be an impious thing. Those of the Homoousian opinion met together also, and opposed the doing hereof. But Macedonius, disregarding those that resisted him, removes the body of the Emperour into that Church, wherein lies Acacius the Martyr's body. This being done, the multitude, divided into two parties, ran forthwith to that Church: and when the two Factions were drawn up against each other, immediately an engagement followed: Wherein so great a number of men were slain, that that Church-yard was full of bloud; [g] and the Well therein overflowed with bloud, which ran even into the adjacent Portico, and from thence into the very street. The Emperour, informed of this calamitous accident, was incensed against Macedonius, both upon account of those that were slain, and also because he had been so audacious as to remove his Fathers body without his consent. Having therefore left Julianus the Cæsar to take care of the Western parts of the Empire, he himself went into the East. But, how Macedonius was soon after this deposed, and underwent a punishment short of his enormous impieties, I will relate a little afterwards.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Concerning the Synod at Seleucia [a city] of Isauria.

But at present, I must give an account of the other Synod, which by the Emperours Edict was to emulate that at Ariminum in the East. At first it was determined, that the Bishops should be convened at Nicomedia in Bithynia. But, a great earthquake, whereby the City Nicomedia hapned to be ruined hindred their being convened at that place. This hapned in the Consulate

* That is, the Resurrection, a fit name; in regard it rose again, as it were, in the same place it stood in before.

[d] Instead of [ἔχεσθαι] the reading must undoubtedly be [εὔχεσθαι, to pray;] which I wonder Christophorson did not perceive. Further, what Socrates relates here, to wit, that the Catholicks prayed in the Churches of the Novatians, seems to me incredible. Our Socrates was, in my judgment imposed upon by old Auxano, who fixed that upon all the Catholicks, which was perhaps done by some few Christians, who were less cautious. For there is nothing more contrary to Ecclesiastick discipline, than to communicate with Hereticks, either in the sacraments, or in prayer. But in my opinion they are mistaken, who from this relation do conclude Socrates to have been a Novatian: yea, it is evidently manifest from this place, that he was a Catholick. For in this chapter he frequently terms the Catholicks, τοὺς τῆς ἐκκλησίας, those of the Church; and opposes them to the Novatians. Therefore he looks upon the Novatians to be without the Church. Vales.

[e] The amendment of this place is to be acknowledged as due to the Allatian M. S. wherein 'tis thus written [ὅπου ἂν δια τοῦτο ὅτε εἰσπορεύονται οἱ ἀφεστεδρεύοντες καὶ εὐχόμενοι, &c. Wherefore for this reason, as well they who had entred that Church, as those that continued in it and prayed, &c.] For in the Florent. and Sfortian M. S. this place is enlarged but by one word only, thus [ὅπου ἂν διὰ τοῦτο ὅτε ἀφεστεδρεύοντες, &c. Wherefore for this reason they who presided over, &c.] But this Chasme is made up by the Allat. M. S. to which agrees Epiphan. Scholasticus's Version. But his rendring [ἀφεστεδρεύοντες, Custodes, Keepers] I like not, I should rather translate the term thus, those that made their abode for some time in the Church, upon account of praying there. Vales.

[f] In the Sfortian M. S. the reading is [συληθῇ, spoiled, which I think to be better than [συλληφθῇ, comprehended, or contained.] Vales.

[g] I made good this place from the incomparable Allat. M. S. Our other M. SS. make no alteration here: but when I perceived the vulgar reading (which is this, ἐγένετο δὲ τοῦτο καὶ εἰς τὸν ἐγκάρσιον σηκὸν, ἄχει παλαίας αὐτῆς, i. e. and it ran to the adjacent Porch, even to the street) to be wholly uncouth, I was not scrupulous of admitting the reading of the Allat. M. S. which is this [καὶ τὸ ἐν αὐτῇ φρέαρ ὑπερέλυσε τὸ αἷμα Θ, ἐκρεῖν δὲ τοῦτο καὶ, &c. and the Well therein overflowed with bloud, which ran even into, &c.] Socrates says, there was so great a slaughter of men, that the Church-yard of Saint Acacius was filled with mans bloud, and the Well therein overflowed with bloud, in such sort that it ran into the neighbouring Porch, and from thence into the Street. Vales.

CONSTANTIUS.

Conſulate of [a] Dacianus and Cerealis, about the eight and twentieth day of the month Auguſt. They reſolved therefore upon removing the Synod to the City Nicæa which was near to it. But this reſolution was again altered: and it ſeemed [more convenient] to meet at Tarſus a City of Cilicia. When this diſpleaſed them alſo, they were aſſembled at Seleucia [a City] of Iſauria, which is ſurnamed Aſpera. This they did on the [b] ſame year [whereon the Ariminum Council was held,] in the Conſulate of Euſebius and Hypatius. The perſons convened were in number an hundred and ſixty. There was preſent with them a perſonage eminent in the Imperial pallace, his name [c] Leonas; in whoſe preſence, as the Emperour had given order by his Edict, the diſquiſition about the Faith was to be propoſed. Lauricius alſo the Commander in chief of the Souldiers throughout Iſauria, was ordered to be there, to provide the Biſhops with what neceſſaries they might ſtand in need of. At this place therefore [the Biſhops] were convened in the preſence of theſe perſons, on the twenty ſeventh of the month September, and began to diſpute about making of publick Acts. For there were Notaries preſent alſo, who were to take in writing what was ſpoken by every one of them. A particular account of all matters then tranſacted, the ſtudious Readers may find in Sabinus's Collection, where they are ſet forth at large. But we ſhall only curſorily relate the chief heads thereof. On the firſt day of their being convened, Leonas ordered every one to propoſe what they would. But ſuch as were preſent ſaid, that no diſpute ought to be raiſed, before the perſons abſent were come. For theſe Biſhops were wanting, Macedonius of Conſtantinople, Baſilius of Ancyra, and ſome others, who ſuſpected they ſhould be accuſed. Macedonius excuſed his abſence by ſaying he was ſick. Patrophilus affirmed he had a diſtemper in his eyes, and was therefore neceſſitated to continue in the Suburbs of Seleucia. All the reſt propoſed one occaſion or other of their being abſent. But, in regard Leonas ſaid, that, notwithſtanding the abſence of theſe perſons, the queſtion was to be propoſed; thoſe that were preſent made anſwer again, that they would in no wiſe enter into any debate, before the * Moralls of thoſe accuſed were inquired into. For Cyrillus of Jeruſalem, Euſtathius of Sebaſtia in Armenia, and ſome others had been accuſed ſome time before. Hereupon aroſe a ſharp conteſt amongſt thoſe that were preſent. For ſome affirmed, that the Moralls of ſuch as had been accuſed were in the firſt place to be lookt into: others were of opinion, that no controverſie ought to be diſcuſſed before [that concerning] the Faith. This Conteſt was raiſed by the different opinion of the Emperour. For his Letter was produced, in one paſſage whereof he gave order for the debating of this matter in the firſt place, in another for that. A diſagreement therefore hapning concerning this matter, a Schiſm was made amongſt the perſons preſent. And this was the original cauſe of the Seleucian-Synods being divided into two parties. The one faction was headed by Acacius [Biſhop] of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, Georgius of Alexandria, Uranius of Tyre, and Eudoxius of Antioch: of the ſame mind with whom there were only two and thirty other [Biſhops.] The principal perſons of the other faction were Georgius of Laodicea in Syria, Sophronius of Pompeiopolis in Paphlagonia, and Eleuſius of Cyzicum; who were followed by the major part. When therefore that ſide prevailed which was for debating in the firſt place concerning the Faith, Acacius's party manifeſtly rejected the Nicene Creed, and intimated the publication of another. But thoſe of the other faction, who were ſuperiour in number, approved of all other matters [determined] in the Nicene Synod; excepting only the term Homoöuſios, which they found fault with. Therefore, after a very ſharp conteſt amongſt one another untill Evening, at length Silvanus (who preſided over the Church at Tarſus) ſpake a loud, ſaying, there was no neceſſity of publiſhing a new Draught of the Creed, but that they ought rather to confirm that ſet forth at Antioch, at the conſecration of the Church. When he had ſaid this, Acacius's party ſecretly withdrew [out of the Council:] but the other faction produced the Creed [compoſed] at Antioch, after the reading whereof the Council broke up for that day. On the next day they met in a Church in Seleucia, and having ſhut the doors, they read that Creed, and confirmed it by their ſubſcriptions. Inſtead of ſome [Biſhops] who were abſent, the Readers and Deacons there preſent ſubſcribed, by whom the abſent perſons had profeſſed, that they would acquieſs in that Draught [of the Creed.]

CONSTANTIUS. * Olives.

[a] This perſons name ſhould not be Tatianus, but Dacianus. For ſo he is called in the Faſti Conſulares, and in Ammianus Marcellinus. This man was one of Libanius's chiefeſt friends; to whom Libanius wrote very many of his Epiſtles, which are extant in the fourth book of his Epiſtles. In the 71 Epiſtle of that book he mentions his Conſulate, and ſays he was Schollar to one of the Emperours, and Maſter to the other: his words are theſe: τὸ δὲ σὸν ἀξίωμα τε καὶ κρεῖττον ἢ σβεσθῆναι, &c. i. e. But your actions are illuſtrious, and better than that they ſhould be extinguiſhed. For your Conſulate, and the honours beſtowed upon you by the Emperours, and your having been one of the Emperours Schollars, and the others Maſter: Moreover, the ſtatelineſs, of your houſes, and the numerouſneſs, largeneſs, and handſomeneſs of your Bathes: all theſe things will for ever retain your name, although your body does depart. In the 146 Epiſtle of the ſame book, there is extant this Elogue of Datianus: τὸ γὰρ τοσαῦτα καὶ τηλικαῦτα ἀνδρὸς ἔργα, &c. For, to hear ſuch and ſo many brave exploits of a perſon, who has erected ſo many Kingdoms, and has been beneficial to ſo many men, nor has ever hurt any body, who is eminent for prudence, and has filled the Earth and Sea with the Glory of his name; is, to a man of diſcretion greater than all preſent or future wealth. And, at the cloſe of the ſame Epiſtle, he intimates, that the ſame Datianus had a Seat at Conſtantinople; and that in Antioch and the ſuburbs thereof, he had Houſes and Palaces beautified with Fountaines and Bathes; to take a view whereof he invites him. Valeſ.

[b] At this place occurs no trivial difficulty. For the deſtruction of the City Nicomedia hapned when Datianus and Cerealis were Conſuls, in the year of Chriſt 358, on the month of Auguſt. But the Councill of Seleucia was held on the year following, in the Conſulate of Euſebius and Hypatius, in the month of September. Theſe things therefore hapned not in one and the ſame year. Wherefore it ſeemeth, that the reading at this place ſhould be [τῷ ἐχομένῳ ἐνιαυτῷ, on the year following.] Or, if the common reading muſt be retained, we muſt underſtand our Authours meaning to be, that the Councill of Biſhops at Seleucia was held on the ſame year with the Ariminum Council. Valeſ.

[c] This Leonas was Queſtor of the ſacred Palace: and Lauricius was Comes of Iſauria, as Ammianus Marcellinus doth atteſt. Valeſ.

CHAP. XL.

That Acacius [Biſhop] of Cæſarea dictated another Draught of the Creed, in the Synod at Seleucia.

But Acacius, and thoſe of his party found fault with what was done, becauſe they had ſubſcribed covertly when the Church-doors were ſhut. For matters, ſaid he, tranſacted in ſecret were naught, and to be ſuſpected. He made theſe objections, becauſe he was deſirous of publiſhing another Draught of the Creed inſtead of that [ſubſcribed by them,] which [form] he had about him, ready drawn up, and had before recited it to Lauricius and Leonas the Governours: and he made it his whole buſineſs to get that Draught only eſtabliſhed and confirmed. Theſe were the tranſactions of the ſecond day, when nothing elſe was done. On the third day, day, Leonas was again very earneſt to procure a meeting of both parties. At which time neither Macedonius of Conſtantinople, nor Baſilius of Ancyra were abſent. When therefore both theſe perſons had joyned themſelves to one and the ſame faction, the Acacians were again unwilling to meet, ſaying, that as well thoſe who had before been depoſed, as them at preſent accuſed, ought in the firſt place to be put out of the aſſembly. After a great conteſt on both ſides, at length this opinion was prevalent, the perſons charged with an accuſation went out; and the Acacians came in. Then Leonas ſaid, that Acacius had delivered a Libell to him; [Leonas] not diſcovering it to be a Draught of the Creed, which in ſome paſſages ſecretly, in others openly contradicted the former. When ſilence was made amongſt thoſe that were preſent, (they ſuppoſing the Libel to contain any thing elſe, rather than a form of the Creed;) Acacius's compoſure of the Creed with a Preface thereto was then recited, the Contents whereof are theſe.

We having met together at Seleucia [a City] of Iſauria (according to the Emperours Command) yeſterday, which was before the fifth of the Calends of October, uſed our utmoſt endeavour with all modeſty to preſerve the peace of the Church, ſtedfaſtly to determine concerning the Faith (as our Emperour Conſtantius moſt dear to God hath ordered) according to the Prophetick and Evangelick expreſſions, and to introduce nothing into the Eccleſiaſtick Faith contrary to the Divine Scriptures. But in regard certain perſons in the Synod have injured ſome of us; have ſtopt the mouths of others, not permitting them to ſpeak: have excluded other ſome againſt their wills: have brought along with them out of divers Provinces perſons depoſed; and have in their company ſuch as have been ordained contrary to the Canon [of the Church:] in ſo much that the Synod is on all ſides filled with tumult, [a] of which the moſt eminent Lauricius preſident of the Province, and the moſt Illuſtrious Leonas the Comes, have been eye-witneſſes: upon this account we interpoſe theſe things. Not that we forſake the Authentick Faith publiſhed at the Conſecration at Antioch, but we give that the preference, eſpecially in regard our Fathers concurred about the propoſition at that time in controverſie. But whereas the terms Homoöuſion and * Homoiöuſion have in times paſt diſturbed very many, and do ſtill diſquiet them: and moreover, whereas 'tis ſaid that there is an innovation lately coyned by ſome, who aſſert a diſſimilitude of the Son to the Father. Upon this account we reject Homoöuſion and Homoiöuſion, as being terms not to be met with in the Scriptures; but we anathematize the term † Anomoion: and do look upon all ſuch, as are aſſertours thereof, to be perſons alienated from the Church. But we do manifeſtly profeſs the likeneſs of the Son to the Father, agreeable to the Apoſtle, that hath ſaid concerning the Son, || Who is the image of the inviſible God.

We acknowledge therefore, and believe in one God, the Father Almighty: the maker of heaven and earth, of things viſible and inviſible. Moreover, We believe in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, his Son, begotten of him without any paſſion before all ages, God the Word, the only begotten of God, the Light, the Life, the Truth, the Wiſedom: by whom all things were made, which are in the heavens, and which are on the earth, whether viſible or inviſible. We believe him to have aſſumed fleſh from the holy Virgin Mary, at the conſummation of ages, in order to the abolition of ſin: and that he was made man, that he ſuffered for our ſins, and roſe again, and was taken up into the Heavens, and ſitteth at the right hand of the Father: and that he ſhall come again in Glory to judge the quick and dead. We believe alſo in the holy Ghoſt, whom our Lord and Saviour hath termed The Paraclete, having promiſed, after his departure, to ſend him to his diſciples, and he ſent him. By whom alſo he ſanctifies [all] *Believers in the Church, who are Baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghoſt. [b] This word [νομίζομεν, we look upon, or account] is wanting in our M. SS. It was firſt inſerted by the publiſhers of the Geneva Edition, from Chriſtophorſons Verſion. But in regard we found not this reading in any Manuſcript Copy, we took the boldneſs to expunge it. In Epiphanius, (in Hæreſ. Semiarian, pag. 872.) and in Athanaſius (in his book de Synod. Arimini & Seleuciæ;) the reading of this place is thus [ἀλλοτρίους ὄντας ἢ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, The Catholick Church hath determined them to be alienated [from it.] I found the ſame reading in the Allat. M. S. After theſe words there follow (in Epiphanius) the names of thoſe Biſhops, who ſubſcribed this Draught of the Creed; being in number about fourty. But before thoſe ſubſcriptions, ſomething is added there, which deſerves to be ſet down here. The words therefore in Dionyſius Petavius's Edition are theſe: ὅτι δὲ τῷ τῇ πίστει ἰσοδυναμεῖ καὶ ἡ ἐν σιρμίῳ πρώην ἐκτεθεῖσα πίστις, ὅτι τῆς εὐσεβείας τοῦ βασιλέως ἡμῶν, γνωρίζουσιν οἱ ἐπυγχανόντες τῇ πίστει· i. e. now, that that Creed lately publiſhed at Sirmium, in the preſence of the piety of our Emperour, does exactly agree with this Creed, is a thing manifeſtly known to thoſe who have read that Creed. Then follows another Chapter, after this manner; ὑπέγραψαν οἱ παρόντες βασίλειος, μάρκος καὶ γεώργιος ὁ τῆς ἀλεξανδρείας ἐπίσκοπος παγκράτιος καὶ ὑπατιανὸς καὶ οἱ πλείστοι ἐπίσκοποι τῆς δύσεως; (I doubt not but the reading ſhould be ἃ ὑπέγραψαν, to which ſubſcribed.) i. e. To which they who were preſent ſubſcribed, Baſilius, Marcus, Georgius Biſhop of Alexandria, Pancratius, Hypatianus, and moſt of the Weſtern Biſhops. Valeſ.

This is the Draught of the Creed publiſhed by Acacius. The perſons who ſubſcribed it were Acacius himſelf, and ſuch as adhered to his opinion, being as many in number, as we have mentioned a little before. After the recitation hereof, Sophronius [Biſhop] of Pompeiopolis in Paphlagonia ſpake theſe words aloud: If to explain our own particular opinion every day be the expoſition of the Faith, we ſhall be deſtitute of the exact diſcuſſion of the truth. Theſe words were ſpoken by Sophronius. And I do affirm, that if as well thoſe who lived before theſe men, as they that ſucceeded them, had at firſt entertained ſuch ſentiments concerning the Nicene Creed; all contentious diſputes would have ceaſed, nor would a violent and irrational diſturbance have been prevalent in the Churches. But let ſuch as are prudent paſs their judgment concerning the ſtate of theſe matters. After they had mutually ſpoken and heard many things concerning this buſineſs, and concerning the perſons accuſed, the convention was for that time diſſolved. On the fourth day they all met again in the ſame place, and with the ſame contentiouſneſs began to diſpute again. Amongſt whom Acacius explained his opinion in theſe words: in as much as the Nicene Creed hath been once, and after that frequently, altered, nothing hinders, but a new Creed may be now publiſhed. Hereto Eleuſius [Biſhop] of Cyzicum made a return, and ſaid; the Synod is at preſent convened, not that it ſhould learn [c] what it had not the knowledge of before, nor to receive a Creed which it was not heretofore in poſſeſſion of: but that, proceeding on in the Creed of the Fathers, it ſhould never recede from it, either during life, or at the time of death. With theſe words Eleuſius oppoſed Acacius's opinion, terming that Creed publiſhed at Antioch the Fathers Creed. But any one might have anſwered him alſo, in theſe words: how is it, that you ſtile thoſe convened at Antioch the Fathers, O Eleuſius, whereas you acknowledge not their Fathers? For they who were aſſembled at Nice, and by their conſent firmed the Homoöuſian Faith, ought more properly to be termed the Fathers, both becauſe they preceded in time, and alſo in regard thoſe convened at Antioch were by them promoted to the Sacerdotal dignity. Now, if thoſe [aſſembled] at Antioch have rejected their own Fathers, they who come after them do not perceive themſelves to be followers of Parricides. Moreover, how can they have admitted their Ordination to be Legitimate, whoſe Faith they have rejected as impious? For if thoſe perſons had not the holy Ghoſt, which is infuſed by Ordination, theſe have not received the Prieſthood. For how could theſe have received [it] from them, who had it not to give? Theſe words might have been ſpoken in oppoſition to what was ſaid by Eleuſius. After this they proceeded to another queſtion. For, in regard the Acacians aſſerted in that Draught of the Creed which had been recited, that the Son was like the Father, they enquired of one another, in what reſpect the Son was like the Father. The Acacians aſſerted, that the Son was like the Father in reſpect of his Will only, not as to his Eſſence. But all the reſt maintained, [that he was like the Father] in reſpect of his Eſſence alſo. They ſpent the whole day in their altercations about this query; and they confuted Acacius, becauſe in the books by him compoſed and publiſhed, he had aſſerted that the Son is in all things like the Father. And how can you (ſaid they) now deny the likeneſs of the Son to the Father as to his Eſſence? Acacius made this anſwer, no modern or ancient Authour was ever condemned out of his own writings. When they had maintained a tedious, fierce, and ſubtle diſpute againſt one another concerning this queſtion, and could in no wiſe be brought to an agreement, Leonas aroſe, and diſſolved the Council. And this was the concluſion, which the Synod held at Seleucia had. For on the day after, Leonas being intreated, refuſed to come any more into the Congreſs, ſaying that he had been ſent by the Emperour, to be preſent at an unanimous Synod. But in regard ſome of you do diſagree, I cannot (ſaid he) be there; go therefore and prate in the Church. The Acacians looking upon what had been done to be a great advantage to them, refuſed to meet alſo. But thoſe of the other party met together in the Church, and ſent for the Acacians, that cognizance might be taken of the Caſe of Cyrillus Biſhop of Jeruſalem. For you muſt know that Cyrillus had been accuſed before; upon what account, I cannot tell. But he was depoſed, becauſe having been frequently ſummoned in order to the examination of his cauſe, he had not made his appearance during the ſpace of two whole years. Nevertheleſs when he was depoſed, he ſent an Appellatory Libel to them who had depoſed him, and appealed to an higher Court of Judicature. To which appeal of his the Emperour Conſtantius gave his aſſent. Indeed, Cyrillus was the [d] firſt and only perſon, who (contrary to the uſage of the Eccleſiaſtick Canon) did this, [to wit,] made uſe of Appeals, as 'tis uſually done in the publick [ſecular] Courts of Judicature. He was at that time preſent at Selencia, ready to put himſelf upon his trial: and therefore the Biſhops called the Acacians into the aſſembly, (as we have ſaid a little before,) that [e] by a general conſent they might paſs a definitive ſentence againſt the perſons accuſed. For they had cited ſome other perſons beſides, that were accuſed, who for refuge had joyned themſelves to Acacius's party. But in regard, after their being frequently ſummoned, they refuſed to meet, [the Biſhops] depoſed both Acacius himſelf, and alſo Georgius of Alexandria, [f] Uranius of Tyre, [g] Theodulus of Chæretapi in Phrygia, Theodoſius of Philadelphia in Lydia, Evagrius of the Iſland Mytilene, Leontius of Tripolis in Lydia, and Eudoxius who had heretofore been Biſhop of Germanicia, but had afterwards crept into the Biſhoprick of Antioch in Syria. Moreover, they depoſed [h] Patrophilus, becauſe being accuſed by Dorotheus a Preſbyter, and ſummoned by them to make his defence, he was contumacious. Theſe perſons they depoſed. But they Excommunicated Aſterius, Euſebius, Abgarus, Baſilicus, Phœbus, Fidelis, Eutychius, Magnus, and Euſtathius: determining they ſhould continue Excommunicate, till ſuch time as by * making ſatisfaction they had cleared themſelves of their accuſations. Having done this, and written Letters concerning thoſe Biſhops they had depoſed to each of their Churches, they conſtitute a Biſhop of Antioch, in the room of Eudoxius, whoſe name was Annianus. Whom the Acacians [ſoon after] apprehended, and delivered him to Leonas and Lauricius, by whom he was baniſhed. Thoſe Biſhops who had Ordained Annianus [being incenſed] hereat, depoſited [i] Conteſtatory Libels againſt the Acacians with Leonas and Lauricius, by which they openly declared, that the determination of the Synod was injured. And when nothing further could be done, they went to Conſtantinople, to inform the Emperour concerning the matters determined by them.

[c] In the Florent. and Allat. M. SS. as ſaies Valeſ. the reading is [ἃ μὴ μεμάθηκεν] which we have expreſt in our Verſion. But Valeſius follows the other reading, which is [ἃ μεμάθηκεν, what it had the knowledge of before.]

CONSTANTIUS.

[d] Nay; long before Cyrill, the Donatiſts appealed from the determination of the Council of Orleans, For thus the Emperour Conſtantine ſpeaks concerning them in his Epiſtle: ô rabida furoris audacia! Sicut in cauſis Gentilium ſolet, appellationem interpoſuerunt: i. e. O the outragious audacouſneſs of fury! As 'tis uſually done in the caſes of the Heathens, they have put in an appeal. Valeſ.

[e] These two lines [διαγράψαντες κοινὴν ἐξενέγκωσιν ψῆφον ἐφ' ἁλῶσι δή ποτε καὶ πῶς ἄλλως ἐκκληθησομένοις, by a general conſent they might paſs a definitive ſentence againſt the perſons accuſed. For they had cited ſome other perſons beſides, that were accuſed,] were at this place, wanting in the common Editions; we have inſerted them from the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. To which agrees Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion. But Chriſtophorſon made up the chaſme at this place very unhappily by conjecture: whence it appears, that he had no Manuſcript Copies of Socrates, but various readings only, gathered from the Margins of Printed Copies. Valeſ.

* Or, by making their defence.

[f] This perſons name ſhould be Uranius (not Urſacius;) ſo he is called in Athanaſius's book, de Synod. Arimin. & Seleuciæ. pag. 880. which name alſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus gives him; as does likewiſe Epiphanius, (in Hæreſ. Semiarian.) who names him among the Biſhops that ſubſcribed the Acacian Creed. Valeſ.

[g] In the Florentine and Allatian M. SS. this perſon is named (not Theodorus, but more truly) Theodulus. For that is his name in Athanaſius, Epiphanius, and Philoſtorgius. When this Theodulus had been diveſted of the Biſhoprick of Chæretapi, in the Council held at Seleucia, he was afterwards ordained Biſhop of Paleſtina by the Eunomians, as Philoſtorgius relates. Concerning Leontius of Tripolis you may meet with many paſſages in Philoſtorgius. Valeſ.

[h] Into his See they put one Philippus a Presbyter of Scythopolis, as Epiphanius atteſts, in Hæreſ. Semiarian. Valeſ.

[i] It ſhould be but one word, thus, διαμαρτύρια, So the Greeks term the Libels of proteſtation, (or, proteſts,) which were uſually depoſited with the Acts. We meet with a form of one of theſe Libels, at the cloſe of Athanaſius's Epiſtle ad Solitarios. I ſuppoſe, that two Libels of proteſtation were delivered by the Council; one to Leonas the Comes; another to Lauricius Preſident of Iſauria. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLI.

That, upon the Emperours return from the Western parts, the Acacians were convened in the City of Constantinople, and firmed the Ariminum Creed, making some additions to it.

FOr the Emperour, being returned from the Western parts, resided [in that City:] at which time also he made a person whose name was [a] Honoratus the first Præfect of Constantinople; having [b] aboliſhed the Proconsul's Office. But the Acacians prevented and calumniated them before-hand to the Emperour, having informed him, that the [c] Creed which they had set forth was not admitted by them. Whereupon the Emperour was highly incensed, and resolved to disperse them, having commanded by an Edict [which he publiſhed,] that such of them as were subject to publick Offices, should be reduced to their former condition. For several of them were liable to [publick] Offices; some [were subject to the bearing of those Offices belonging] to the City Magistracy; others [to them appertaining] to the [d] Sodalities of Officialls or Apparitours in several Provinces. These persons being after this manner disturbed, the Acacians abode for some time at Constantinople, and assembled another Synod, to which they sent for the Bishops of Bithynia. When therefore they were all met together, being [e] fifty in number, amongst whom was Mavis of Chalcedon, they confirmed the Creed published at Ariminum, which had the Consuls names prefixt. Which Creed it would have been superfluous to have inserted here, had they made no additions to it. But in regard they added some words thereto, we thought it necessary to set it down at this place again. The contents of it are these.

[a] In the Old Fasti (put forth by Jacobus Sirmondus under the name of Idatius,) there is this Record concerning this thing: Eusebio & Hypatio, his consulibus primum processit Constantinopoli præfectus Urbis, nomine Honoratus, die tertio Idûs Decembris: i.e. in the Consulate of Eusebius and Hypatius a Præfect of Constantinople was first made, his name Honoratus, on the third of the Ides of December. Valeſ.

[b] Before the Emperour Constantius had made a Præfect of the City at Constantinople, the Province Europa (the chief City whereof was Constantinople) was governed by a Proconsul, as Socrates here atteſts. Athanasius mentions this Proconsul, in his Apologetick de Fugâ suâ, not far from the beginning; where he says that the Emperour Constantius wrote Letters to Donatus the Proconsul, against Olympius Bishop of Thracia. In the Emperour Constantius's Epistle also, which he wrote to the Senate and Constantinopolitan-people concerning the praises of Themistius, there is mention of this Proconsul; at the close of that Epistle. Valeſ.

[c] That is, the Creed which had the Consuls names præfixt. Valeſ.

[d] Τῶν ἐν ταῖς ἐπαρχίαις τάξεων· So this place is worded in the Original. What the τάξεις were, I have long since explained in my notes on Amm. Marcellinus: to wit, the Bodies or Sodalities of Officials or Apparitours who attended upon the Presidents and Governours of Provinces. It was their duty to collect the tribute from the Inhabitants of the Provinces, and to put in execution the Presidents Orders. Further, as they who had listed themselves in the Camp-milice, stood obliged by a Military-oath, and enjoyed not a compleat liberty, but were bound in a servitude as it were, till such time as they were disbanded, (as Suidas declares, in the word βεβεαυός·) so those Officials, who followed the City-milice, were bound to this employment as it were, and lyable to the Offices of their Milice; and their Farms, as well as those of the Decurions, were incumbred with these burdens, as 'tis apparent from the Theodosian Code. Valeſ.

[e] In the Alexandrian Chronicle, seventy two Bishops are said to have been present at the Constantinopolitan-Synod, in the year of Christ, 360. Valeſ.

We Believe in one only God, the Father Almighty, of whom are all things. And in the only begotten Son of God, begotten of God before all ages, and before every beginning: by whom all things, visible and invisible, were made. * Who is the only begotten born of the Father, the only of the only, God of God, like to the Father (who begat him) according to the Scriptures. Whose generation no person knoweth, but the Father only, who begat him. We know this Person [to be] the only begotten Son of God, who upon his Father's sending of him, came down from the heavens, according as 'tis written, upon account of the destruction of Sin and Death: and was born of the holy Ghost, and of the Virgin Mary according to the flesh, as it is written, and conversed with the disciples; and having fulfilled every dispensation according to his Fathers Will, he was crucified, and died, and was buryed; and descended into the parts beneath the earth. At whom hell it self trembled. Who arose from the dead on the third day, and was conversant with the disciples: and after the completion of fourty days, he was taken up into the Heavens, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father; he shall come in the last day of the Resurrection in his Fathers Glory, that he may render to every man according to his works. And [we believe] in the holy Ghost, whom he himself the only begotten of God, Christ our Lord and God, promised to send as an Advocate to mankind, according as 'tis written, the Spirit of truth; whom he sent unto them, after he was assumed into the Heavens. But we thought good to remove the term * Ousia, (which was used by the Fathers in a more plain and ordinary sense, and being not understood by the people, has given offence,) in regard 'tis not contained in the sacred Scriptures; and that in future not the least mention should be made thereof, for as much as the sacred Scriptures have no where mentioned the substance of the Father and of the Son. [f] Nor ought the subsistence of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost, to be so much as named. But we assert the Son to be like the Father, in such a manner as the sacred Scriptures do affirm and teach. Moreover, let all the Heresies, which have been heretofore condemned, and which may have risen of late, being opposite to this Creed published [by us,] be Anathema.

CONSTANTIUS.

* Or, who is the only begotten born, the only of the only Father, &c.

* Substance.

[f] In Athanasius's book de Synodis, pag. 906, the reading is [οὐδὲ γὰρ οὐδὲ ὀφείλει, Nor ought, &c.] to which agrees the Version of the Latine Translatour. Which is also confirmed by Athanasius himself, in the same book, pag. 905. the place we will quote by and by. Valeſ.

This Creed was at that time recited at Constantinople. Having now at length passed through the labyrinth of the Expositions of Faith, we will reckon up their number. After the Creed [published] at Nice, they set forth two Expositions of the Faith at Antioch, at the Dedication. A third was that delivered to the Emperour Constans in the Gallia's, by Narcissus and those that accompanied him. The fourth was that sent by Eudoxius into Italy. Three [Draughts of the Creed] were published at Sirmium, one whereof was recited at Ariminum, which had the names of the Consuls prefixt. The eighth was that which the Acacians promulged at Seleucia. The last was set forth at the City Constantinople, with an addition. For hereto was annexed, that neither substance, nor subsistence ought to be mentioned in relation to God. Moreover, Ulfila Bishop of the Goths did at that time first agree to this Creed. For before this he had embraced the Nicene Creed; being Theophilus's follower, who was Bishop of the Goths, and had been present at, and subscribed the Nicene Synod. Thus far concerning these things.

CHAP. XLII.

That upon Macedonius's being deposed, Eudoxius obtained the Bishoprick of Constantinople.

BUt Acacius, Eudoxius, and those that were with them at Constantinople, made it wholly their business, that they also might on the other ſide depoſe ſome perſons of the contrary party. Now, you muſt know, that neither of the factions decreed theſe depoſitions upon account of Religion, but for other pretences. For though they diſſented about the Faith, yet they found not fault with one anothers Faith in their mutual depoſitions of one another. Thoſe therefore of Acacius's party making uſe of the Emperours indignation, (which he had kept [concealed in his mind,] and earneſtly indeavoured to wreak it againſt others, but moſt eſpecially againſt Macedonius,) do in the firſt place depoſe Macedonius, both becauſe he had been the occaſion of many murders, and alſo in regard he had admitted a Deacon taken in Fornication to Communion. Then, [they depoſe] Eleuſius [Biſhop] of Cyzicum, becauſe he had baptized one Heraclius Hercules's Prieſt at Tyre, a perſon known to be a Conjurer, and ordained him Deacon. [In the next place they depoſe] Baſilius, (or Baſilas, for ſo he was alſo called,) who had been conſtituted [Biſhop] of Ancyra in the room of Marcellus, as having unjuſtly tortured a certain perſon, bound him with Iron chains, and confined him to Priſon: alſo, becauſe he had faſtned calumnies upon ſome perſons: and moreover, in regard by his Letters he had diſturbed the Churches in Africa. Dracontius [was depoſed by them,] becauſe he had removed from Galatia to Pergamus. Moreover, they depoſed Neonas [Biſhop] of Seleucia, in which City the Synod had been convened, as alſo Sophronius of Pompeiopolis in Paphlagonia, Elpidius of [a] Satala in Macedonia, and Cyrillus of Jeruſalem; and others were ejected by them for other reaſons.

[a] Satala was a Town in Armenia; of which there is frequent mention amongſt the Antients. But in Macedonia, no mention is made of a City of this name by the Ancients. Wherefore I judge, that inſtead of Macedonia, it ſhould be Armenia, here in the Greek Text. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLIII.

Concerning Euſtathius Biſhop of Sebaſtia.

BUT Euſtathius [Biſhop] of Sebaſtia in Armenia, was not ſo much as admitted to make his defence, becauſe he had been long before depoſed by Eulalius his own Father, who was Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, in regard he wore a garment misbecoming the Sacerdotal function. You are to know, that in Euſtathius's room Meletius was conſtituted Biſhop, concerning whom we will ſpeak hereafter. But Euſtathius was afterwards condemned in a Synod convened upon his account at Gangra [a City] of Paphlagonia, becauſe, after his depoſition in the Synod at [a] Cæſarea, he had done many things repugnant to the Eccleſiaſtick Laws. For he had forbidden marriage, and maintained that meats were to be abſtained from: and upon this account he ſeparated many who had contracted marriages, from their wives, and perſwaded [b] thoſe who had an averſion for the Churches, to communicate at home. He alſo enticed away ſervants from their Maſters by a pretext of piety. He himſelf wore the habit of a Philoſopher, and cauſed his followers to make uſe of a new and unuſual garb, and gave order that women ſhould be ſhorn.

[a] Sozomen, book 4. chap. 24. ſays 'twas at Neocæſarea. Valeſ.

[b] Theſe words of Socrates [τὰς συναλλαγὰς ἐκτρεπομένους, thoſe who had an averſion for, or, deteſted the Churches] are not to be underſtood of all thoſe who declined the Churches: but they muſt be joyned to the foregoing words, and are to be meant of thoſe perſons, who by Euſtathius's perſwaſion had ſeparated themſelves from the converſe of their wives. Euſtathius perſwaded theſe men to avoid the Churches aſſemblies, and not to communicate with other believers; but that, being as it were pure and perfect, they ſhould participate of the ſacred Myſteries by themſelves at home. See what Epiphanius has related concerning this Euſtathius, in his Hareſie of the Aeriani; and Baſilius, in his Epiſtles. Valeſ.

He [aſſerted] that ſet Faſts were to be avoided; but maintained Faſting on Sundays. He forbad Prayers to be made in the houſes of thoſe who were married; and taught, that the bleſſing and communion of a Presbyter who had a wife (whom he had lawfully married during his being a Laick,) ought to be declined as a thing moſt deteſtable. Upon his doing and teaching theſe and ſeveral other ſuch like things as theſe, a Synod (as I have ſaid) convened at Gangra in Paphlagonia depoſed him, and Anathematized his opinions.

CONSTANTIUS.

[c] These things were done afterwards. But Macedonius being then ejected, Eudoxius, deſpiſing the See of Antioch, is conſtituted [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople, being conſecrated by the Acacians. Who forgot themſelves, in that they Decree'd what was contradictory to their former determinations. For they who had depoſed Dracontius becauſe of his tranſlation from Galatia to Pergamus, conſidered not with themſelves, that by Ordaining Eudoxius who then made a ſecond remove [to another Biſhoprick] they did what was contrary to their own Sanctions. Having done theſe things, they ſent the Creed which had been read, [d] to Ariminum, together with its Supplement, corrected by them; and gave order, that ſuch as would not ſubſcribe it, ſhould be baniſhed, according to the Emperours Edict. [Laſtly,] They made known what they had done, both to others in the Eaſt who entertained the ſame ſentiments with them, and alſo to Patrophilus [Biſhop] of Scythopolis. For he went from Seleucia forthwith to his own City. Further, Eudoxius having been conſtituted [Biſhop] of the Great City*, the [e] Great Church named Sophia was at that time conſecrated, in Conſtantius's Tenth and Julianus Cæſar's third conſulate, on the fifteenth of the month February. As ſoon as Eudoxius was ſeated in that See, he was the firſt that uttered this ſentence which is [ſtill]

* Conſtantinople.

[c] I am not of Socrates's opinion, who makes the Synod of Gangra (wherein Euſtathius was condemned) to have been after that aſſembled at Seleucia, and after the Conſtantinopolitan Synod. Sozomen (book 4. chap. 24.) makes the Synod of Gangra to be ancienter than the Council of Antioch, which was held at the Dedication in the year of Chriſt 341. Indeed, Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 361.) places the Synod of Gangra in the reign of Conſtantine the Great. But he is confuted both by Socrates and Sozomen. For Socrates makes that Synod to be later than the Seleucian and Conſtantinopolitan Synod. But Sozomen places it after Euſtathius's depoſition, which was done by Euſebius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. Now, Euſebius thruſt himſelf into the Conſtantinopolitan See in Conſtantius's reign, as 'tis agree'd amongſt all men. Laſtly, Baſilius (in his ſeventy fourth Epiſtle, which he wrote to the Weſtern Biſhops againſt Euſtathius Biſhop of Sebaſtia,) makes no mention of the Council of Gangra. Whence 'tis manifeſt, that at ſuch time as Baſilius wrote that Epiſtle (which he did in Valens's reign,) the Council of Gangra, wherein Euſtathius was condemned, had not been held. Some one will peradventure ſay, (which is objected by Baronius) that that Euſtathius condemned in the Synod of Gangra was a different perſon from Euſtathius of Sebaſtia. But this is gratis dictum, nor is it founded on the authority of any Authour. Valeſ.

[d] I have rendered this place ſo, as to refer theſe words [to Ariminum] to theſe [they ſent:] which Verſion of ours is confirmed by Athanaſius, in his book de Synodis, pag. 905. his words are theſe: πάντα γεγράφασι ἐν τῇ ἰσαυρίᾳ, &c. Having written theſe things in Iſauria, they departed to Conſtantinople, and repenting as it were [of what they had done,] according to their uſual manner they altered their Draught: and when they had added ſome words, [to wit] that [the term] ſubſiſtence ſhould not be uſed in relation to the Father, and the Son, and the holy Ghoſt, they ſent this [form of] the Creed to thoſe at Ariminum, &c. Which paſſage in Athanaſius, Socrates does ſeem to tranſcribe here, Epiphanius Scholaſticus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred this place to this effect; Having done this, they ſent the Creed read at Ariminum together with its ſupplement, &c. Valeſ.

[e] I perfected and mended this place from the Florentine and Sfortian Copies. Concerning the Conſecration of this Church, it is thus recorded in Idatius's Faſti: Conſtantio decimo, &c. In Conſtantius's Tenth and Julianus's third Conſulate, the Great Church at Conſtantinople was conſecrated, on the fifteenth of the Kalends of March. Cedrenus (in his Chronicon) ſays this was the ſecond Conſecration of this Church. For it was firſt conſecrated, ſays he, by Euſebius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. But being afterwards ruined, it was re-edified by Conſtantius Auguſtus, and conſecrated by Eudoxius. See the Chronicon Alexandrinum, where many paſſages (in no wiſe trivial) occur concerning this Conſecration. Valeſ.

in every bodies mouth, saying; The Father is Irreligious; the Son is Religious. When a tumult and a disturbance arose thereupon, Be not troubled (said he) at what has been spoken by me, for, the Father is irreligious, because he worships no person: but the Son is religious, because he worships the Father. When Eudoxius had spoken these words, the tumult was appeased; but instead of the disturbance, there was a great laughter raised in the Church. And this saying of his continues to be a ridicule even to this day. Such cavils the Arch-hereticks made use of, and busied themselves about such expressions as these, rending the Church in sunder [thereby.] This was the conclusion, that the Synod had, which was convened at Constantinople.

CHAP. XLIV.

Concerning Meletius Bishop of Antioch.

IT now remaines, that we speak concerning Meletius. For he (as we said a little before) was made Bishop of Sebastia in Armenia, after Eustathius's Deposition. He was afterwards translated from Sebastia to [a] Beræa [a City] of Syria. When he had been present at the Synod in Seleucia, and Subscribed the Creed published there by Acacius, he went directly from thence to Beræa. Upon the convention of the Synod at Constantinople, when the Antiochians understood that Eudoxius had despised [the presidency over their Church, and removed to the wealth of the Constantinopolitan See, they sent for [b] Meletius from Beræa, and install him [Bishop] over the Church of Antioch. At first he superseded making any discourses about points of Faith, and delivered moral Doctrine only to his hearers. But after his continuance there some time, he expounded the Nicene Creed, and asserted the Homoüsian opinion. Which when the Emperour understood, he gave order that he should be banished: and caused Euzoïus (who had before been deposed together with Arius,) to be ordained Bishop of Antioch. But as many as reserved an affection for Meletius, left the Arian congregation, and made assemblies apart by themselves: [although] those who originally embraced the Homoüsian opinion, would not communicate with them, because Meletius had received his Ordination from the suffrages of the Arians, and because his followers had been baptized by them. After this manner was the Antiochian Church affected towards the other party, although they agreed with them in the points of Faith. But the Emperour understanding that the Persians were raising another War against the Romans, went in great hast to Antioch.

[a] I can scarce believe, that Meletius was translated from Sebastia in Armenia to the Episcopate of Beræa. For Sozomen and Theodoret, and (before them) Ferome do affirm, that he was translated from Sebastia in Armenia to the See of Antioch, making no mention of his being Bishop of Beræa. Theodoret says only thus much, that upon Meletius's being promoted to the Bishoprick of Sebastia, perceiving a contumacy in those under his charge, he retired from thence to some other place. Then therefore he went to Beræa, as I conjecture; but he presided not over the City of Beræa. This mistake of Socrates's was perceived by Baronius, at the year of Christ 360. Which he corrects so, as to affirm, that Meletius was translated from Beræa to Sebastia, not from Sebastia to Beræa. Which, as I suppose, is not true, in regard neither Theodoret nor Sozomen have affirmed that concerning Meletius. Valef.

[b] This persons name is written sometimes with an [e] thus Meletius; sometimes with an [i] thus Melitius. See Eusebius's Eccles. Hist. book 7. chap. 32. note (a) pag. 138.

CHAP. XLV.

BUT Macedonius, who had been ejected out of Constantinople, being unable to bear his condemnation, could by no means endure to be at quiet. But joyned himself to those of the other party, who had deposed Acacius and his followers at Seleucia. He therefore sent an Embassy to Sophronius and Eleusius, exhorting them to adhere to that Creed which was at first published at Antioch, and afterwards confirmed at Seleucia, and that they should give it an [a] adulterate name, [to wit] the Homoïousian Creed. Wherefore many of his acquaintance and friends flock't to him, who are now from him called Macedoniani. And as many as dissented from the Acacians at the Synod of Seleucia, from thence forward manifestly asserted the term Homoïousios, [b] whereas before this they had not openly owned it. But there is a report, which has been prevalent amongst many men, that this [term Homoïousios] was not Macedonius's invention; but Marathonius's rather, whom they had made Bishop of Nicomedia a little before. Upon which account they call the followers of this opinion Marathoniani also. In like manner Eustathius (who had been ejected out of Sebastia for that reason which we have mentioned a little before,) joyned himself to that party. But after Macedonius refused to include the holy Ghost in the Divinity of the Trinity, then Eustathius said, I cannot assent to the terming of the holy Ghost God, nor dare I call him a Creature. Upon which account, those that embrace the Homoüsian-opinion, give these persons the name of * Pneumatomachi. The reason, why these Macedoniani are so numerous in [c] Hellespont, I will declare in its due place. Now, the Acacians used their utmost endeavours that they might be convened again at Antioch, in regard they repented their having asserted the Son to be wholly like to the Father. On the year following therefore, wherein Taurus and Florentius were Consuls, they met at Antioch in Syria, (over which Church Euzoïus presided, in which City the Emperour also resided [at that time]) when some few of them resumed a debate of those points which they had determined before, saying that the term † Homoïos ought to be expunged out of the Creed, which had been published both at Ariminum, and at Constantinople. Nor did they any longer keep their Vizours on, but affirmed bare fac'd, that the Son was in all respects unlike the Father, not only as to his Essence, but in relation to his Will also. And they openly asserted (according as Arius had affirmed) that he was made of nothing. To this opinion those who at that time were followers of Aëtius's Heresie at Antioch, gave their assent. Wherefore, besides their having the appellation of Arians, they were also called * Anomoei, and [a] Translatours understood not this place. And yet they might have been informed from Harpocration's Lexicon, that κεκιβδηλωμένον (the term here used,) does signifie adulterate, or, counterfeit; by a Metaphor taken from money which has a false stamp. Socrates therefore calls Homoïousios (For so 'tis to be written, agreeable to the Florentine and Sfortian Manuscripts; and the import of the term is, that the Son is of a substance, or Essence like to the Father:) an adulterate name, because 'tis corrupted, and counterfeitly put instead of Homoüsios (i. e. that the Son is of the same substance, or Essence with the Father:) which is the name of the true and uncorrupted Creed. Further, the Acacians rejected as well the term Homoïousios, as Homoousios; and retained only Homoios (i. e. like the Father;) and wholly abhorred the term Ousia (i. e. Substance.) Valef.

* That is, that the Son is of a Substance, or Essence like to the Father.

[b] This place is corrupted by a transposition of the words; which may easily be rectified thus; ἤδη μὲν φανερῶς τὸ ὁμοιούσιον ἐδόξαζον, τὸ πρότερον δὲ οὐκ ἐνετεχνάζοντο αὐτὸ, from thence forward manifestly asserted the term Homoïousios, whereas before this they had not openly owned it. Nor do I doubt but Socrates wrote thus. Christophorson and Musculus apprehended not the meaning of this place. But Epiphanius Scholasticus's rendition of it agrees with our Version: only instead of [ὅσοι τε, and as many as: the reading in his copy seems to have been [ὅσοι γε, for as many as] which displeaseth us not. Valef.

* That is, Adversaries, or Opposers of the holy Spirit.

† That is, Like the Father.

* They termed them Anomoei, because of their asserting the Son to be unlike the Father.

CONSTANTIUS.

† Exucontii, by thoſe at Antioch who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion, who [notwithſtanding] were at that time divided amongſt themſelves upon Meletius's account, as has been ſaid before. When therefore they were asked by the Homoöuſians, why they were ſo audacious, as to term the Son to be unlike the Father, and to affirm that he exiſts of nothing, whenas in the Creed publiſhed by them they had ſaid he was God of God; they attempted to elude this objection by ſuch fallacious artifices as theſe: the phraſe God of God (ſaid they) has the ſame import with thoſe words of the Apoſtle, * but all things of God. Wherefore, the Son is of God, he being one of thoſe all things. And upon this account, in the Editions of the Creed, theſe words According to the Scriptures are added. Georgius Biſhop of Laodicea was the Authour of this † Sophiſm. Who being a perſon unskilled in ſuch expreſſions, was ignorant after what manner Origen had in former times diſcuſſed and interpreted ſuch peculiar phraſes of the Apoſtle. But, notwithſtanding their attempt to cavil after this manner, yet in regard of their inability to bear the reproaches and contempt [thrown upon them,] they recited the ſame Creed, which they had before [publiſhed] at Conſtantinople: and ſo departed every one to his own City. Georgius therefore returning to Alexandria, continued his Preſidency over the Churches there, (Athanaſius as yet abſconding,) and perſecuted thoſe in Alexandria who embraced not his Sentiments. He was alſo cruel and ſevere towards the Populace of that City; to moſt of whom he was very odious. At Jeruſalem, [d] Harrenius was Ordained in Cyrillus his room. You muſt alſo know, that after him [e] Heraclius was Conſtituted [Biſhop there,] who was ſucceeded by Hilarius. But at length Cyrillus returned to Jeruſalem, and recovered the Preſidency over the Church there. Moreover, at the ſame time there ſprang up another Hereſie, upon this account.

† They had this name, in regard they maintained the Son to be made of nothing, or, of things which are not. See Athanaſius, pag. 906. Edit. Paris; whence Socrates borrowed theſe names for theſe Hereticks.

* 1 Cor. 11. 12.

† Or, Fallacy.

[d] In the Allatian M. S. he is called Erennius; where this whole paſſage is thus worded: Ἐν δὲ τοῖς Ἱεροσολύμοις κυείλλε καθαιρεθέντος, ὡς εἴρηται, ἀρχιεπισκοπεῖν ἐχειροτόνησαν Ἡρέννιον· μετ' ἐκεῖνον ἐφάρχει Ἡράκλειος· ἐπὶ δὲ τούτου Ἱλάριος· i.e. At Jeruſalem, Cyrillus having been depoſed, as has been ſaid, Erennius ſucceeded in the Church: after whom, Eraclius: and after him Hilarius. But Jerome (in his Chronicon) calls him Irenius: for this is the reading in the moſt correct copies, and in Johannes Miræus's Edition; Maximus Hieroſolymorum Epiſcopus moritur. Poſt quem Eccleſiam Ariani invadunt, id eſt Cyrillus, Eutychius, rurſum Cyrillus, Irenius, tertiò Cyrillus, Hilarius, quarto Cyrillus: id eſt, Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem dies; after whom, the Arians invade that Church, that is, Cyrillus, Eutychius, Cyrillus the ſecond, Irenius, Cyrillus the third, Hilarius, Cyrillus the fourth. In Nicephorus Conſtantinopolitanus's Chronicon, he is very corruptly called Arſenius. Valeſ.

[e] Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem had at his death ordained Heraclius to be his ſucceſſour. But Acacius Biſhop of Cæſarea, together with ſome other Arian Biſhops, ſlighting his ordination, ſubſtituted Cyrillus in the room of Maximus being now dead. This Cyrillus degraded Heraclius from his Epiſcopal dignity, and reduced him to the degree of a Presbyter; as Jerome relates in his Chronicon. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLVI.

Concerning the Apollinariſtæ, and their Hereſie.

AT Laodicea in Syria, there were two men of the ſame name, the Father and the Son: For each of their names was Apollinaris. The father was dignified with a Presbyterate in that Church: the ſon had a Readers place. They were both Teachers of Grecian Literature; the father taught Grammar, the ſon Rhetorick. The father was by birth an Alexandrian, and having at firſt taught at Berytus, he removed afterwards to Laodicea, where he married, and begat his ſon Apollinaris. They both flouriſhed at the ſame time with Epiphanius the Sophiſta, and being very intimate friends, they converſed together with him. But Theodotus Biſhop of Laodicea, fearing that by their continual converſe with that perſon they ſhould be perverted to Gentiliſm, forbad their going to him. They regarding the Biſhops [prohibition] very little, continued their intimacy with Epiphanius. After this, Georgius, ſucceſſour to Theodotus, endeavoured to reform [and wean] them from converſing with Epiphanius; but being unable to perſwade them by any means, he puniſhed them both with Excommunication. Apollinaris the ſon lookt upon what was done to be an injury, and confiding in the fluentneſs of his Sophiſtick faculty of ſpeaking, he alſo ramed a new Hereſie, which flouriſheth at this preſent, and bears the name of its Inventour. But ſome do report, that they diſſented from Georgius, not ſo much upon account of the forementioned reaſon, but becauſe they ſaw he maintained abſurdities; ſometimes profeſſing the ſon to be like the father, (according as it had been determined [in the Synod] at Seleucia;) at others inclining to the Arian opinion. Laying hold therefore of this ſpecious pretext, they made a ſeparation [from him.] But when they ſaw no body adhered to them, they introduce a [new] Scheme of Religion. And at firſt aſſerted, that [a] humanity was aſſumed by God the Word in the Oeconomy of his incarnation, without the ſoul. But afterward, rectifying their former errour by repentance as it were, they added, that the ſoul was indeed aſſumed: but that it had not a mind, but that God the Word was in the place of a mind, in his aſſumption of Humanity. As to this point only theſe [Hereticks] do affirm that they diſſent [from Catholicks,] who from them are now called Apollinariſtæ. For they aſſert that the Trinity is Conſubſtantial. But we ſhall mention the two Appollinaris's again in due place.

CONSTANTIUS.

[a] The Arians aſſerted a tenet neer of kin to this of the Apollinariſtæ, or Apollinarians. Ἀρξάμενοι δὲ σαρκὸς μόνην, &c. Arius (ſays Athanaſius de Adv. Chriſti,) profeſſes the fleſh only to be the Cover of the Deity: and aſſerts the Word to have been in the fleſh, in the ſtead of our Inner man, that is, the ſoul. In this opinion he was followed by Euromius, as Theodoret informs us, Contr. Hæreſ. book 5. chap. 11. But the Apollinarians differred from him: for they diſtinguiſhed (as we may ſee from this paſſage in our Socrates) between the ſoul and mind of man; acknowledging (in the ſecond Edition of their Hereſie) that God the Word aſſumed an humane Body and a Soul; (which latter Arius and his crew denied) but not the mind, or ſpirit of man: the place whereof was ſupplied, ſaid they, by the Word it ſelf. This Phyloſophick notion (making Man conſiſt of three parts, a body, a ſoul, and a mind;) they borrowed from Plotinus; ſo ſays Nemeſeus in his de Nat. Hom.

Concerning the death of the Emperour Conſtantius.

MOreover, whilſt the Emperour Conſtantius reſided at Antioch, Julianus Cæſar engages with a numerous army of Barbarians in the Gallia's. And having obtained a Victory, was for that reaſon greatly beloved by all the Souldiers, by whom he is proclaimed Emperour. This being told to the Emperour Conſtantius put him into an agony. He was therefore baptized by Euzoius, and * undertakes an expedition againſt Julianus. But arriving between Cappadocia and Cilicia, he ended his life at Mopſucrenæ, (being ſeized with an Apoplexy by reaſon of his too great ſolicitude,) in the Conſulate of Taurus and Florentius, on the third of November. This was the firſt year of the two hundred eighty fifth Olympiad. Conſtantius lived fourty five years, and reigned thirty eight. He was his Fathers Colleague in the Empire thirteen years: after whoſe death [he Governed] twenty five: which ſpace of years this Book doth contain.

THE THIRD BOOK OF THE Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory OF SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS.

CHAP. I.

Concerning Julianus, his Extract, and Education. And how, upon his being made Emperour, he revolted to Gentiliſm.

JULIANUS.

THE Emperour Conſtantius ended his life on the confines of Cilicia, about the third of November, in the Conſulate of Taurus and Florentius. During the ſame perſons Conſulate, Julianus arriving from the Weſtern parts [a] about the eleventh of December next enſuing, made his entry into Conſtantinople, where he was proclaimed Emperour. Now, whereas 'tis our deſign to ſay ſomething concerning the Emperour Julianus, a perſon fam'd for his eloquence; let none of thoſe who were his Intimado's, expect we ſhould do it in a pompous and majeſtick ſtile, as if it were neceſſary, that a caracter of ſo eminent a perſon ſhould in every particular correſpond with his greatneſs of whom 'tis given. But, the compoſure of an Hiſtory of the Chriſtian Religion being our buſineſs, we will continue our making uſe of a low, plain, and mean ſtile for perſpicuities ſake. And this we promiſed [to do] at the beginning. Being therefore to ſpeak concerning him, his Extract, Education, and how he came to the Empire: in order to our performing hereof, we muſt begin a little higher. Conſtantinus, he who gave Byzantium his own name, had two brothers begotten by the ſame father, but not born of the ſame mother. The name of the one was Dalmatius, the other was called Conſtantius. Dalmatius had a ſon who bore his own name. Conſtantius begat two ſons, Gallus and Julianus. After the death of [Conſtantine] the Builder of Conſtantinople, when the Souldiers had murthered Dalmatius the younger, at that time theſe *two alſo being Orphans, wanted but little of falling into the ſame danger with Dalmatius: had not a diſtemper which ſeemed to be mortal delivered Gallus [from their violence:] and the tenderneſs of Julianus's age (for he was not then eight years old compleat) protected him. But, after the Emperours rage againſt them was mollified, Gallus frequented the Schools at Epheſus in Ionia, in which Country they had large poſſeſſions left them by their Anceſtours. And Julianus being grown up, was an auditour in the Schools at Conſtantinople, going into the Pallace (where there were then Schools) in a private habit, and was tutored by Macedonius the Eunuch. [b] Nicocles the Laconian taught him the Grammar; he had for his Rhetorick-maſter Ecebolius the Sophiſta, who was at that time a Chriſtian. For the Emperour Conſtantius took great care, leaſt by his being an hearer of a Pagan-maſter, he ſhould revolt to the ſuperſtition [of the Gentiles.] For Julianus was at firſt a Chriſtian. Upon his making a great progreſs in Literature, a rumour [began] to be ſpread amongſt the people, that he was fit to Govern the Roman Empire. Which report being more openly divulged, much diſturbed the Emperours mind. Wherefore, he removed him from the * Great City to Nicomedia, ordering him not to frequent [the School] of Libanius the Syrian-Sophiſta. For at that time Libanius, having been expelled Conſtantinople by the School-maſters, had opened a School at Nicomedia. Wherefore, he vented his gall againſt the School-maſters, in an [c] Oration which he wrote againſt them. But Julianus was forbidden to go to him, becauſe Libanius was as to his Religion a Pagan. Nevertheleſs, being a great admirer of Libanius's Orations, He procured them privately, and peruſed them frequently and ſtudiouſly. When he had made a great proficiency in Rhetorick, there came to Nicomedia, Maximus the Philoſopher, not

JULIANUS.

* That is, Gallus and Julianus.

* That is, Conſtantinople.

[a] We have the ſame account in Idatius's Faſti: Tauro & Florentio his Coſſ. &c. in the Conſulate of Taurus and Florentius, Conſtantius Auguſtus died at Mopſucrinæ in the confines of Cilicia a Province of Phœnicia, on the third of November. And Julianus made his entry into Conſtantinople on the eleventh of December. But, what Socrates adds, to wit, that Julian was proclaimed Emperour in that City, muſt be ſo underſtood, not as if that were the firſt time of his being ſaluted Emperour. For he had been proclaimed Emperour in the Gallia's a long while before, whilſt Conſtantius was alive. But, upon his entry into Conſtantinople, he was declared Emperour by the ſenate and Conſtantinopolitans, and took poſſeſſion of the Empire of the Eaſt. Valeſ.

[b] There are ſeveral Epiſtles of Libanius's extant, written to this Nicocles; particularly the ſeventh Epiſtle of his fourth book, wherein Libanius excuſes the inſolency of a Citizen of Antioch, who had abuſed him: amongſt other paſſages he ſays, that the fault of one Citizen was not to be aſcribed to the whole City. For in a City containing an hundred and fifty thouſand inhabitants, 'tis not to be wondred at, if one bad Citizen be found: whenas, neither in your Sparta (which yet has Lycurgus for its Law-giver) all are alike good and generous. Valeſ.

[c] This Oration of Libanius's Againſt the School-maſters is not (to my knowledge) now extant. Valeſ.

JULIANUS.

[a] Maximus of Byzantium. [b] Maximus the Epheſian, whom the Emperour Julianus ordered to be ſlain afterwards, as being a practicer of Magick. But this hapned a long while after. At that time, his coming to Nicomedia was occaſioned by nothing elſe but Julianus's fame, which induced him to go thither. Julianus having had a taſte of Philoſophick Literature from him, began forthwith to imitate his Maſters Religion, who alſo inſtilled into his mind a deſire of the Empire. When the Emperour was made acquainted with theſe things, Julianus being betwixt hope and fear, became very deſirous of avoiding ſuſpicion, and he who had before been a ſincere Chriſtian, then began to act the hypocrite. Being therefore ſhaved to the very skin, he pretended to lead a monaſtick life. Privately he imployed himſelf about the ſtudy of Philoſophy: but in publick, he read the ſacred Writings of the Chriſtians. Moreover, he was made a Reader in the Church of Nicomedia: and by this ſpecious pretext he avoided the Emperours fury. All this he did out of fear. But [in the interim] he rec ded not from his hope, but told many of his friends, that thoſe would be happy times, when he ſhould be poſſeſt of the Empire. Whilſt his affairs were in this poſture, his brother Gallus was created Cæſar, and in his journey into the Eaſt came to Nicomedia, to give him a viſit. Not long after this Gallus was ſlain, immediately upon which the Emperour grew ſuſpicious of Julianus. Wherefore he ordered a guard ſhould be ſet upon him. But a ſoon as he could get an opportunity of ſlipping away from his Keepers, he removed from place to place, and by that means made his eſcape. At length the Emperours wife Euſebia, having found him out during his abſconding, perſwades the Emperour to do him no harm, but to allow him a liberty of going to Athens, to ſtudy Philoſophy. From whence (that I may be brief) the Emperour ſent for him, and created him Cæſar. After which he married him to his ſiſter Helena, and ſent him into the Gallia's againſt the Barbarians. For the Barbarians (whom the Emperour Conſtantius had a little before hired to be his Auxiliaries againſt Magnentius,) having been imployed in no ſervice againſt the Tyrant, fell to deſtroying the Roman Cities. And in regard Julianus was as yet but young, he ordered him not to enter upon any thing of action without the advice of the Commanders of the Army. Who having received ſo large a commiſſion, grew negligent in their management of affairs, upon which account the Barbarians increaſed in ſtrength; Julianus permitted the Commanders to ſpend their time in Luxury and drinking: but he made the Souldiers more couragious, by promiſing a ſet reward to him who ſhould kill a Barbarian. This was the original cauſe, whereby both the Barbarians Forces were diminiſhed, and alſo he himſelf was rendred more acceptable to the Souldiers. There is a report, that as he was entring into a Town, a [c] Crown, with which they [uſually] adorn the Cities, being hung up by Ropes between two Pillars, fell down upon his head and fitted it exactly, at which all that were preſent gave a ſhout. For by this ſign [it ſeemed] to be portended, that he ſhould be Emperour. There are thoſe who ſay, that Conſtantius therefore ſent him againſt the Barbarians, that he might periſh there, in an engagement with them. But I know not whether they who report this, ſpeak the truth. For ſhould he have framed ſuch a deſign againſt him, after he had joyned him in marriage to his own ſiſter, it would have been no other then a conſpiracy againſt himſelf. But let every one judge of this matter according to his own pleaſure. Moreover, upon Julianus's making a complaint to the Emperour of the ſlothfullneſs of his Military Officers, there was another Commander ſent to him, exactly agreeable to Julianus's courage. Having got ſuch an Aſſiſtant, he made a bold attack upon the Barbarians. They diſpatcht away an Embaſſadour to him, informing him, that they were ordered by the Emperours Letters to March into the Roman Territories, and the Letters were produced to him. But he clapt their Embaſſadour into priſon; and having engaged their forces, routed them totally. He alſo took the King of the Barbarians priſoner, and ſent him to Conſtantius. Upon this fortunate ſucceſs, he is proclaimed Emperour by the Souldiers. But becauſe they wanted an Imperial Crown, one of his guards took the Chain which he wore about his own neck, and put it upon Julianus's head. After this manner therefore Julianus came to be Emperour. But what he did afterwards, let the hearers judge, whether or no they became a Philoſopher. For he neither ſent an Embaſſage to Conſtantius, nor did he ſhew him that Reverence which was due to him, as being his Benefactour, but managed all affairs according to his own arbitrement. He changed the Governours of Provinces; and reproacht Conſtantius in every City, by reciting in publick his Letters ſent to the Barbarians. Whereupon [thoſe inhabitants] revolted from Conſtantius, and came over to him. At that time, he manifeſtly pull'd off his mask of Chriſtianity. For he went from City to City, opened the Heathen Temples, offered ſacrifice to Idols, and termed himſelf the * Pontifex Maximus. And ſuch as profeſſed Gentiliſm celebrated their heatheniſh Feſtivals [after their own manner.] By theſe proceedings of his he [f] takes an occaſion of raiſing a Civil War againſt Conſtantius. And, as far as in him lay, [he took care] that all thoſe calamities ſhould have hapned, which are the conſequents of a War. For this Philoſophers deſire could not have been [g] fulfilled without much bloud-ſhed.

JULIANUS.

But becauſe they wanted an Imperial Crown, one of his guards took the Chain which he wore about his own neck, and put it upon Julianus's head. After this manner therefore Julianus came to be Emperour. But what he did afterwards, let the hearers judge, whether or no they became a Philoſopher. For he neither ſent an Embaſſage to Conſtantius, nor did he ſhew him that Reverence which was due to him, as being his Benefactour, but managed all affairs according to his own arbitrement. He changed the Governours of Provinces; and reproacht Conſtantius in every City, by reciting in publick his Letters ſent to the Barbarians. Whereupon [thoſe inhabitants] revolted from Conſtantius, and came over to him. At that time, he manifeſtly pull'd off his mask of Chriſtianity. For he went from City to City, opened the Heathen Temples, offered ſacrifice to Idols, and termed himſelf the * Pontifex Maximus. And ſuch as profeſſed Gentiliſm celebrated their heatheniſh Feſtivals [after their own manner.] By theſe proceedings of his he [f] takes an occaſion of raiſing a Civil War againſt Conſtantius. And, as far as in him lay, [he took care] that all thoſe calamities ſhould have hapned, which are the conſequents of a War. For this Philoſophers deſire could not have been [g] fulfilled without much bloud-ſhed.

JULIANUS. But God the Arbiter of his own Councils, repressed the * Impetus of one of these two Antagonists without any † damage to the Republick. For when Julianus arrived amongst the Thracians, news was brought him, that Constantius was dead. And thus the Roman Empire at that time escaped a Civil War. But Julianus having made his entry into Constantinople, began immediately to consider with himself, after what manner he might win the favour of the people, and procure their benevolence towards himself. He makes use therefore of this Artifice. He very well understood, that Constantius was odious to all such as embraced the Homoousian opinion, both because he had driven them from their Churches, and also in regard he had proscribed and banished the Bishops belonging to them. He assuredly knew also, that the Heathens were sorely vexed, because they were prohibited sacrificing to their Gods: and that they were very desirous of getting an opportunity, wherein their Temples might be opened, and they have a liberty of offering sacrifices to their Idols. He was sensible, that for these reasons both those sorts of people had privately rancoured minds against his predecessour [Constantius.] He also found, that all people in general highly resented the violence of the Eunuches, and the rapines [h] of Eusebius the principal person of the Bed-chamber to him. He therefore treated them all with a great deal of craft and subtlety. With some he dissembled: others he obliged by kindnesses, being a great affectour of vain glory. But He made it evident to all in general how he was affected towards the superstition [of the Heathens.] And first, that he might make Constantius odious for his cruelty towards his Subjects, and render him infamous amongst the Vulgar, he commanded that the exiled Bishops should be recalled; and restored to them their estates which had been confiscated. Then, he issued out an Order to his Confidents, that the Heathen Temples should be forthwith opened. He also ordered, that such persons as had been injured by the Eunuches, should be repossessed of their goods which were unjustly taken from them. He punished Eusebius the principal person of the Imperial Bed-chamber with death, not only because many persons had been wronged by him, but also in regard he was assured that his brother Gallus had been murthered upon account of his calumny [against him.] He took care that Constantius's body should be honoured with an Imperial Funeral. He expelled the Eunuches, Barbers, and Cooks out of his Pallace. The Eunuches, because he had lost his Wife, after whose death he resolved not to marry any other. The Cooks, in regard he fed upon a very slender and mean diet. And the Barbers, because, said he, one is sufficient for a great many. For these reasons he put these sorts of men out [of the Pallace.] Most of the Notaries he reduced to their former condition, and ordered that the rest should be allowed a salary befitting a Notary. He also retrenched the [i] publick way of conveyance of necessaries for [publick] uses: for example, [the use] of Mules, Oxen, and Asses; and permitted horses only to serve for such publick conveniences. These Acts of his are commended by some few persons: but most men discommend them, because the grandeur and magnificence of the Imperial riches being lost, which creates an admiration in the minds of the Vulgar, he thereby rendred the dignity of an Emperour despicable and obnoxious to contempt. Moreover, he sate up all night, composing Orations, which he recited at his going into the Senate-house. For he was the first and only Emperour since Julius Cæsar's times, that made Speeches in the Senate-house. He had an high esteem for such as were studious about [any part of] Literature: but more especially for those who professed Philosophy. Wherefore, the report hereof brought such as were pretenders to this sort of Learning from all parts to the Pallace, who wore their * Palliums, and were most of them more conspicuous for their garb, than their Learning. But they were all troublesome to the Christians, being persons that were Impostours, and who always owned the same Religion with the Emperour. He himself also was so excessively vain glorious, that he reviled all his predeceessours in the Empire, in a book he composed, which he entitled The Cæsars. The same proud temper of mind excited him to write Books against the Christians also. His expulsion of the Cooks and Barbers was an act [befitting] a Philosopher indeed, but not an Emperour. But in his reproaching and reviling [of others,] he did neither like a Philosopher, nor an Emperour. For both those sorts of persons are to be [of a temper of mind] superiour to all detraction and envy. An Emperour may indeed be a Philosopher, in what bears a respect to modesty and temperance. But a Philosopher, should he imitate an Emperour in all things, would transgress his Rules. Let thus much be cursorily said concerning the Emperour Julianus, his Extract, Education, and disposition, and after what manner he came to the Empire.

* Or, Force.

† Or, without the damage of others.

[h] Translatours perceived not that this place was faulty. I doubt not but Socrates wrote thus: [Εὐσεβίῳ τε τῷ προπόσῳ τοῦ ἱεροῦ κοιτῶνος, and the rapines of Eusebius the principal person of the Bed chamber to him.] For προπόσῳ signifies the Provost, or chief Officer of the sacred Bed-chamber, which Office Eusebius then bore. Socrates does frequently use this word in this sense; as we may see in his second book chap. 2. Vales.

[i] Gregory Nazianzen, in his former Invective against Julian, does confess also that the publick way, or manner of travelling and conveying of necessaries from place to place, was well rectified by Julian. For Constantius had impaired it much, by allowing the Bishops every where the use thereof, that they might come to the Synods convened by him. But, what regulations Julianus made in this matter, 'tis hard to determine. And yet we may conjecture from Socrates's words, that the way of travelling by Chariots (which was also called the Cursus Clavularis,) was put down by him, and that travelling on Horse-back (upon Horses provided for publick uses) remained only in use. Johannes Lydus has treated at large de publico Cursu, in his book de Mensibus. Vales.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Sedition which hapned at Alexandria, and after what manner Georgius was slain.

WE come now to mention what was tranfacted in the Churches at that time. In the great City Alexandria there hapned a disturbance upon this account. There was a place in that City, which had for a long time lain wast and neglected, (being filled with a great deal of filth,) wherein the Heathens had formerly celebrated their Mysteries to || Mithra, and had sacrificed men. This place being vacant and uſeleſs, Conſtantius had ſometime before beſtowed upon the Church of the Alexandrians. Georgius, deſirous to erect an Oratory therein, gave order that the place ſhould be cleanſed. Whilſt they were clearing of it, there was an † Adytum diſcovered, of a vaſt depth, wherein were hid the Myſteries of the Heathens. Which were the Skulls of many men, young and old, who, as report ſays, had heretofore been ſlain, at ſuch time as the Heathens made uſe of divinations by the inſpection of entrails, and performed Magick ſacrifices in order to the inchantment of mens ſouls. The Chriſtians therefore, upon their diſcovery of theſe things in the Adytum of the Temple of Mithra, made it their buſineſs to expoſe theſe Heatheniſh myſteries to the view and deriſion of all men. And they began forthwith to carry them in triumph as 'twere about the City, ſhowing the multitude mens bare Skulls. When the Heathens that were at Alexandria beheld this, being unable to endure this ignominious affront, they became highly enraged: and making uſe of what came next to hand for a weapon, they fell with great violence upon the Chriſtians, and deſtroyed many of them [a] by various ſorts of death. Some of them they killed with ſwords, others with clubs or ſtones. Others they ſtrangled with ropes. Some they crucified, inflicting this ſort of death on them deſignedly, in contumely to the Croſs [of Chriſt.] They wounded moſt of them. At which time, as it uſually happens in ſuch [riots,] they ſpared not their neereſt friends and relatives. But one Friend ſlew another, Brother [murdered] Brother, Parents their Children, outragiouſly embrewing their hands in one anothers blood. For which reaſon the Chriſtians left off cleanſing Muthra's Temple. But the Heathens dragg'd Georgius out of the Church, and having bound him to a Camel, tore him to pieces, after which they burnt him, together with the Camel.

CHAP. III.

That the Emperour incenſed at Georgius*'s murder, ſharply rebuked the* Alexandrians by his Letter.

BUT the Emperour highly reſented Georgius's murther, and by his Letter ſeverely reprehended the Citizens of Alexandria. There was a report ſpread abroad, as if they had done this to Georgius, who hated him upon Athanaſius's account. But my opinion is, that ſuch as entertain malice and hatred in their mindes, do uſually put themſelves into their company who make inſurrections againſt unjuſt perſons. The Emperour's Letter, 'tis certain, lays the blame upon the populace, rather than upon the Chriſtians. But Georgius was then, and had before [a] appeared, troubleſome and offenſive to all perſons. And for this reaſon the multitude was incenſed againſt him in ſuch an high degree. But, that the Emperour [as I ſaid] does rather blame the people, you may hear from the Letter it ſelf.

EMPEROUR CÆSAR JULIANUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to the Citizens of Alexandria.

Although you have no Reverence for Alexander the Builder of your City, and (which is more) for that Great God the moſt holy Serapis; yet how is it that you have forgot both that humanity, and * Decorum, due to mankind in general? We will add, [which is due] to Us alſo, to whom all the behaviour. Gods, eſpecially the Great Serapis, have aſſigned the Empire of the World. For whom it was fit you ſhould have reſerved the Cognizance of their caſe who had injured you. But perhaps, you were impoſed upon by anger and rage, which where it inhabits the mind, does uſually perpetrate moſt enormous facts. [b] But when you had repreſſed your fury, you afterwards added the commiſſion of an unjuſt act to what had on a ſudden been adviſedly reſolved by you. Nor were you of the Commonalty aſhamed of perpetrating thoſe things, for which you deſervedly hated them. For, declare to Us, [We adjure you] by Serapis, for what unjuſt acts were you incenſed againſt Georgius? You will undoubtedly make anſwer, becauſe he exaſperated Conſtantius of Bleſſed memory againſt us: alſo, becauſe he brought an Army into the ſacred City, and the [c] King of Egypt poſſeſt himſelf of Gods moſt holy Temple, and took away from thence the images, the conſecrated gifts, and the furniture in thoſe ſacred places. At which when (as it was meet) you were highly incenſed, and attempted to defend God, (or rather his goods and poſſeſſions,) from violence; He, contrary to juſtice, Law, and Piety, audaciouſly ſent armed men againſt you. [But] perhaps (in regard he was more afraid of Georgius than Conſtantius,) [d] He had made better proviſion for his own ſafety, had he at firſt behaved himſelf more moderately and civilly towards you, and not ſo tyrannically. You being therefore for theſe reaſons enraged againſt Georgius the enemy of the Gods, have again polluted your ſacred City, whenas you might have brought him to his Trial before the Judges. For by this means neither Murder, nor any other unlawful Fact had been committed: but juſtice had been equitably and exactly done, which would have preſerved you guiltleſs from all manner of wickedneſs, and would have puniſhed him who had impiouſly committed ſuch enormous Crimes, and [laſtly] would have curbed all thoſe who contemn the Gods, and diſreſpect ſo great Cities and ſuch a flouriſhing people; making the barbarity they practiſed againſt them the Præludium [as it were] of executed as a Criminal. If any one therefore has a mind to follow our Verſion, 'tis but inſerting one particle only, thus: ἴσως δὲ. But perhaps, &c. But Petavius (in his notes on this Epiſtle of Julianus, ſee the forementioned Edition) has produced another emendation from ſome M. SS. Copies; after this manner, ὃς αὐτὸν παρεφύλαξεν. who had preſerved himſelf. &c. Valeſ.

[b] In the Florentine and Sforzian M. SS. inſtead of [ἀναστείλας] the reading is [ἀναστείλασθες·] wherefore, I doubt not but this whole place is to be thus reſtored: εἶτα τῆς ὁρμῆς ἀναστείλασθες, τοῖς παροχρήμα βεβουλευμένοις καλῶς, ὕστερον ἐπῆλθες τὰ ἀδικήματα; But when you had repreſſed your fury, &c. Valeſ.

[c] He means Artemius, Commander in chief of the Forces in Egypt; as he is ſtiled by Theodoret, (book 3. chap. 17. Eccleſ. Hiſtor.) who relates, that he was deprived of his eſtate, and beheaded by Julian; becauſe, being Captain of Egypt in the reign of Conſtantius, he had broken many images. It was he, who allowed Georgius the Arian a guard of ſouldiers for his aſſiſtance, whilſt he deſtroyed the heathen Temples in Alexandria. See our notes on Amm. Marcellinus, book 22. pag. 228. The Martyrdom of this Artemius is extant in Simeon Metaphraſtes, in which many things are contained that do much illuſtrate the Hiſtory of thoſe times. Valeſ.

[d] In that Edition of Julianus's works publiſhed by Petavius, printed at Paris 1630, (where this Letter of Julianus's to the Alexandrians is reckoned to be his tenth Epiſtle:) and in Nicephorus (book 10. chap. 7.) the reading and punctation of this paſſage is thus: ἧσσον παρεφύλαττεν, εἰ μετριώτερον ὑμῶν καὶ πολιτικώτερον, ἀλλὰ μὴ τυραννικώτερον πόρρωθεν προσοῤῥέοντος. The beſt verſion of which paſſage (for no leſs than four have rendred it into Latine) is Langus's; who his rendred it thus: Qui melius ſibi ipſi conſuluiſſet, ſi moderate vobiſcum & civiliter, nec tam tyrannicè ab initio egiſſet. We have followed the ſame ſenſe in our rendition. But Chriſtophorſons Verſion is reprovable, both for his inſerting the word [γὰρ, for] contrary to the authority of all Copies; and alſo, becauſe he excuſes Artemius Commander of the Forces in Egypt, as if he had carried himſelf civilly and moderately at the beginning of his Government. It would certainly have been moſt abſurd, ſhould Julian have excuſed him, whom he had ordered to be

JULIANUS. their power. Compare therefore this Our Letter [e] with that We sent a while since, and consider the difference between them. How highly did We then commend you? But now, by the [immortal] Gods! When We should praise you, We cannot, by reason of your heinous offence. The people are so audacious as to tare a man piece-meal like dogs. Nor are they afterwards abashed or carefull of preserving their hands pure, that they * may stretch them out undefiled with bloud in the presence of the Gods. But Georgius deserved to undergo these sufferings. We might perhaps grant, [that he deserved] more horrid and acute tortures. And should you say, [he deserved them] upon your account, We also assent to that. But should you add, [he deserved to have this inflicted on him] by you; that We can in no wise allow. For you have Laws, which ought to be observed and revered by you all, as well privately as in publick. Now, suppose it happens, that some private persons do violate these Laws, yet the Community must be regulated by good Laws, and you are to pay obedience to those laws, and not transgress what has from the beginning been well and prudently constituted. It has hapned very fortunately for you, O ye Alexandrians! that you have perpetrated such a fact as this in Our Reign; Who, by reason of Our Reverence towards God, and upon account of our [f] Grandfather and Uncle whose name We bear, (who Governed Egypt and your City,) do retain a fraternal affection for you. Certainly, that power which suffers not it self to be disrespected, and such a Government as is severe, entire, and of an healthy constitution, [g] could not connive at such an audacious insolence in its Subjects, but would diligently purge out that deadly distemper as it were by a more acute Medicine. But We, for the reasons now mentioned, make use of that most mild and gentle Remedy in your case, [to wit] Exhortation and Discourse. To which, We are Confident, We shall find you more readily submissive, because (as We are informed) you are not only Grecians by original extract, [h] but do also still retain in your minds and endeavours a splendid and generous Character of that your noble Descent. [i] Let it be published to Our Citizens of Alexandria. Thus wrote the Emperour.

JULIANUS. [a] The reading in the Florent. M. S. and in Nicephorus is better than that in the vulgar Editions: it is thus [ὑπὲρ μικρῶν πρόσθεν ἐπέστειλα, with that we sent, &c.] Vales.

* Or, produce them undefiled with bloud before the Gods.

[f] In Nicephorus the reading is truer; where the term [πάππου Grandfather] is left out; and the clause is thus worded [διὰ τὸν θεῖον τὸν ἡμῶν καὶ ὁμώνυμον, upon account of our Uncle whose name we bear] He means Julian Exprefect of Egypt; concerning whom Amm. Marcellinus relates much. In Julianus's Epistles, both readings are retained thus: διὰ τὸν πάππον ἢ ἡμῶν καὶ τὸν θεῖον ὁμώνυμον, upon account of our Grandfather and Uncle whose name we bear. But this reading is not to be endured; for, what reason has Julianus to mention his Grandfather here? Sozomen does confirm Nicephorus's reading, as we may see, book 5. chap. 7. Eccles. Hist. Vales.

[g] I doubt not but this place should be thus worded; ὅπως ἂν ἡμῖν πεῖθοιεν τόλμημα; and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

[h] The reading should doubtless be [καὶ παῦν ἔτι, τῆς εὐγενείας ἐκείνης, &c. but do also still, &c.

[i] It must be [πεισθήτω Let it be published.] We have spoken concerning this clause (which was usually annext to the Emperours Edicts) in our Annotations on Eusebius, and think it superfluous to repeat it here. Vales.

CHAP. IV.

How, upon Georgius*'s being murdered,* Athanasius returned to Alexandria, and recovered his own Church.

NOt long after, Athanasius returning from his Exile, was kindly received by the people of Alexandria, who at that time expelled the Arians out of the Churches; and gave Athanasius possession of the Oratories. But the Arians assembled themselves in some obscure and mean houses, and Ordained Lucius in the place of Georgius. Such was the state of affairs then at Alexandria. JULIANUS.

CHAP. V.

Concerning Lucifer, and Eusebius.

AT the same time Lucifer and Eusebius were by an Imperial Order recalled from banishment. Lucifer was Bishop of Caralis, a City of Sardinia: Eusebius of Vercellæ, which is a City of the Lygurians in Italy, as we have said before. Both these persons therefore returning from Exile out of the Upper Thebais, [a] held a consult how they might hinder the impaired Laws of the Church from being violated and despised.

[a] Eusebius and Lucifer were not the only persons who entred into a consult about repairing the decayed state of the Church, and establishing the Canon of Faith; but other Bishops besides them, who by Julianus's Edict were at that time recalled from Exile: to wit, Hilarius, Asterius, and the rest, as Theodoret truly remarks, book 3. chap. 4. Eccles. Histor. These Prelates, moved thereto by a zeal to the Catholick Faith, took in hand to reduce Hereticks and Schismaticks to the path of Truth, and recall them to their former Concord. Therefore, what Baronius says, to wit, that Eusebius and Lucifer were created Legates of the Apostolick See by Liberius, in order to their repairing the state of the Church, can in no wise be true. For the same must have been said concerning Hilarius and the other Prelates. Besides, Rufinus does expresly disprove this. For he relates, that Eusebius and Lucifer were Commissionated with this Legantine power by the Alexandrian Synod. Vales.

CHAP. VI.

How Lucifer arriving at Antioch, Ordained Paulinus.

IT was concluded therefore, that Lucifer should go to Antioch in Syria, and Eusebius to Alexandria: that, by assembling a Synod together with Athanasius, they might confirm the opinions of the Church. [a] Lucifer sent a Deacon as his Substitute, by whom he promised his assent to what should be determined by the Synod. But he himself went to Antioch, and finds that Church in a great disturbance. For the people disagreed amongst themselves. For, not only the Arian Heresie, which had been introduced by Euzoïus, divided the Church: but (as we have said * before) Meletius's followers also, by reason of their affection towards their Master, differed from those who embraced the same Sentiments with them. Lucifer therefore, when he had constituted Paulinus Bishop over them, departed from thence again.

[a] Socrates borrowed this out of Rufinus; who (in book 1. chap. 27. Eccles. Histor.) has these words: Lucifer autem cùm exoraretur ab Eusebio, &c. But Lucifer, being entreated by Eusebius, that they might go together to see Athanasius at Alexandria, and in a general Consult with those Prelates that were left, determine concerning the state of the Church; refused to be present himself, but sends his Deacon in his Deputy. But from the Synodick Epistle, which Athanasius wrote in the name of the Alexandrian Synod to the Catholick Bishops which were in the City of Antioch, we are informed that Lucifer sent two of his Deacons to the Synod of Alexandria, Herennius and Agapetus; whom he sent after he had Ordained Paulinus Bishop of Antioch. For the Legates of Paulinus himself were present at this Synod, and subscribed Athanasius's Synodick Epistle. For these things were transacted thus. Soon after Eusebius's going to the Alexandrian Synod, Lucifer together with these two Bishops Cymatius and Anatolius (the one whereof was Bishop of Paltus, the other of Berœa,) created Paulinus Bishop of Antioch. Who, immediately after his Ordination, sent his Legates Maximus and Calamerus to the Alexandrian Synod. Also, Apollinaris Bishop of Laodicea (who had a peculiar Sect, and a Bishop of his own faction, at Antioch) sent his Legates at the same time. The Bishops of Egypt therefore who were met at Alexandria, when they had heard that Euſebius, Aſterius, and Lucifer's Legates were ſent by Lucifer, Cymatius, and Anatolius, and when they had admitted the Legates ſent by Paulinus and Apollinaris; departed every one to their own Sees, and gave order to Athanaſius and ſome other Biſhops who continued at Alexandria, that they ſhould write a Letter to the Biſhops convened at Antioch, concerning receiving the Hereticks and Schiſmaticks into communion, how they ought to behave themſelves in that affair. In obedience to their Order, Athanaſius wrote a Letter to the Biſhops convened at Antioch, to wit, to Lucifer, Euſebius, and Aſterius, (for theſe were now returned from the Alexandrian Synod:) Cymatius, and Anatolius. This Letter is extant in Athanaſius's works, which Baronius ſuppoſed to be the Synodick Epiſtle of the Alexandrian Synod. But 'tis manifeſt from the Contents of that Letter, that it was not written from the Synod it ſelf, but from Athanaſius; nor was it ſent to all the Biſhops, but to thoſe of Antioch in particular. Which may be concluded both from the inſcription it ſelf, and alſo from the Text of the whole Letter. For he treats therein concerning the affairs of the Antiochian Church only, as (beſides others) we are informed from this paſſage: Πάνλες πίνυν τὸν ἐυλομένυς εἰρηνδίειν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, μάλιτα τὸν ἐν τῇ παλαίᾳ σωαγομένυς, ἢ τὸν ἀπὸ τῆς ἀρειανῶν, προσκαλέσαδε παρ' ἑαυτοῖς. Which place Athanaſius's Tranſlatour has rendred ill: the import of it in Engliſh is this; invite therefore to you all thoſe that are deſirous of continuing in peace with you, eſpecially thoſe who celebrate their conventions in the Old City, and ſuch as [come] from the Arians. Athanaſius means thoſe that adhered to Meletius Biſhop of Antioch. For they, being Separatiſts from the Euſtathians, had their Religious meetings in the Palæa (that is, in the Old City,) as Theodoret atteſts, book 2. chap. 31. and book 3. chap. 4. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Athanaſius ſpeaks of the ſame perſons afterwards in the ſaid Epiſtle; and diſtinguiſhes thoſe that had their meetings in the Old City, from the followers of Paulinus, that is, the Euſtathians. For Paulinus was one of their number. Thoſe therefore that had their aſſemblies in the Palæa can be no other than Meletius's favourers, whom Athanaſius does moſt eſpecially commend. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

How Euſebius and Athanaſius accorded together, and aſſembled a Synod of Biſhops at Alexandria, wherein they expreſly declared, that the Trinity is Conſubſtantial.

BUt, as ſoon as Euſebius arrived at Alexandria, he, together with Athanaſius, was very diligent about convening a Synod. There aſſembled Biſhops out of ſeveral Cities, and conferred amongſt themſelves concerning many and moſt weighty matters. In this Synod they aſſerted the Divinity of the holy Ghoſt, and included him in the Conſubſtantial Trinity. They likewiſe determined that Chriſt at his incarnation aſſumed not only Fleſh but an humane Soul, which was alſo the opinion of the primitive Eccleſiaſticks. For they introduced not any new Doctrine, invented by them, into the Church, but [confirmed] thoſe points which Eccleſiaſtick tradition had from the beginning aſſerted, and which the Learnedeſt perſons amongſt the Chriſtians had demonſtratively affirmed. For ſuch Sentiments as theſe all the Antients in their diſputations concerning this point have left us in their Writings. Irenæus, Clemens, Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and Serapion preſident of the Church in Antioch, do aſſert this in the Books by them compoſed, [a] as an opinion by general conſent acknowledged, [to wit,] that Chriſt at his aſſumption of Fleſh was endowed with a [humane] Soul. Moreover, the Synod convened upon [b] Berillus's account, who was Biſhop of Philadelphia in Arabia, in their Letter to the ſaid Berillus hath maintained the ſame Doctrine. Origen alſo doth acknowledge every where, in his works which are extant, that Chriſt at his incarnation aſſumed an humane Soul: but more particularly, in the ninth Tome of his Comments upon Geneſis, he has explained the Myſtery hereof; where he hath copiouſly proved, that Adam is a type of Chriſt, and Eve of the Church. Holy Pamphilus, and Euſebius who borrowed his Sirname from him, perſons worthy to be credited, do atteſt this. For both theſe perſons (who club'd in their drawing up the Life of Origen in writing, and anſwered ſuch as were prepoſſeſt with a prejudice againſt that perſon, in thoſe famous Books, wherein they made an Apology in defence of him,) do affirm, that Origen was not the firſt perſon engaged in this Subject, but that he interpreted the myſtical tradition of the Church. But, thoſe Biſhops preſent at the Synod of Alexandria, omitted not their reſearches into this queſtion, to wit, concerning * Ouſia and † Hypoſtaſis. For Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spaine, (whom we formerly mentioned) who was ſent before by Conſtantine the Emperour, to compoſe the diſturbance at that time raiſed by Arius, being deſirous to root out the opinion of ‖ Sabellius the Libyan, raiſed a diſpute concerning Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis, which was the occaſion of another diſſention. But the Nicene Synod, which was ſoon after convened, made not the leaſt mention of this diſpute. Notwithſtanding, in regard ſome perſons were afterwards deſirous of contending about this matter, for that reaſon theſe determinations were made in this Synod concerning Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis. [c] It was reſolved by them, that theſe terms ought not to be uſed concerning God. For, [they ſaid that] the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt are one thing. Which words, the terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis are not condemned: but this only is aſſerted, that it is more ſafe to uſe the terms of the Nicene Creed, than theſe, of three Hypoſtaſis's and of one Hypoſtaſis. For the debate at that time was only concerning theſe words; ſome affirming there were three Hypoſtaſis's in the ſacred Trinity, as did the followers of Meletius: others, with Paulinus, profeſſing there was but one Hypoſtaſis. But no queſtion was then ſtarted concerning the term Ouſia. For both ſides aſſerted that there was one ſubſtance in the Trinity. How therefore can that which Socrates here ſays ſtand good, to wit, that it was Decreed in the Alexandrian Synod, that theſe terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis were not to be uſed concerning God? Perhaps alſo Sabinus (whoſe Collection Socrates had diligently peruſed) had led him into this miſtake. Valeſ.

* Eſſence, or Subſtance.

† Subſtence, Exiſtence, or Perſonality.

‖ See Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 7. chap. 6. note (b.)

This was the difference betwixt the Sabellian and Arian Hereſie; Sabellius confounded the perſons in the ſacred Trinity, Arius divided the ſubſtance.

[a] This clauſe is thus worded in the Greek [ὡς ὁμολογέμενον αὐτοῖς;] where the term [αὐτοῖς] ought in my judgment to be expunged, as being unneceſſarily inſerted here by ſome careleſs Tranſcriber out of the foregoing line, where it occurs. But Nicephorus (book 10. chap. 14. where he writes out this paſſage of Socrates) makes uſe of the term [ὁμοούσιον,] inſtead of [ὁμολογέμενον;] either becauſe that was the reading in his Copy; or elſe in regard he thought [ὁμολογέμενον] was to be ſo explained. Valeſ.

[b] Nicephorus (at the book and chapter now mentioned) calls this perſon Cyrillus. But, from the authority of the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. we have termed him Berillus. Our emendation is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion. Berillus was not Biſhop of Philadelphia, as Socrates ſays here, but of Boſtra (or of Boſtri) in Arabia: he denied Chriſt to have been God before his incarnation, as Euſebius informs us, book 6. chap. 33. of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; where ſee note (a.) That paſſage of Origens muſt be underſtood concerning this Hereſie of Berillus's, which occurs in his Comment on the Epiſtle to Titus: where his words are theſe: Sed & eos qui hominem dicunt Dominum Jeſum, &c. Alſo thoſe, who affirm the Lord Jeſus to be a man fore-known, and predeſigned, who before his coming in the fleſh had no peculiar exiſtence of his own, but that being born man he had the Deity of the Father only in him; theſe perſons, I ſay, cannot, without great danger, be accounted members of the Church. This paſſage occurs alſo in Pamphilus's Apologetick in defence of Origen. And Gennadius has mentioned it, in his book De Dogmatibus Eccleſiaſticis, cap. 4. Valeſ.

[c] The Acts of the Synod of Alexandria are not now extant; but 'tis ſufficiently apparent, both from that Synodick Epiſtle which Athanaſius wrote in the name of that Council, and alſo from hence, becauſe the Great Athanaſius was preſent at that Synod, that what Socrates here ſays is falſe. For, as to the Synodick Epiſtle, there occurs no ſuch paſſage in that, as this, that the terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis are not to be uſed as often as we ſpeak concerning God. Nor, would Athanaſius ever have ſuffered that to have been determined in his Synod, which does manifeſtly contradict the Nicene Creed. For in that Creed the term Ouſia does occur. Socrates ſeems to have been deceived by this paſſage in the Synodick Epiſtle: Πάνλες τὲ τῇ τὸ Θεὸ χάριτι, &c. And, by the grace of God, all perſons, after ſuch interpretations of thoſe terms, unanimouſly agreed, that that Creed, which the Fathers made profeſſion of at Nice, was better and more accurate, and that in future, it was ſufficient, that the terms thereof ſhould be made uſe of. In which words, the terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis are not condemned: but this only is aſſerted, that it is more ſafe to uſe the terms of the Nicene Creed, than theſe, of three Hypoſtaſis's and of one Hypoſtaſis. For the debate at that time was only concerning theſe words; ſome affirming there were three Hypoſtaſis's in the ſacred Trinity, as did the followers of Meletius: others, with Paulinus, profeſſing there was but one Hypoſtaſis. But no queſtion was then ſtarted concerning the term Ouſia. For both ſides aſſerted that there was one ſubſtance in the Trinity. How therefore can that which Socrates here ſays ſtand good, to wit, that it was Decreed in the Alexandrian Synod, that theſe terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis were not to be uſed concerning God? term term Ousia was not so much as mentioned in the sacred Scriptures: and, that the * Apostle, obliged thereto upon a necessity of [delivering some] opinions, had not rightly used the word Hypostasis. But they Decreed, that these terms were to be admitted of upon another account, to wit, when they refute Sabellius's opinion, least, for want of expressive words, we should suppose [the Trinity to be] one thing called by a triple name; but we must rather believe every one [d] of those named in the Trinity to be truly God in his proper Person. These were the determinations of the Synod at that time. But nothing hinders, but we may briefly declare our knowledge concerning [the terms] Ousia and Hypostasis. Such persons amongst the Greeks as were Expositours of their Philosophy, have given various definitions of Ousia; but they have not made the least mention of Hypostasis. [e] Irenæus Grammaticus, in his Alphabetical Lexicon entitled Atticistes, affirms this word [Hypostasis] to be a barbarous term: For it is not [says he] used by any of the Antients: but should it be any where found occurring, it is not taken in that sense wherein 'tis now used. For, in Sophocles (in [his Tragedy entitled] Phœnix,) the term Hypostasis signifies Treachery. In Menander [it imports] Sauces; [f] as if any one should term the Lees in an Hogshead of Wine Hypostasis. But, you must know, that although the Antient Philosophers did not make use of this term Hypostasis, yet the more modern Philosophick Writers used it frequently instead of * Ousia. Moreover, they have given us (as we said) various definitions of Ousia. But if Ousia may be circumscribed by a definition, how can we properly make use of this term in reference to God, who is incomprehensible? Evagrius, in [his piece intitled] Monachicus, dissuades us from discoursing rashly and inconsiderately concerning God. But he altogether forbids the defining of the Divinity, in regard it is a most † Simple thing. For definitions, says he, belong to things that are compounded. The same Authour delivers these very words. Every proposition, says he, has either a Genus which is predicated, or a Species, or a Differentia, or a Proprium, or an Accidens, or what is compounded of these; but none of these can be supposed to be in the sacred Trinity. Let that therefore which is inexplicable, be adored with silence. Thus [argues] Evagrius, concerning whom we shall speak hereafter. But, although we may seem to have made a digression by relating these things; yet we have mentioned them here, in regard they are useful and pertinent to the subject of our History.

* They mean, I suppose those words of the Apostle at Hebr. 1. 3. Χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, the Character of his Subsistence, or (as our English Version words it) the express image of his person. Some of the Antients were very cautious about acknowledging three Hypostases in the Deity. Particularly St Jerome, who thought that the term Hypostasis in this Text signified Substantia: and therefore in his Version 'tis thus rendred figura substantiæ ejus, the figure of his substance. See Dr Owens account of this phrase, in his Exposition on the Hebrews, pag. 55, &c. Edit. London. 1668.

[d] Instead of [ὀνομάτων, of the names,] which is the common reading; the Florentine M. S. words it thus [ὀνομαζομένων, of those named.] But Nicephorus maintains the common reading; for he has recorded this passage of Socrates thus: ἀλλὰ ἔκρυπτον ἐν τῇ τριάδι τῶν ἀγαμένων ὀνομάτων ἐν ἰδίᾳ ὑποστάσει θεολογοῦντο τρεῖς διαφυῶν. Which his Learned Translatour Langus has thus rendred: Sed tribus usurpatis nominibus, res quæque in Trinitate tripliciter distincta peculiari subsistentiâ suâ intelligatur. But I cannot approve of this rendition, in regard it recedes too far from the Authours words. Langus was puzled with these words [ὀνομάτων, of the names,] and not without reason. For the bare name of the Father, Son, and holy Ghost, is neither believed, nor asserted to be God; but the things [or persons] signified by those names. Wherefore, the reading in the Florentine M. S. is, in my judgment, to be preferred before the vulgar reading; and we have rendred it accordingly. Valesius.

[e] Irenæus Grammaticus was an Alexandrian, the Scholar of Heliodorus Metricus, who by a Latine name was called Minucius Pacatus. He wrote many books concerning the propriety of the Attick Language. For he compiled three Books of Attick names, and as many more de Atticâ consuetudine in dictione & in prosodia, which were alphabetically digested: he composed one Book also de Atticismo, as Suidas relates in his Lexicon. Valesius.

[f] Nicephorus (book 10. chap. 15.) reads this passage otherwise. For, instead of [ὡς εἴ τις λέγοι, as if any one should term] he words it thus [ᾧ ἄλλος τινὶ ἐν πίθῳ τρύγα φησίν· And another stiles it the Lees in an Hogshead.] Epiphanius Scholasticus translates this place thus: Apud Menandrum vero veluti fæces quæ ex vino colliguntur in dolio, ὑπόστασιν, id est, subsistentiam designare dicit. But, I think that there is another sense of these words, to wit, that Menander should term Sauce Hypostasis, because it settles in the bottom of the dish, like Lees, or Sediment, in an Hogshead. Valesius.

CHAP. VIII.

AT the same time Athanasius recited the Apologetick he had formerly made concerning his own Flight, in the audience of those that were present. Some passages whereof, being useful and profitable, I will here insert, and leave the whole Book, in regard 'tis large, to be inquired out and perused by the Studious. Behold [says he] these are the audacious villanies of those impious wretches. These are their practises, and yet they blush not at the mischiefs they have formerly [a] contrived against us, but do even at this time accuse us, because we were able to escape their murdering hands. Yea rather, they are sorely troubled, because they have not quite dispatcht us. In fine, under a pretence and colour they upbraid us with fear, but are ignorant that whilst they make a noise about this, they retort the crime upon themselves. For, if it be bad to fly, it is much worse to pursue. For, the one absconds that he may not be murdered: but the other pursues with a design to murder. Yea, the Scripture informs us that we must fly. But he that seeks an occasion to murder, violates the Law, and does himself give [others] an occasion of flying. If therefore they upbraid us with our flight, they should rather be ashamed of their own pursuit. Let them leave plotting, and those that fly will soon desist from making their escape. But they cease not from acting their own villanies; but do all they can to apprehend: being very sensible, that the flight of such as are pursued is a great evidence against them that pursue. For no body flies from a meek and good-natured person, but rather from one that is of a barbarous and malitious disposition. And therefore, * Every one that was discontented and in debt fled from Saul to David. Wherefore, these persons also endeavour to slay such as conceal themselves, that there may seem to be no evidence to convince them of their wickedness. But in this case also these mistaken persons seem to be blinded. For by how much the more manifest the flight is, by so much will the slaughters caused by their treacheries, and the banishments be more evidently exposed to the view of all men. For, whether they kill, death will make a greater noise against them; or again, whether they banish, they do in every place † erect monuments of their own injustice against themselves. Were they therefore sound as to their intellectuals, they might perceive themselves intangled herein, and egregiously mistaken in their own measures. But in regard they are infatuated, for that reason they are incited to persecute, and whilst they seek

ſeek to murder others, perceive not their own impiety. For, if they reproach ſuch as conceal themſelves from thoſe that ſeek to murder them, and calumniate ſuch as fly from their purſuers, what will they do when they ſee Jacob flying from his brother Eſau; and Moſes retreating into [the Country] of * Madian for fear of Pharaoh? what anſwer will theſe Bablers make to David who fled from Saul, (when he †ſent [Meſſengers] from his own houſe to murder him,) hid himſelf in a Cave, and changed his countenance, untill he had paſſed by * Abimelech, and avoided the treachery? Or, what will theſe fellows, who are ready to utter any thing, ſay, when they ſee the Great Elias (who called upon God and raiſed a dead man) hiding himſelf for fear of Ahab, and flying becauſe of Jezebels Menaces? At which time the Sons of the Prophets alſo, being ſought for [to be ſlain,] abſconded, concealing themſelves in Caves with † Abdia. Or have they not read theſe paſſages, in regard they are antient? But they have alſo quite forgot what is related in the Goſpel. For the Diſciples for fear of the Jews retreated and hid themſelves. And || Paul, when he was ſought for at Damaſcus by the Governour, was let down from the wall in a basket, and eſcaped the hands of him that ſought him. Since therefore the Scripture records theſe things concerning the Saints, what excuſe can they invent for their raſh precipitancy? For, if they upbraid [them] with timidity, that audacious reproach recoyls upon themſelves being madmen as it were. But if they calumniate thoſe [Holy] perſons as having done this contrary to the will of God, they [demonſtrate themſelves] to be altogether unskilled in the Scriptures. For in the Law there was a command that * Cities of refuge ſhould be appointed, to the intent that ſuch as were ſought for to be put to death, might ſome way or other be enabled to ſecure themſelves. But, in the conſummation of ages, when the Word of the Father (he who ſpake to Moſes,) came himſelf into the world, he did again give this command, ſaying, † But when they perſecute you, flee from this City to another. And a little after he ſays: * When ye therefore ſhall ſee the abomination of deſolation, ſpoken of by Daniel the prophet, ſtand in the holy place, (who ſo readeth, let him underſtand:) then let them who be in Judea flee into the mountaines. Let him who is on the houſe-top, not come down to take any thing out of his houſe. Let not him who is in the field, return back to take his clothes. When therefore the Saints underſtood theſe things they entred upon ſuch a courſe of life as was agreeable hereto. For, the ſame commands which the Lord has now given, he had delivered by the Saints before his coming in the fleſh. And this is a rule for [all] men, which leads them to perfection, [that is] To do what ever God hath commanded. Upon this account, the Word himſelf alſo, (made man for our ſakes,) when he was ſought for, vouchſafed to conceal himſelf, as we do; and being perſecuted again, he [was pleaſed] to fly, and avoid the conſpiracy. For, it became Him, that as by hungring, thirſting, and undergoing theſe afflictions, ſo by this means alſo he ſhould demonſtrate himſelf to be made man. At the very beginning, as ſoon as he was made man, he himſelf, being as yet but a child, gave this command to Joſeph by an Angel, * Ariſe, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt. For Herod will ſeek the young childs life. And after the death of Herod, it appears, that (for fear of his Son Archelaus,) he retired to Nazareth. Afterwards, when he had demonſtrated himſelf to be God, and had healed the withered hand, the Phariſees went out and entred into a conſult againſt him, * how they might deſtroy him. But when Jeſus knew it, he withdrew himſelf from thence. Moreover, when he had raiſed Lazarus from the dead, † From that day forth (ſays the Evangeliſt) they took counſel for to put him to death. Jeſus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews: but went thence unto a country near to the wilderneſs. Further, when our Saviour had ſaid, || Before Abraham was, I am; the Jews took up ſtones to caſt at him: But Jeſus hid himſelf, and went out of the temple. And going thorow the midſt of them, went away, and ſo eſcaped. When therefore they ſee theſe things, [b] or rather hear them, (for they ſee them not,) ought they not, according as 'tis written, to be burnt with fire, in regard they deſign and ſpeak the contrary to what our Saviour did and taught. In fine, when John had ſuffered Martyrdom, and his diſciples had buried his body; * When Jeſus heard of it, he departed thence by Ship into a deſart place apart. Theſe things our Lord did, and thus he taught. But I wiſh theſe perſons could [be perſwaded to] be even in ſuch a manner aſhamed, that they would confine their raſhneſs to men only, and not proceed to ſuch an heighth of madneſs, as to charge our Saviour with fearfulneſs, [c] againſt Whom they have once already deſignedly invented Blaſphemies. But no man will ever tolerate this their madneſs: but rather by their ignorance in the Goſpels they will be confuted by all men. For, there is a rational and true cauſe for ſuch a retreat and flight as this is: which as the Evangeliſts have recorded, * was made uſe of by our Saviour. And from hence we ought to ſuppoſe, that the very ſame [cauſe of flight] † was made uſe of by all the Saints. For what ever is recorded concerning our Saviour as man, the ſame ought to be referred to mankind in general. For he aſſumed our nature, and demonſtrated in himſelf † ſuch affections and diſpoſitions of mind as are agreeable to our infirmity. Which John has ſet forth in theſe words: * Then they ſought to take him: but no man laid hands on him, becauſe his hour was not yet come. Yea, before that hour came, he himſelf ſaid to his mother, ‡ Mine hour is not yet come. And to thoſe who were called his brethren [he ſaid] * My time is not yet come. Again, when the time was come, he ſaid to his diſciples, || Sleep on now, and take your reſt: for behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man ſhall be betrayed into the hands of ſinners. Neither therefore permitted he himſelf to [b] Inſtead of [μᾶλλον δὲ κρίναντες, or rather conſider them] we follow the reading in the Edition of Athanaſius, which is thus [μᾶλλον δὲ κἂν εἰκάσῃς, ἐπεὶ μὴ βλέπουσι, πῶς καὶ τὸ γεγραμμένον ἐθέλησουσι πυρὶ καυθῆναι, &c. or rather hear them, (for they ſee them not,) ought they not, according as 'tis written, to be burnt with fire, &c. For the Arians could not then ſee thoſe things, which had been done long before their age. After the same manner also did the blessed Martyrs consult their own preservation in the Persecutions which now and then hapned. When they were Persecuted, they fled, and continued in places of concealment. But when found out, they suffered Martyrdom.* Thus has Athanasius discourst in his Apologetick concerning his own flight.

CHAP. IX.

How (after the Synod at Alexandria [made up] of those who asserted the Homoöusian Faith,) Eusebius, returning to Antioch, found the Catholicks disagreeing there upon account of Paulinus's Ordination; and being unable to bring them to an agreement, he departed from thence.

BUt Eusebius Bishop of Vercellæ, immediately after the Synod, went from Alexandria to Antioch. Where finding Paulinus Ordained by Lucifer, and the Populace disagreeing amongst themselves, (For the followers of Meletius had their assemblies apart by themselves:) he was troubled, because all people did not unanimously agree to the Ordination that had been made, and in his own thoughts disapproved of what was done. But, by reason of the reverence and respect he bore to Lucifer, he held his peace, and went away, having promised, that he would rectifie what had been done, in a Synod of Bishops. Afterwards, he used his utmost diligence to unite the dissenters, but could not effect it. In the interim Meletius returned from his Exile. And finding his followers celebrating their assemblies apart by themselves, he headed them. But Euzoïus, a Prelate who embraced the Arian Tenets, was possessed of the Churches. Paulinus had only one of the lesser Churches within the City, out of which Euzoïus had not ejected him, by reason of the reverential respect he had for him. But Meletius had his meetings without the gates of the City. After this manner therefore did Eusebius depart from Antioch at that time. But when Lucifer understood that his Ordination was not approved by Eusebius, he lookt upon it as an injury, and was highly incensed. Wherefore he separated himself from Eusebius's communion, and out of a pertinacious contentiousness presumed to reprove what had been determined by the Synod. These things being transacted in a time of sadness and discord, caused many persons to separate from the Church. For there sprung up another new Heresie, [the followers whereof were termed] Luciferians. But Lucifer was not in a capacity of satisfying his anger. For he was bound by his own [a] promises, by which (being sent by his Deacon) he had engaged that he would assent to the Synods determinations. Wherefore, he retained the Ecclesiastick Faith, and departed into Sardinia to his own See. But such as at first were agrieved together with him, do hitherto continue Separatists from the Church. Further, Eusebius, like a good Physitian, travelled over the Eastern Provinces, where he perfectly recovered those that were weak in the Faith, teaching and instructing them in the doctrines of the Church. Departing from thence, he arrived in Illyricum, and afterwards went into Italy, where he took the same course.

JULIANUS.

[a] The term here in the original is [ἀπολογίας, defences,] which is in no wise agreeable here. Therefore, instead thereof, Nicephorus substituted these words [τῶν ἰδίων πίστεων, by his own nets.] In my judgement, it should be [τῶν ὁμολογίας, by his own promises;] and so Epiphanius read it, as appears by his Version. But Rufinus (book 1. chap. 30. Eccles. Hist.) has this passage only; sed constringebatur, &c. But he was bound by the bond of his Legate, who by his authority had subscribed in the Council. Afterwards, Rufinus adds these words concerning Lucifer, si vero recepisset Alexandrini decreta concilii, &c. But, had he admitted of the determinations of the Alexandrian Council, he saw that all his attempts must have been frustrated. But I see no reason why Lucifer should reject the Alexandrian Synods determinations. For that Synod had approved of Paulinus's ordination, as I have remarkt before from Athanasius's Synodick Epistle. And whereas Eusebius subscribed that Epistle, he also may seem to have approved of Lucifers Ordination of Paulinus. Yet, the same Eusebius coming to Antioch after the Alexandrian Council, and perceiving the disagreement between the Catholicks, would communicate with neither party, as Rufinus attests in the forequoted book and chapter: that is, he abstained as well from Paulinus's as Meletius's communion. Vales.

CHAP. X.

Concerning Hilarius Bishop of Poictiers.

BUt Hilarius Bishop of Poictiers (which is a City of the second Aquitania) had prevented him, having before-hand laid the foundations of such points as were agreeable to the Catholick Faith [in the minds] of the Bishops in Italy and Gallia. For he, returning first from banishment, arrived in those Countries before him. Both of them therefore vigorously defended the Faith. But Hilarius, being a person endowed with a great stock of Eloquence, asserted the Homoöusian opinion in Books which he wrote in the Latine tongue: wherein he sufficiently confirmed * that Faith, and powerfully confuted the Arian Tenets. These things hapned a little after the recalling of those who had been banished. But you must know, that at the same time, Macedonius, Eleusius, Eustathius, and Sophronius (and [the rest of that Sect] who were all called by one general name Macedoniani) held frequent [a] Synods in various places. And having called together those who in Seleucia were followers of their opinion, they Anathematized the Prelates of the other party, I mean, the Acacians. They also rejected the Ariminum Creed, and confirmed that which had been recited at Seleucia. Which Creed was the same that had before been set forth at Antioch, according as we have remarked in our foregoing * Book. And when by some persons they were asked this question: You who are termed Macedoniani; if you differ in your Sentiments from the Acacians, how comes it to pass, that you have [b] communicated with them [c] untill now, as which was with good reason objected against the Macedonians, that whereas they dissented from the Acacians in the Draught of the Creed, and were deposed by them in the Seleucian and Constantinopolitan Synod; yet notwithstanding this, they communicated with them. Basilius, 'tis certain, accuses them upon this account in his 73 Epistle ad suos Monachos. Basilius's words there are to be understood concerning Eustathius and the Macedonians, who blamed Basilius, because he had heretofore communicated with Eudoxius, as 'tis apparent from his 79th Epistle to Eustathius. Vales.

That is, the Homoüsian Faith.

[a] Concerning these little Synods, or Conventicles, of the Macedoniani, this passage in Basilius's 72 Epistle, Ad Evæsenos is to be understood; πίστις παρ' ἡμῖν οὐκ ἄλλη καὶ ἐν Σελευκείᾳ, &c. There is not amongst us one faith at Seleucia, another at Constantinople: a third at Zela, a fourth at Lampsacum, and a fifth at Rome. Vales.

[c] Nicephorus understood this passage of Socrates otherwise; he words it thus: πάλαι ποτὲ νῦν τοῖς πρὸ ἀμαχίου διαφέρονται, ὁμόφρονες αὐτοῖς· τὸ πρότερον καὶ κοινωνοὶ καθεστῶτες, i. e. Why do you now dissent from the Acacians, with whom you have heretofore agreed and communicated? Nicephorus therefore seems to have taken these words [ἄχει νῦν, untill now] for [ἄχει τότε, hitherto.] But I like not this exposition, and am of opinion, that [ἐκοινωνεῖτε, did communicate] is by Socrates used instead of [κοινωνεῖτε, do communicate.]

Which Baſilius does mightily confirm in his forequoted Epiſtle, and Epiphanius (in Hæreſ. Semiarian.) Where he ſays, that although the Semiarians were divided into ſeveral factions, yet they diſſented in words only, but in reallity agreed in the ſame opinion: in ſo much that it would be very difficult to aſſign the point wherein they diſagreed amongſt themſelves. But upon a more mature conſideration of the matter, I judge Nicephorus's ſenſe of theſe words to be truer. For Socrates ſays, that Eleuſius, Euſtathius, and the reſt of the Macedonians did at this time (that is, in the Reign of Julian) firſt make up a Body of their own Sect, and, having convened Synods, did confirm the Creed of the Antiochian Synod, and anathematize Acacius with his followers: and that when they were queſtioned by ſome, why they had communicated with the Acacians (whoſe Creed they did reject) ſo long after the Seleucian Synod; they returned this anſwer by Sophronius; to wit; the Weſtern Prelates erred, in regard they aſſerted the Homoüſian Faith: the Eaſterns, being followers of Aëtius's opinion, profeſſed the Son to be diſlike the Father: but we keeping the middle way, do affirm the Son to be like the Father according to his ſubſiſtence. This is Sophronius's anſwer. Which that it may ſatisfie the queſtion propoſed, this muſt neceſſarily be underſtood, to wit; Since therefore the Acacians entertained the ſame Sentiments, it need not be wondred at, that we have hitherto held communion with them. Acacius, 'tis certain, did profeſs the Son to be like the Father, in the ſame manner as the Macedonians did. See Sozomen, book 5. chap. 14. Valeſ.

JULIANUS. being of the ſame opinion with you? To this demand they returned an anſwer by Sophronius Biſhop of Pompeiopolis a City of Paphlagonia, after this manner: The Weſtern Biſhops, ſays he, were infected (as it were with a diſeaſe) with the Homoüſian opinion. Aëtius in the Eaſt, having adulterated [the doctrine of the Faith,] introduced [an opinion whereby he maintained] a diſſimilitude of ſubſtance [between the Son and the Father.] Both theſe opinions were impious. For, the Weſtern Biſhops did raſhly knit together in one the diſtinct perſons of the Father and Son, binding them together with that Cord of iniquity, the term Homoüſios. Aëtius wholly ſeparated that affinity of nature which the Son hath to the Father, by [introducing] this expreſſion, Unlike according to * Eſſence. Since therefore, [the Aſſertours of] both theſe opinions fall into the higheſt extreams of oppoſition, the middle way between theſe two aſſertions ſeemed to us to be more agreeable to truth and piety, whereby 'tis affirmed, that the Son is like to the Father † according to Subſiſtence. [d] This is the anſwer which the Macedoniani returned by Sophronius to that queſtion, as Sabinus ſays in his Collection of the Acts of Synods. But, whereas they accuſe Aëtius as being the Authour of the * Anomoian opinion, and not Acacius, 'tis apparent, they do fallaciouſly corrupt the truth, thinking to avoid the Arians on the one ſide, and the Homoüſians on the other. For they are confuted by their own words, that through a deſire of innovating they have made a ſeparation from them both. But let thus much be ſaid concerning theſe [perſons.]

† Καθ' ὁμοίωσιν; See chap. 7. of this book.

[d] This place is very intricate. The anſwer of the Macedoniani (which Socrates has related above, out of Sabinus) is obſcure enough.

* See book 2. chap. 20. note (b.)

But the cenſure and reprehenſion of that anſwer (which Socrates now ſubjoyns,) ſeems to be much more obſcure. Nor does Nicephorus give us any aſſiſtance here; for he has tranſcribed this paſſage of Socrates's almoſt word for word. Notwithſtanding, we will endeavour to produce ſomething in order to the illuſtration of this place. This therefore is our Sentiment. The Macedoniani were asked, why they diſſented from Acacius, with whom they had before held communion. In their anſwer they blamed the Homoüſians and Aëtius. This is nothing to the purpoſe, ſays Socrates. For you were not queſtioned concerning Aëtius, but concerning Acacius; you do meerly ſophiſticate: for Acacius, as well as you, does condemn Aëtius's opinion. Now, whereas you condemn Aëtius's opinion, you are not for that reaſon any whit leſs Hereticks. For by your own words you are convinced of Novelty or Hereſie, whilſt you aſſert the Son to be like the Father according to ſubſiſtence. Wherein you diſſent as well from the Catholick followers of the Nicene Creed, (who profeſs him to be of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father,) as from the Arians, who aſſerted him to be a Creature, or diſlike in reſpect of his Subſtance. 'Tis certain, Theodoret (book 4. Hæret. Fabul.) does ſay, that Macedonius aſſerted the Son of God to be every way like to the Father, and that he was the firſt who invented the term Homoiouſios. He was therefore one of the Semiarians, as well as Acacius. Valeſ.

CHAP. XI.

How the Emperour Julianus exacted money from the Chriſtians.

But, the Emperour Julianus, having at the beginning of his Reign ſhown himſelf mild and gratious to all perſons, in proceſs of time did not demonſtrate himſelf to be of ſuch a like temper towards every one. For whenever there hapned any occaſion of calumniating Conſtantius, he moſt readily granted the Chriſtians requeſts. But when no ſuch [reflections] were to be made, he made all men apparently ſenſible of that private hatred which he had conceived againſt the Chriſtians in general. Forthwith therefore he iſſues out an Order, that the Church of the Novatians in Cyzicum, which had been totally demoliſhed by [a] Enzoius, ſhould be rebuilt; impoſing a moſt burthenſome penalty upon Eleuſius Biſhop of that City, if he did not perfect that building at his own charge within the ſpace of two months. He alſo promoted gentiliſm with his utmoſt endeavour. And (as we have ſaid before) he opened the Pagan Temples. Yea, he himſelf did publickly offer ſacrifice to the Genius of the City Conſtantinople in the [b] Baſilica, where the image of the Publick Genius was erected.

[a] It muſt be [ὑπὸ ἐλαδσίς, by Euleuſius] as 'tis apparent from the following words. So Chriſtophorſon found the reading to be, as is evident from his Verſion. See Sozomen. Valeſ.

[b] He means I ſuppoſe, that Baſilica [or Cathedral] which was in the fourth Ward of the City Conſtantinople. For this was ſimply and abſolutely called The Cathedral. The other was termed the Theodoſian Cathedral, which ſtood in the ſeventh Ward of the City, as we are informed from The old deſcription of that City. In the former Baſilica therefore, the Image of the City Conſtantinople's publick Genius had heretofore been placed. For ſo theſe words of Socrates [τῆς κωνσταντίου πόλεως τύχη δημοσία] muſt be rendred. For the Greeks do uſually call that τύχη, which the Latines term Genius; and τυχία are the Temples of the publick Genius; ſee Euſeb. book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, chap. 11. note (q.) Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Maris Biſhop of Chalcedon.

Moreover, at this time, Maris Biſhop of Chalcedon in Bithynia being led by the hand into the Emperours preſence, (for he was very aged, and had that diſtemper in his eyes termed the Pin and Web:) when he came before him, he reproved him ſharply, terming him an impious perſon, an Apoſtate, and an Atheiſt. The Emperour returned him opprobrious language for his reproaches, calling him blind fellow. And your Galilæan God (ſaid he) will never cure you. (For Julianus did uſually term Chriſt The Galilæan; and Chriſtians Galilæans.) But Maris anſwered the Emperour with a greater confidence: I thank God (ſaid he) for depriving me of mine eyes, that I might not behold your face, who have fal'n into ſuch horrid impieties. The Emperour made no return hereto, [a] but was ſeverely revenged on him [afterwards.] For when he perceived, that thoſe who ſuffered Martyrdom in the Reign of Diocletian, were honoured by the Chriſtians; and having obſerved that many perſons were very deſirous of being made Martyrs, as if he reſolved to be [a] In the Florent. and Sforſtian M. SS. the reading here is [ἐν τῷτο μέλλησε χεῖρο, but revenged it afterwards:] which reading pleaſes me beſt. For Julianus was not afterwards in any inſtance revenged upon Maris in particular; but he perſecuted all the Chriſtians in general, with that ſort of perſecution which Socrates relates. Nicephorus met with the ſame reading in his Copy: for thus he has expreſt this paſſage in Socrates: δεινῶς δὲ λίαν τὸ πρᾶγμα μέλλησε χεῖρο, but he was in a very horrid manner revenged for that thing. Valeſ.

JULIANUS. revenged on the Christians upon this very account, he took another course. He declined indeed that extremity of cruelty [practised] in the Reign of Diocletian: nevertheless, he did not wholly abstain from [raising] a Persecution. For I call that a Persecution, when those who live peaceably, are by any means whatever disquieted and molested. Now, he disturbed them after this manner: He made a Law, that the Christians should not be allowed an education in humane Literature; least (said he) when they have sharpned their tongues, they should with a greater readiness answer the * Disputants amongst the Heathens.

* Or, Logicians.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the tumult raised by the Heathens against the Christians.

HE also issued out an Order, that those who would not relinquish the Christian Religion, and come and offer sacrifice to Idols, should not hold any Military imploy about Court. Nor would he permit the Christians to be Governours of Provinces, saying, that their Law forbad the use of the sword against such delinquents as had deserved a capital punishment. Moreover, he induced many persons, partly by flatteries, and partly by gifts, to sacrifice. Immediately therefore both those who were true Christians, and also they who pretended [the profession of that Religion, being tryed] in a furnace as it were, were apparently manifested to all men. For such as sincerely and cordially professed Christianity, willingly left their Military Offices, being resolved to suffer any thing, rather then renounce Christ. Amongst whom were Jovianus, Valentinianus, and Valens, all which persons afterwards wore the Imperial Crown. But others, who were not found Christians, [a] who preferred riches and Secular Honours before the true felicity, without the least delay submitted and offered sacrifice. One of which number was Ecebolius, a Sophista of Constantinople. Who, making himself conform to the dispositions and humours of the Emperours, was in Constantius's time pretendedly a very zealous Christian: In Julianus's Reign he seemed a very fierce assertour of Gentilism. After Julianus's death, he would needs profess Christianity again: For, having prostrated himself before the door of the Oratory, he cried out, Trample upon me who am salt without savour. This is the true Character of Ecebolius, a person, as at first, so afterwards, light and inconstant. At that time the Emperour, desirous to be revenged upon the Persians for the frequent incursions they had made into the Roman Territories in the Reign of Constantius, went in great hast through Asia into the East. But being sensible of the many mischiefs which accompany a War, and that a vast Treasure is required [to carry it on,] without which it cannot be commodiously managed; he craftily devised a way to extort money from the Christians. For he imposed a pecuniary mulct upon those that refused to sacrifice: and the exaction was very severe upon such as were sincere Christians. For every one was compelled to pay proportionably to his estate. And thus the Emperour, by an unjust collection of ill-gotten money, JULIANUS. was in a short time mightily enriched. For that Law was put in execution, not only where the Emperour was present, but in those places also to which he came not. At the same time also the Pagans made incursions upon the professours of Christianity: and there was a great conflux of such as termed themselves Philosophers. Moreover, they constituted certain detestable Rites; in so much that they sacrificed young children, as well males, as females, inspected their entrails, and tasted of their flesh. And these were their practises, both in other Cities, and also at Athens and Alexandria. At which City likewise they framed a calumnious accusation against Athanasius the Bishop, acquainting the Emperour that he would destroy that City and all Egypt, and therefore that it was requisite he should be driven from that City. The [b] Prefect also of Alexandria, according to the Emperours command, made an attempt against him.

[a] In stead of [ὅσοι τὰ χρήματα, who preferred riches, &c.] I suppose it should be [ὡς τὰ χρήματα, in regard they preferred, &c. [Which emendation is confirmed by Epiphan. Scholasticus's Version; and by Nicephorus's expressing of this passage, in his tenth book, chap. 23. Vales.

[b] The name of this Prefect of Egypt [who in the Greek is called Prefect of Alexandria] was Hermogenes, as we are informed from Julian's 23d Epistle. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning Athanasius's Flight.

BUT * he Fled again, saying these words to his intimate acquaintance, Friends, let us recede a little while; for 'tis a small cloud, which will soon vanish. Having spoken these words, with all possible celerity he went aboard of a ship, and passing over the Nile, fled into Egypt. They who endeavoured to apprehend him, made a close pursuit after him. When he understood that his pursuers were not far behind, those that accompanied him, perswaded him to fly into the wilderness again. But by making use of prudent advice, he escaped those that pursued him. For he perswaded his followers to turn back and meet the pursuers, which was done with all possible speed. When therefore they, who a little before fled, approacht the pursuers, [a] the persons who sought [for Athanasius,] ask't his followers nothing [but this,] whether they had seen Athanasius. They gave them notice, that he was not far off, and said, that if they made hast, they would soon apprehend him. Being after this manner imposed upon, they pursued him very hotly, but in vain. Athanasius having made his escape, came privately to Alexandria, and absconded there till such time as the Persecution ceased. Such were the miseries which befell the Bishop of Alexandria, after his frequent persecutions and troubles occasioned partly by the Christians, and partly by the Heathens. Moreover, the Presidents of Provinces, supposing the Emperours superstition to be a fair opportunity of [increasing] their private gain, treated the Christians very ill, beyond [what] the Imperial Order [commissioned them to do:] one while exacting greater sums of money from them than they ought to have done; at other times inflicting on them corporal punishments. These things the Emperour was sensible of, but connived at them. And to the Christians, making their addresses to him upon this account, his answer was, 'Tis your duty, when you are afflicted, to bear it patiently: for this is the command of your God.

* Athanasius.

[a] In my judgment, this passage should be worded thus [ὅτε ζητοῦντες ἠρώτων τοὺς ἑπομένους, εἰ ἀκολουθοῦσιν, εἰ πού ἀδυνάσιον τεθέασται, Those who sought for him, ask't his followers, whether they had seen Athanasius:] the term [οὐδὲν nothing] being expunged; which is superfluous. Nicephorus confirms our emendation; in whom this word [nothing] occurs not, either because he found it not in his Copy; or else in regard he disliked that expression. Further, this whole story is taken out of Rufinus. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning thoſe who in the Reign of Julianus ſuffered Martyrdom at Merus a City of Phrygia.

AT the City Merus, Amachius Preſident of the Province of Phrygia, gave order for the opening of the Temple there, and commanded it ſhould be cleanſed from the filth heapt up therein by length of time, and that the images in it ſhould be poliſhed and trim'd up. This fact did ſorely trouble the Chriſtians. One Macedonius, Theodulus, and Tatianus, out of their zeal to the Chriſtian Religion, were unable to bear that indignity. But, having acquired a warmth and fervency of affection towards Vertue, they ruſhed into the Temple by night, and brake the images in pieces. The Governour, highly incenſed at what was done, reſolved to deſtroy many in that City who were guiltleſs; whereupon the authours of this Fact rendred themſelves on their own accord. And choſe rather to die themſelves in defence of the Truth, than to ſee others put to death in their ſtead. The Governour having ſeized theſe perſons, ordered them to expiate the crime they had committed, by ſacrificing. Upon their refuſal to do that, he threatned them with puniſhment. But, being perſons endowed with a great courage of mind, they diſregarded his menaces, and ſhewed themſelves prepared to undergoe any ſufferings whatever. And choſe to die, rather than be polluted by ſacrificing. When therefore he had made theſe men undergoe all manner of tortures, at laſt he gave order they ſhould be laid on Grid-irons, under which he commanded fire to be put, and ſo deſtroyed them. At which time they gave the higheſt and moſt Heroick demonſtration of their fortitude, by theſe words of theirs to the Preſident: Amachius, if you deſire to eat broyled fleſh, turn us on the other ſide, leaſt we ſhould ſeem half broyled to your taſt. After this manner theſe perſons ended their lives.

CHAP. XVI.

How (when the Emperour prohibited the Chriſtians from being educated in the Grecian Literature,) the two Apollinaris's betook themſelves to writing of Books.

BUt, that Imperial Law, which prohibited the Chriſtians from being educated in the Grecian Literature, made the two * above mentioned Apollinaris's far more eminent than they had been before. For, whereas both of them were perſons well skilled in humane Learning, the father in Grammar, the ſon in Rhetorick, they ſhewed themſelves very uſefull to the Chriſtians at that juncture of time. For the father, being an exquiſite Grammarian, † compoſed a Grammar agreeable to the form of the Chriſtian Religion: he alſo turned the Books of Moſes into that termed Heroick verſe: And likewiſe paraphraſed upon all the Hiſtorical Books of the Old Teſtament; putting them partly into ‡ Dactylick Verſe, and partly reducing them into the form of * Dramatick Tragedy. He [deſignedly] made uſe of all ſorts of Verſe, that no mode of expreſſion [peculiar to] the Grecian Language, might be unknown, or un-heard-of amongſt the Chriſtians. But the Younger Apollinaris, a perſon provided with a good ſtock of Eloquence, explained the Goſpels, and Apoſtolick writings, by way of Dialogue, as Plato amongſt the Grecians [had done.] Having rendred themſelves uſefull after this manner to the Chriſtian Religion, by their own Labours they vanquiſhed the Emperours ſubtlety. But Divine Providence was more prevalent and powerfull, than either theſe perſons induſtry, or the Emperours attempt. For that Law quickly became extinct, together with the Emperour [who made it,] as we will manifeſt in the procedure [of our Hiſtory.] And theſe mens Works are reputed no otherwiſe, than if they had never been written. But ſome one will perhaps make this formidable objection againſt us; How can you affirm theſe things to have been effected by Divine Providence? For, it is indeed evident, that the Emperours ſudden death proved very advantagious to the Chriſtian Religion. But certainly, the rejecting of the Chriſtian writings compoſed by the two Apollinaris's, and the Chriſtians beginning again to be cultivated with an education in the Grecian Literature, can in no wiſe be of advantage to Chriſtianity. For, the Grecian Literature, in regard it aſſerts * Polytheiſm, is very pernicious. To this objection we will (according to our ability) make ſuch a return, as at preſent comes into our mind. The Grecian Learning was not admitted of, either by Chriſt, or his diſciples, as being divinely inſpired; nor was wholly rejected, as hurtfull. And this, in my opinion, was not inconſiderately done by them. For, many of the Philoſophers amongſt the Grecians were not far from the knowledge of God. For, [being furniſhed] with a diſcurſive knowledge, they ſtrenuouſly oppoſed thoſe that denied Gods Providence, of which ſort were the Epicureans, and other contentious [Cavillers;] and confuted their ignorance. And by theſe Books they rendred themſelves very uſefull to the Lovers of piety: but they apprehended not the principal head of Religion, becauſe they were ignorant of the Myſtery of Chriſt, † Which hath been hid from generations and ages. And that this is ſo, the Apoſtle in his Epiſtle to the Romans does declare, in theſe words: * For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven againſt all ungodlineſs, and unrighteouſneſs of men, who hold the truth in unrighteouſneſs. Becauſe that which may be known of God, is manifeſt in them. For God hath ſhewed it unto them. For the inviſible things of him from the Creation of the world, are clearly ſeen, being underſtood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead, that they may be without excuſe: becauſe that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God. From theſe words 'tis apparent, that they had the knowledge of the truth, which God manifeſted unto them. But they were obnoxious, in regard when they knew God, they glorified him not as God. Whereas therefore [the Apoſtles] prohibited not an education in the Grecian Learning, they left it to the choice of ſuch as were deſirous of it. Let this be one argument, in anſwer to the objection made againſt us. Another is this, The divinely inſpired Scriptures do indeed deliver doctrines that are admirable and truly divine: they do likewiſe infuſe into [the minds of] thoſe that hear them, both an eminent piety, and exact courſe of life; and alſo exhibit to perſons that are ſtudious a faith acceptable to God. But they teach not an art of reaſoning, whereby we may be enabled to anſwer thoſe that reſolutely oppoſe the truth.

JULIANUS. Besides, the Adversaries are then most effectually baffled, when we make use of their own weapons against them. (But, the Christians could not be furnished herewith, from the Books written by the Apollinaris's.) Which when the Emperour Julianus had accurately considered, he by a law prohibited the Christians from being instructed in the Grecian Literature. For he very well knew, that the fables [therein contained] would render the opinion he had imbibed, obnoxious to reproach. Which fabulous stories when Socrates (the eminentest of the Philosophers amongst them) contemned; as if he had been a person that attempted to violate their Deities, he was condemned. Further, both [a] Christ and also his Apostle do give order, that we should be skilfull Exchangers of money, * that we should prove all things, holding fast that which is good; and to † beware, least any man spoil you through Philosophy and vain deceit. But, we shall never obey this [precept,] unless we can possess our selves of the Adversaries weapons; and whilst we are in possession of them, we are not to entertain the same sentiments with our Adversaries: but must abominate the evil: and, retaining what is Good and true, examine all things we embrace. For Good, where-ever it is, is the property of truth. But if any one does suppose, that by asserting these things we use violence [towards the Scriptures by wresting of them,] let such a one consider, that the Apostle does not only not forbid our being instructed in the Grecian Learning; but he himself seems not to have neglected it, in regard he knew many sayings which were spoken by the Grecians. For, whence took he an occasion of using this saying, * The Cretians are always lyers, evil beasts, slow-bellies, except it were from his perusal of the [b] Oracles of Epimenides the Cretian, a person that was an Initiator? Or whence knew he this, * For we are also his off-spring, unless he had been acquainted with the Phœnomena of Aratus the Astronomer. Moreover, this, † Evill communications corrupt good manners, is a sufficient evidence that he was not unacquainted with Euripides's Tragedies. But, what need is there of making a large discourse concerning these things? For, 'tis evident, that antiently, by an uninterrupted usage as it were, the Ecclesiastick Doctors studied the Grecian Arts and Sciences, untill they arrived at a very great age: and this [they did,] partly upon account of [gaining] Eloquence, and of *polishing the mind; and partly in order to a confutation of those things, concerning which [the Heathens] were mistaken. Let thus much be said by us, according to our capacity, upon account of the two Apollinaris's.

[a] At what place this precept of our Saviours [that we should be skilfull mony-changers] does occur, is uncertain. For 'tis not to be met with in the Gospels. But, in as much as Origen and Ferome do agree, that this command was given by our Saviour, and was afterwards inculcated by the Apostle; I am of the same opinion with the Learned Usher, who supposes, that that saying of our Saviour was recorded in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Further, this saying is frequently mentioned amongst the Antients. Amongst the rest, Palladius makes mention of it in the Life of John Chrysostome. See Euseb. Eccles. Hist. book 7. chap. 7. note (a.) and the following remark. Vales.

* Titus 1. 12.

[b] Epimenides did indeed predict many things, partly to the Athenians, partly to the Lacedæmonians, and partly to the Cretians, as may be seen in Diogenes Laërtius: (See Laërtius in Epimened.) But I never read, that oracles were written by him. Suidas affirms, that he wrote some mysticall and expiatory Poems, and some other obscure things. These therefore must be stiled Oracles. Epimenides was a person incomparably well skilled in Lustrations and Consecrations. In his Lustrations or purgations, he made great use of the Sea-Onyon: and therefore one kind of it was from him called the Epimenidian-Sea Onyon. So Theophrastus, book 7. chap. 10. Hence it appears, why Socrates termed Epimenides ἀνδρ. τελετὴν, an Initiator. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

How the Emperour, making preparations for an expedition against the Persians, arrived at Antioch: and being derided by the Antiochians, he [published] an Oration [against them] entitled * Misopogon.

* That is, Beard-hater.

But, the Emperour, having extorted a vast treasure from the Christians, and hastning his expedition against the Persians, goes to Antioch in Syria. When he was come thither, being desirous to demonstrate to the Antiochians how superabundantly he affected glory, he depressed the prizes of vendible commodities lower than was fitting: [for] he respected not the present time, nor considered with himself, that the presence of a numerous Army does necessarily endammage the inhabitants of a Province, and cut off plenty [of provisions] from the Cities. Wherefore, the [a] petty Merchants and Provision-sellers, unable to endure the loss they sustained by the Imperial Edict, at that time left off trading. Whereupon, [the Markets] were unfurnished with Provisions. The Antiochians could not tolerate this violence [used towards them;] (for they are persons naturally prone to revile:) but presently brake forth [into invectives] against the Emperour, and cried out upon him. They also derided his beard; (for he wore a very large one:) saying, it ought to be shaved, and ropes made of it. [They said] likewise, that he had the stamp of a Bull on his Coyn, [which was an Emblem] that he had turned the world upside down. For the Emperour, extreamly addicted to superstition, and continually * sacrificing Bulls upon the Altars of his Idols, had commanded, that an Altar and a Bull should be stamp't upon his Coyn. The Emperour, enraged at these scoffs, threatned that he would most severely punish the City of Antioch; [b] and that he would return to Tarsus in Cilicia [and reside there.] And having given order for a provision of necessaries to be made there, he prepared for his departure thence. Upon which account, Libanius the Sophista took an occasion of writing two Orations; the one he composed by way of address to the Emperour, in behalf of the Antiochians; the [c] other he wrote to the Antiochians giving a Character of him, says thus: Præsagiorum scisciatationi nimiæ deditus, ut æquiparare videretur in hac parte principem Hadrianum: superstitiosus magis, quàm sacrorum legitimus observator innumeras sine parsimonia pecudes Maltans: ut æstimaretur si revertisset de Parthis boves jam defuturos: Marci illius similis Cæsaris, in quem id accepimus dictum, ὁι λευκοὶ βόες Μαρκῷ τῷ κράσει. Αν σὺ νικήσῃς, ἡμεῖς ἀπολόμεθα.

[a] Ὁι μαλακολεῖς. So the Greeks do in general term all small and minute-Merchants, because they barter'd their Wares for a mean value. For μαλακάλλειν signifies to buy and sell for gain; and μαλακολὴ imports a Merchandizeing trade, as Julius Pollux informs us, book 3. chap. 25. Hence, he was termed παλίμβολος ὁ παλαιὸς ἐμπολῆ μαλακελληδόν, (says Harpocration) who had been frequently sold. These Traders are in Latine termed Cociones, Arilatores, and Dardanarii. But Nicephorus calls them παλιγκάπηλους, whom Socrates here terms μαλακολεῖς; παλιγκάπηλοι may in English be termed Retailers, such as the Dardanarii heretofore were. Vales.

* Hence 'tis that Gregor. Nazianzen (in his first Invective against Julian,) stiles him καυστὴν τοῦ χαλκοῦ. Ammian. Marcellinus (book 25. pag. 294, Edit. Paris. 1636;)

[b] In the original, the reading here is [ἡ ὁπὶ ταρσὸν τῆς κιλικίας ὀξυπεστρέφει; And returns to Tarsus in Cilicia:] which reading Nicephorus has followed. But in my opinion, it should be thus [ἡ ὁπὶ ταρσὸν τῆς κιλικίας ὀξυποστρέφειν, and that he would return to Tarsus in Cilicia [and reside there.] For Julian threatned, that when he returned from Persia, he would go to Tarsus in Cilicia, and would not Winter any more at Antioch. See Amm. Marcellinus, book 23. pag. 239. of our Edition. Vales.

[c] This Oration of Libanius's is in my hands; 'tis transcribed from two M. SS. Copies, the one belonging to Johannes Aurispa, the other to the most eminent Cardinal Francis Barberini. JULIANUS. concerning the Emperours diſpleaſure.* But, 'tis ſaid, this Sophiſta wrote theſe Orations only, and did not recite them in publick. Moreover, the Emperour, relinquiſhing his reſolution of revenging himſelf upon thoſe revilers by deeds, diſcharged his rage by reciprocal Taunts and Scoffs. For he compiled a book [againſt them,] which he entitled Antiochicus or Miſopωγων, wherein he has left a perpetual brand upon the City of Antioch. Thus much concerning theſe things. We muſt now relate what [miſchiefs] the Emperour then did to the Chriſtians in Antioch.

CHAP. XVIII.

How, when the Emperour was deſirous to conſult the Oracle, the Dæmon gave no anſwer, being afraid of Babylas the Martyr.

FOr, having given order, that the Heathen Temples in Antioch ſhould be opened, he was very deſirous of receiving an Oracle from Apollo * Daphnæus. But, in regard the Dæmon inhabiting that Temple, feared his neighbour, (I mean [a] Babylas the Martyr,) he gave no anſwer. For the Coffin lay hard by, wherein was incloſed the body of that Martyr. When the Emperour underſtood the reaſon thereof, he forthwith iſſued out an order for the immediate tranſlation of the Coffin. The Chriſtians of Antioch underſtanding this, [flockt together all of them] as well women, as young children, and carried the Coffin from Daphne into the City, with great rejoycings and ſinging of Pſalms. [The contents of] thoſe Pſalms were reproachfull reflections upon the Heatheniſh gods, and upon thoſe that confided in them, and in their images.

* There was a Grove in the ſuburbs of Antioch, called Daphne, which was conſecrated to Apollo; whence he was termed Apollo Daphnæus. Sozomen ſpends a great many words in deſcribing this Grove, at chap. 19. book 5. of his Eccleſ. Hiſtor.

[a] He ſucceeded Zabinus in the Biſhoprick of Antioch, ſays Euſebius, book 6. chap. 2. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. The ſame Authour (chap. 39. book. 6.) ſays that he died in priſon (but Chryſoſtome, Lib. de S. Babyl. Tom. 9. pag. 669. tells us he was beheaded,) in Decius's Reign. Where his body was firſt buried, is not known: but wherever it was, there it reſted, till Gallus, Julian's brother, built a Church over againſt the Temple of Apollo Daphnæus, (ſee Sozom. book 5. chap. 19.) into which he cauſed S. Babylas's body to be tranſlated. After this removal of it, mentioned in this chapter, 'twas intombed within the City Antioch, in a Church dedicated to his name and memory.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning the Emperours wrath, and concerning Theodorus the Confeſſour.

MOreover, the Emperours Genius and diſpoſition, which he had [hitherto] kept concealed, was at that time clearly diſcovered and manifeſted. For he who before profeſt himſelf to be a Philoſopher, could not moderate himſelf any longer. But being very eaſily provokt to anger by thoſe reproachfull Hymns, was ready to inflict the ſame puniſhments upon the Chriſtians, which Diocletian heretofore laid on them. But in regard his ſollicitude about the Perſian Expedition afforded him not a convenient opportunity of proſecuting this deſign, he ordered Saluſtius Prefect of the Pretorium, to apprehend thoſe perſons that had been moſt zealous and buſie in ſinging Pſalms, in order to their being puniſhed. The Prefect (although as to his Religion he was an Heathen, yet) did not willingly receive that Order. But, in regard he could not contradict it, he commands many of the Chriſtians to be apprehended, and confines ſome of them to Priſon. Upon one young man (whoſe name was Theodorus, whom the Heathens brought before him,) he inflicted Tortures, and various ſorts of puniſhment, ordering that his body ſhould be lacerated all over; and then, when 'twas ſuppoſed he could live no longer, he releaſed him from his tortures. But God preſerved this perſon. For he ſurvived that confeſſion a long time. Ruſinus, who wrote an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory in Latine, * ſays, that he converſt with this Theodorus a long while after this, and enquired of him, whether, during his being ſcourged and racked, he felt an acuteneſs of pain. And that his anſwer was, that the pain [proceeding] from his tortures was very little: and that there ſtood by him a certain young man, who both wiped off the ſweat cauſed by his agony, and alſo corroborated his mind, and that he cauſed that ſpace of time wherein he was tortured, to be a delight to him, rather than a conflict. Let thus much be ſaid concerning the admirable Theodorus. At the ſame time arrived Embaſſadours from the Perſians, requeſting [the Emperour] to put an end to the War [a] upon certain expreſs articles and conditions. But he diſmiſt them, with theſe words, You ſhall ere long ſee Us in perſon, and ſo there will be no need of an Embaſſy.

CHAP. XX.

How the Emperour perſwaded the Jews to ſacrifice, and concerning the utter deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

WHilſt the Emperour was very deſirous to endammage the Chriſtians ſome other way beſides this, he betrayed his own ſuperſtition. For, being much addicted to ſacrificing, he not only delighted in the bloud [of ſacrifices] himſelf, but thought himſelf wronged, unleſs others would do ſo too. But, in regard he found but few ſuch men as thoſe, he ſent for the Jews and enquired of them, upon what account they abſtained from ſacrificing, whenas the Law of Moſes injoyned it. Upon their anſwering him, that they could not ſacrifice in any other place, but only at Jeruſalem, he gave order, that Solomon's Temple ſhould be forthwith re-edifyed. [In the interim] he himſelf proceeds in his expedition againſt the Perſians. But the Jews (who for a long time had been deſirous of getting an opportune time, wherein their Temple might be rebuilt, in order to their offering ſacrifice,) were then very induſtrious about that work. They alſo ſhewed themſelves very formidable to the Chriſtians, and their behaviour towards them was proud and inſolent, threatning they would do them as much miſchief, as they themſelves had formerly ſuffered from the Romans. In regard therefore the Emperour had given order, that the charge [of that Structure] ſhould be paid out of his Exchequer, all things were ſoon provided; [to wit,] Timber, Stone, burnt Brick, Clay, Lime, and all other materials neceſſary for Building. At which time, Cyrillus Biſhop of Jeruſalem call'd to mind the Propheſie of Daniel, (which Chriſt alſo has confirmed in the holy Goſpels,) JULIANUS. Goſpels,) and [a] predicted in the preſence of many perſons, that that time would come very ſhortly, wherein one ſtone ſhould not be left upon another in that Temple, but that our Saviours Prophecy ſhould be fulfilled. Theſe were the Biſhops words. And in the night there hapned a great earthquake, * which tore up the ſtones of the old foundation of the Temple, and diſperſed them all, together with the adjacent edifices. By reaſon of this accident, the Jews were extreamly terrified. And the fame of it brought many perſons, who lived at a great diſtance, to that place. When therefore a numerous multitude were gathered together, there hapned another prodigie. For there came down a fire from Heaven, which conſumed all the Builders Tools. You might have ſeen Mallets, Irons to ſmooth and polliſh Stones with, Saws, Hatchets, Axes; in ſhort, all things the workmen had, which were to be uſed about that work, deſtroyed by the flames. The fire prey'd upon theſe things for a whole day together. The Jews, being in the greateſt fear imaginable, acknowledged (though unwillingly) that Chriſt was God. But they obeyed not his will; but were prepoſſeſſed with an opinion of their own Religion, and continued firm thereto. For neither did a third Miracle, which hapned afterwards, induce them to a belief of the truth. For, the night following, the impreſſions of a Croſs, which caſt forth beams of brightneſs, appeared printed upon their garments. Which impreſſions when they ſaw the next day, they endeavoured to waſh and rub them out, but could not. They were blinded therefore, as the Apoſtle ſays, and caſt away that good they had in their hands. Thus was the Temple, inſtead of being rebuilt, at that time totally demoliſhed.

[a] That is, Cyrillus predicted in the preſence, &c. For the term [προεῖπε τοῦτο] muſt not be referred to Chriſt; though Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon both render it ſo. Nicephorus does evidently confirm our Verſion, at book 10. chap. 33. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning the Emperours inroad into Perſia, and concerning his Death.

MOreover, the Emperour made an irruption into Perſia, a little before the Spring, being informed that the Perſians were a people that were weakeſt, and of the leaſt courage in the Winter. For, being unable to endure cold, they abſtain from undertaking any Military action at that time. But, according to the proverb, a Mede will not pull ſo much as his hand from under his Cloak at that time. [On the contrary,] in regard he very well knew, that the Romans were able to endure a Winter Campaigne, he poured his Army into the Perſian Territories. When therefore they had depopulated a large tract of ground, [laid waſte] many Villages, and Garriſons, they then [began] to take Cities. And, having inveſted the great City Cteſiphon, he reduced the Perſian King to ſuch ſtraights, that he diſpatcht frequent Embaſſies to Julian, entreating him that he might be puniſhed with the loſs of ſome part of his Country only, provided he would depart out of his Territories, and put an end to the War. But Julianus was not in the leaſt affected in his mind, nor ſhewed any compaſſion towards theſe ſuppliants. Neither did he take into his conſideration this common ſaying, to wit, To conquer is famous, but to * be more than Conquerour, is odious. But, giving credit to certain divinations, which Maximus the Philoſopher (with whom he converſt continually) ſuggeſted to him; and imagining, that he ſhould not only equal, but exceed the glory of Alexander the Macedonian; [for theſe reaſons, I ſay,] he rejected the humble addreſſes of the Perſians. And he ſuppoſed, agreeable to the opinion of Pythagoras and Plato, that by a Tranſmigration of ſouls he was poſſeſt of Alexanders ſoul; or rather, that he himſelf was Alexander in another body. This opinion deceived him, and was the cauſe of his not admitting of the Perſian Kings humble addreſs at that time. The King of Perſia therefore, perceiving his Embaſſie to be ineffectual, was reduced to a neceſſity [of fighting.] Whereupon, the next day after he had ſent his Embaſſie, he draws out all the forces he had, againſt the Roman Army, in order to his giving them Battel. The Romans did indeed blame the Emperour, in regard he would not avoid an engagement, when as he might have done it with Advantage. Nevertheleſs, they gave the Enemy Battel, and routed them again. The Emperour was in the Engagement in perſon, on Horſe-back, and encouraged his men: but he had no Armour on, in regard he ſolely confided in his hope of ſucceſs. But [on a ſudden] a Dart is caſt at him from an unknown place, which pierced through his Arm, and entred his ſide. [a] Of which wound he died, the perſon that killed him being unknown. For ſome ſay, [the Dart] was thrown by a certain Perſian who fled: others, [that it was caſt] by one of his own men, which is the ſtrongeſt and moſt common report. But Caliſtius (who had a Military imploy in this [b] Emperours Guards, and recorded his Acts in Heroick Verſe,) in his Narrative of this War, ſays, that Julian was wounded by a Dæmon, of which he died. This was perhaps a Poetical Fiction of his; peradventure 'twas really true. For revengefull Furies have deſtroyed many perſons. But, however that matter was, this is not unknown, that [this Emperour] was a perſon, by reaſon of his too great heat and ardency of mind, unwary; becauſe of his Learning, vain glorious; upon account of his counterfeit mildneſs, obnoxious to contempt. Julianus therefore ended his life in Perſia (as we have ſaid) in his fourth Conſulate, which he bore with Saluſtius [his Colleague,] about the twenty ſixth of June. This was the third year of his Empire; the ſeventh from his having been created Cæſar by Conſtantius; and the thirty firſt year of his age.

[a] Theodoret (*Eccleſ. 'Tis reported, that upon the receipt of his wound, he filled his hand with bloud, and threw it up into the air, and ſaid, O Galilean: [ſo he termed our Saviour, and the Chriſtians he called Galileans] Thou haſt overcome, &c.

[b] The Greek term οἰκέτας, ſignifies in this place Protectores Domeſticos, The Emperours Guards; concerning whom we have ſpoken at large, in our Notes on book 14. of Amm. Marcellinus; pag. 33. In this ſenſe Socrates uſes this term, book 4. chap. 1. This is that Caliſtus (if I miſtake not) whom Libanius (Epiſt. 120. book 4.) calls Caliſtio, friend to Saluſtius Præfect of the Prætorium. son couragious and nobly descended. He being Tribune of the Souldiers, * when Julianus by publishing of an Edict, gave the Souldiers their choice, whether they would sacrifice, or leave their Military Employments; chose rather to lay down his Commission, then obey the command of the impious Emperour. But Julianus, necessitated thereto by the then imminent War, had continued him in Commission, amongst his chief Commanders. Being at that time Elected to the Empire, he refused it. And when he was forcibly drawn forth by the Souldiers, he cried out, saying, that being himself a Christian, he would not reign over men firmly addicted to Gentilisme. But, after all of them with one voice answered, professing that they also were Christians, he accepted of the Empire. Moreover, in regard he was on a sudden left in very great streights † in an Enemies Country, and his men being destroyed by a Famine, upon terms he put an end to the War. The conditions were indeed misbecoming the Roman glory: but they were necessary in that conjuncture. For, being punished with the loss of the [a] Borders of the Empire, and having surrendred Nicibis (a City in Mesopotamia,) to the Persians, he departed out of Persia. At the relation of these things the Christians were encouraged [b]: But the Pagans bewailed Julianus's death. Further, the whole Army blamed his imprudent heat and rashness, and ascribed the disgrace of the loss of their Borders to him; because, being imposed upon by a Persian desertour, he had burnt the Ships, which supplied them with provision by water, whereupon the Army was reduced to a great extremity by a Famine. Further, at that time Libanius the Sophista composed a Funeral Oration upon Julian, which he entitled Julianum, or The Epitaph. In which Oration he does at large recite and extol almost all his Actions: he has also mentioned the Books which Julian wrote against the Christians, wherein he says, the Emperour has demonstrated the Books of the Christians to be ridiculous, and stuft with trifles. Had it sufficed this Sophista, to have commended the Emperours other Actions only, I should quietly have proceeded to the following part of my History. But whenas, being a sharp Oratour, by mentioning Julians Books he does enveigh against the Christian Religion; for this reason we are resolved to speak something concerning this matter: and in the first place we will produce his own words.

* See Chap. 13.

† Or, in the Country of the Persians.

[a] In the original, the reading is [Ζημιωθεὶς γὰρ τοῦ σύρας τῆς ἀρχῆς, For, being punished with the loss of the dominion over the Syrians:] which reading is retained in all our copies. Agreeable to which is Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version; who renders it thus: Amissâ namque Syriâ, & traditâ Persis Nisibi, For having lost Syria, and surrendred Nicibis to the Persians: And Nicephorus words this passage thus: Καὶ δή τινα ἧσσ' ἐπιστελλῶν ῥωμαίοις παραδὸς Πέρσαις, τοῦ σύρων ἀρχὴν φημὶ καὶ τοῦ ἐν Μεσοποταμίᾳ νισιβίν, &c, Moreover, surrendring some places to the Persians, that were tributary to the Romans, I mean the Government of the Syrians, and Nisibis in Mesopotamia. But, Jovianus surrendred not Syria to the Persians. He gave them Nisibis only, and the Countries beyond the Tigris. Wherefore, I doubt not, but instead of [τοῦ σύρας, the Syrians] it should be [τοῦ ὅρους τῆς ἀρχῆς, the Borders of the Empire;] and accordingly we have rendred it. Than which emendation, there is nothing more certain. Socrates himself confirms it, who speaking concerning this matter a little after, in this chapter, says thus, καὶ τοῦ αἰτίαν τῆς ζημίας ἧσσ' ὅρων εἰς αὐτὸν ἀνέφερον, and ascribed the disgrace of the loss of the Borders to him. Vales.

[b] Between these two words [encouraged] and [death,] there was wanting in the printed Copies of Socrates this whole line [ὁι δὲ τοῦ θρησκείαν ἕλληνες, πένθος ἐποιοῦντο τοῦ ἰουλιανοῦ, But the Pagans bewailed Julianus's;] which we have inserted from the Florent. and Sforzian M. SS. Further, from this very one place 'tis evident, that Christophorson made use of no M.S. copies, in his translation of Socrates. Vales.

CHAP. XXIII.

A confutation of what Libanius the Sophista has said concerning Julianus.

THE Winter, says he, having lengthened the nights, the Emperour undertook those Books, which make the man of Palestine God, and the Son of God; and by a long dispute and validitie of arguments he evinced, that those [Records] revered and honoured [by the Christians] are ridiculous and meer trifles: having in this matter demonstrated himself to be more skilfull and wiser, than the * Tyrian Old man. But, may that Tyrian be propitious to me, and not be disgusted at what is said, [a] in regard he was out-done by his Son!

JOVIANUS.

* Porphyrius.

[a] In the Florent. and Sforzian M. SS. the reading is [ὡς ἂν ᾧ ἡττώμενος, in regard he was out-done by his Son.] But in Libanius's Oration, which I have read in Manuscript, it is thus worded [ὡς ἂν υἱέως ἡττώμενος,] which reading pleases me best. This Funeral Oration of Libanius's concerning the praises of Julian the Emperour, is published indeed by Morellus, in the Second Tome of the said Libanius's works; but very corruptly. For, two parts in four of it are transposed; and besides, there are some pages of it wanting. We have some time since found out the transposition of this Oration; and made up its defects from Johannes Altinus's Manuscript; in which Copy this passage is extant, which Socrates does here quote. Vales.

These are Libanius the Sophista's words. I am indeed of opinion, that he was a most incomparable Sophista: but, I am confident, had he not entertained the same sentiments with the Emperour, as to Religion, he would have spoken against him all that hath been said by Christians, and (as 'tis very likely,) being a Sophista, would have enlarged upon that subject. For, whilst Constantius was living, he wrote * Encomiums upon him; but after his death, he loaded him with reproaches and abusive accusations. Wherefore, had Porphyrius been an Emperour, he had undoubtedly preferred his books before Julian's: and, had Julianus been a Sophista, he would have termed him an ill Sophista, as he does Ecebolius, in his Epitaph upon Julian. Since therefore he, as being of the same Religion with the Emperour, as a Sophista, and as the Emperour's friend, has related what he thought good; we, according to our ability, will answer what he has written. In the first place therefore, he says, that the Emperour undertook those Books, when Winter had lengthened the nights. This term, to undertake or attempt, imports, that he made it wholly his business to write a discommendation, as the Sophistæ usually do, when they instruct young men in the rudiments of their Art. For he had been acquainted with those Books long before, but then he made his attempts against them. And, having spent a great deal of time in a tedious contest, he did not [oppose them] (as Libanius says) with solid arguments; but for want of truth betook himself to Jests and Drollery, (whereof he was a great admirer,) by which means he derided what is firmly established in those Books. For, whosoever undertakes a Contest against another, does usually belie him against whom he manages the dispute, one while by perverting the truth, at another by concealing it. And he that has a Pique against another, as an adversary endeavours, not only to act, but to speak against him in all things: and delights to turn the * faults that are in himself, upon him with whom he is at variance. That Julianus and Porphyrius (whom Libanius calls The Tyrian Old man) did both of them take great delight in scoffing, is evident from their own Books. For Porphyrius, in the Books he wrote concerning Philosophick History, has made the Life of Socrates a ridicle, who was the eminentest of the Philosophers: and has left such passages upon Record concerning him, as neither Melitus, nor Anytus, Socrates's Accusers, would have attempted to say. Concerning Socrates, I say a person admired amongst the Grecians, cians, for his modesty, Justice, and other Virtues. Whom Plato the most admirable Philosopher among them, Xenophon, and the whole †Or, quire. † company of Philosophers, not only honour as a person beloved by God, but also repute him to have been endowed with a wisdom more than humane. And Julianus, imitating his * Father, has discovered the distemper of his own mind in [the Book he entitled] The Cæsars, wherein he has discommended all the Emperours his predecessours, not sparing even Marcus the Philosopher. That both of them therefore took great delight in Scoffs and Taunts, their own writings do sufficiently declare. Nor need I many or solid arguments, but this is sufficient to represent the humour and disposition of them both [b]: This Character I give of them, grounding my conjecture concerning their disposition, upon the works of each of them. But, what Gregorius Nazianzenus has said concerning Julianus, you may hear [delivered] in his own words. For, in * His second Oration against the Gentiles, he says thus. Experience, and his assuming the Imperial Dignity and Authority, evidenced these things to others. But to me they were in a manner apparently manifest long before, at such time as I was conversant with him at Athens. For he came thither immediately after the innovations attempted by his † Brother, having requested this of the Emperour. The design of this his journey was twofold; the one was more honourable, [namely,] to see Greece, and the Schools there: the other was kept secret, known but to a very few, [to wit,] that he might consult the Sacrificers and Impostours there concerning his own affairs: for his impiety was not yet in possession of confidence and liberty. At that time therefore, I well remember, I was no bad Diviner concerning this person, although I pretend not to be one of their number, who are well versed in the knowledge and use of these predictions. But, the unevenness and inconstancy of his disposition, and the incredible extravagancy of his mind, made me a Prophet, if he be the best Prophet, who gives the truest conjecture. For, 'twas my opinion, that no good could be portended by an instable neck, by shoulders which sometimes he brandished, at others [c] represt; by wandring and rowling eyes; a furious countenance; feet unsteady and stumbling; a nose breathing forth reproach and contempt; ridiculous cuttings of faces signifying the same thing; immoderate and excessively loud laughter; noddings, and then denials by his countenance, without any reason; a voice represt and cut off by his breath; immethodicall and indiscreet questions; answers no whit better then these, crowding one after another, inconstant to themselves, nor yet proceeding in a Learned Order. What need I give a particular description of every thing? Before his Actions I saw he would be the same that I have since found him to be by his Actions. And, were some of those persons here, who were then present and heard me, they would be easily induced to attest this. To whom, when I saw these things, I forthwith spake these words, How great a mischief to its self does the Roman Empire breed up! When I had uttered these words, I prayed to God, that I might be a false Prophet. For that was better, than that the world should be filled with such horrid mischiefs, and that such a monster should appear, the like to which had never been seen before; although many deluges are recorded; many devastations by fire, many earthquakes, and * chasms; [d] and moreover, many monstrous and inhumane men, and beasts that were prodigious and compounded of several kinds, of which Nature produced new forms. Upon this account, he ended his life in a manner answerable to his madness.

JOVIANUS.

* Or, openings of the earth.

[d] This passage is to be made good from Gregorius Nazianzenus, thus: Ἐπ δὲ καὶ ἀνδρῶν ἀπανθρώπων καὶ θηρίων ἀλλοκότων τε καὶ σωμάτων, ὧν ἡ φύσις ἐκαινοτόμησε· and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

[b] After these words this line [ἐξῶ μηδὲν ταῦτα ὀκνῶ ἐκλέγων λόγων οὐδὲ ἤθους ἀνθρ] was wanting in the Printed Copies; which I inserted from the Sfortian M. S. Vales.

This Character Gregorius has given us concerning Julianus. Moreover, that in those many Books (in the compiling whereof they imployed themselves,) they have attempted to violate the truth, by perverting some passages of the sacred Scriptures, by making insertions in other some, and by explaining all things agreeable to their own design; [e] many persons have demonstrated in their answers to them, who have also overturned and confuted their Fallacies. But, above all other [Ecclesiastick Writers,] [f] Origen, (who lived long before Julianus's times,) by raising objections against himself from such passages in the sacred Scripture as seemed to disturb the Readers, and after that by clearing of them, has put a stop to the fallacious cavills and verbose niceties of ill-affected persons. Which works of his had Julianus and Porphyrius perused carefully, and given them a candid reception, undoubtedly they would have turned their discourses to some other subject, and would not have applied their minds to the writing of fallacies stuft with impiety and blasphemy. That the Emperour made it his business to cavil in his discourses before ignorant and the simpler sort of men, not in their presence who retain a representation of the truth taken from the sacred Scriptures; is evident from hence: For, having pickt out as many expressions as upon account of necessity are by way of dispensation used concerning God in a more humane manner, and put them and many such like phrases all together; at length he subjoynes these very words; Every one of these expressions therefore (unless the phrase contains in it some secret and occult sense and meaning, which I suppose,) is stuft with a deal of Blasphemy against God. Thus much he has said in expres words, in his Third Book against the Christians. And in that Book of his, to which he gave this title [g] *Concerning the Cynick Phyloso-*phy, declaring after what manner sacred Fables ought [e] Many of the Antients have undertaken to refute Porphyrius and Julianus's books against the Christians. Methodius, Eusebius, and Apollinaris wrote books against Porphyrius. Cyrillus wrote against Julian; which books of Cyrillus's are still extant, but are not extraordinarily acute. Vales.

[f] In what books Origen has explained such passages in sacred Writ as might trouble the Readers, and has confuted the fallacious arguments brought against the Christian Religion; 'tis hard to assert. For, in his books against Celsus, he has in no wise done this. Nor, was it his design in that work, to explain those passages in the sacred Scripture, which had any difficulty in them, but only to answer Celsus's objections. Perhaps, Socrates does mean Origens τραπεζίτας. For in those books Origen shewed the congruity of the opinions of our Religion with those of the Philosophers, as Jerom informs us in his Epistle to Magnus the Orator. In order to his effecting of this, 'twas requisite for Origen to expound those places of Scripture, which seemed to contradict the sentiments of the Philosophers. Vales.

[g] He means his book against Heraclius the Cynick; the title whereof is, πῶς κυνιστέον, the way of living like a Cynick. For, in the 403 pag. of that book, this passage here quoted occurs. Vales.

[c] In Gregory Nazianzens second Invective against Julian (out of which this passage is quoted) the term here is ἀνασκέμενοι which word Billius renders, attollebat, he lifted up. But I had rather it should be rendred Librator, poyzed. Nicephorus retains the vulgar reading, to wit, ἀναχαιτίζωσι, repress; whose Translatour gives this rendition of these words: Humeri, quos subinde jactaret ac reduceret mobiles, i. e. Moveable shoulders which he would sometimes thrust out, at others pluck back. Vales. See Mr Montagu's account of this term, in his notes on pag. 98. of Nazianzens second Invective, Edit. Eton. 1610.

* This passage occurs in Nazianzen's second Invective against Julian, pag. 97. Edit. Eton. 1610.

JOVIANUS.

ought to be feigned, he ſays, that in ſuch things as theſe Truth muſt be concealed: theſe are his very words: For Nature loves concealment: and the hidden ſubſtance of the Gods cannot endure to be thrown into polluted ears in bare and naked words. From theſe words 'tis apparent, that the Emperour had this ſentiment concerning the divine Scriptures, [to wit,] that they were myſtical Diſcourſes, containing in them an abſtruſe ſenſe and meaning. Moreover, he is very angry, becauſe all men do not entertain the ſame opinion concerning them; and inveighs againſt thoſe perſons amongſt the Chriſtians, who take the ſacred Oracles in their plain and obvious ſenſe. But, it was not decent to rail in ſuch a manner againſt the ſimplicity of the Vulgar, nor upon their account to uſe ſuch inſolence towards the ſacred Scriptures: nor yet, to hate and have an averſion for [h] thoſe things which are rightly underſtood by others, becauſe all perſons underſtood them not, as he had a mind they ſhould. But now, the ſame accident ſeems to have befal'n him, which hapned to Porphyrius. For he, having been beaten by ſome Chriſtians at Cæſarea in Paleſtine; and being unable to maſter his paſſion, in a great fury [i] relinquiſhed the Chriſtian Religion: and out of his hatred towards thoſe that had beaten him, he fell to writing Blaſphemous Books againſt the Chriſtians; as Euſebius Pamphilus has manifeſtly made it out againſt him, who has clearly confuted his Books. But the Emperour, having uttered diſdainfull expreſſions againſt the Chriſtians in the preſence of unthinking perſons, through the ſame diſtemper of mind fell into Porphyrius's Blaſphemy. Since therefore both theſe perſons voluntarily [deſerted the truth and] brake out into impiety, they are puniſhed by the very knowledge and conſciouſneſs of their own crime. Further, whereas Libanius the Sophiſta in deriſion to the Chriſtians does ſay, that they make a man of Paleſtine God and the Son of God; in my opinion he ſeems to have forgot, that he himſelf has deified Julianus at the cloſe of his Oration. For they almoſt ſtoned to death (ſays he) the firſt meſſenger of his death, as if he had bely'd the God. Then, a little afterwards he adds theſe words, O Thou darling (ſays he) of the Dæmons, Thou Diſciple of the Dæmons, Thou Aſſeſſor with the Dæmons! Although Libanius himſelf underſtood this otherwiſe; yet, in regard he avoided not the ambiguity of the term [Dæmons,] which is [ſometimes] taken in an ill ſenſe, he ſeems to have ſaid the ſame which the Chriſtians uſually do in their reproaches. Wherefore, had it been his deſign to have commended the Emperour, he ought to have ſhun'd an ambiguous term; as he did avoid another word; for which being reproacht, he afterwards raz'd it out of his Orations. Moreover, how man in Chriſt may be ſaid to be God, and how he was apparently man but inviſibly God; and after what manner both theſe aſſertions are infallibly true, the Divine Books of the Chriſtians do evidently ſhew. But the Heathens, before they believe, cannot underſtand. For 'tis the Oracle of God which ſaith, that * If ye will not believe, ſurely you ſhall not underſtand. Wherefore, they are not aſhamed to deify many men; and I wiſh at leaſt they had been men good as to their morals, juſt, and ſober; and not rather impure, unjuſt, and perſons addicted to drunkenneſs: I mean, the Hercules's, Bacchus's, and Æſculapius's, by whom Libanius bluſhes not to ſwear frequently in his Orations. Whoſe Sodomies and Adulteries ſhould I give a particular account of, my diſcourſe thereof would be long and a tedious digreſſion. Thoſe that are deſirous of information about theſe things, will find a ſatisfactory account thereof in [k] Ariſtotles Peplum, [l] Dionyſius's Corona, [m] Rheginus's Polymnemon, and in the crowd of the Poets: who by writing concerning theſe things, do demonſtrate to all men, that the Heathen Theology is trifling and ridiculous. Further, that 'tis the peculiar practiſe of the Heathens and a thing uſual amongſt them, with great readineſs to deifie men, 'twill be ſufficient to advertize you by a few inſtances. To the Rhodians (who conſulted the Oracle upon their being faln into a calamitous diſtreſs,) an anſwer was given, that they ſhould worſhip Attis the Phrygian, an Heathen Prieſt who inſtituted mad ceremonies in Phrygia. The contents of the Oracle are theſe.

JOVIANUS.

Appeaſe [n] Attis, the great God, chaſt Adonis,
The Doner of a proſperous Life, and happineſs,
The beautifully-hair'd Bacchus.

Bacchus, Clemens Alexandrinus alſo does inform us (in his Protrepticon) in theſe words: Διὰ ἣν αἰτίαν οὐκ ἀπεικότως τὸν Διόνυσόν τινες αὐτὸν προσαγορεύειν ἤθελον αἰδοίων ἐστερημένον, upon which account ſome will have Attis, deprived of his Genitals, not unfitly termed Bacchus. Demoſthenes, in his Oration pro Coronâ: καὶ βοῶν ἐυοῖ σαβοῖ, καὶ ἐπαχθόμενος ὑῆς ἄττης, i. e. and ſhouting Euoi Saboi [theſe were the uſual acclamations of thoſe celebrating Bacchus's Feaſts] and triumphing in words, Hues Attis. Which words of Domoſthenes's Harpocration ſuppoſed were meant of Attis the Phrygian. But ſome of the Antients, read not in that place of Demoſthenes, Attis, but Ates, which is an Additional name to Bacchus, as is alſo ὑῆς. See the Author of the Etymologicon in the term ὑῆς and ἄττης. Valeſ.

The Oracle calls Attis (who by reaſon of his Love-madneſs caſtrated himſelf,) Adonis, and Bacchus. And when Alexander King of the Macedonians paſſed over into Aſia, the Amphictyones made him preſents, and Pythia uttered this Oracle.

Adore the ſupream God Jove,
And Minerva Tritogenia,
The King concealed in a mortal Body,
Whom Jove has begotten [o] of a race ineffable, Mortals Defender of Equity, King Alexander.

[o] Inſtead of [ἀείστοις γονάϊς, of a race moſt incomparably the beſt] the reading (as the rule of verſe requires) ſhould be [ἀῤῥήτοισι γονάϊς, of a race ineffable.] Valeſ.

Theſe are the words of the Oracle which the Dæmon uttered at Delphos: He himſelf, when he would flatter Potentates, Deified them. And this was perhaps done meerly out of flattery. But, what ſhall we ſay concerning Cleomedes the Champion, whom they have made a God, and uttered this Oracle concerning him.

The laſt of the Hero's, Cleomedes Aſtypalæus.
Him worſhip with ſacrifices, as being no longer a Mortal.

[h] In the Sfortian M. S. the reading here is τὰ καλῶς αὐτῷ νοούμενα. But I am better pleaſed with my former conjecture, which was to read it thus, τὰ καλῶς ἄλλοις νοούμενα, thoſe things which are rightly underſtood by others. Although, the reading may be barely thus, τὰ καλῶς νοούμενα, thoſe things which are rightly underſtood. For the word [αὐτὰ] crept in hither, from the following line. Valeſ.

[i] Ἀπέλειπε in the Florentine M. S. the reading is καθέλειπε, he deſerted. Nicephorus (book 10. chap. 36. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) words it thus, ἐξόμνυσι, abjured. Valeſ.

[l] It ſhould be Dionyſius, not Dionyſus. 'Tis hard to ſay, who this Dionyſius was, who wrote a book with this title. I am of opinion, it was Dionyſius Mileſius; who (as Suidas atteſts) wrote κύκλον ἰσοπλευρικὸν, an Hiſtorical Circle; For κύκλος and στέφανος are the ſame. Valeſ.

[m] Suidas relates, that Reginus Grammaticus wrote a book with this title, Polymnemon. Valeſ.

* See Eſai. 7. 9. Socrates quotes the words of the Septuagint; and we render it accordingly.

JOVIANUS.

Upon account of this Oracle, Diogenes the Cynick, and [p] Oenomaus the Philosopher condemned Apollo Pythius. The Inhabitants of Cyzicum have declared Adrianus to be the thirteenth God. And Adrianus himself has deified Antinous his own Catamite*. These things Libanus does not term ridiculous, and meer trifles; although he very well knew these Oracles, and that single Book, which [q] Adrias wrote concerning the Life of Alexander. [r] Nor is he himself ashamed to Deifie Porphyrius. For his words are these, May the Tyrian be propitious to me, whose Books he preferred before the Emperours. Let thus much suffice to have been said by us by way of digression, upon account of the Sophista's scoffing and reproaches. I thought fit to omit the rest, which requires a particular Treatise. We must now subjoyn the remaining part of our History.

[p] Oenomaus a Cynick Philosopher, having been deluded by Apollo's Oracle, resolved to revenge himself; and wrote a book concerning the falseness of Oracles, to which he gave this title, φωραγορῶν, i. e. A discovery of Cozeners: this Eusebius tells us from Porphyrius, in his fifth book De Præparat. Vales.

* That is, his favorite whom he kept to abuse contrary to nature.

[q] Musculus and Christophorson took [Ἀδρείας] to be a proper name. Langus (in his notes on Niceph. book 10. chap. 36.) was of opinion, that instead of Adrias, it should be Adrianus. Indeed, the word Adrias is not to be endured. For no body was ever called by that name. Therefore Nicephorus, instead of [Ἀδρείας] substituted this word [Ἀλεξανδρεὺς;] very erroneously. In this place Socrates means that book of Lucian's, which has this title, Ἀλέξανδρος, ἢ ψευδόμαντις, Alexander or The false Prophet. In which book Lucian describes the frauds and impostures of one Alexander a Paphlagonian, who had craftily forged an Oracle. Wherefore instead of Ἀδρείας (or Ἀνδρείας, as 'tis in the Florentine M. S.) it must be Lucianus. Unless we should say, that Socrates mistook, and ascribed this book to one Adrianus, or Arrianus. Vales.

[r] Before these words I placed a full point, following herein Nicephorus's authority. Moreover, the reading should be [οὐδὲ ἐπαλύνεται, nor is he himself ashamed.] Vales.

CHAP. XXIV.

That the Bishops flockt from all places to Jovianus, every one of them hoping they should induce him to embrace their own Creed.

After Jovianus's return out of Persia, the Ecclesiastick commotions were again renewed. For the Prelates of the Churches made it their business to prevent one another, each of them expecting, that the Emperour would give his assent to their Creed. But he had from the beginning adhered to the Homoüusian Faith; and openly declared, that he preferred that Creed before all others. And by his Letters he encourages Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria, who immediately after Julianus's death, had recovered the Alexandrian Church. But, being then made more confident and couragious by the Emperours Letters, he was freed from fear on all hands. The Emperour likewise recalled those Bishops, who had been banished by Constantius, and had not procured their own revocation by Julianus. Moreover, all the Heathen Temples were then shut up. And [the Dæmon Priests] themselves absconded, some in one place, some in another. The * Philosopers also laid aside their Palliums, and cloathed themselves in the common and ordinary habit. Likewise, that [a] Publick pollution caused by the bloud [of sacrifices,] which they had celebrated in Julianus's Reign even to loathsomness, was then taken away.

* Οἱ τριβωνοφόροι, The Pallium-wearers.

[a] He seems to mean the Taurobolia and Criobolia, after the undertaking whereof, the Pagans believed they were eternally regenerated; as the old inscriptions inform us. This whole ceremony is incomparably well described at large by Prudentius, in the passion of Romanus the Martyr; pag. 255, &c. Edit. Basil. It was in short thus: The Priest to be consecrated, being habited in his Sacerdotal Vestments, (adorned with a Crown of Gold, and wrapt about with a silken Gown,) was put into a deep Pit dug into the earth. Over this Pit an Altar made of planks was erected, through which many holes were bored. Upon this Altar a great Bull was laid, adorned with Garlands, and his horns were guilded: his breast they divided with a consecrated Weapon. A stream of reeking bloud gushing immediately out of the large wound, flowed upon the boarded Altar, and running through the holes made therein, rained down upon the Priest inclosed under the boards; who catcht the shower of gore by putting his head under the falling drops; wherewith he besmeared his garments, and his whole body. See Prudentius, ut supra.

CHAP. XXV.

That the Macedonians and Acacians, meeting together at Antioch, confirmed the Nicene Creed.

But the affairs of the Christians were in no wise in a sedate posture. For the principal heads of every party made their [a] addresses to the Emperour, supposing they should obtain from him power and authority against those by them reputed to be their adversaries. And in the first place, those termed Macedoniani present a Libel to him, requesting that they who asserted the Son to be unlike the Father, might be ejected out of the Churches, and themselves put into their places. The persons who presented this Supplicatory Libel, were Basilius [Bishop] of Ancyra, Silvanus of Tarsus, Sophronius of Pompeiopolis, Pasinicus of [b] Zelæ, Leontius of Comani, Callicrates of Claudiopolis, and Theophilus of Castabali. The Emperour having received their Libel, sent them away without an answer. He expresst himself only thus to them: I abominate (said he) Contentiousness: But I Love and Honour those that are * desirous of Unity and Concord. When these expressions were divulged in the hearing of the other parties, they mollified the stiffness of those who were desirous of Contention. And this fell out agreeable to the Emperours intent and design. Moreover, the contentious disposition of the Acacians was then also clearly manifested, and they evidently demonstrated their continual usage of complying with their sentiments who were vested with the supream power. For, meeting together at Antioch in Syria, they entred into discourse with Melitius, who having separated from them a little before, had embraced the Homoüusian opinion. And this they did, in regard they saw Melitius was highly esteemed by the Emperour, who then resided at Antioch. Having therefore made a profession of the Homoüusian opinion, and confirmed the Nicene Creed, by a general consent they drew up a Libel, which they presented to the Emperour. The Contents whereof are these.

[a] It must be μεταλήψεις, which has the same import with πρόσοδος, approaches, or addresses. Περιλήψεις signifies another thing, to wit, Progressus, proceedings. Vales.

[b] Instead of [Ζήνων, Zeni] it should be [Ζήλων, Zelæ] according as Epiphan. Scholasticus read it. Zelæ or Zela is a Town of Cappadocia, as Pliny and others do affirm. Basilius mentions this place in his 72 Epist. ad Evæsenos; and in Epist. 73. ad Monachos suos. Vales.

* Περιφερόντας, those that hasten towards, &c.

To the most Pious and most Dear to God, Our Lord JOVIANUS VICTOR AUGUSTUS, The SYNOD of Bishops present at ANTIOCH, Assembled out of divers Provinces.

Even we our selves are fully satisfied, most Pious Emperour, that your Piety has in the first place studied to Assert and Constitute the Peace and Unity of the Church. Nor are we insensible, that You have rightly judged a Draught of the true and Orthodox Faith to be the Head and Fountain of this Unity. Wherefore, that we may not be reputed of their number who adulterate the Doctrine of truth, we declare to Your Piety, that we do embrace and firmly adhere to the Creed of the holy Synod heretofore convened at Nicæa. Especially, since that term therein, which to some seems [c] new and unusual, (we mean the term Homoöusios,) has with Caution been explained by the Fathers; so, as to denote, that the Son was begotten of the Fathers substance, and that he is like the Father as to his substance. Not, as if any passion were to be understood in relation to that inexplicable Generation: nor, is the term Ousia taken by the Fathers according to any usual signification of it amongst the Grecians; but, ['tis made use of] in order to the subversion of what has been impiously and audaciously asserted by Arius concerning Christ, [to wit,] that he existed of things which are not. Which [Tenet] the Anomæans, who are newly sprung up, do with a far greater boldness and audaciousness impudently assert, to the utter ruine of Ecclesiastick unity. Wherefore, we have annexed to this our Declaration a Copy of that Creed set forth by the Bishops convened at Nicæa, which we also embrace. It is this, We believe in one God the Father Almighty, and [d] all the rest of the Creed.

[c] The term [Ξένον, new or unusual] was added by Christophorson out of Nicephorus. For, in the Kings M.S. (which Robert Stephens followed,) and in the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. this word is wanting. Nor did Epiphanius Scholasticus meet with it in his Copy, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For thus he renders it: Quando etiam Consubstantialitatis nomen, quod aliter se quibusdam habere videtur, dicimus cautam interpretationem a patribus excepisse. Vales.

[d] We remarked before (Socrat. book 1. chap. 8. note (a.)) that the term μαθημα, is by the Greeks used to signifie the Creed, because 'twas commonly learnt by heart. But, the word πλήρης is useless here. In my judgment, it would be placed better after these words [ὅλης ὄζης,] thus, ὅλης ἐσὶν πλήρης, It is this in full. Vales.

* Here follow the names of those Bishops who presented and consented to this Libel.

* I Meletius Bishop of Antioch have presented [this Libel,] and do give my consent to what is above written. [And so do I] Eusebius of Samosata, Evagrius of [e] Siculi, Uranius of Apamæa, Zoilus of Larissa, Acacius of Cæsarea, Antipater of Rhosus, Abramius of Urimi, Aristonicus of Seleucia upon Belus, [f] Barlamenus of Pergamus, Uranius of Melitina, Magnus of Chalcedon, Eutychius of Eleutheropolis, [g] Isacoces of Armenia The Great, Titus of Bostra, Petrus of [h] Sippi, Pelagius of Laodicæa, [i] Arabianus of Antros, [e] In the Sfortian M. S. it is [σικελῶν Siculi,] which reading is truer than [σικελὸς, Sicelus.] It is the name of a City Situate in the East, concerning which I have yet met with nothing. Amongst the Bishops of the Acacian party who subscribed the Seleucian Synod, Evagrius of Mitilene, of the Province of the Islands, is recounted. Vales.

[f] This is neither a Greek, nor a Latine name. In the Tripartite-History it is Barbabentus. Vales.

[g] Epiphanius Scholasticus terms him Isacius. He seems to be the same person with him that is called Isaces in Basilius's 69 Epistle, which is the Synodick Epistle of the Antiochian Council under Meletius. He is recounted between Cosroes and Narses. Vales.

[h] Upon my warrant, make it Hippi. This Petrus was Bishop of Hippi, a Province of Palestine. He subscribed the Seleucian Synod, together with the others of the Acacian party here recounted, to wit, Zoilus of Larissa, Eutychianus of Eleutheropolis; as you may read in Epiphanius, in Hæres. Semiarian. Hippos was a Town in Palestine, thirty Stadium's distant from Tiberias; Josephus mentions it in his own Life. Vales.

[i] In Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version he is called Arabianus Adrensis, very right. For this is the Arabianus, or Arabion, Bishop of the Adrai, who subscribed the Seleucian Synod, amongst the Bishops of the Acacian party, as Epiphanius relates in Hæres. Semiarian. Where he is placed after Exercsius Bishop of Gerasi, and next before Charisius Bishop of Azotus. Adra, or Adraön, is a City of Arabia, under the Bishoprick of Bostra, as Guillelmus Tyrius informs us. 'Tis certain, Uranius Bishop of Adra is reckoned amongst the Bishops of the Province of Arabia in the first Constantinopolitan-Synod. But, in the fifth Constantinopolitan-Synod, one Dorymenius is counted Bishop of Adra. Vales.

Piso of Adani, by [k] Lamydrion the Presbyter, Sabinianus of Zeugma, Athanasius of Ancyra, by Orphitus and Aëtius Presbyters, [l] Irenius of Gaza, Piso of Augusta, Patricius of Paltus, by Lamyrion the Presbyter, Anatolius of Berœa, Theotimus of Arabi, Lucianus Arcenus.

JOVIANUS.

[k] I should rather write it Lamurio, agreeable to Epiphanius Scholasticus; for 'tis a name formed ἀπὸ τῆς λαμύρας, which signifies Talkative. A little after this, instead of Aetius, the said Epiphanius reads Aëtius; and so I found it written in the Florentine M. S. Vales.

[l] This person is mentioned by Marcus the Deacon, in his Life of Porphyrius Bishop of Gaza, which you have in Surius. Vales.

We found this Libel recorded in that work of Sabinus's, entitled A Collection of Synodick Acts. Moreover, the Emperour had taken this resolution with himself, that by kind words and perswasives he would extirpate the contentiousness of the disagreeing parties; and he declared that he would not create trouble to any person of what belief soever he were of: but that he would love and highly value such as should be the principal promoters of the Churches Unity. That these things were after this manner done by him, Themistius the Philosopher does also attest. For in the Oration he composed upon his Consulate, he admires the Emperour, [m] for his allowing every person a free liberty of worshipping the Deity in such a manner as he desired; whereby he repressed the humours of flatterers. Upon whom he made very facetious reflections, saying, 'tis experimentally known, that they worship the Purple, not God; and that such persons differ not from the Euripus, which sometimes throws its Waves this way, at others the quite contrary.

[m] Instead of [ὡς τὸ ἐφεῖναι θρεσκεύειν] it should be [διὰ τὸ ἐφεῖναι θρεσκεύειν;] and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

CHAP. XXVI.

Concerning the Death of the Emperour Jovianus.

After this manner did the Emperour at that time repress their fury, who made it their business to cavill and contend. Departing immediately from Antioch, he went to Tarsus in Cilicia, where he buried Julianus's Body. Having performed all the Solemnities of his Funeral, he is declared Consul. Designing to go directly from thence to Constantinople, he arrived at a place, the name whereof is Dadastana; it is Situate in the Frontiers of Galatia and Bithynia. There Themistius the Philosopher (with others of the Senatorian Order,) met him, and recited his Consular Oration before him, which he afterwards spoke in the presence of the people at Constantinople. Indeed, as well the Civill, as Ecclesiastick affairs of the Roman Empire, being blest with so good an Emperour, would have been managed fortunately and successfully; had not a sudden death ravish't so eminent a personage from the publick. For, being seized with a distemper [termed] an Obstruction, in Winter time, he ended his life at the fore mentioned place, in his own and his Son Varronianus's Consulate, upon the seventeenth of February. Having Reigned seaven months, and lived thirty three years. This Book contains the [transactions of affairs during the] space of two years and five months.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

THE Emperour Jovianus having ended his life (as we have declared) at Dadaſtana, in his own and his Son Varronianus's Conſulate, on the ſeventeenth of February; the Souldiers departing from Galatia, on the ſeventh day after came to Nicæa in Bythinia, where by a general ſuffrage they proclaim Valentinianus Emperour, on the five and twentieth of February, [a] in the ſame Conſulate. By original extract he was a Pannonian, born at the City Cibalis. Having been entruſted with the leading of an Army, he had given a demonſtration of his great skill in Tacticks. He was a perſonage of a large ſoul, and always appeared ſuperiour † to that degree of honour he had arrived at. When therefore they had created him Emperour, He went immediately to Conſtantinople, and thirty days after his being proclaimed, he makes his Brother Valens his Colleague in the Empire. They were both Chriſtians, but they diſagreed about the Faith of the Chriſtian Religion. For Valentinianus had a veneration for the Creed of the Nicene Synod: but Valens, by reaſon of a prepoſſeſſion, adhered rather to the Arian opinion. The reaſon of this his prepoſſeſſion was, becauſe he had been baptized by Eudoxius [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople, a Prelate of the Arian Religion. Both of them entertained a warmth and ardency for that Religion which each adhered to: and yet after they came to the Empire, they differed one from the other very much, in their diſpoſitions. For formerly, in the Reign of Julianus, (when Valentinianus was Tribune of the Souldiers, and Valens had a Military employ in the Emperours Guards) each of them gave a demonſtration of the zeal they had for their Religion. For being compelled to ſacrifice, they choſe to leave their Military employments, rather than relinquiſh Chriſtianity. But, at that time the Emperour Julianus, knowing them to be perſons uſefull to the Publick, removed neither of them from their Military preferment; nor yet Jovianus, who was his Succeſſour in the Empire. But, being afterwards promoted to the Empire, * they were at firſt like to one another, as to their care about the management of the publick affairs; but they differed (as I have ſaid) about the Chriſtian Religion, and behaved themſelves after a diſagreeable manner towards the Chriſtians. For Valentinianus did indeed favour ſuch perſons as embraced his own ſentiments; but he was not in the leaſt troubleſome to the Arians. But Valens, deſirous to promote the Arians, did moſt grievouſly diſquiet and diſturb thoſe who differed in opinion from them; as the procedure of our Hiſtory will evidence. At that very time, Liberius preſided over the Roman Church: at Alexandria Athanaſius [was Biſhop] of the Homoöuſians; and Lucius of the Arians, whom the Arians had conſtituted Georgius's ſucceſſour. Euzöius preſided over the Arians at Antioch. Thoſe of the Homoöuſian opinion in that City, were divided into two parties, Pauliñus headed the one party, and Melitius the other. Cyrillus was again put into poſſeſſion of the Church at Jeruſalem. The Government of the Churches at Conſtantinople was in the hands of Eudoxius, an aſſertour of the Arian opinion: the Homoöuſians kept their aſſemblies in a little Oratory within that City. Thoſe of the Macedonian Hereſie, who had [b] diſſented from the Acacians at Seleucia, at that time retained their Churches in every City. In this poſture were the affairs of the Church at that time.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

[a] I doubt not, but inſtead of [ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ὑπατείᾳ, in his Conſulate] Socrates wrote [ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ὑπατείᾳ, in the ſame Conſulate;] that is, in the Conſulate of Jovianus Auguſtus and Varronianus that noble young Prince, his Son. Valeſ.

* That is, in Marſhalling of an Army.

† Or, to his preſent fortune.

* That is, Valentinianus, and Valens.

[b] I am of the ſame mind with Chriſtophorſon, who inſtead of [διακεχωρισμένοις τοῦ περὶ ἀκάκιον, had declared for the Acacians] read [διενεχθεῖσι, περὶς τοῦ περὶ ἀκάκιον, had diſſented from the Acacians.] Which reading I have followed in my Verſion. The reading may be [διακεκριμένοις, ſeparated from] which is perhaps trueſt. Nicephorus has altered this paſſage of Socrates thus, διδασκάλοις ἅ ὅτι περὶ ἀκάκιον, aſſerting the ſame things with the Acacians,] which is worſt of all. Valeſ.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

CHAP. II.

That Valentinianus went into the Weſtern parts [of the Empire,] and Valens reſided at Conſtantinople, who, upon the Macedonians addreſs to him that a Synod might be convened, granted their requeſt. And that he perſecuted the Homoöuſians.

BUt, the one of the Emperours, to wit, Valentinianus, went forthwith into the Weſtern parts [of the Empire.] For the care of the publick affairs * neceſſarily required his preſence there. But Valens, after he had reſided a little while at Conſtantinople, had an addreſs made to him by moſt of the Biſhops of the Macedonian Hereſie, who requeſted another Synod might be convened, in order to the amendment of the † Creed. The Emperour, ſuppoſing they embraced the ſame ſentiments with Acacius and Eudoxius, permitted it to be done. And ſo theſe perſons made it their buſineſs to aſſemble a Synod in the City Lampſacus. But Valens went with all ſpeed poſſible towards Antioch in Syria, fearing leaſt the Perſians ſhould break the League they had entred into for thirty years in the Reign of Jovianus, and invade the Roman Territories. But the Perſians were quiet. Which calm Valens made an ill uſe of, and raiſed an irreconcileable War againſt thoſe who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion. He did indeed no harm to Paulinus the Biſhop, by reaſon of that perſons exemplary and eminent Piety. But he puniſhed Melitius with Exile. He drove all others, who refuſed to communicate with Euzoius, from the Churches in Antioch, and ſubjected them to loſſes and various puniſhments. 'Tis ſaid, that he drowned many perſons in the River Orontes which runs by that City.

† Or, Faith.

CHAP. III.

That, whilſt Valens Perſecuted thoſe who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion in the Eaſt, there aroſe a Tyrant at Conſtantinople, [by name] Procopius. And that at the ſame time an Earthquake hapned, and an inundation of the Sea, which ruined many Cities.

WHilſt Valens did theſe things in Syria, there aroſe a Tyrant at Conſtantinople, by name Procopius. He got together a great force in a ſhort time, and made preparations for an expedition againſt the Emperour. This being told to the Emperour, put him into a very great Agony, which for a little while repreſt the fury of his Perſecution againſt the Catholicks. In the interim that the diſquietude of a Civil War was with pangs expected, an Earthquake hapning ruined many Cities. The Sea alſo altered its own boundaries. For, in ſome places it overflowed ſo much, that Veſſels might Sail, where there was a foot paſſage before. And it departed from other places in ſuch a manner, that they were found to be dry ground. And this hapned in the firſt Conſulate of the two Emperours.

CHAP. IV.

That there being a diſturbance in the Secular as well as the Eccleſiaſtick State of affairs, the Macedonians, having convened a Synod at Lampſacus, did again confirm the Antiochian Creed, and Anathematized that [publiſhed] at Ariminum, and did again ratifie the depoſition of Acacius and Eudoxius.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

THeſe things hapning to be thus, neither the Civil, nor the Eccleſiaſtick State of affairs was in a ſedate poſture. Thoſe therefore who had requeſted of the Emperour a power of convening a Synod, met at Lampſacus in the ſame Conſulate [which I have even now mentioned.] This was the ſeventh year from the Synod which had been aſſembled at Seleucia. Having again confirmed the * Antiochian Creed there, to which they had ſubſcribed at Seleucia, they Anathematize that Creed publiſhed at Ariminum by thoſe [Biſhops] with whom they had heretofore agreed in opinion: and again condemned Acacius's and Eudoxius's party, as having been juſtly depoſed. Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople could not in any wiſe contradict theſe determinations; for the Civil War, which was imminent, permitted him not to revenge himſelf of them. Wherefore, Eleuſius Biſhop of Cyzicum and his Adherents, were at that time for ſome little while the ſtronger party, in regard they aſſerted that termed Macedonius's opinion, [a] which before had a very mean repute, but was then rendred more conſpicuous and better known in the Synod at Lampſacus. I ſuppoſe this Synod to have been the reaſon, why thoſe termed the Macedoniani are ſo numerous in the Helleſpont. For Lampſacus is Scituate in a narrow Bay of the Helleſpont. This was the concluſion of the Synod of Lampſacus.

* This Creed occurs in Socrates's Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Book. 2. chap. 10

[a] Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred theſe words [μικρὸν τε ἔμπροσθεν] Paulo antea, a little before; as if it had been [μικρῷ πρότερον.] I am of the opinion, that this place is faulty, and by a ſmall change is thus to be reſtored: μικρὸν τὸ ἔμπροσθεν, καὶ τότε ἐν τῇ κατ' λαμπάκου συνόδῳ γενόμενον φανερώτερον, which before had a very mean repute, but was then rendred more conſpicuous and better known in the Synod at Lampſacus. He ſpeaks concerning Macedonius's Hereſie, which hitherto (ſays he) had been obſcure and unknown: but then, in the Synod of Lampſacus, it became moſt apparently known. I doubt not but Socrates wrote agreeable to my emendation. Concerning this Synod of Lampſacus, ſee Baronius, at the year of Chriſt, 365. Valeſ.

CHAP. V.

That, an engagement hapning about a City of Phrygia between the Emperour [Valens] and the Tyrant Procopius, the Emperour took the Tyrant by the treachery of his Commanders, and put him and them to death, by inflicting new and unuſual puniſhments upon them.

ON the year following, wherein Gratianus and * Dagalaifus were Conſuls, [a] the War was in good earneſt begun. For when the Tyrant Procopius, having removed from Conſtantinople, was upon the March with his Army towards the Emperour; Valens, informed thereof, haſtens from Antioch, and engages Procopius neer a City of Phrygia, the name whereof is Nacolia. In the firſt encounter he was worſted. But, not long after, he took Procopius alive, Agilo and Gomoärius his Commanders having betrayed him: upon [all] whom Valens inflicted new and unuſual puniſhments. For, diſregarding the Oathes

* Or, Dagalaiphus.

[a] Τὰ κατὰ πολέμων ἐπέθετο. Epiphanius renders it bella parabantur, the War was prepared. Chriſtophorſon, following the ſenſe, rather than the words, tranſlates it, Bellum geri cœptum eſt, the War was begun to be waged. But, in order to the expreſſing the ſignificativeneſs and propriety of the Greek phraſe, it muſt be rendred, Bella incubuerunt, or, belli vis graſſata eſt; the War was with all diligence taken in hand, or, the force of the War raged. Valeſ.

he

he had bound himself in to the Traitours, [b] he put them to death by cutting them in sunder with Saws. And, having bound each of the Tyrants legs to two trees standing neer one another, which were bowed down, [c] he afterwards permitted the bended trees to erect themselves. By the rise whereof Procopius was torn in sunder. And thus the Tyrant, rent into two pieces, ended his Life.

[b] Ammianus Marcellinus relates no such thing concerning Agilo and Gomoarius Procopius's Captaines. He does indeed affirm, that they revolted to Valens's side, but says not, that they were cut in sunder with Saws. Marcellinus gives us this narrative only, (See Amm. Marcellinus, book 26. pag. 328, 329, Edit. Paris. 1636.) that the Tribunes Florentius and Barchalba, after the fight at Nacolia, delivered Procopius bound to Valens. And, that Procopius was immediately beheaded; and Florentius and Barchalba soon after underwent the same punishment. Therefore, what Socrates relates here concerning Agilo and Gomoarius, and concerning Procopius's being torn in sunder, is false. Philostorgius also, in his ninth book, relates that Procopius was beheaded, and that Florentius, who delivered him to Valens, was burnt. Vales.

[c] This place is corrupted, as 'tis evident. In my judgment, 'tis thus to be restored: Ἔπειτα τὰ δένδρα ὑπαμφθέντα ἀφῆκεν ὀρθῶσθαι; and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

CHAP. VI.

That, after the death of the Tyrant, the Emperour forced those who had been present at the Synod, and all the Christians, to embrace Arius's Opinion.

THE Emperour, having at that time been fortunate and successfull in that action, began immediately to disquiet the Christians, being desirous to bring over all persons to Arianism. But he was in a more especial manner incensed against the Synod which had been convened at Lampsacus, not only because it had deposed the Arian Bishops, but in regard that Draught of the Creed published at Ariminum, had been Anathematized there. Being therefore come to Nicomedia in Bithynia, he sent for Eleusius Bishop of Cyzicum to him. This Prelate had more closely adhered to Macedonius's opinion, as I have said before. Wherefore the Emperour, having convened a Synod of Arian Bishops, compelled Eleusius to give his assent to their Faith. At first he denied to do it. But when he was threatned with Banishment and Proscription of his Goods, being terrified he gave his assent to the Arian opinion. He repented immediately that he had consented. And returning to Cyzicum, in the presence of all the people he complained of his being forc't, saying, that he had given his assent by compulsion, not voluntarily: he also advised them to seek out for another Bishop, because he had been compelled to renounce his own opinion. But the inhabitants of Cyzicum, by reason of that great love and affection they had for him, refused to be subject to another Bishop, nor would they permit any other [to govern] their Church. They continued therefore under his presidency, and would in no wise recede from their own Heresie.

CHAP. VII.

That Eunomius, having ejected Eleusius the Macedonian, was made Bishop of Cyzicum. And concerning Eunomius's original, and that having been * Amanuensis to Aëtius [surnamed] Atheus, he imitated him.

* Or, Notary.

WHen the Bishop of Constantinople heard this, he prefers Eunomius to the Bishoprick of Cyzicum, in regard he was a person able by his eloquence to draw [the minds of] the multitude to his own Lure. Upon his arrival at Cyzicum, an Imperial Edict was published, by which order was given, that Eleusius should be ejected, and Eunomius installed. This being done, those of Eleusius's party, having erected an Oratory without the City, celebrated their assemblies therein. Let thus much be said concerning Eleusius. We must now give an account of Eunomius. Eunomius had been Amanuensis to Aëtius, surnamed Atheus, of whom we have made mention * before. Conversing with him, he imitated his Sophistick way of discoursing: addicting himself [to the use of] certain insignificant and impertinent terms, and was insensible of his framing fallacious arguments in order to the deceiving of himself. Upon this account he was puf't up with pride, and fell into [a] Blasphemy, being indeed a follower of Arius's opinion, but was various ways an adversary to the doctrines of truth. He had but a very mean skill in the sacred Scriptures, and was unable to understand their meaning. But he was very full of words, always making a repetition of the same things over and over, but could not arrive at the design he had proposed to himself. His seven books which with a great deal of vain labour he wrote upon the Apostles Epistle to the Romans, are a demonstration hereof. For, although he has spent a great many words in the explanation thereof, yet he could in no wise [b] apprehend the scope and design of that Epistle. Of the same sort are those other Books of his that be extant. Of which he that should be desirous to make tryal, would find a great scarcity of sense amidst a multitude of words. This Eunomius therefore was by Eudoxius [c] preferred to the Bishoprick of Cyzicum. [d] When he was come thither, by making use of his usual Dialectical art, he amazed his Auditours by his unusual expressions, whereupon there arose a disturbance at Cyzicum. [At length] the inhabitants of Cyzicum, not able to endure his arrogant and haughty manner of expressing himself, drove him from their City. He went to Constantinople, where he made his abode with Eudoxius, and was [reputed a [e] Vacant Bishop. But, that Eunomius was made Bishop of Cyzicum under the Emperour Constantius, in that Synod of Constantinople, which was held immediately after the Synod of Seleucia, as Philostorgius does in expres words affirm, book 5. chap. 3 and Theodoret, book. 2. chap. 27 & 29. Eccles. Histor. which two Authours have recorded Eunomius's affairs with a far greater accuracy, than Socrates has related them. 'Tis certain, that in Valens's Reign, Eunomius was banished by Valens, because he was reported to be a favourer of the Tyrant Procopius, as Philostorgius affirms. So unlikely is it, that he should have had the Bishoprick of Cyzicum then bestowed upon him. Sozomen has followed Socrates's mistake, in book 6. chap. 8. Eccles. Histor. Vales.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

* See Socrates, book 2. chap. 35.

[a] In the Florentine M. S. the reading is [εἰς βλασφημίας into Blasphemies:] which is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Vales.

[b] The common reading is [τὸν σκοπὸν λαβεῖν, apprehend the scope, or designe;] in the Florent. M.S. it is [τὸν σκοπὸν ἐλεῖν, comprehend the designe.] Vales.

[c] Socrates has done ill, to place Eunomius's promotion to the Episcopate of Cyzicum, in the Reign of Valens Augustus. For Eunomius was made Bishop of Cyzicum under the Emperour Constantius, in that Synod of Constantinople, which was held immediately after the Synod of Seleucia, as Philostorgius does in expres words affirm, book 5. chap. 3 and Theodoret, book. 2. chap. 27 & 29. Eccles. Histor. which two Authours have recorded Eunomius's affairs with a far greater accuracy, than Socrates has related them. 'Tis certain, that in Valens's Reign, Eunomius was banished by Valens, because he was reported to be a favourer of the Tyrant Procopius, as Philostorgius affirms. So unlikely is it, that he should have had the Bishoprick of Cyzicum then bestowed upon him. Sozomen has followed Socrates's mistake, in book 6. chap. 8. Eccles. Histor. Vales.

[d] Instead of [ὡς οὖν ἐγένετο κατὰ τοῦτο] it should undoubtedly be [ὡς δὲ ἐγένετο κατ' αὐτοῦ, when he was come thither.] I wonder this was not perceived by Chrysostophorson. For Epiphanius might have shown him the true reading, who renders it thus, cum illuc venisset, when he was arrived there. Vales.

[e] In Civil and Military offices, some persons were actually employed in bearing of them; others were Vacantes, [that is, persons that had the title of such an Office, but were not actually concerned in the management of it; we may term them titular Officers:] who in the Code are said to be præcincti honore otiosi cinguli. So some Tribunes are termed Vacantes in Amm. Marcellinus, as I have remark't in my notes on that Historian. After the same manner those Bishops are termed Vacantes by our Socrates, who had the bare name of a Bishop, without a Church, without a Clergy and people, over whom they might preside. Of the same nature almost are those, who now a days are stiled Bishops in Infidel Countries, such a one therefore was Eunomius, when, being being driven from Cyzicum, he reſided with Eudoxius at Conſtantinople. Which hapned in Conſtantius's Empire, not in Valens's Reign, as Socrates here relates. Further, after Eunomius's expulſion, Eleuſius ('tis probable) recovered his See again. Valeſ.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

we may not ſeem to have ſaid theſe things upon account of calumny and reproach, hear Eunomius's own words, after what manner he takes the boldneſs to expreſs himſelf in his Sophiſtick and fallacious aſſertions concerning God. For he ſays word for word thus. God knows no more than we do concerning his own ſubſtance. Nor is that more known to him, and leſs to us. But, whatever we know concerning the divine ſubſtance, that is wholly known to God. And on the contrary, whatever he [knows,] the ſame you will without any difference find in us. Theſe, and many other ſuch like fallacies, Eunomius framed, being inſenſible [of his own errour.] But how he afterwards became a Separatiſt from the Arians, we will in due place relate.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the Oracle, which was found cut upon a ſtone, when the Wall of Chalcedon was demoliſhed by reaſon of the Emperour Valens*'s anger.*

But, the Emperour gave order, that the Walls of Chalcedon (a City Scituate over againſt Byzantium,) ſhould be demoliſhed. For he had obliged himſelf by Oath to do this (after he ſhould have vanquiſhed the Tyrant Procopius,) becauſe the Chalcedonians, ſiding with the Tyrant, had ſhamefully [a] railed at and abuſed him, and had ſhut their gates upon him as he [b] paſſed by their City. The Wall therefore was by the Emperours order pulled down. And the ſtones were conveyed to the publick Baths of Conſtantinople, which are called [c] Conſtantianæ. There was a Prophecy found, cut on one of the ſtones, which had for a long time lain concealed, but was then diſcovered; ſignifying, that when the City ſhould be furniſhed with plenty of water, then the Wall ſhould ſerve for a Bath: and that numerous tribes of Barbarous Nations, having overrun the Provinces of the Roman Empire, and done a great deal of miſchief, at length ſhould themſelves alſo be deſtroyed. Nothing hinders, but we may here inſert the Prophecy it ſelf, in favour to ſuch as are ſtudious.

[a] Amm. Marcellinus relates, that Valens laid ſiege to Chalcedon, during his War with Procopius. At which ſiege the Inhabitants of that City reviled him from the Walls, and contemptuouſly ſtiled him Sabaiarius, Small-bear-drinker. Sabaia (as Marcellinus deſcribes it) was a ſmall ſort of Liquour made of Barly, very uſually drank in Pannonia. In which Country Valens was born, (ſee Socrates book 4. chap. 1.) and therefore was, by way of reproach, called Sabaiarius, or Sabiarius. That this was the Pannonians uſual drink, Dio atteſts Lib. 49. where he ſays, that the Pannonians fed upon a very mean diet; that they had very little Wine, or Oyle; and that Barly and Millet was their food and drinke. See Amm. Marcellinus, book 26. pag. 325. Edit. Park. 1636; and Valeſius's notes thereon, pag. 324.

[b] Inſtead of [πεϱιόντ Θ,] it ſhould in my mind be [παϱιόντ Θ,] as I have expreſt it in my Verſion. But the Chalcedonians, becauſe of that Revolt of theirs, were not only puniſhed with the demoliſhment of their walls; but had this infamous brand alſo ſet upon them, viz. that no Chalcedonian ſhould ever be preferred to any Office. Iſidorus Peluſiota (book 1. Epiſt. 485.) does atteſt this, in theſe words: Καϱχηδονίους νόμ Θ κωλύ ἀϱχὴν ἄϱχειν, the Law probibits the Carthaginians from bearing any Office. On my peril make it καλχηδονίους, Chalcedonians. For the Carthaginians have no concern with this place, in regard they were not ſubjects of the Eaſtern Empire, concerning which Iſidorus here ſpeaks. Valeſ.

[c] Sozomen mentions theſe Baths, termed Conſtantianæ, in his Eccleſ. Hiſtor. book 8. chap. 21. They were in the Tenth Ward of the City Conſtantinople, as we are informed from the old deſcription of that City. Alſo, Ammianus Marcellinus (book 3.) relates, that Valens built a Bath at Conſtantinople, of the ſtones of the walls of Chalcedon. But Cedrenus and Zonaras do affirm, that an Aquæduct or Conduit, not a Bath, was built of thoſe Stones. Which relations do not contradict one another. For an Aquæduct is neceſſary for a Bath. It was doubtleſs a very famous work; whereof mention is made by Themiſtius, (in Oratione decennali ad Valentem,) and by Gregorius Nazianzenus in his 25th Oration; who very elegantly terms this Aquæduct of Valens's, a Subterraneous and Aërial River. So alſo Themiſtius, in his Oration entitled Amatorium, or de Regiâ pulchritudine ad Gratianum; the paſſage wherein I will ſo much the more willingly annex here, becauſe the Oration is not yet Printed: Αἱ δὲ ὑπὸ δεσμῶσαι ἠλιβάτους, πρῶναι ἔγγειοι καὶ ἐναέριοι, σφυλῇ τὰ νῶτα ἀπεικασμέναι, πλέον ἢ σαθρὰς γαλίας ἀναῤῥαπτα καὶ χαῦλα, ὅτε μὲν ἄνωθεν ὅτε καὶ ἀντίπω διαδεσμῶσαι, καὶ ὅτε ὑποτεθεῖσαι, ὅτε ἐπιχωθεῖσαι, σωφρονίσαι ὑπερφύοι, καὶ ὑπήκοον ἤδη ποιῆ τὴν πυλῶν, &c. Moreover, in Socrates here, I had rather read Caroſianæ, than Conſtantianæ. For the Baths called Conſtantianæ were built by the Emperour Conſtantius, as their name does declare. But the Caroſianæ Baths were finiſhed by Valens, and dedicated after Gratianus's third and Æquitius's Conſulate, Vindalonius Magnus being then Præfect of Conſtantinople, as 'tis recorded in Idatius's Faſti, and by the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle. They were named Caroſianæ from Caroſia Valens's daughter, as Sozomen atteſts, book 6. And they were in the Seventh Ward of the City, as the deſcription of Conſtantinople declares. Valeſ.

When Nymphs their myſtick daunce with watry-feet
Shall tread through proud Byzantium*'s ſtately ſtreet;*
When Rage the City-wall ſhall overthrow,
Whoſe Stones to fence a Bathing place ſhall go.
Then Savage Lands ſhall ſend forth num'rous ſwarms,
(Shining with Golden locks and burniſh't Arms,)
Which having Iſter*'s Silver ſtreames o're paſt,*
Shall Scythian Fields, and Mœſia*'s Meadows waſt:*
But when, proud with ſucceſs, they enter Thrace, They'l meet their fate, and find a burial-place.

This was the Prophecy. But it afterwards hapned, that the Aquæduct built by Valens, furniſhed the City with plenty of water: and then the Barbarous Nations made an inſurrection, as we ſhall hereafter declare. This prediction, as it fell out, was by ſome perſons taken in another ſenſe. For when that Aquæduct was brought into the City, [d] Clearchus, being Præfect of the City, built a ſtately [e] Bath, in that now called Theodoſius's Forum: which Bath was named The plentifull water. Upon which account the City celebrated a Feſtival with great ſolemnity.

[d] This is the Clearchus, who was afterwards Conſul with Richomeres, in the Empire of Theodoſius. Concerning whom Eunapius makes mention, in the Life of Maximus the Philoſopher: and ſays that he had firſt been Vicarius of Aſia in the Procopian War; and was afterwards made Proconſul of all Aſia by Valens, for the eminent ſervice he had done in the War with Procopius. Libanius has very many Epiſtles written to this Clearchus in his fourth and fifth book; wherein he commends him highly, and intimates that he had a Royal command over Aſia. He was Preſect of Conſtantinople in the Conſulate of Modeſtus and Arinthæus, as we are informed from the Theodoſian Code. Valeſ.

[e] Cedrenus and Zonarus call it a Nymphæum. But the Nymphæa are not the ſame with Baths, as 'tis apparent from the deſcription of Conſtantinople. For the Nymphæa are the Nymphs Temples, watered with pleaſant Fountains; as I have long ſince remarkt in my notes on Am. Marcellinus, pag. 46. Valeſ.

And this is that, ſay they, which is ſpoken of in the Prophecy, in theſe words,

———Their myſtick daunce with watry feet
Shall tread through proud Byzantium*'s ſtately ſtreet.*

But, what belonged to the completion of this Prophecy hapned ſometime afterwards. At that time, when the Walls ſhould have been pulled down, the Conſtantinopolitans entreated the Emperour to deſiſt from demoliſhing of them. Alſo, [ſome of] the Inhabitants of Nicomedia and Nicæa came from Bithynia to Conſtantinople, and made the ſame requeſt. The Emperour, being highly incenſed, was with great difficulty induced to admit of the ſuppliants Petition. But, that he might perform his Oath [wherein he had bound himſelf,] he gave order, both that the Walls ſhould be pulled down, and alſo that the breaches made by that demoliſhment ſhould at the ſame time be repaired repaired with other ſmall ſtones. At this preſent therefore there is to be ſeen in ſome parts of the Wall, patches baſely wrought up with very mean materials, laid upon vaſt and prodigious ſtones, which [patches] were at that time made. Let thus much be ſaid concerning the Wall of Chalcedon.

CHAP. IX.

That the Emperour Valens Perſecuted the Novatians alſo, who (in like manner as did the Catholicks*) embraced the* Homoöuſian Faith.

BUt the Emperour deſiſted not from Perſecuting thoſe that embraced the Homoöuſian opinion: but drove them from Conſtantinople; and together with them the Novatians alſo, in regard they owned the ſame ſentiments with them: whoſe Churches he ordered to be ſhut up. And gave order, that their Biſhop alſo, by name Agelius, ſhould be puniſhed with Baniſhment. He was a perſon, that had preſided over their Churches from the times of Conſtantine, and had led an Apoſtolick life. For he always went bare foot, and made uſe of but one coat, obſerving the command of the Goſpel. But the Emperours rage againſt the Novatians was ſtopt by a pious and alſo an Eloquent perſon, by name Marcianus. He had before born a Military employ in the Imperial Pallace, but was at that time a Presbyter of the Novatian Church, and taught Anaſtaſia and Caroſa, Valens's daughters, the Grammar; [a] by whoſe names the publick Baths which Valens erected at Conſtantinople, yet ſtanding, [were called.] Out of veneration therefore to this perſon, the Novatian Churches, which for ſome ſmall time had been ſhut up, were opened again. But the Novatians were not perfectly free from diſturbances cauſed by the Arians. For they were hated by the Arians, becauſe the Novatians loved and had an extraordinary kindneſs for the Homoöuſians, with whom they agreed in opinion. This was the poſture of affairs at that time. Further, you are to know, that the war againſt the Tyrant Procopius was finiſhed in the Conſulate of Gratianus and Dagalaifus, about the latter end of May.

[a] 'Tis falſe, what Socrates here ſays, that the Anaſtaſian Baths at Conſtantinople had their name from Anaſtaſia Valens's daughter, and were erected by Valens. They were built by Conſtantine The Great, and from his Siſters name were called the Anaſtaſian Baths. Amm. Marcellinus tells us thus much, (book 26. pag. 320, Edit. Paris 1636.) Where he deſcribes Procopius's Tyrannick deſign: his words are theſe; Idem Procopius diductus in cogitationes varias, Anaſtaſianas Balneas Petit, a Sorore Conſtantini Cognominatas, the ſame Procopius, divided into various thoughts, went to the Anaſtaſian Baths, which had their name from Conſtantines Siſter. At which place in Amm. Marcellinus I have long ſince remark't in my notes thereon, that Anaſtaſia, Conſtantines Siſter, was married to Baſſianus Cæſar. After my publiſhing of thoſe my notes on Amm. Marcellinus, there was a noble and Learned perſon in England, who found fault with this Annotation of mine, and has ſtiffly denyed, that Baſſianus was ever created Cæſar. Upon what account therefore I was induced to affirm this, I will in ſhort here declare. When the Emperour Conſtantine (after his conqueſt of Maxentius) had given his Siſter Conſtantia in marriage to Licinius; quickly after that he returned into the Gallia's, and ſent his Brother Conſtantius to Licinius, entreating him that Baſſianus might be created Cæſar; to which Baſſianus, Anaſtaſia, Conſtantines other Siſter, was married. Sed Licinio talia fruſtrante, &c. that is, But when Licinius diſappointed him as to thoſe things, Baſſianus (by the inſtigation of Senicio his Brother, who was his boſom-friend) takes up Arms againſt Conſtantine. Who being apprehended in the very attempt, was by Conſtantines order convicted and put to death. When Sinicius the Author of this treachery, was demanded in order to his being puniſhed; Licinius denying that, the agreement betwixt them was broken. This paſſage occurs in the excerptions de Vita Conſtantini, which I heretofore publiſhed at the end of Amm. Marcellinus. From which words I draw theſe concluſions: (1) That Conſtantine treated with Licinius, in order to Baſſianus's being created Cæſar. (2) That Baſſianus being ſollicited by Licinius, did not only conſpire againſt Conſtantine, but made War alſo againſt him. Baſſianus therefore muſt of neceſſity [be allowed] to have played the Tyrant, and therefore to have by force aſſumed the Title of Cæſar, which Conſtantine had thoughts of giving him, had Licinius conſented. Being moved by theſe reaſons, I have termed Baſſianus, Cæſar, whom notwithſtanding I do acknowledge to have been a Tyrant, and do grant that he never was duely and Lawfully made Cæſar. Moreover, in regard the Anaſtaſian Baths were at Conſtantinople before Procopius's inſurrection, (as we have ſhown from Amm. Marcellinus) it may be evidently concluded from thence, that they were not built by Valens, in regard at that time he was but newly made Emperour. Further, the reading here in Socrates ſhould be thus [δημόσια λατρεῖα, the publick Baths.] Valeſ.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

CHAP. X.

That the Emperour Valentinianus begat a ſon, who bore his Fathers name [to wit, Valentinianus;] he having begat [his ſon] Gratianus before his being created Emperour.

NOt long after this War, [a] during the ſame Conſulate, a ſon was born to Valentinianus the Emperour in the Weſtern parts, who had his Fathers name given him. For he had begotten Gratianus long before his [undertaking the Government of the] Empire.

[a] Socrates is grievouſly miſtaken here. For Valentinianus the Younger, who was born in the Conſulate of Gratianus and Dagalaiphus, was not Valentinianus's, but Valens Auguſtus's Son. Idatius does expreſly affirm this in his Faſti, in theſe words: Gratiano Nob. & Dagalaiſo Conſulibus, &c. In the Conſulate of the moſt noble Gratianus, and Dagalaiſus, Valentinianus the Younger, Son to Valens Auguſtus, was born, on the fifteenth of the Calends of February. I know indeed, that in Jacobus Sirmondus's Edition of theſe Faſti, the common reading is, Filius Auguſti Valentiniani, the Son of Valentinianus Auguſtus. But, in that moſt antient Manuſcript belonging to the Colledge of Clermont, from which Sirmondus publiſhed theſe Faſti, I found it in expreſs words written thus, Filius Auguſti Valentis, the Son of Valens Auguſtus. Beſides the teſtimony of theſe Faſti, it may be made evident by many other arguments, that this Valentinianus the Younger, (who was born in the Conſulate of Gratianus and Dagalaiphus, in the year of Our Lord, 366,) was the Son of Valens Auguſtus. For, this is the very ſame Valentinianus, as 'tis on all hands agreed, who was afterwards Conſul with Victor, in the year of Chriſt 369; and to whom Themiſtius ſpake his Conſular-Oration, which is at this day extant under this title: πρεσβευτικὸς ὐαλεντινιανῷ νεῷ. Now, in this Oration, Themiſtius frequently calls Valens the Father of this Valentinian, and ſtiles Gratianus ἀνεψιὸν, that is, his Couſin German by the Fathers ſide. See pag. 253. in that Oration. Beſides, Themiſtius does affirm (pag. 254,) that the ſlaughter and overthrow of the Tyrant Procopius was foreſignified by God, by the birth of this Valentinian. 'Tis certain, Valentinianus Junior was born when Gratianus and Dagalaiphus were Conſuls, on the 15th of the Calends of February; as 'tis recorded in Idatius's Faſti, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle. In which year the Tyrant Procopius was vanquiſhed by Valens, on the ſixth of the Calends of June, as 'tis affirmed in the ſame Faſti. But, if Valentinianus Junior had been Son to Valentinianus Senior, his birth had ſignified nothing to Valens. Further, if this Valentinianus had in reality been Son to Valentinianus Senior, why did he make his reſidence in the Eaſt? How could he have been ſent ſo long a journey from his Father, being as yet but an Infant? For he accompanied Valens in the Gothick Expedition, as Themiſtius atteſts not far from the beginning of this Oration. Laſtly, 'tis evident from Themiſtius's Quinquennalian Oration [i. e. His Oration upon Valens's having arrived at the fifth year of his Empire,] near the cloſe thereof, that Valens had an only Son then when he celebrated his Quinquennalia, that is, in the year of our Lord 368. In regard therefore, the moſt noble Valentinianus was made Conſul in the Eaſt on the year following, he can be no other perſon than Valens's Son. And Themiſtius, in the cloſe of his Quinquennalian Oration (after he had ſpoken concerning Valens's only Son,) adds theſe words: ὃν ἐγὼ Ἀλέξανδρον ποιοῦμαι, καὶ δρέμμα αὖθις τοιοῦτον αὐχήσει φιλοσοφία, whom I would make an Alexander, and Philoſophy ſhall again boaſt of ſuch an Iſſue. And in his Exhortatory Oration, which he ſpake the year after to Valentinianus Junior, he makes an addreſs to the Child almoſt in the ſame words: δεῦρ' ἴθι παῖ, ἐπὶ σὸν ἐμὸν καθίζε γονάτων, come [Royal] Babe, ſit upon my knees! And a little after: συμπαιδαγωγήσει δέ σε ἐμοὶ Πλάτων καὶ Ἀριστοτέλης, οἵ καὶ τὸν μέγαν Ἀλέξανδρον ἐπαιδαγώγησαν, Plato and Ariſtotle ſhall together with my ſelf inſtruct Thee, by whom the Great Alexander was tutored. From whence 'tis apparent, that it is one and the ſame perſon concerning whom Themiſtius ſpeaks in both places; and therefore that Valentinianus Junior, whom Themiſtius ſpeaks to in his Exhortatory Oration, was the ſame only Son of Valens. But, this Valentinianus Junior was, by another name, called Galates. For Socrates and Sozomen give him him this name. Sozomen (book 6. chap. 16.) does expreſly affirm, that Valens had one only Son by [Dominica] his Wife, whoſe name was Galates. Since therefore, 'tis manifeſt from what I have juſt now ſaid, that the moſt noble Valentinianus was Valens's Son, Valentinianus and Galates muſt neceſſarily be one and the ſame perſon. I ſhould think that the Child might have the ſurname of Galates given him, becauſe he was born in Galatia, at ſuch time as Valens was at War with Procopius. Moreover, Socrates's miſtake (in which errour he is followed by Sozomen, book 6. chap. 10.) did, in my judgment, proceed from hence; viz. becauſe he confounded the two Junior Valentinians, (one whereof was Son to Valens, the other to Valentinianus Senior,) and made but one perſon of two. For he thought, that the moſt noble Valentinianus (who was Conſul with Victor) was the ſame perſon with that Valentinianus Junior, who, after the death of his Father Valentinianus Senior, Governed the Empire with Gratianus. But we have long ſince refuted this errour, in our notes on book 30. of Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 413. Valeſ. Valeſius, at the now quoted pag. of his notes on Amm. Marcellinus, does indeed evidently prove that there were two Junior Valentinians; but (contrary to what he affirms here,) he aſſerts they were both Sons to Valentinianus Senior, whom he there ſtiles Magnus. See his note.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning a hail of an unuſual bigneſs which fell from heaven, and concerning the Earthquakes in Bithynia, and the Helleſpont.

ON the following Conſulate, which was Lupicinus's and * Jovianus's, there fell a hail at Conſtantinople † of a Vaſt bigneſs, on the ſecond of July, which was like ſtones. Many perſons ſaid, that this hail was ſent by reaſon of Gods anger, becauſe the Emperour had baniſhed ſeveral of the Sacerdotal Order, in regard they refuſed to communicate with Eudoxius. A little after this time, during the ſame Conſulate, the Emperour Valentinianus proclaimed his Son Gratianus || Auguſtus, on the twenty fourth of Auguſt. On the year after, wherein Valentinianus and Valens were the ſecond time Conſuls, there hapned an Earthquake in Bithynia, which ruined the City Nicæa, on the eleventh of October. This was the twelfth year after the ruine of * Nicomedia. Soon after this Earthquake, moſt part of Germa, a City in the Helleſpont, was deſtroyed by another Earthquake. Notwithſtanding theſe accidents hapned, yet neither was Eudoxius Biſhop of the Arians, nor the Emperour Valens, put into any fear. For they deſiſted not from perſecuting thoſe who diſſented in opinion from them. [Moreover,] theſe Earthquakes ſeemed to denote the diſturbance of the Churches. Wherefore, many of the Sacerdotal Order (as I have ſaid) were baniſhed. Only Baſilius and Gregorius, by a certain diſpenſation of divine providence, ſuffered not baniſhment, by reaſon of their eminent piety. [a] The firſt of theſe perſons was Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia; and the ſecond [preſided over] Nazianzum, a ſmall City near Cæſarea. But we ſhall mention Baſilius and Gregorius in the procedure [of our Hiſtory.]

* Or, Jovinus's.

* Nicomedia was deſtroyed by an Earthquake, in the conſulate of Dacianus and Cercalis, about the 28th of Auguſt. See Socrates, book 2. chap. 39.

[a] Baſilius was made Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, in the year of Chriſt 369, as Baronius has rightly obſerved. But Socrates ſeems to make Baſilius's promotion to that Biſhoprick ſomewhat ancienter. For, in his account at this place of thoſe affairs that were tranſacted in Valentinianus's and Valens's ſecond Conſulate, which was the year of Chriſt 368, he does acknowledge that Baſilius was then Biſhop of Cæſarea, and Gregorius of Nazianzum. But, as to Gregorius, Socrates is manifeſtly miſtaken. For he was not at that time made Biſhop of Nazianzum by Baſilius, but of Saſimi: which Biſhoprick he notwithſtanding never entred upon, as he himſelf atteſts in his Epiſtles. But in his Verſes concerning his own Life, he evidently complaines of Baſilius, who (when as he had ſixty Biſhopricks under him,) had preferred him to the Church of a pittifull little Town, although he himſelf was nothing inferiour to Baſilius. CHAP. XII.

That thoſe who embraced Macedonius's Opinion, being reduced into ſtreights by reaſon of the Emperours violence towards them, ſent an Embaſſage to Liberius [Biſhop] of Rome, and ſubſcribed to the Homoöuſian Creed.

WHen thoſe who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion had at that time been ſorely diſquieted and put to flight, the Perſecutors renewed their rage againſt the Macedonians. Who, being reduced to great ſtreights by fear rather then force, ſent Embaſſies to one another throughout every City; ſignifying, that they muſt of neceſſity fly, both to the Emperours Brother [Valentinianus,] and alſo to Liberius Biſhop of Rome; and that ['twas more eligible for them] to embrace their Faith, than to communicate with Eudoxius's party. [a] They ſent therefore Euſtathius [Biſhop] of Sebaſtia, (who had been many times depoſed,) Silvanus of Tarſus in Cilicia, and Theophilus of Caſtabali, which is alſo a City of Cilicia: and gave them order, that they ſhould not diſſent from Liberius concerning the Faith, but ſhould enter into communion with the Roman Church, and confirm the Homoöuſian Creed. Theſe perſons, carrying along with them their Letters who had diſſented [from Acacius] at Seleucia, arrived at Old Rome. They could not go to the Emperour [Valentinian] himſelf; for he was engaged in a War with the [b] Sarmatæ in the Gallia's. But they delivered their Letters to Liberius. He [at firſt] wholly refuſed to admit them: for he ſaid, that they were of the Arian Faction, and could in

[a] Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 365, proves Socrates, becauſe he places this Embaſſy of the Macedoniani to Liberius Biſhop of Rome (the chief of which was Euſtathius Biſhop of Sebaſtia,) on the year of Chriſt 368, in which year Valentinianus and Valens were the ſecond time Conſuls. Baronius thinks 'twas ſent in the year of Chriſt 365, and grounds his opinion on theſe two arguments eſpecially. Firſt, Euſtathius, with his companions, was ſent Embaſſadour by the Synod of Lampſacus. Now, that Synod was convened in the year of Chriſt 365, ſeven years after the Seleucian Synod, as Socrates atteſts. 'Tis certain, the Embaſſadours (in their Libel of Faith which they preſented to Liberius,) do expreſly profeſs that they were Legates from the Synod of Lampſacus, and that they brought the Letters of that Synod to Liberius. Secondly, if this Embaſſy of the Macedoniani were ſent on the year of Chriſt 368, it would not have been ſent to Liberius, but to Damaſus. For Liberius died on the year of Chriſt 367, in the Conſulate of Lupicinus and Jovinus; and on the ſame year Damaſus entred upon that See. But, the Macedonian Embaſſadours preſented a Libel of their Faith to Liberius, and from the ſame Liberius received Letters to the Prelates of their own party, as Socrates relates in this chapter. This Embaſſy therefore was not ſent in the year 368. Theſe are Baronius's arguments. But I would rather place this Embaſſy on the year of Chriſt 367, and will determine hereof againſt Baronius, upon this account. Baronius confeſſes, that Elpidius Presbyter of Rome was ſent, together with Euſtathius and his companions, to the Illyricum Synod; the Synodick Letter whereof Theodoret has recorded, book 4. chap. 9. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. But, the Illyricum Synod, at which Elpidius and Euſtathius of Sebaſtia were preſent, was convened in the year of Chriſt 367, or 368; as appears from the inſcription of that Letter which the Emperour Valentinianus wrote to the Biſhops of Aſia, that he might confirm that Synod. For that Imperial Letter has this title: Valentinianus, Valens and Gratianus, Auguſti, to the Biſhops, &c. as you may read in Theodoret, book 4. chap. 8. Now Gratianus was proclaimed Auguſtus by his Father, in the Conſulate of Lupicinus and Jovinus, on the ninth of the Calends of September, as (beſides Socrates) Idatius in his Faſti, and the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle, do declare. Therefore, if the Illyricum Synod hapned on the ſame year whereon the Macedonians Embaſſy was ſent; the Macedonians Embaſſy muſt neceſſarily be placed on the year of Chriſt 367, in which year Liberius died in the beginning of September. Euſtathius therefore might go to Liberius in June, and receive Letters from him in Auguſt. Now, I am of opinion, that the Illyricum Synod was held on the ſame year, in the month of September, which Synod Valentinianus the Emperour confirmed, after Gratianus was created Auguſtus. Valeſ.

[b] Socrates ſhould have ſaid The Alamanni, rather than the Sarmatæ. For at this time Valentinian was detained in the Gallia's, by reaſon of his War againſt the Alamanni. Towards the end of his Reign, he went into Illyricum, in order to his engaging in a War againſt the Sarmatæ. Valeſ.

no wise be received [into communion] by the Church, in regard they had rejected the Nicene Creed. They made answer, that by a * retractation they had acknowledged the Truth, that they had long since renounced the Anomoian Creed, and had professed that the Son was every way like to the Father; and that the term Homoios differed not in its import from Homoousios. Having said thus much, Liberius required of them a profession of their opinion in writing. They presented him a Libel, wherein were inserted the Contents of the Nicene Creed. I have not here inserted the Letters written from Smyrna in Asia, and from Pisidia, Isauria, Pamphilia, and Lycia, (in which places they had held Synods,) because of their length. But the Libel, which the Embassadours, sent with Eustathius, delivered to Liberius, runs thus.

* Or, Repentance.

TO OUR LORD, BROTHER, AND FELLOW MINISTER LIBERIUS; EUSTATHIUS, THEOPHILUS, AND SILVANUS, GREETING IN THE LORD.

By reason of the mad opinions of Hereticks, who desist not from giving cause of offence to the Catholick Churches; upon this account [we say] we, [desirous] to deprive them of all opportunity [of giving offence] do approve of and assent to the Synod of Orthodox Bishops which has been convened at Lampsacus, Smyrna, and at several other places: [c] from which Synod We being employed as Legates, do bring a Letter to your Benignity, and to all the Italian and Western Bishops, to hold and keep the Catholick Faith, which having been established in the holy Nicene Synod in the Reign of Constantine of Blessed Memory, by three hundred and eighteen Bishops, hath hitherto always continued intire and unshaken: in which [Creed] the term Homoousios is holily and piously made use of, in opposition to Arius's perverse doctrine: in like manner We also, [d] together with the foresaid persons, do under our own hands profess, that We have held the same Faith, and do hold, and will keep it to our last breath: and We do condemn Arius, and his impious doctrine, together with his disciples, and those that embrace his sentiments; as also, all the Heresie of Sabellius, the * Patripassians, Marcionistæ, Photinians, Marcelliani, and that of Paul of Samosata, and the doctrine of these Hereticks, and all those who maintain the same Tenets with them; in fine, all the Heresies that are opposite to the foresaid holy Creed, which was piously and Catholickly set forth by the holy Fathers at Nicæa. But in a more especial manner we Anathematize that Draught of the Creed recited at the Ariminum Synod, as being contrary to the foresaid Creed of the holy Synod [convened] at Nicæa. [c] To which (it being brought from Nice [a Town] of Thracia) [the Bishops] subscribed at Constantinople, being over perswaded by fraud and perjury. But, our Creed, and the foresaid persons [confession of Faith] also, from whom we are employed as Legates, is this.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

[c] In my judgment it should be thus worded [οἷς τε ὅλῳ καὶ ὑποκειμένῃ ὑποτεθέντες ἐν κωνσταντινουπόλει κομιδεῖσιν ὑπὸ νίκης, &c.] which we have expressed in our Rendition. For they Anathematize not only that Form of the Creed which had been recited in the Ariminum Council, but the Acts also at Nice in Thracia, (See Socrates, book 2. chap. 37, neer the close of that chapter,) to which, being brought to Constantinople, the Bishops, induced thereto by fraud, had subscribed, as if they had been the Acts of the Nicene Synod. Vales.

We Believe in one God, the Father Almighty, the Framer of all things visible and invisible: and in one only begotten God, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God; begotten of the Father, that is, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, of the same substance with the Father, by whom all things were made which are in heaven, and which are on the earth: who, for us men, and for our salvation, descended [from heaven,] became incarnate, and was made man; and suffered, and rose again the third day; and ascended into the heavens; and shall come to judge the quick and dead. And [we believe] in the holy Spirit. But, those that affirm there was a time when he was not, and that he was not before he was born, and that he was made of things which are not; or those that assert the Son of God existed of another Hypostasis or Substance, or that he is Changeable or mutable; these persons the Catholick and Apostolick Church of God does Anathematize.

I Eustathius Bishop of the City Sebastia, I Theophilus, and I Silvanus, Legates of the Synod of Lampsacus, of Smyrna, and of other [Synods,] have Voluntarily and willingly written this confession [of Faith] with our own hands. And, if any person, after the publication of this Creed by Us, shall be desirous of bringing any accusation, either against Us, or those that have sent Us, let him come with Your Holiness's Letters before such Orthodox Bishops as Your Sanctity shall approve of, and go to Tryal with Us in their presence. And if any crimination shall be made out, let the Authour thereof be punished. Liberius having bound up and secured the Legates by this Libel, admitted them to communion, and afterwards dismist them with this Letter.

THE LETTER OF LIBERIUS BISHOP OF ROME, TO THE BISHOPS OF THE MACEDONIANI.

To Our dearly beloved Brethren and Fellow-Ministers, Evethius, Cyrillus, Hyperechius, Uranius, Heron, Elpidius, Maximus, Eusebius, Eucarpius, Heortasius, Neon, Eumathius, Faustinus, Proclinus, Pasinicus, Arsenius, Severus, Didymion, Brittannius, Callicrates, Dalmatius, Ædesius, Eustochius, Ambrosius, Gelonius, Pardalius, Macedonius, Paulus, Marcellus, Heraclius, Alexander, Adolius, Marcianus, Sthenelus, Johannes, Macer, Charisius, Silvanus, Photinus, Antonius, [f] Anytho, [f] In the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. this persons name is constantly written thus, Autho. So he is also called in Epiphanius Scholasticus. In Christophorson's Version 'tis Aytho, with three Syllables. I never met with this name in all my reading. Perhaps it should be Autho. Vales.

Celsus,

[c] The studious Reader may observe from this place, that Eustathius, Silvanus, and Theophilus (after they had spoken concerning many Synods, to wit, of that at Lampsacus, of that at Smyrna, and of others held in Lycia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Isauria,) do now say, that they came as Legates from one Synod, and that they brought the Letters of one Synod. For these are their words: ἧς συνόδου πρεσβείαν ποιούμενοι --γράμματα κομίζομεν, From which Synod we being employed as Legates, do bring a Letter. The reason why they expresst themselves thus, is, because the Smyrna Synod, and those other Synods which were held by the Macedonians in Pisidia, Isauria, Pamphylia, and Lycia, had been compoled according to the pattern and likeness of the Synod at Lampsacus, and had expresst their Faith and Doctrine, as being the original Draught. Upon which account, all these Synods are by the Macedonian Legates taken for one Synod: and the Letters of each of those Synods, which Socrates has a little before told us were brought by those Legates, are taken for one and the same Letter, because they contained one and the same Doctrine of Faith. I made this remark, because in Christophorson's Version all things are here confused and altered: Epiphanius Scholasticus has rendred this place much better. Vales.

[d] Instead of [καὶ τοῦ σὺν αὐτοῖς συνεπιδόντων] the reading should be [καὶ σὺν αὐτοῖς συνεπιδόντων.] So Epiphan. Scholast. reads; and accordingly we have rendred it. Vales.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS

Celſus, Euphranor, Mileſius, Patricius, Severianus, Euſebius, Eumolpius, Athanaſius, Diophantus, Menodorus, Diocles, Chryſampelus, Neon, Eugenius, Euſtathius, Callicrates, Arſenius, Eugenius, Martyrius, Hieracius, Leontius, Philagrius, Lucius, and to all the Orthodox Biſhops in the Eaſt; Liberius Biſhop g of Italy, and the Biſhops in the West, [wiſh] health always in the Lord.

g The words [of Italy] muſt be expunged; Epiphan. Scholaſticus acknowledges them not: or elſe it muſt be thus worded: Liberius Biſhop, and the Biſhops of Italy, and thoſe in the Weſt, &c. For thus Liberius diſtinguiſhes the Biſhops of Italy from the reſt of the Weſtern Prelates, in the beginning of this his Letter, in theſe words; both to our ſlenderneſs and alſo to all [the Biſhops] in Italy and in the Weſtern parts. Nor is it otherwiſe expreſt in the Libel of Faith which the Legates preſented to Liberius. Valeſ.

h It muſt undoubtedly be [προλαμπόμενα,] that it may be referred to the foregoing word [γεγράμμεθα, Letters.] And thus Epiphanius Scholaſticus, and Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlatour, read it. It would doubtleſs have been fooliſh to term antient Biſhops τοὺς τῆς πίστεως φωτὶ προλαμπόμενοι, perſons illuminated with the light of Faith; as if they had been ſome Neophytes, or late Converts to the Faith. Valeſ.

i Inſtead of [μέχει τῆς χθὲς νίκαιαν συνόδου] it would be better thus [μέχει νῦν ἀπὸ τῆς χθὲς νίκαιαν συνόδου, from the Nicene Synod hitherto] So in the Libel of Faith preſented to Liberius by the Legates: ἥτις ἐν τῇ ἁγίᾳ, &c. Which having been eſtabliſhed in the holy Nicene Synod---hath hitherto always continued intire and unſhaken. So Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon read this place. Valeſ.

k It ſhould not be [ἀυ]οῖς] but [ἀυ]οὶ,] that is, your Legates themſelves. For Liberius means the Libel of Faith, which the Macedonian Legates had preſented to him. In which Libel the Legates profeſs, that as well thoſe perſons by whom they had been ſent did conſtantly retain that Creed which had heretofore been ſet forth at Nicæa; as alſo that they themſelves did and always would obſerve and keep to the ſame Creed. Maſculus and Chriſtophorſon ſuppoſed that by theſe words the Nicene Fathers were meant; than which nothing is more abſurd. Langus led them into this miſtake, who in his Verſion of Nicephorus has rendred this paſſage in relation to the Nicene Fathers. Epiphanius Scholaſticus (more truly) ſuppoſed, that hereby the Macedonian Legates were meant; which is apparent from his Verſion. Valeſ.

Your Letters (Dearly beloved Brethren,) h Reſplendent with the Light of Faith, delivered to Us by Our highly eſteemed Brethren, the Biſhops, Euſtathius, Silvanus, and Theophilus, brought the moſt wiſh't-for joy of Peace and Unity to Us: and that moſt eſpecially upon this account, becauſe they have affirmed and demonſtrated, that Your opinion and Your ſentiments are conſonant and agreeable, both to Our Slenderneſs, and alſo to all [the Biſhops] in Italy and in the Weſtern parts. And this we acknowledge to be the Catholick and Apoſtolick Faith, which i from the Nicene Synod hitherto has continued entire and unſhaken. This Creed k Your Legates themſelves have profeſſed that they do hold and embrace, and being filled with great joy, have wiped out all impreſſions and [quenched] the remaining ſparks of an abſurd opinion, and have made a publication of this Creed, not only in words, but under their own hand-writing. The Copy whereof We have judged neceſſary to be annexed to theſe Letters, that we might not leave the Hereticks any pretext of framing another conſpiracy, whereby they ſhould again excite the Incentives of their own malice, and according to their uſage, rekindle the flames of diſcord. Moreover, Our deareſt Brethren, Euſtathius, Silvanus, and Theophilus, have profeſſed and acknowledged this alſo, that both they themſelves, and alſo Your Love, have always had this Creed, and will retain it to the laſt; to wit, the Creed approved of at Nicæa by three hundred and eighteen Orthodox Biſhops: which does contain the perfect Truth, and ſtops the mouthes, and vanquiſhes all the ſhoals of Hereticks. For, not of their own accord, but by divine appointment ſo great a Company of Biſhops was convened againſt the madneſs of Arius; as were * equal in number to thoſe, by whoſe aſſiſtance Bleſſed Abraham through faith deſtroyed ſo many thouſands [of his enemies.] Which faith being comprehended in the Hypoſtaſis, and in the term Homoöuſios, does (like a ſtrong and impregnable fortreſs) beat back and repell all the aſſaults and miſchievous machinations of Arius's perverſe opinion. Wherefore, when all the Weſtern Biſhops had met at Ariminum, whither the improbity of the Arians had called them together, that either by ſome kind perſwaſives, or (which is trueſt) [by compulſion] of the Secular power, they might deſtroy, or perverſely deny what had with all imaginable caution been inſerted into the Creed; their ſubtilty advantaged them not in the leaſt. For, almoſt all thoſe perſons then convened at Ariminum, who had at that time been either enticed into errour, or impoſed upon, are now returned to a right mind, have Anathematized that Draught [of the Creed] publiſhed by them convened at Ariminum, and have ſubſcribed to that Catholick and Apoſtolick Creed ratified and eſtabliſhed at Nicæa. And having entred into a communion with Us, they are with a greater warmth incenſed againſt Arius's Opinion, and againſt his diſciples. Of which buſineſs when the Legates of Your Love perceived an evident proof, they annexed You Your Selves to their own Subſcription; and do Anathematize Arius, and what was tranſacted at Ariminum againſt the Creed ratified at Nicæa: l to which [tranſactions] You Your Selves, beguiled by perjury, have ſubſcribed. Wherefore, it ſeemed agreeable to Us, to write to Your Love, and to give aſſiſtance to thoſe, whoſe requeſts are juſt and equitable. More eſpecially, becauſe we are aſcertained by the profeſſion of Your Legates, that the Eaſtern [Biſhops] are come to themſelves, and do embrace the ſame Sentiments with the Orthodox Weſtern [Prelates.] We make known this to you alſo, (leaſt you ſhould be ignorant of it,) that the Blaſphemies of the Ariminum Synod are now Anathematized, by thoſe who ſeem to have been damnified at that time by Fraud, and that all perſons have unanimouſly conſpired in an agreement to the Nicene Creed. And this ought to be made known to all men by You, that ſuch as have been damnified [in their Faith] * by force and Fraud, may now at length return from Heretical darkneſs to the divine light of Catholick Liberty. Who (if after this Synod they will not vomit up the poyſon of perverſe doctrine, † renounce all Arius's Blaſphemies, and Anathematize them,) may know that they themſelves, together with Arius, and his diſciples, and the reſt of the Serpents, whether Sabellians, or Patropaſſians, or what ever other Hereſie they are [followers] of, are excluded from, and are no members of the Church's Aſſemblies, which admits not illegitimate Sons. God preſerve You in ſafety, Dearly beloved Brethren.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

l The erroneous punctation in Rob. Stephen's Edition deceived Chriſtophorſon. For, he renders it thus: Cum jurejurando adhibito ſubſcripſiſtis, to which [Tranſactions] You Your Selves by taking an Oath have ſubſcribed, Langus, and (before him) Epiphanius Scholaſticus have rendered it truer, thus, Quibus vos perjurio capti ſubſcripſiſtis, to which you, beguiled by perjury, have ſubſcribed. In the Macedonians Libel of Faith, 'tis ſaid in expreſs words, that the Biſhops, being impoſed upon by Fraud and Perjury, had ſubſcribed the Creed ſet forth at Nice in Thracia. For the Arians, (ſee note (e.) in this chapter,) after they had drawn up a Form of the Creed in a Synod held at Nice in Thracia, ſwore that that was the Creed of the Synod of Nicæa. Valeſ.

* Καθ' ὑπερβαίαν, by impudency and improbity.

Euſtathius and thoſe that accompanied him, having received theſe Letters, went over into Sicilia: where after they had cauſed a Synod of Sicilian Biſhops to be convened, they made a profeſſion of the Homoöuſian Faith in their preſence, and confirmed the Nicene Creed; and having received from them Letters written to the ſame

* See Gen. 14. 14. where we find, that the number wherewith Abraham routed the four Kings forces, was three hundred and eighteen, being all his own ſervants.

same effect, they returned to the persons by whom they had been sent. Who, upon receipt of Liberius's Letter, sent Legates from City to City, to the principal Assertours of the Homoöusian Faith, exhorting them to meet together unanimously at Tarsus [a City] of Cilicia, in order to the confirming of the Nicene Creed, and that they might put an end to all manner of contentious disputes, which had since that been raised. And this had perhaps been effected, had not Eudoxius (a Prelate of the Arian Religion, one who at that time was in great favour with the Emperour) hindred it. Who being more exasperated because of the Synod summoned to meet [at Tarsus,] framed greater mischiefs against them. Moreover, that the Macedonians, by sending Legates to Liberius, entred into a Communion with him, and confirmed the Nicene Creed; Sabinus himself has confessed in his Collection of Synodick Actions.

CHAP. XIII.

How Eunomius separated himself from Eudoxius, because he adhered to [his Master] Aëtius. And that (a disturbance being raised at Alexandria by Eudoxius's means,) Athanasius fled again. And that (when the Populace were tumultuous hereupon,) the Emperour being afraid, by his Letters pacified the* Alexandrians, and ordered that Athanasius should be put into quiet possession of his Church again.

*Or, interceded with.

ABout the same time Eunomius, being separated from Eudoxius, held his assemblies apart by himself, because, after he had several times entreated him to embrace his Master Aëtius's [opinion,] Eudoxius refused to do that. And yet Eudoxius did not this willingly: (For he rejected not Aëtius's opinion; in regard it was the same with his own:) but because all those who embraced the same Sentiments with Eudoxius, *declined [Aëtius] as being Heterodox. This was the reason why Eunomius made a separation from Eudoxius. After this manner were these matters transacted at Constantinople. But an [b] Edict of the Præfects of the Prætorium sent thither by Eudoxius's care, disturbed the Church at Alexandria. Wherefore, Athanasius, afraid of the irrational and mad violence of the multitude, and fearing least he should *be look't upon as the occasioner of those mad absurdities which might be committed; hid himself four whole months in his Fathers Monument. But, when the Populace, [vexed] because of his absence, were tumultuous by reason of their love and affection towards him; the Emperour, understanding that upon this account Alexandria was sorrowfull and sad, signified by his Letters, that Athanasius should securely and without fear continue possest of the Churches. And this was the reason why the Alexandrian Church continued undisturbed untill the death of Athanasius. But how, when he was dead, those of the Arian faction got possession of the Churches again, we will relate a little after this.

*Or, bear the blame of, &c.

[a] Πεεὶσαδευ (the term here used) signifies in this place to decline, or have an aversion for: in which signification Lucianus uses it in Hermotimo. Langus and Christophorson render it abhorrere, to abhorre. But Epiphanius, unacquainted with this signification of the word, has rendred it thus: Sed quoniam omnes unanimes, illius, eum Sectæ alterius fatebantur. But because all those of Eudoxius's Opinion confessed him to be of another Sect. Vales. This term [Αἱρετικὸς,] occurs 2 Tim. 2. 16. where in our English Version 'tis rendred [to shun.]

[b] He means an order of the Præfects of the Prætorium. For 'twas usual, that the Præfect of the Prætorium, as often as he issued out any Edict, should annex the names of the other Præfects of the Prætorium. An instance whereof occurs both in the Gesta purgationis Cecilliani, which are published after the Carthaginian Collation, and also in Theodosius and Valentinianus's Novells. There is a famous evidence of this thing in the antient Writer De Quæstionibus veteris ac Novi Testamenti. Cap. 97. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

That after the death of Eudoxius at Constantinople, the Arians Ordained Demophilus; but the Orthodox, by [the assistance of] Eustathius of Antioch, [made] Evagrius [Bishop of Constantinople.]

FUrther, the Emperour Valens departed from Constantinople, and [a] hastned towards Antioch again. And being arrived at Nicomedia a City of Bithynia, he made a stop there upon this account. Eudoxius the chief Prelate of the Arian Faction ended his life soon after the Emperours departure [from Constantinople,] in Valentinianus's and Valens's third Consulate, having been in possession of the Chair of the Constantinopolitane Church [b] Nineteen years. Wherefore, the Arians constituted Demophilus [Bishop] in his room. But the Homoöusians, supposing that a fair opportunity was offered to them, elected one Evagrius, a person that owned the same Creed with them. And [c] Eustathius (who had sometime before been Bishop of Antioch, and had formerly been recalled from exile in Jovianus's Reign,) Ordained him. This Eustathius was at that time present at Constantinople, [to which City he came] with a designe of setling and strengthening those of the Homoöusian Faith; where he continued, absconding himself.

[a] The Emperour Valens had gone towards Antioch before. But hearing of Procopius's defection ---whilst he was in his journey, he was forced to come back; as Amm. Marcellinus attests, book 26. Baronius therefore finds fault with Socrates without cause. For Socrates says not, that Valens came to Antioch before, but that he went towards that City; which is certainly most true. But Christophorsons Version seems to have been the cause of Baronius's mistake; for he renders it thus: Imperator Valens denuo Antiochiam ire maturans, the Emperour Valens hasning to go to Antioch again. Vales.

[b] Sozomen's account is truer, who makes Eudoxius to have been Bishop but eleven years. 'Tis certain, Eudoxius thrust himself into the Bishoprick of Constantinople when Eusebius and Hypatius were Consuls, which was the year of Christ 359. He died in the third Consulate of Valentinianus and Valens, in the year of our Lord 370. Wherefore, at this place of Socrates (in stead of [Ἐννεακαιδεκάτῃ, nineteen]) it ought to be Ἑνδεκάτῃ, eleven,] which is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus. Wherefore, Baronius does here also undeservedly reprove Socrates; in regard, not Socrates himself, but the Copies of Socrates's History are here false. Concerning Eudoxius's death, consult Philostorgius, book 9. Vales.

[c] Sozomen tells us the same story, in his Eccles. Histor. book 6. chap. 13. But Baronius, at the year of Christ 370, reproves both these Historians. For he maintains, that Eustathius Bishop of Antioch was dead long before, in Constantius's Reign. Indeed, Jerome (in his book de Scriptor. Ecclesiast.) does relate, that Eustathius died in exile, and was buried at Trajanople in Thracia, to which place he had been banished. If this be true, Eustathius must necessarily have died in Constantius's Reign. For Julianus, and after him Jovianus, recalled all the Bishops from exile. It is indeed scarce credible, that Eustathius Bishop of Antioch could live to these times. For, in regard he was at the Nicene Council, which was held in the year of Christ 325; we may suppose him to have been then in the forty fifth year of his age. From this year to the third Consulate of Valentinianus and Valens (wherein Eustathius is said to have ordained Evagrius at Constantinople) there are five and fourty years. So that Eustathius must necessarily have been ninety years old, if he ordained Evagrius Bishop in this year. Further, I must not omit, what I have been informed of, from Victor Tununensis's Chronicon; to wit, that Eustathius was not interred at Trajanople, as Jerome relates, but at Philippi. For these are his words: Post Consulatum tertium Longini, &c. After Longinus's third Consulate, Calendio Bishop of Antioch got together the reliques of his predecessour Eustathius, Bishop and Confessour, from Philippi in Macedonia, and with great honour conveyed them to Antioch. Theodorus Lector says the same, in his second book Excerpt. Histor. Ecclesiast. Baronius does ill, to place this translation of Eustathius's reliques on the year of Christ 482, in regard, as 'tis evident from Victor Tununensis's Chronicon, 'twas performed in the year of our Lord 490, when Longinus II, and Faustus were Coss. But what Theodorus Lector adds at that place, to wit, that the Eustathians, who before had meetings by themselves, were then at length united to the Catholicks, an hundred years after Eustathius's death; is in my judgment false. For, this being supposed, Eustathius would have lived to the year of Christ 390. Vales.

CHAP.

CHAP. XV.

That when the Emperour had baniſhed Evagrius and Euſtathius, the Arians ſorely oppreſſed and afflicted the Homoöuſians.

UPon the doing hereof, the Arians renewed their perſecution againſt the Homoöuſians afreſh. What had hapned, ſoon came to the Emperours knowledge, who fearing, leaſt a Sedition, cauſed by a contention of the multitude, ſhould ruine the City, ſent ſome Forces from Nicomedia to Conſtantinople: and gave order, that both perſons, as well he that was ordained, as he that had ordained him, ſhould be apprehended, and baniſhed, the one to one place, the other to another. Euſtathius therefore was exiled to [a] Bizua a City of Thracia; and Evagrius was conveyed away to another place. Theſe things having been performed after this manner, the Arians, growing more inſolent and bold, ſorely afflicted the Catholicks: [ſometimes] they beat them, [at others] they gave them contumelious language; [ſome] they ſhut up in priſon, [others] they puniſhed with Pecuniary Mulcts; in fine, they practiſed all ſorts of afflictive and moſt unſufferable miſchiefs againſt them. Which when they were unable to endure, they went to the Emperour, [with a deſign] to beſeech him, that they might, in ſome meaſure at leaſt, be freed from the Violence [of the Arians.] But, [although] they had propoſed this deſign to themſelves, [yet] they were wholly fruſtrated of their hope, becauſe they expected to obtain it from him, who had been the Authour of their injurious uſage.

[a] This account diſagrees both from what we have related before (chap. 14. note c.) out of Jerome, and alſo from the relation of Theodorus Lector, and Theophanes in his Chronicon. For Jerome ſays, that even in his age Euſtathius lay buried at Trajanople, whither he had been baniſhed. But Theodorus Lector and Theophanes relate, that he was baniſhed to Philippi, and there buried. That Euſtathius therefore, who was baniſhed by Valens to Bizua, muſt neceſſarily be a different perſon from Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch. Bizua is a City of Thracia, heretofore the pallace of the Thracian Aſtores, as Stephanus atteſts. Eutropius mentions it in his ſixth book, where he ſpeaks of Lucius Lucullus, who ſubdued the Thracian Beſſi. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning the holy Presbyters who were burnt in a Ship, and concerning the Famine, which by the wrath of God hapned in Phrygia upon that account.

FOr, when ſome choice pious perſons, who were Eccleſiaſticks, being eighty in number, (the principal men amongſt whom were Urbanus, Theodorus, and Menedemus,) were arrived at Nicomedia, and had preſented a Supplicatory Libel to the Emperour, informing him of the violence and calamitous ſufferings which were inflicted on them [by the Arians:] the Emperour, highly incenſed, concealed his anger, till ſuch time as he had given a ſecret order to Modeſtus the Præfect, for the apprehending of theſe perſons, and putting of them to death. The manner of their death was new and unuſual; therefore it ſhall be recorded. The Præfect being afraid, leaſt if he ſhould murder theſe men in publick, *he might raiſe a tumult of the unthinking crowd againſt himſelf, pretends to ſend them away into baniſhment. [This news] being received by theſe perſons with a couragiouſneſs of mind, the Præfect orders them to be put aboard a Ship, as if [he deſigned] they ſhould be carried away and baniſhed: but he commanded the Sea men, that when they came to the middle of the Sea, they ſhould ſet the Veſſel on fire: that ſo, being deſtroyed after this manner, they might be deprived of a Burial. Thus therefore it was performed. The Mariners ſailed out of the Haven, and being arrived at the middle of the Aſtacum-Bay, do what they were ordered: and having ſet the Ship on fire, went aboard another ſmall Veſſel which followed them, and ſo came off. But, a very boyſterous Eaſterly wind hapned to blow, whereby the burning Ship was fiercely driven: in ſo much that it ſailed with a great deal of ſwiftneſs; and laſted till it came to a Sea-Port, the name whereof is [a] Dacidizus, where it was wholly conſumed together with the men in it. Many have reported, that this [horrid Villany] continued not unpuniſhed. For there hapned ſo ſore a [b] Famine all over Phrygia immediately after, that many of the Inhabitants were forced to remove out of that Country for ſome time, and betake themſelves, partly to Conſtantinople, and partly to other Provinces. For Conſtantinople, although it nouriſhes a vaſt multitude of people, yet always abounds with plenty, both becauſe it has all manner of neceſſaries for proviſion imported into it from all places by Sea, and alſo in regard the Euxine-Sea, lying near it, furniſhes it with plenty of Bread-corn, as often as it wants.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS

* Or, be

[a] Sozomen (book 6. chap. 14.) tells the ſame ſtory, where he calls this place Dacibyza, and ſays 'tis a Maritime-City of Bithynia. Cedrenus alſo terms it Dacibyza. But Theophanes gives it the name of Dacidiza. Valeſ. [b] Concerning this Famine there is this Record, in the Old Faſti, with Sirmondus has publiſhed under the name of Idatius: Valentiniano III, and Valente III, &c. i. e. in the third Conſulate of Valentinianus and Valens there was a great Famine in the parts of Phrygia. CHAP. XVII.

That the Emperour, arriving at Antioch, did again Perſecute thoſe that Embraced the Homoöuſian Opinion.

BUt the Emperour Valens, little regarding the calamities cauſed by the Famine, went to Antioch in Syria. During his reſidence there, he deſtroyed ſuch as would not profeſs Arianiſm. For although he had perfectly ejected the Embracers of the Homoöuſian Opinion out of the Churches of almoſt all the Eaſtern Cities; yet he was not ſatisfied therewith, but did beſides inflict various puniſhments upon them. And he deſtroyed many more than formerly [had been murdered by him,] by expoſing them to different ſorts of death; but more eſpecially by drowning them in a River.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning what was done at Edeſſa, and the reproachfull affront put upon the Præfect, and concerning the Faith, couragiouſneſs, and conſtancy of thoſe Citizens; and concerning a pious woman.

BUt, we muſt relate what was done at Edeſſa [a City] of Meſopotamia. In that City there is a ſtately and ſplendid * Church [which bears the name] of Thomas the Apoſtle, wherein aſſemblies in order to the performance of the publick duties of Religion are without intermiſſion convened, by reaſon of that places ſanctity. The Emperour Valens, deſirous to view this Church, and being informed that the whole congregation met therein were [followers] of that Hereſie which he deteſted, ſtruck the Præfect with his own hand, (as 'tis ſaid,) becauſe he had not taken

* Μαρτύριον; it ſometimes ſignifies a place where the reliques of ſome Martyr are depoſited: 'tis plain from what follows, that by it our Authour here means a Church.

taken care to have them driven from that place. When the Præfect, after this manner abused, made preparations (though unwillingly) to obey the Emperours rage; (for he was not willing to be the instrument of the murder of so many persons;) he gave them notice secretly, to the intent that no person might be found within that Church. But no body heeded either his advice, or his menaces. For on the day following all persons flock't to the Church. And when the Præfect with a great company of Souldiers hastened to the Oratory, in order to his fulfilling the Emperours rage; a poor woman, leading her own little son by the hand, went with great speed towards the Church, and broke through the [a] ranks of Souldiers which Guarded the Præfect. At which the Præfect being highly displeased, orders the woman to be brought to him. And speaks to her after this manner, Miserable woman! Whither runnest thou in this * undecent manner? She replied, To the same place that others run too. Have you not heard, said he, That the Præfect is going to put to death all persons that shall be found there? I have heard so, answered she, and do therefore make haste, that I may be found there [b]: And whither draggest thou that little child, said the Præfect; the woman replied, that he also may be voutsafed the honour of Martyrdom. Upon hearing hereof, the Præfect made a conjecture of the constancy and resolution of the persons assembled [in the Church.] And he went back immediately to the Emperour, and informed him, that all of them were ready to die for their own faith. And declaring withall, that it would be absurd to destroy so many persons in so short a time, he thereby perswaded the Emperour, to desist from being enraged. After this manner the Edessens escaped their being destroyed by their own Emperour.

[a] Rufinus (from whom Socrates borrowed this story) book 2. chap. 5. Eccles. Hist. words this passage thus: Infantem quoque parvulum secum trahentem, cursuque rabido, irrupto etiam officii agmine, festinantem. Leading her little child with her, and making such great haste, that she broke through the Præfects Guards. This memorable fact of the woman of Edessa hapned on the year of Christ 371 or 372; as we shall see by and by. Baronius has done ill to place it on the year of our Lord 370. Vales.

* Ἀκόσμως. Rufinus (in the book and chapter just now quoted) says, she made such haste, that she would not stay to shut her door, nor dress herself in the usual garb that women appeared in in publick.

[b] After these words, there were wanting in Robert Stephens's Edition these two whole lines [Καὶ τὸ τοῦτο τὸ μικρὸν ἔλαχες παιδίον φήσ-τ' ἐπέρχε· ἡ δὲ ἀντιφησίν, ὅτε κἀκεῖσε μαρτυρείας καταξιωθῆναι, And whither draggest thou that little child, said the Præfect, the woman replied, that he also may be voutsafed the honour of Martyrdom] which I have inserted from the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. Epiphanius Scholasticus acknowledges them; and so does Rufinus, from whom Socrates borrowed this story. Moreover, from this place also 'tis evident, that Christophorson had perused no M. S. Copies of Socrates. Vales.

CHAP. XIX.

That the Emperour Valens slew many persons, the first letter of whose name was * Theta, upon account of a certain Necromantick-divination, whereby that was foretold.

* Or. Th.

[a] This whole scene of that unhappy Oracle, which some Heathens had consulted that they might know who should succeed Valens in the Empire, is at large set forth by Ammianus Marcellinus, in his 29th book. But, 'tis difficult to assign the year whereon it hapned. Baronius, in his Annalls places it on the year of Christ 370. I am of opinion, that it was acted in the year of our Lord 371, or at the beginning of the year 372. For Valens, in the year of Christ 371, made his entry into Antioch, at the end of Summer, Gratianus II, and Probus being Consuls, as I have demonstrated in my notes on the foresaid book of Marcellinus, partly from the Laws of the Theodosian Code, and partly from Libanius's book concerning his own Life. Now, that Tragedy and Conspiracy of those wicked wretches against Valens, hapned after his entry into the City Antioch, as 'tis manifest from Marcellinus. Therefore, it must necessarily happen at the close of the year 371, or at least at the beginning of 372. 'Tis certain, Theophanes and Cedrenus do place Valens's entry into Antioch on his eighth year. But, the same Theophanes does ascribe that conspiracy of those impious wretches, who had consulted the Oracle concerning the future Emperour, to Valens's ninth year. Which agrees exactly with our opinion, if we may compute Valens's first year from the Consulate of Jovianus and Varronianus. Vales.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

To which persons, having made use of a certain Magicall inchantment, the Dæmon gave responses, not plain and manifest, but (as he usually does) oblique and ambiguous: by shewing only four Letters, * Theta, and Epsilon, and Omicron, and Delta; saying, that his name, who should Reign after Valens, did begin with these Letters; and that his name was compounded. The report of what had been done came to the Emperours ears. But he permitted not God (who manages all things in a due and orderly manner) to have the knowledge of things future, and to do what seemed good to him: but, slighting the sanctions of Christianity, for which he supposed himself to have a zeal and ardency, he put many to death, of whom he had a suspicion that they would seize upon the Empire. Therefore, the Theodorus's, the Theodotus's, the Theodosius's and the Theodulus's, and as many as had such like names as these, were deprived of their lives. Amongst whom [b] one Theodosiolus, a person of great Valour and Courage, a descendant of a Noble Family in Spain, was also put to death. And out of a fear of the imminent danger, many persons [at that time] changed their names, denying those names their Parents had given them, when they were young, in regard they were liable to danger. But, let thus much be said concerning this.

* Or, Th, E, O, D.

[b] In the Sfortian M. S. the reading here is [Θεοδόσιος ἢ ἄλλος τις, another Theodosius.] Epiphanius Scholasticus also calls him Theodosius. Who this Theodosius [or, Theodosiolus] should be, 'tis uncertain. For I cannot think, it was that Theodosius, (father to Theodosius the Emperour,) of whom Ammianus makes frequent mention in his History. For he lived in the West, and was not slain by the fraud and treachery of malevolent persons, till after Valentinianus's death. And yet this Character added by Socrates [a personage of great Valour and Courage, a descendant of a Noble Family in Spain,] does exactly fit him. Vales.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning Athanasius's death, and the promotion of Peter [to his See.]

FUrther, you are to know, that as long as Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria lived, the Emperour (upon account of some [over-ruling dispensation] of Gods providence) forbore disquieting Alexandria and Egypt, knowing for certain, that there was a numerous multitude of persons there, who favoured Athanasius; and for this reason he was afraid, least a sedition being raised at Alexandria, the populace, who are naturally hot and violent, should endammage the publick state of affairs. [Moreover,] Athanasius, after those many Conflicts [He had undergone] upon the Church's account, departed this life in the second Consulate of Gratianus which he bore with Probus; he governed that Bishoprick amidst many dangers fourty and six years, and left Peter, a pious and eloquent person, to succeed him in his See.

Athanasius's death.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

CHAP. XXI.

That after Athanaſius's death, the Arians by the Emperour Valens's Order, delivered up the Churches in Alexandria to Lucius who had been Ordained by them before, and committed Peter to Priſon.

THe Arians therefore took courage immediately, being rendred inſolent by the Emperour's Religion; and without delay they give an account hereof to the Emperour, who then reſided at Antioch. At the ſame time alſo Euzoïus (who preſided over the profeſſours of Arianiſm at Antioch,) with greedineſs catches that opportunity ſo ſeaſonably offered; and makes it his deſign to procure himſelf to be ſent to Alexandria, to the intent that he might deliver poſſeſſion of the Churches there to Lucius the Arian. Which was alſo approved of by the Emperour. And forthwith he went to Alexandria, [accompanied] with the Imperial Forces. For [a] Magnus, Lord Treaſurer to the Emperour, went along with him. The Imperial Order was directed to Palladius * Præfect of Egypt, and a command was iſſued forth that the Military Forces there ſhould give their aſſiſtance. Wherefore, they apprehended Peter, and confined him to Priſon. After they had diſperſed the other Eccleſiaſticks ſome into one place, ſome into another, they ſeated Lucius in the Epiſcopal Chair.

[a] This Magnus is termed κομης λαργιτιόνων κόμης, Comes of the Court-Largeſſes, in the Letter of Petrus Alexandrinus (the perſon ſpoken of in this chapter,) part of which Letter Theodoret has recorded, book 4. chap. 22. Eccleſ. Hiſtor.

* In the original he is termed Præfect of Alexandria; which title was ſometimes given to the Præfects of Egypt; as it has been obſerved before.

CHAP. XXII.

That Sabinus the Macedonian Heretick has made no mention of thoſe many miſchiefs which happened at Lucius's inſtallment. But they are recorded in a Letter written by Peter; who made his eſcape, and fled to Damaſus [Biſhop] of Rome. But the Arians and Lucius were the Authours of many miſchievous practiſes and cruelties againſt thoſe holy perſons who led a Monaſtick life in the Solitudes.

MOreover, what miſchiefs hapned at Lucius's induction [into the Sea of Alexandria,] or what was done againſt thoſe perſons that were ejected, as well in, as without the Courts of Judicature, and how ſome were ſubjected to various Tortures, and others were baniſhed, even after they had been tortured; [of any of theſe particulars] there is not the leaſt mention made by Sabinus. For, in regard he was a Semi-Arian, he concealed the enormous villanies of his friends. But Peter has manifeſtly diſplaied them to the view of all men, in his own Letters, which he ſent about to the Churches every where, after his eſcape * out of Priſon. This † perſon, as ſoon as he could make an eſcape out of his impriſonment, fled to Damaſus Biſhop of Rome. But the Arians, although few in number, notwithſtanding were repoſſeſſed of the Alexandrian Churches. Not long after, an Imperial Edict [came forth, wherein] it was ordered, that [all] the Embracers of the Homoöuſian Opinion ſhould be ejected out of Alexandria, and [driven] from all parts of Egypt. And the Governour of Egypt was commanded, with a numerous Army of Souldiers every where to put to flight and chaſe away thoſe, whom Lucius ſhould order [to be ejected.] At the ſame time they moleſted, diſturbed, and in a moſt cruel and hoſtile manner aſſaulted the Monaſteries in the Deſart. For Armed men ruſh't in upon perſons unarmed, who would not ſtretch forth ſo much as their hand to ſtrike a ſtroak; and deſtroyed them with ſuch cruelty and barbarity, that what they perpetrated againſt them is inexpreſſible.

* Or, out of his bonds.

CHAP. XXIII.

A Catalogue of the holy Monks [who lived] in the Deſart.

BUt, in regard we have made mention of the Monaſteries in Egypt, nothing hinders but we may give an account in ſhort concerning them. The Monaſteries in Egypt had their original ('tis probable) from very great antiquity: but they were enlarged and much increaſed by a pious man, whoſe name was Ammon. This perſon, when young, had an averſion for marriage. But when ſome of his neareſt relatives entreated him not to ſpeak reproachfully of Matrimony, but that he would marry a wife; he was prevailed upon, and entred into a Matrimonial ſtate of life. And immediately after he had taken the Virgin out of the * Bride-chamber, and with the uſual ſolemnity lead her into his Lodging-room, at length when his friends and acquaintance were gone away, he took the Apoſtolick Book, read Saint Pauls Epiſtle to the Corinthians, and expounded to his wife the Apoſtles admonitions to married perſons. And making an addition of ſeveral particulars from elſewhere, he informed her, how many burdenſome inconveniences do accompany marriage, how full of grief and diſquietude the cohabitation of man and woman is, and what pangs attend a woman great with child; adding withall the grief and troubles [which ariſe] from the breeding up of children. [On the other hand] he added the conveniencies of Chaſtity, how great a freedom attends a pure life, how unpolluted it is, and void of all uncleanneſs; and that virginity places perſons in the neareſt alliance to God. Having diſcourſt of theſe and many other ſuch like particulars to his virgin-wife, he perſwades her, that before they ſhould have any carnal knowledge of each other, ſhe would together with him renounce a Secular life. When they had made this agreement between themſelves, they retired to the mountain called Nitria. There they lived in a Cottage, and for ſome ſhort time made uſe of one Aſcetick apartment in common, without the knowledge of any difference between the Maſculine and Feminine Sex, but being (according to the Apoſtle) one in Chriſt. Not long after, the new and unpolluted Bride ſpake theſe words to Ammon: it is not decent for you (ſaid ſhe,) who with the greateſt ſtrictneſs immaginable do profeſs Chaſtity, to look upon

* Ἀπὸ τῆς παστάδος. Παστὰς, or (which has the ſame import) παστὸς, ſignifies a Wedding-chamber, Dining-room, or entertaining-room. See Stephens's Theſaur. Græc. Ling. in the word πάστος. The Seventy two Tranſlatours do uſe this term (at Joel 2. 16, and at Pſalm 19. 5.) to expreſs the Hebrew word חֻפָּה Chuppa; which was a Tabernacle or Tent ſet up on purpoſe, for the performance of the ſolemnities (uſual amongſt the Jews) of betrothing between the man and woman.

upon a woman [a] in so narrow an habitation. Wherefore if you please, we will perform our Ascetick exercises apart. With this compact also both parties were well pleased. And being separated one from the other, they thus spent the remainder of their lives; abstaining from Wine and Oyle, and feeding upon dry bread only, which they eat some times after one days [fasting,] at others after two, at other times after more. Antonius, who was this Ammon's Cotemporary, saw his soul after his death taken up [into heaven] by Angels, as Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria does declare in his Life of Antonius. Moreover, very many persons imitated his Ammon's Life. And by degrees the mountaines of Nitria and Scetis were filled with multitudes of Monks. To write whose lives, would be the Subject of a particular work. But in regard there were amongst them persons of great piety, who were eminent for their Ascetick discipline, lived Apostolick Lives, and did, and said some things that were usefull and worthy to be recorded, I thought it expedient [to select] some few passages out of many, and intermix them with my History, in order to the Readers advantage. 'Tis reported therefore, that this Ammon never saw himself naked, saying, that it was misbecoming a Monk to behold his own naked body. And, being one time desirous to pass a River, he was † loath to uncloath himself; but prayed to God, that he might have a passage over without impeding the resolution he had taken: and an angel conveyed him to the other side of the River. Didymus, another Monk, although he lived Ninety years, yet kept company with no man during his whole life. Another, by name Arsenius, would not separate the younger Monks, who had committed an offence, from Communion, but those only that were elderly: for he said, that a young Monk being excommunicated, becomes || contumacious: but an elderly Monk does quickly become sensible of the grief of Excommunication. Ptor eat his meat walking. When one asked him why he fed after that manner; I will not (said he,) go to meat, as to a serious and set work, but as to an incident and by businesse. To another, questioning him concerning the same thing, he answered; least (says he,) whilst I am eating, my mind should be affected with any bodily pleasure. Isidorus said, that it was fourty years since he was sensible of sin in his mind; and that he never consented, either to lust, or anger. Pambos, a man illiterate, went to a person, that by him he might be taught a Psalm. And having heard the first verse of the thirty eighth Psalm, which runs thus, * I said I will take heed to my ways that I offend not with my tongue; he refused to hear the second verse, and went away; saying, that this one verse was enough for him, in case he could learn it perfectly, and in reality practise and perform it. And when he who had given him the verse to learn, reproved him, because he had not seen him in a whole six months space, he answered; I have not yet truly and indeed learnt the verse of the Psalm. Many years after this, to one of his acquaintance enquiring of him whether he had learnt the verse, his answer was, during the space of these Nineteen years I have scarce learned to * fulfill it effectually. The same person (when one gave him Gold [to be bestowed] for the maintenance of the poor, and said to him, tell the sum which I have given,) replyed, there is no need of telling the money, but of a right and sound disposition of mind. The same Pambos, upon the entreaty of Athanasius the Bishop, came out of the Desart to Alexandria. And seeing a woman-player there, he brake forth into tears. When the persons in presence asked him, why he wept; two things (said he) trouble me; the one is, this womans destruction: the other, because I do not use so much diligence and industry to please God, as she does to delight obscene men. Another of them said, that a Monk, unless he will work, is to be involved in the same condemnation with the covetous and rapacious person. Petirus was well furnished with a knowledge in Natural Speculations, and frequently expounded sometimes one thing, at other times another, to such as addressed themselves to him. At every one of his † Lectures he made a prayer to God. But, amongst the Monks [who lived] at that time, there were two pious persons who bore the same name. For each of them had the appellation of Macarius. The one was born in The Upper Egypt, the other came from the City Alexandria. Both of them were famous upon several accounts, [to wit,] for their Ascetick exercises, for their Morals, for their Converse, and for the Miracles wrought by their hands. The Egyptian Macarius wrought so many cures, and drove so numerous a company of devils out of persons possest, that [to relate] what he performed by the grace of God, would require a particular and separate Work. Towards those who came to him, he behaved himself with an austere gravity, tempered with caution and circumspection. But the Alexandrian Macarius, although he was every way like the Egyptian Macarius, yet he differed from him in this, that he shewed himself chearfull and pleasant towards those who came into his company, and by his courteous behaviour and complaizance induced young men to embrace an Ascetick course of life. Evagrius, Scholar to these Macarius's, having before been a Philosopher in words only, learned [from them] that Philosophy [which consists] in deeds and actions. * He having been ordained Deacon by Gregorius Nazianzenus at Constantinople, went afterwards with him into Egypt, where he conversed with those forementioned persons, and imitated their course of life. Nor were the Miracles wrought by his hands, fewer in number than those performed by his Masters. The same Evagrius wrote Books of very great use: one whereof has this Title, [b] The Monk, or Concerning Active Virtue: another is entitled, The Gnostick, or to him who is reputed worthy of knowledge. This Book is divided into Fifty Chapters. A third is termed Antirreticus [or The Refutation, being a Collection] from the sacred Scriptures, against the tempting evil spirits; it is divided into eight parts, The Monastick]

[a] In the original 'tis thus worded, ἐν τοσούτῳ οἰκήματι, in so great an house. Christophorson has rendred it, in tantillo domicilio, in so small an house. But the Greek term will not admit of this rendition. Wherefore, I had rather it should be thus worded, ἐν τῷ σῷ οἰκήματι, in your dwelling. Vales.

[b] Instead of [Μοναχὸς is reputed worthy of knowledge] Epiphanius Scholasticus in his copy read Μοναστικὸς, The Monastick] as 'tis apparent from his Version. Notwithstanding, Nicephorus (book 11. chap. 22) confirms the common reading. But, as to Evagrius's other book here mentioned he words the title of it thus. Γνωστικὸς, ἢ περὶ τῆς καλαξιωθέντος γνώσεως, The Gnostick, or concerning him who is reputed worthy of knowledge. It may also be written (as it is here in Socrates) thus, or to him who is reputed worthy of knowledge which reading we have followed in our Version. Concerning this Evagrius's books, see Jerome's sentiment, in his Epistle to Ctesiphon against the Pelagians: where he informs us, that Evagrius was an Origenist. Palladius (in Lausiaca) says Evagrius wrote three books. The first of these he calls Ἱερὸς, The Saint: the second Μοναχὸς, The Monk; the third Ἀντιῤῥητικὸς, The Refutation; which is against the frauds of the Devil. Palladius terms that book of Evagrius's, The Saint, which Socrates here calls The Gnostick. according to the number of the eight thoughts. [He wrote] alſo ſix hundred Prognoſtick Problems: and moreover, two Books in Verſe; the one to thoſe Monks [who live] in Monaſteries or Covents; the other to the Virgin. How admirable theſe Books of his are, they that read them will perceive. It is not unſeaſonable, as I ſuppoſe, to annex to what has been ſaid before, ſome few paſſages recorded by him, concerning the Monks. For he ſays word for word thus. It is alſo neceſſary to make an enquiry into the ways of thoſe Monks, who have heretofore walked * uprightly, and to conform [our ſelves] to the pattern thereof: For many things have been well ſaid and done by them. Amongſt which this was the ſaying of one of them, that a drier, ſlender, and not irregular ſort of diet, joyned with love, will in a ſhort time bring a Monk to a Port void of all inquietude. The ſame Monk freed one of his brethren from his being diſturbed with apparitions in the night, enjoyning him to miniſter to the ſick, whilſt he was faſting. And being asked [why he commanded him to do that,] ſuch troubles as theſe (ſaid he) are compoſed and extinguiſhed with nothing ſo eaſily, as with mercy and compaſſion. A Philoſopher of thoſe times came to Antonius the Juſt, and ſaid unto him, O Father, how can you hold out, being deſtitute of the comfort of Books? Antonius replied, my Book, O Philoſopher, is the nature of things made, and 'tis ready at hand as often as I am deſirous of reading the Words of God. That aged perſon the Egyptian Macarius, that choſen veſſel, asked me, why by remembring the injuries we receive from men, we deſtroy that ſtrength and faculty of memory which is in our minds: but by remembring the miſchiefs done to us by the devils, we continue unhurt? And when I was doubtfull what anſwer I ſhould make, and entreated him to explain the reaſon hereof to me; the firſt (ſaid he,) is an affection of the mind, which is contrary to nature: the ſecond is agreeable to nature. I went one time to the holy Father Macarius, at noon-day, when it was very hot, and being moſt extreamly thirſty, requeſted ſome water to drink. His anſwer to me was, Content your ſelf with the ſhade; for many perſons who are at this time travelling by Land, or making a voyage by Sea, do want [the refreſhment of] that. Then, I conferred with him about Abſtinence, and he ſaid unto me, Be couragious and confident my Son: For theſe twenty years compleat, I have not taken my fill either of bread, water, or ſleep. For I have eaten my bread by weight; I have drank my water by meaſure: and I have ſtollen [c] a little part of a ſleep, by leaning my ſelf againſt a wall. One of the Monks had the news of his Fathers death brought to him. His return to him that told him this, was, forbear ſpeaking impiouſly; for my Father is immortal. One of the Brethren was poſſeſſour of nothing elſe but the Book of the Goſpels: when he had ſould that Book, he gave [the money he had for it,] to feed the hungry, and uttered this ſaying worthy to be recorded, I have ſould that Book which ſaieth, * Sell that thou haſt and give to the poor. There is an Iſland about Alexandria, ſcituate at the Northern part of that City, beyond the Lake called Mareotis. Near that Iſland dwells a Monk [d] of Parembole, a moſt approved perſon amongſt the Gnoſticks, who has declared, that all things practiſed by the Monks, are done for five reaſons, for the ſake of God, of Nature, on the account of Cuſtom, of Neceſſity, and of the work of the hands. It was the uſual ſaying of the ſame perſon alſo, that by nature there was only one virtue, but that in reſpect of the faculties of the ſoul it was divided into ſeveral Species. For the light of the Sun, ſaid he, is without any figure; but it does uſually receive its figure from the windows through which it enters. Another of the Monks was wont to ſay, I do therefore every way eſchew pleaſures, that I may * prevent the occaſions of anger. For I know very well, that anger does always † militate for pleaſures, and does diſquiet my mind, and expell knowledge. One of the aged Monks ſaid, that Charity knows not how to keep the || Depoſitum of meat or money. This was another ſaying of the ſame perſon, I do not remember that I was ever twice deceived as to the ſame thing by the Devil.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

A Tranſlatours have been notoriouſly miſtaken at this place. For Chriſtophorſon renders it thus; in ea Monachus ex Sectâ Gnoſtico-rum vir ſanctiſſimus habitavit, in that [Iſland] dwelt a Monk, a moſt eminent perſon of the Sect of the Gnoſticks. Lan-gus, Nicephorus's Tranſlatour, has rendred this paſſage in Evagrius thus: Habitat in ea Monachus Gnoſticorum Ordinis celeberrimus, in that [Iſland] dwells a moſt famous Monk of the Order of the Gnoſticks. But firſt, Evagrius does not ſay, that that Monk dwelt in that Iſland beyond the Lake Mareotis; but only, that he dwelt near that Iſland. For that's the import of the word παροικεῖ. Secondly, παρεμβολὴ [Parembole] does not ſignifie a Sect, or an Order: nor are the Gnoſticks taken in this place for a Sect of Hereticks; but 'tis a ſort of Monks, concerning whom Evagrius wrote a book. Parembole therefore is a Village not far from Alexandria, near the Lake Mareotis. Athanaſius makes mention of it in his ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians, where he produces the Catalogue of Clergy-men, whom Meletius had in the City and within the Territory of Alexandria. After his mentioning of the Presbyters and Deacons of Meletius's party, which he had at Alexandria, he adds theſe words; καὶ Μακαρίου Πρεσβύτερον τῆς Παρεμβολῆς, and Macarius Presbyter of Parembole. Parembole is alſo mentioned in the Notitia Imperii Romani, wherein were the Quarters of the ſecond Trajan Legion under the command of the Comes of the Military affairs throughout Egypt. Ptolemæus alſo (in Ammoniaca) places Alexander's Parembole near the Lake Mareotis. Here therefore dwelt that Monk, who was ſo eminent amongſt the Gnoſticks. Valeſ.

[c] Concerning this Serapion, Jerome (in his book de Scriptor. Eccles.) speaks these words: Serapio Thmuëos Ægypti Urbis Episcopus, qui ob eleganti-am ingenii Scholasticus dictus est, &c. Serapion Bishop of Thmuis a City of Ægypt, who for the Elegance of his wit was stiled Scholasticus, &c. He died in Constantius's Reign, before the Seleucian Synod, that is, before the year of Christ 359. For in the Seleucian Synod, amongst the Bishops of Acacius's party, Ptolomæus is reckoned Bishop of Thmuis a City of Augustonica, or Augustanica. For Baronius is not to be heeded, who (in his Annotations on the Roman Martyrology,) says, Thmuis was a City in the Province Scethis. Scethis was not the name of a Province, but was it self rather in the Province Augustanica. And yet Marcellinus (book 22.) places Thmuis in (that properly called) Egypt. Vales.

Thus much we have taken out of Evagrius's Books and inserted here. There was also another admirable person amongst the Monks, by name Ammonius, who had so little of curiosity in him, that being at Rome with Athanasius, he was desirous of viewing none of those magnificent works in that City; but saw only the Cathedral of Peter and Paul. This Ammonius, when he was to have been forced to take a Bishoprick, fled away, and cut off his own right ear, that by a * Mutilation of his body he might avoid being ordained a Bishop. Some time afterwards, Evagrius (who was also to have been forc't to [take] a Bishoprick by Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria, and had made his escape, without making any mutilation upon his own body;) accidentally met Ammonius, and in a facetious manner said unto him, That he had done ill to cut off his own ear, and that upon that account he was culpable before God. To whom Ammonius made this return: But do not you think, Evagrius, that you shall be punished, because you have cut out your own tongue, and out of a love to your self, would not make use of that Grace which was bestowed upon you? Moreover, at that time, there were in the Solitudes many other admirable and pious persons, the mention of whom in this Work of ours would be too long and tedious. Besides, we must of necessity digress from the design we have proposed to our selves, should we give a particular account of the Lives of every one of these persons, and of the Miracles they performed by that eminent Sanctity wherewith they were endued. If any one be desirous of an accurate account of these men, and would know what actions they performed and did, what sayings they uttered conducive to the profit and advantage of the hearers, and how the wild-beasts were obedient to them: there is a particular Book, elaborated by Paladius the Monk, who was Evagrius's Scholar; wherein all things appertaining to these persons, are with great accuracy discourst of at large. In which Book [Palladius] makes mention of women also, who followed a course of life like to the foresaid men. Further, Evagrius and Palladius flourished a little after the death of Valens [Augustus.] But we will now return to that place, whence we have digressed.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning those holy Monks who were exiled; how God (by the Miracles they performed) attracted all persons to himself.

WHen therefore the Emperour Valens had by his Edict given order, that as well the Orthodox, in Alexandria, as those in the other parts of Egypt, should be forcibly driven from their habitations; depopulation and ruine forthwith defaced and overthrew all things: whilst some persons were drag'd before the seats of judicature; others thrown into Prison; and others tortured by other methods. For they inflicted various sorts of punishment upon persons that were great lovers of peace and quietness. After these things were done at Alexandria, in such a manner as Lucius thought good, and when Euzoïus was returned to Antioch, these [two] persons hastned immediately to the Solitudes of Egypt; [I mean] the Commander in chief of the Milice, with a numerous company of Souldiers, and Lucius the Arian. For he himself was not at that time absent, but (without shewing any compassion in the least towards the assembly of those holy men,) perpetrated worse barbarities than the Souldiers themselves did. When they arrived at the place, they apprehended the men performing their usual exercises; [to wit,] praying, curing diseases, and casting out devils. But these [wretches,] little regarding God's Miracles, would not permit so much as the usual and solemn prayers to be performed in the Oratories; but drove the holy persons even out of those places. Nor did they acquiesse in the doing hereof only, but proceeded on further, and [a] made use of weapons against them. These [cruelties] Rufinus says he was [b] present at and saw, and was a fellow-sufferer with these persons. Wherefore, the words of the Apostle were renewed against them. For, they were mocked,

[a] Instead of [Τοῖς ὄχλοις ἐκέχρηντο, made use of the multitudes] I read [τοῖς ὅπλοις ἐκέχρηντο, made use of weapons.] This reading is confirmed by Rufinus, book 2. chap. 3. Which passage in Rufinus Socrates does here take notice of. Vales.

[b] Instead of [παρ' ὧν] we read [παρὼν, was present at.] See Rufinus book 2. chap. 4. where his words are these Quæ præsens vidi loquor, & eorum gesta refero, quorum in passionibus socius esse promerui. I speak what I was present at, and saw; and I relate their actions, of whose sufferings I had the favour to be a Companion. Vales.

and * had triall of Scourgings, they were ſtript naked, were bound, were ſtoned, were ſlain with the Sword, [they were] perſons that wandred about in the Solitudes, in Sheep-skins, and Goat-skins, being deſtitute, afflicted, tormented, of whom the world was not worthy, they wandred in Deſerts, and in Mountaines, and in Dens, and Caves of the earth: † notwithſtanding they received a Teſtimony both from their Faith, and from the Works and Cures, which the Grace of God performed by their hands. But (as 'tis probable,) divine Providence permitted theſe perſons to ſuffer theſe things, having provided ſome better thing, that by thoſe miſeries which they underwent, others might obtain ſalvation in God. And this was demonſtrated by the Event. When therefore theſe admirable perſons were ſuperiour to all that force and violence uſed towards them, Lucius, quite out of heart, advices the Commander of the Military Forces, to baniſh the Fathers of the Monks. Theſe [Fathers of the Monks] were, the Egyptian Macarius, and he of Alexandria who bore the ſame name. Theſe perſons therefore were exiled into an Iſland, wherein there was no Chriſtian Inhabitant. In that Iſland there was an [Heathen] Temple, and a Prieſt in it, whom all the Inhabitants worſhipped like a God. But when theſe pious perſons arrived in that Iſland, all the Dæmons there were ſeized with a fear and trembling. At the ſame time alſo, this accident hapned. The Prieſts daughter, poſſeſt on a ſudden by a Devil, fell into a rage and overturned all things. She was extreamly unruly, and could by no means be quieted: but cried out with a loud voice, and ſpake to thoſe pious perſons, ſaying, why are you come to caſt us out from hence alſo? Theſe men therefore did in that place give another demonſtration of that * power of theirs which they had received from the Grace of God. For they drove the Devil out of the Virgin, and [having reſtored her] to her right mind, delivered her to her Father; whereby they induced both the Prieſt, and alſo all the Inhabitants of that Iſland, to [embrace] the Faith of the Chriſtian Religion. Wherefore, [c] they caſt away their Images immediately; changed the Fabrick of their Temple into the form of a Church; received Baptiſm, and with cheerfulneſs learned all the [Doctrines] of Chriſtianity. Thus theſe admirable perſons, perſecuted upon account of the Homoöuſian Faith, rendred themſelves more approved, brought ſalvation to others, and made the Faith more firm and ſtrong.

* He alludes to that paſſage, at Hebr. 11. 36, 37, 38.

ABout the ſame times, God produced another perſon, by whoſe Teſtimony he thought fit the Faith ſhould be corroborated and confirmed. For Didymus, a man admirable and eloquent, adorned with all ſorts of Learning, flouriſhed at that time. This perſon being very young, when he had but juſt learned to read; fell into a diſtemper of his eyes; wherewith he was ſorely troubled, and loſt his eye-ſight. But God, inſtead of corporal eyes, gave him thoſe of the mind. For what he could not be inſtructed in by ſeeing, he learnt by hearing. For being of an apt and ingenious diſpoſition from his childhood, and endued with an excellent wit, he far ſurpaſſed even thoſe [a ripe-witted children] who had the acuteſt ſight. For he became Maſter of the Rules of Grammar with much eaſe, and arrived to the knowledge of thoſe of Rhetorick with more celerity. Proceeding on from thence to Philoſophy, with an admirable facility he learnt Logick, Arithmetick, and Muſick; and treaſured up with n his own mind the other Precepts of the Philoſophers, in ſuch a manner, that he could readily diſpute againſt thoſe, who had perfectly learnt thoſe Arts by the benefit of their eyes. Moreover, he was ſo exactly well-skilled in the divine Oracles of the Old and New Teſtament, that he publiſhed many diſcourſes upon them: he dictated Three Books concerning the Trinity; and interpreted Origens Books Concerning Principles, ſetting forth [b] Comments thereupon, wherein he aſſerts that thoſe Books were incomparably well written, and that their Cavils are trivolous, who accuſe Origen, and make it their buſineſs to ſpeak reproachfully of his Works: for they are not able, ſays he, to arrive at the knowledge of that Authours perſpicacity and prudence. If any perſon therefore be deſirous of knowing Didymus's great Learning, and the fervency of his mind, he may have an account thereof by a peruſal of the Books elaborated by him. It's reported, that Antonius [the Monk] diſcourſed with this Didymus, [c] long before the times of Valens, at ſuch time as he left the deſart, and came to Alexandria upon account of the Arians; and that perceiving the Learning and knowledge of this perſon, he ſpake theſe words to him; O Didymus! Let not the loſs of your bodily eyes trouble you. For you are deprived of ſuch eyes, [d] as the Flies and Gnats can ſee with. But rejoyce, that you have thoſe eyes, wherewith the Angels ſee, by which even God himſelf is diſcerned, and his Light comprehended. This was the ſaying of the pious Antonius to Didymus, long before theſe times [we are treating of.] But at that time, Didymus was look't upon to be the greateſt Patron and Defender of the genuine Faith, who diſputed againſt the Arians, unravelled their Sophiſtick Cavills, and confuted their adulterate and fraudulent diſcourſes.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

[a] The word [ἐνφυεῖς] which we have rendred [ripe-witted children] muſt be expunged; which ſeems to have crept in here, out of the foregoing line. Epiphanius Scholaſticus acknowledges it not. For thus he renders it; Qui cum a pucro fuiſſet ingenioſus, vincebat etiam acuta conſpicientes, who being from a boy of an ingenious diſpoſition, excelled even thoſe who ſaw with the greateſt acuteneſs. Valeſ.

[b] Concerning theſe Comments of Didymus's on Origens books περὶ ἀρχῶν, Ferome ſpeaks, in his 1ſt, and 2d book againſt Rufinus. Valeſ.

[c] Epiphanius Scholaſticus, and the other tranſlatours have rendred this place ill; as if Antonius the Monk had come to Alexandria in the times of Valens Auguſtus. But, 'tis manifeſt, that Antonius died in the Reign of Conſtantius. Ferome informs us hereof, in his Chronicon, and in his Life of Hilarion. 'Tis uncertain, in what year of Conſtantius's Empire Antonius left the Solitudes, and came down to Alexandria; whether it was about the beginning of Conſtantius's Reign, before the ordination of Gregorius the Arian; or rather, after the Synod of Seràica, and Athanaſius's ſecond reſtitution. Valeſ.

[d] Inſtead of [οἷς καὶ μῦαι καὶ κώνωπες βλέπουσιν, as the Flyes and Gnats can ſee with,] in Cedrenus, at the ſixth year of Conſtantius, the reading is [οἷς καὶ μῦαι καὶ κώνωπες βλάπτουσιν, as the Flyes and Gnats can do harm to. Nor did Epiphanius Scholaſticus find it written otherwiſe in his Copy, as 'tis apparent from this his Verſion: quibus & Muſcæ & Culices nocere poſſunt, to which the Flyes and Gnats can do harm. And yet Rufinus, (Eccleſ. Hiſtor. book 2. chap. 7.) out of whom Socrates borrowed this ſtory, defends the common reading, which we have followed in our Verſion. And Ferome alſo does confirm this our reading, in his Epiſtle to Cuſtrutius. Valeſ.

Concerning Baſilius of Cæſarea, and Gregorius of Nazianzum.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

[it made use of] Basilius Cæsariensis, and Gregorius Nazianzenus. Concerning whom I judge it now opportune to give a short account. The memory and fame of these two persons, which is still preserved amongst all men, and the Learning contained in the Books written by them, might indeed be sufficient to set forth the praises and commendations of each of them. But, in regard they were persons in an eminent manner usefull to the Church at that time, and were preserved [by God,] as being the Incentives of the [Orthodox] Faith; the Subject of our History does of necessity ingage us, in an especiall manner to make mention of these two men. Should any one therefore be desirous of comparing Basilius and Gregorius with one another, and of giving an account of the Life, Morals, and Virtues that were in them; he would be in a great doubt which of them he should prefer before the other. For they were both equal to one another, whether you respect their [pious and] exact course of Life, or their Learning; I mean as well their Grecian Literature, as their knowledge in the sacred Scriptures. For, when very young, they went to Athens, and were the hearers of Himerius and Prohæresius, the two most eminent Sophistæ of those times; afterwards they frequented [the School of] Libanius at Antioch in Syria, and by their industry arrived at the highest accomplishments of *eloquence. And when they were judged worthy to be professours of eloquence, many persons perswaded them to enter upon the teaching and profession thereof. Others advised them to practise the Law, but they despised both these sorts of Life: and discontinuing their studies of eloquence, embraced a Monastick life. Having therefore had a taste of the precepts of Philosophy from him who at that time taught Philosophy at Antioch, not long after they procured Origen's Works, and from them got an insight into the interpretation of the sacred Scriptures. For the great fame of Origen did at that time fill the whole world. When they had with great studiousness exercised themselves in the perusal of those Books, they powerfully opposed the Assertours of Arianism. And although the Arians *cited Origen's Books, in confirmation (as they supposed) of their own opinion; yet these two persons confuted them, and evidently demonstrated, that they understood not the meaning of Origen. Indeed, the Arians, and their then Abettor Eunomius, although they were at that time accounted persons of great eloquence, yet, as often as they engaged in a discourse with Gregorius and Basilius, 'twas made evidently apparent that they were men altogether ignorant and unlearned. Basilius was first promoted to a †Diaconate by Meletius Bishop of Antioch; after that, he was preferred to the [b] Bishoprick of his own Country, I mean Cæsarea in Cappadocia, and undertook the care of the Churches.

[a] What Socrates says here, is in my opinion false; viz. that Basilius and Gregorius, after they had finished the course of their Learned studies at Athens, were hearers of Libanius the Sophista at Antioch. Gregorius himself does refute this, in his Poem concerning his own Life; where he says, that he was in the thirtieth year of his age when he left Athens, and that his friends would have detained him at Athens, that he might be a professour of eloquence; (the same is attested by Rufinus, book 2. chap. 9. Eccles. Hist.) but that he fled secretly from thence, and went into his own Country. Vales.

* Or, Rhetorick.

† Or, the Office of a Deacon.

[b] Baronius says, Basilius was prefered to the Bishoprick of Cæsarea, in the year of Christ 369: and this he attempts to prove from Gregorius Nyssenus's testimony. Theophanes and Cedrenus, in his Chronicon, do place the beginning of Basilius's Episcopate, on the ninth year of Valens, which was the year of Christ 371. But the same Authours do affirm, that Basilius was yet but a Presbyter, in the eighth year of Valens. See Theophanes's and Cedrenus's words at the said eighth year of Valens. Gregorius Nazianzenus does confirm the same, in his Oration de Laudibus Basilii. Where he does attest in expres words, that Basilius was yet but a Presbyter only of the Church of Cæsarea, at such time as Valens, guarded with a part of Heretical Prelates, undertook an expedition against the Churches of the East, which he hastned to deliver up to the Arians. Moreover, Valens undertook this expedition against the Orthodox on his own third Consulate, that is on the year of Christ 370, as our Socrates does affirm: (compare the 14th and 17th chapters of this 4th book.) Gregorius Nyssenus confirms this, in his first book against Eunomius (who had upbraided Basilius with fearfulness and pusillanimity,) where he describes Valens's preparations and expedition against the Churches, in these words: Ἐξήλασεν μὲν τῆς Κωνσταντινουπόλεως ὅτι τὴν ἑῴαν ὁ Βασιλεύς, &c. The Emperour went from Constantinople into the East, puft up in his mind with the late successfull and fortunate Actions he had performed against the Barbarians. That is, after the War against the Goths, and the League made with them. Which hapned in the year of Christ 369, as Amm. Marcellinus attests. Wherefore, that expedition of Valens's to destroy Gods Churches, hapned in the year of our Lord 370, as I have now said. Now, that Basilius was then no more than a Presbyter, his Brother Gregorius does in the same place inform us. For, he says, that the Præfect of the Pratorium, to wit, Modestus, at first made use of flatteries, and promised Basilius a Præsulate and an Ecclesiastick presidency, provided he would obey the Emperour. Nyssen's words are these: πειθόντι μὲν τὸν ἐκ Βασιλέως πιμὴν, ἢ τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς Ἐκκλησίας ἀφεῖναι. Therefore Basilius was not Bishop of Cæsarea, at such time as Modestus endeavoured to pervert him. Moreover, Modestus first bore the Præfecture of the Prætorium, when Gratianus II and Probus were Coss. in the year of Christ 371, as I have remark in my notes on the 29th book of Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 380. It may also be proved by another argument, that Basilius was preferred to the Episcopate of Cæsarea after the year of Christ 370. For Nazianzen in the Funeral Oration which he wrote on him, says that Basilius was but a Presbyter, at such time as that Famine (by far the forest of all the Famines that are mentioned to have hapned at any time) hapned in Cappadocia. Now, this is the Famine, which our Socrates mentions in the sixteenth chapter of this book; it hapned in the third Consulate of Valentinianus and Valens. Vales.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

For being afraid, least the novelty of the Arian opinion should prey upon and devour the Provinces of Pontus, he went [c] with great hast into those parts. Where he constituted Monasteries, instructed the inhabitants in his own doctrines, and confirmed the minds of those that wavered. [d] Gregorius [being constituted] Bishop of Nazianzum a small City in Cappadocia, over which Church his own father had before presided, took the same course that Basilius did. For he also went up and down to the Cities, and corroborated those that were feeble and dispirited as to the faith. But more especially, he made frequent journeys to Constantinople, and confirmed the Orthodox in that City by his Preaching and Discourses. Upon which account, he was soon after by him made Bishop of Sasima, a small City in the confines of Cappadocia and Galatia, and ordained him Bishop of the same. But Gregorius never resided there, but only passed through it, when he went to or came from Nazianzum. For he was not willing to be Bishop of any City, but of Nazianzum, his native City. Which City, when Valens had divided into two parts, and had made Thyanis the Metropolis of the one part, he was constrained to be Bishop of both. Which City, when Valens had divided into two parts, and had made Thyanis the Metropolis of the one part, he was constrained to be Bishop of both.

[c] Gregorius Nazianzenus (who is more to be credited in these things) does attest in his Funeral Oration concerning the praises of Basilius, that Basilius, as yet but a Presbyter, went into those parts, with a design to oppose himself against the perfidiousness of the Arians. Vales.

[d] Socrates borrowed this out of Rufinus; who (in book 2. chap 9. Eccles. Histor.) writes thus: Gregorius vero apud Nazianzon, &c. But Gregorius, being substituted Bishop in his father's stead, at the Town Nazianzum, faithfully bore the storm of the Hereticks. And yet 'tis manifest, that Gregorius was not made Bishop, but Coadjutor only to his own father Gregorius, in the Episcopate of Nazianzum: and upon this condition too, that he should not succeed his father in that Bishoprick; as he himself attests in his Eighth Oration, and in his Poem concerning his own Life. He was first constituted Bishop of Sasimi by Basilius the Great, who had been the first Founder of this Bishoprick, that he might assure that place to his own Church; as Gregorius attests in the Poem concerning his own Life. From thence he was translated to the Constantinopolitan See, which he quickly left, betook himself to Nazianzum, and governed the Bishoprick of that place some while, till such time as, being wearied out with age and diseases, he made choise of his own successour. Jerome's account therefore is true, whose words (in his book De Script. Eccles.) are these: Gregorius primùm Sasimorum, deinde Nazianzenus Episcopus, &c. Gregorius, Bishop first of Sasimi, and afterwards of Nazianzum, &c. And 'tis strange, that although he governed three Bishopricks, yet they were all doubtfull and uncertain. 'Tis plain, that in his Epistles he himself does frequently deny, that he ever presided over the Episcopate of Sasimi, or ever performed any sacerdotal office there. Neither Jerome his Scholar, nor Rufinus, do ascribe the Constantinopolitan Bishoprick to him. Lastly, he delivered the Bishoprick of Nazianzum to another, rather than governed it himself. Vales.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

ter conſtituted Biſhop over the people at Conſtantinople, by the ſuffrage of many Biſhops. When therefore what * both theſe perſons did, came to the Emperour Valens's ears, he forthwith ordered [c] Baſilius to be brought from Cæſarea to Antioch. Immediately therefore he was conveyed thither, and by the Emperours order was ſet before the Tribunal of the Præfects: [f] when the Præfect put this queſtion to him, why he would not embrace the Emperours Faith; Baſilius with a great deal of confidence found fault with the Emperours Religion, and commended the Homoöuſian Faith. But when the Præfect threatened him with death, would to God (ſaid Baſilius) it might happen to me, to be delivered from the bonds of the body upon account of the truth! Then, upon the Præfects admoniſhing him to inſpect and conſider the matter more ſeriouſly with himſelf, 'tis reported that Baſilius ſaid, I am the ſame this day that I ſhall be to morrow: [g] I wiſh that you would not have changed your ſelf. After this Baſilius continued that day in cuſtody. Not long after, it hapned, that Valens's ſon, a young child, whoſe name was [h] Galates, was ſeized with a ſore diſtemper, in ſo much that his recovery was deſpaired of by the Phyſitians. The Empreſs Dominica, his mother, did poſitively affirm to the Emperour, that ſhe had been ſorely diſquieted with fearfull and horrid viſions in her dreams; and that the child was viſited with ſickneſs, becauſe of the Biſhops injurious uſage. The Emperour, taking theſe things into conſideration, ſends for Baſilius. And to make tryal of him, expreſſes himſelf to him after this manner. If your Opin on be true, pray that my ſon may not dye. If you will believe, O Emperour! (replied Baſilius,) as I doe; and if [you will aſſent that] the Church ſhall be united, the child ſhall live. When the Emperour would not conſent to that, the will of God therefore be done (ſaid Baſilius) concerning the child. After Baſilius had ſpoken theſe words, [the Emperour] ordered he ſhould be diſmiſt. But the child died not long after. Let thus much be compendiouſly ſaid concerning theſe perſons.

Moreover, each of them wrote and publiſhed many, and thoſe incomparable Books. Some of which Rufinus ſays were by * him tranſlated into Latine. Baſilius had two brothers, Petrus and Gregorius. Petrus imitated Baſilius's monaſtick courſe of life: but Gregorius [followed] his eloquent way of teaching. He alſo finiſhed that Book concerning the Six days-work, (which Baſilius had taken pains about, and left imperfect) after his Brother's death. And recited a Funeral Oration in [praiſe of] Meletius Biſhop of Antioch, at Conſtantinople. There are alſo ſeveral other Orations of his extant.

Concerning Gregorius Thaumaturgus.

BUt, in regard ſome are apt to miſtake, becauſe of the likeneſs of the name, and by reaſon of the Books which in their title are aſcribed to Gregorius, you are to know, that there was another Gregorius of Pontus; who had his original extract at Neocæſarea in Pontus, and was ancienter than theſe [Gregorius's.] For he was * Origen's Scholar. This Gregorius's fame is very great at Athens, at Berytus, over the whole [a] Pontick Diœceſis, and (I had almoſt ſaid) over the whole world. For having left the Schools at Athens, he went to Berytus, and ſtudied the Civill Law. Where being informed that Origen did interpret the ſacred Scriptures at Cæſarea, he went in great haſt to that City. And having been an hearer of the Magnifick expoſition of the ſacred Scriptures, he bad far-well to [his ſtudy of] the Roman Laws, and in future became wholly addicted [to Origen.] By whom he was inſtructed in the true Philoſophy, and after that, his Parents recalling him, he returned into his own country. Where firſt of all, whilſt he was a Laick, He did many miracles; ſometimes healing the diſeaſed; at others driving away devills by * Letters; [in fine,] he brought over the profeſſours of Gentiliſm [to the faith,] not only by his words, but much more by the works he did. He is mentioned alſo by Pamphilus the Martyr, in the Books he wrote [b] concerning Origen. Whereto is annexed [c] Gregorius's Oration, wherein he returned thanks to Origen at his departure from him. There were therefore, that I may ſpeak briefly, [many] Gregorius's. The firſt is this ancient, Origens Scholar; the ſecond, Nazianzenus; the third, Baſilius's Brother. There was alſo another Gregorius at Alexandria, whom the Arians conſtituted Biſhop [of that City] during the time of Athanaſius's exile. Thus much concerning theſe perſons.

* Or, Epiſtles.

[b] Inſtead of [περὶ ὧν ἐγκώμιος, concerning Origen,] it would be better thus [ὑπὲρ ὧν ἐγκώμιος, in defence of Origen;] for he means Pamphilus's Apologetick in defence of Origen: concerning which conſult Photius, in his Bibliotheca. Valeſ.

[c] In the Greek, 'tis thus worded: συγκλητικὸς λόγος Γρηγορείς εἰς Ὠριγένην· which Muſculus renders thus; Liber Gregorii quo Origenem commendavit, Gregorius's book wherein he has commended Origen. Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it thus: Oratio Gregorii in Origenis commendationem conſcripta, Gregorius's Oration written in praiſe of Origen. But, I cannot approve of this Verſion: for that Oration was not written by Gregorius Thaumaturgus in commendation of Origen; but to return thanks to his maſter, when he left his School. Indeed, Commendatory Letters are termed συγκλητικαὶ· but there were never any Orationes συγκλητικαὶ, commendatory Orations. Wherefore, I doubt not but it ſhould be σωτηριακτικὸς; although Nicephorus confirms the vulgar reading. Now, λόγος σωτηριακτικὸς is a Valedictory Oration, as we have remarked in our notes on Euſeb. Life of Conſtant. book 3. chap. 21. note (a.) Valeſ.

[f] Socrates took this out of Rufinus, book 2. chap. 9. Eccleſ. Hiſt. But Gregorius Nyſſenus, in his firſt book againſt Eunomius, ſays that Baſilius ſtood before the Tribunal of Modeſtus the Præfect twice; once when he was Presbyter, and a ſecond time when he was Biſhop. But Nazianzen makes no mention of Baſilius's former examination. Valeſ.

[g] In Rufinus (Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 2. chap. 9.) this paſſage is thus worded; utinam te non mutares, I wiſh you would not have changed your ſelf. In which words Baſilius reproves Modeſtus, becauſe from being a Catholick he was become an Arian, that he might pleaſe the Emperour. We are indeed told by Gregorius (in his funeral Oration) that Modeſtus was an Arian. Valeſ.

[h] Here Valentinianus Junior is called by another name, as we have obſerved before, chap. 10. of this book note (a.) He was ſurnamed Galates, becauſe he was born in Galatia. Further, in regard Socrates does here term him νήπιον, a young child; our opinion (which we have given in before) is very much confirmed; to wit, that theſe things were done about the year of our Lord 371, or 372. For Valentinianus Junior was born in the year of Chriſt 365; as we have remarked before: from which year to the year 372, are ſix years compleat. So Valentinianus Junior, called alſo Galates, died at ſix years old. For a child of that age is rightly termed νήπιον. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning Novatus, and those from him termed Novatians. And, that those Novatians who inhabited Phrygia, altered [the time of celebrating] the Festival of Easter, and kept it on the same day the Jews did.

ABout this very time, the Novatians, who inhabited Phrygia, altered the day of celebrating the Feast of Easter. How this was done, I will declare; having first of all told you, upon what account the accurate and exact Canon of their Church does at this present flourish in the Provinces of Phrygia and Paphlagonia. [a] Novatus, a Presbyter of the Roman Church, made a separation therefrom, in regard Cornelius the Bishop admitted those Believers to communion, who had sacrificed in that Persecution, which the Emperour Decius raised against the Churches. Becoming a Separatist therefore upon this account, and being elected to the Bishoprick [of Rome] by such Prelates as embraced the same sentiments with him, he wrote to the Churches every where, that they should not admit such persons as had sacrificed, to the [sacred] Mysteries: but should exhort them to repentance, and leave the pardoning of their offences to God, who is able, and has power to remit sins. The Inhabitants of every Province having received such Letters as these, gave their judgments of the things therein signified, according to their own * dispositions and humours. For whereas Novatus had given notice, that those were not to be † vouchsafed the participation of the Mysteries, who after Baptism had fallen into [any] deadly sin; the promulgation of this Canon seemed severe and cruel to some: but others admitted of this Rule, as just and equitable, and [of great use] for the establishing a pious and more regular course of life. [b] In the interim that this great controversie was in debate, arrive the Letters of Cornelius Bishop [of Rome,] promising indulgence to those who had sinned after Baptism. Upon these two persons writing thus contrary to one another, and each of them confirming what he asserted by testimony of the sacred Scriptures; [c] every inhabitant of the Provinces betook himself to that party, whereto he had before entertained a greater propensity and inclination. For, such persons as delighted in sin, laid hold of the Indulgence then granted, and in future abused it to all manner of impiety. [Moreover,] the people of Phrygia seem to be more sober, and persons of better Moralls, than other Nations. For 'tis very rare that the Phrygians do swear. Indeed, the Scythians and Thracians are very ready to be overcome with anger and passion: and those who inhabit that Region [which lyes] towards the rising Sun, are more addicted to the serving of their lusts. But the Paphlagonians and Phrygians are not prone to either of these vices. For, neither Cirque-Sports, nor Theatrical-Shews, are at this present * esteemed amongst them. On which account, as well these persons, as others who embrace the same Sentiments with them, in my judgment seem to have given their assent to what was then written from Novatus. For, amongst them whoring is reputed a most enormous wickedness. 'Tis apparently known, that the Phrygians and Paphlagonians do live more modestly and temperately, than any other Sect of men what ever. I am of opinion, that it was the very same reason likewise [which prevailed] with those that inhabit the Western parts; who also have followed Novatus's opinion. But, Novatus (although he was a Separatist upon account of an accurate and more strict course of life, yet) made no alteration in [the celebration of] the Feast of Easter. For he always celebrated that Festival, after the same manner that those in the Western parts did. Now, the Inhabitants of those parts do always keep that Feast after the Æquinox, agreeable to an usage very anciently delivered to them, even from the time that they first embraced Christianity. [Further,] this * person suffered [d] Martyrdom afterwards, [to wit] in the Reign of the Emperour Valerian, who raised a Persecution against the Christians. But those in Phrygia who from his name are called Novatians, [e] having an aversion even for that communion they were permitted [to hold with the rest of the Catholicks in the celebrating] of this [Festival,] about this time changed the Feast of Easter also.

[a] The Greeks usually term him Novatus, whose right name was Novatianus. Concerning whose Heresie, you may consult Eusebius, (Eccles. Hist. book 6. chap. 43,) Epiphanius, the Author of the questions on the Old and New Testament, and Theodoret. Vales.

* Or Moralls.

† He means the Sacrament of the Lords Supper.

[b] Instead of [ἐν τοσούτῳ δὲ τούτῳ] it is doubtless to be thus worded [ἐν τούτῳ δὲ τοσούτῳ, &c.] Questionless, Socrates left it written thus; and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

[c] The expression in the original is, ἕκαστος καθ' ἕθος; which Musculus renders thus, sicut fieri solet, as it is usually done; and Christophorson thus; ut moris est, as the manner is. But I cannot approve of these Versions. For the Grecian writers make use of (not κατ' ἔθος, but) ὡς ἔθος, to signifie, as it is usually done, or, as the manner is. Wherefore, I am rather of opinion, that it should be ἕκαστος κατ' ἔθνος, every inhabitant of the Provinces: so Epiphanius Scholasticus read it. For he renders it thus; Singuli Provincialium, &c. Every Subject of the Provinces. Κατ' ἔθνος has the same import with κατ' ἐπαρχίαν; which phrase Socrates has made use of a little before, in this chapter; where his words are, τοιαύτας τὰς ἐπιστολὰς οἱ κατ' ἐπαρχίαν δεχόμενοι, the Inhabitants of every Province having received such Letters as these. Vales.

* Novatus.

[d] The Novatians did boast, that the Founder of their Sect was a Martyr; and they wrote a book, the Title whereof was, The Martyrdom of Novatianus. But this book, which was stuft with Lies and Fables, has long since been confuted by Eulogius Bishop of Alexandria, in his sixth book against the Novatians, the Excerptions whereof occur in Photius's Bibliotheca, p. 1621. Edit. David Hoeschel. 1610. Moreover, in those Acts of the Martyrdom of Novatianus, Novatianus was not said to have suffered Martyrdom, but only to have been a Confessour of the Faith of Christ. For, the Author of the Acts says, that of the eight Presbyters of the Roman Church who were under Macedonius Bishop of Rome, seven offered sacrifice to Idols together with Macedonius, and that only Novatus underwent an egregious Martyrdom of confession. And that together with Novatianus three Bishops (almost the only persons of the Western parts) termed it a Martyrdom; to wit, Marcellus and Alexander Bishops of Aquileia, and Agamemnon Bishop of Porta, or rather of Tibur. Who lived apart after that confession, held assemblies with Novatianus, and avoided their communion who had sacrificed to Idols. A little afterwards they laid their hands on Novatianus, and ordained him Bishop of Rome. Vales.

[e] This place is strangely corrupted. Nor is this fault new; but the copies were faulty even in Epiphanius Scholasticus's time; for thus he renders it: Hi vero qui ex eo nomen habuerunt, ejusque fuere participes, &c. But these who had their name from him, and were partakers thereof, &c. How Nicephorus read this passage in Socrates, 'tis uncertain, in regard his Greek Text is at this place defective. But Langus, who had seen a Greek Copy of Nicephorus, renders it thus: Qui vero ejus nomine in Phrygia Censentur, &c. But those who are accounted of his name in Phrygia, when by indulging themselves, they had degenerated from his institutions and communion, at this time altered the Paschal Festival also. I say nothing concerning the other Translatours, in whose Versions you will find nothing of soundness. I am of opinion, that the place, by a small alteration, is thus to be made good: ἐν τῷ κοινωνίαν τύλις συγχωρηθεῖσαν ἑτεροπώρους. That is, having an aversion even for that communion they were permitted [to hold with the rest of the Catholicks in the celebrating] of this [Festival.] There is nothing more plain than this sense. Before Valens's time, the Novatians in Phrygia kept Easter at the same time the rest of the Catholicks did. After that, they began to shun the communion and society of the Catholicks in this matter also. Further, although I do very much approve of Socrates's judgment, who gives an account why the Phrygians more especially embraced the Novatian Heresie; yet there may another reason be given hereof. For, Novatus, or rather Novatianus, was (as 'tis said) by Country a Phrygian: so Philostorgius asserts book 8. Wherefore, 'tis no wonder, that he had many followers of his own opinion in that province. Vales.

For,

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

For, ſome few (and thoſe in no wiſe eminent) Biſhops of the Novatians in Phrygia, having convened a Synod in the Village Pazum, (at which place are the * heads of the River Sangarius,) promulged a Canon, that it ſhould be obſerved [yearly on what day] the Jews celebrated their Feaſt of unleavened bread, and that together with them the Feaſt of Eaſter ſhould be kept. Theſe things were told me by a certain [f] old man, who ſaid that he was the ſon of a Presbyter, and was together with his Father preſent at the foreſaid Synod. At which Synod, neither Agelius Biſhop of the Novatians at Conſtantinople, was preſent, nor yet Maximus of Nicæa; neither were the Biſhops of Nicomedia, or Cotiæum at it: although theſe perſons were the chief Regulatours of the Novatian Religion. Theſe things were after this manner tranſacted at that time. But, not long after, the Church of the Novatians was divided into two parties upon account of this Synod, as we will declare in due place. We muſt now paſs from hence, to [a relation of] what hapned at this very time in the Weſtern parts.

* Or, Fountains.

[f] I conjecture, that this was long-lived Auxano, a Presbyter of the Novatian Church; whoſe teſtimony Socrates makes uſe of, book 1. chap. 10, & 13. But, we muſt not here omit Nicephorus's words concerning our Socrates: he ſays thus, book 11. chap. 14; Hæc ſibi renuntiata eſſe Socrates, qui hoc loco non abhorrere ſe à Novatianorum inſtitutis palàm præ ſe fert, à ſene quodam ſcribit, &c. Socrates (who in this place plainly ſhews himſelf not to be a deteſter of the Novatian principles) relates that theſe things were told him by a certain old man, &c. Notwithſtanding, I am not of Nicephorus's opinion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIX.

Concerning Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, and Urſinus. How, a Diſturbance and Sedition hapning in Rome upon their account, there followed a great ſlaughter of men.

WHilſt the Emperour Valentinianus lived in peace and tranquillity, and was vexatious towards no Sect; Damaſus ſucceeded Liberius in the Government of the Biſhoprick of Rome. [a] Under whom the Church of Rome hapned to be diſturbed, upon this account. One Urſinus, a Deacon of the ſame Church had been a competitor, when the Election of a Biſhop was made. But, in regard Damaſus was preferred [before him,] Urſinus, unable to bear the being fruſtrated of his expectation, made it his buſineſs to [b] hold aſſemblies that were Schiſmatical and ſeparate from the Church; and perſwades certain mean Biſhops to ordain him [clandeſtinely] in a ſecret place. And he is ordained, not in a Church, but in an obſcure place, in that called [c] Sicinius's Pallace. Upon the doing hereof, a diſſention was raiſed amongſt the populace. They diſagreed amongſt themſelves, not upon account of the Faith, or [any] Hereſie, but about this only, [to wit] who ought to be put in poſſeſſion of the Epiſcopal Chair. Hereupon there hapned [frequent] conflicts of the multitudes; in ſo much that many were killed, on account of that variance. For which reaſon, many perſons as well Laicks, as Eccleſiaſticks, were puniſhed by [d] Maximinus the then Præfect [of the City;] and ſo both Urſinus at that time ceaſed from [proſecuting] his attempt, and alſo thoſe who had a mind to be his followers, were quieted.

[a] Inſtead of [Ἀφ' ἧς] read [Ἐφ' ᾧ, under whom; for that's the reading in the Florent. M.S. and in Nicephorus. Valeſ.

[b] Παραστιάζαι. A very elegant term, to ſignifie Scifmatical aſſemblies and conventicles, who are ſaid to erect one Altar contrary to another. Hence comes the term ἀβασταγωγή, a ſort of Schiſm, concerning which Baſilius ſpeaks, in his Canonicall Epiſtle to Amphylochius, de Baptiſmo Hæreticorum. Valeſ.

[c] Amm. Marcellinus (book 27. pag. 337. Edit. Valeſ.) calls it Sicininus's Pallace; where, ſays he, there is a little private aſſembling place of [the profeſſours of] the Chriſtian Religion; in which [during the conflicts between Damaſus's and Urſinus's parties] there was in one day an hundred and thirty dead bodies found, &c. Read the Hiſtorians following words; from the whole paſſage 'tis plain, how diſorderly the Elections of a Biſhop of Rome then were, and at what an height they lived.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

[a] Socrates borrowed this out of Ruſinus, book 2. chap. 10. Eccleſ. Hiſt. In that year, whereon Urſinus raiſed his Schiſm, Juventius, not Maximinus, was Præfect of the City, as Amm. Marcellinus atteſts, book 27. pag. 337. But, in regard this Schiſm laſted many years, 'tis poſſible that Maximinus (who was Præfect of the Annona,) might take cognizance of this buſineſs, and torture ſome Eccleſiaſticks, as Ruſinus relates. This Maximinus was Præfect of the Annona, in the ſeventh year of Valentinian; as Jerome does aſſert in his Chronicon. Marcellinus ſpeaks much concerning this Maximinus, in his 28th book. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXX.

How (after the death of Auxentius Biſhop of Millain,) a Sedition hapning on account of the Election of a Prelate to ſucceed in that Sea; Ambroſius, Preſident of the Province, going with a Military Force to appeaſe the tumult, was by a general ſuffrage (the Emperour Valentinianus having given his conſent alſo) preferred before all perſons, and Elected Biſhop of that Church.

ABout the ſame time, there hapned another thing worthy to be recorded, which came to paſs at Millain. For, [a] Auxentius Biſhop of that Church being dead, who had been ordained by the Arians, the Inhabitants of Millain were again diſturbed about the Election of a Biſhop: and there was a great contention amongſt them, ſome making it their buſineſs to elect one perſon, others another. When a Sedition was raiſed about this matter, the Governour of that Province (a perſon veſted with a Conſular dignity, whoſe name was Ambroſius,) fearing leaſt ſome abſurdity might happen in the City, [cauſed] by that tumult, ran into the Church, in order to his appeaſing of the uproar. After that the people upon his coming thither were quieted, and that he had repreſt the irrational fury of the multitude by a long and very uſefull exhortatory Oration; there hapned on a ſuddain an unanimous agreement amongſt all perſons; who cried out, that Ambroſius deſerved the Biſhoprick, and all made it their requeſt, that he might be ordained. For, by that means only ['twas ſaid] the people would be united, and embrace a concordant opinion concerning the Faith. In regard therefore, this unanimous conſent of the people ſeemed to the Biſhops that were preſent, to proceed from ſome divine [order and appointment,] without delay they laid hold of Ambroſius: and having baptized him, (for he was then but a Catechumen,) they forthwith went about the promoting of him to the dignity of that Biſhoprick. But, becauſe Ambroſius (though he received Baptiſm with much willingneſs, yet) refuſed the Epiſcopal dignity with all imaginable earneſtneſs; [the Biſhops] acquaint the Emperour Valentinianus with what hapned. The Emperour, admiring the unanimous conſent of the people,

[a] Socrates has tranſcribed this following paſſage, almoſt word for word out of Ruſinus's book 2. chap. 11. Eccleſ. Hiſt. For, he obſerves the ſame order that Ruſinus does, after Damaſus's ordination forthwith ſubjoyning Ambroſius's promotion. But, although Ruſinus and Socrates have conjoyned theſe two Ordinations, as if they had been made at one and the ſame time; yet there was a great interval of time between each ordination. For Damaſus entred upon the Biſhoprick of Rome in the Conſulate of Lupicinus and Jovinus, on the year of Chriſt 367. But Ambroſius was promoted to the Epiſcopate of Millain in the year of our Lord 374, in the third Conſulate of Gratianus which he bore with Equitius; as Baronius has obſerved from Saint Jerom's Chronicon. Valeſ.

VALENTINIANUS & VALENS.

people, and acknowledging what had come to pass, to be the work of God, declared to the Bishops, that they ought to obey God, who had commanded he should be ordained: for that he was elected by the suffrage of God, rather than of men. Ambrosius being after this manner constituted [Bishop,] the Inhabitants of Millaine, who had been at variance before, were by his means reduced at that time to unity and concord.

CHAP. XXXI.

BUt after this, when the Sarmatæ made incursions into the Roman Territories, the Emperour undertook an expedition against them, at the head of a vast Army. The Barbarians, informed of these great preparations for a War, and being sensible of their own inability to make a resistance, sent an Embassy to the Emperour, and requested that they might obtain a Peace upon certain conditions. When the Embassadours were introduced into the Emperours presence, and appeared to him to be * vile and despicable fellows, he asked, whether all the Sarmatæ were such sort of persons. The Embassadours made answer, that the noblest personages of † their whole Nation were come to him; whereupon Valentinianus was highly incensed, and crying out with a very loud voice, said; that he was very unfortunate to have the Roman Empire devolve upon him, when such a Nation of Barbarians, so vile and contemptible, was not satisfied to continue in safety within its own limits; but would take up Arms, || depopulate the Roman Territories, and audaciously break out into a War. And he tore himself in such a manner by his crying out, that all his Veines were opened, and every one of his Arteries broken. [A vast quantity of] bloud gushing out after this manner, he died in the Castle called Bergition, after Gratianus's third Consulate [which he bore] with Equitius, about the seventeenth of the month November; when he had lived fifty four years, and reigned thirteen. Valentinianus therefore having ended his life, the Milice in Italy, on the sixth day after his death, proclaimed his Son (who had the same name with his Father,) Valentinianus (a very young child,) Emperour, in [a] Acincum a City of Italy. The Emperours, informed hereof, were displeased, not because Valentinianus Junior (who was brother to the * one Emperour, and the † others Nephew) was made Emperour: but in regard he had been proclaimed without either of their being acquainted with it, whom they themselves were about to proclaim. Notwithstanding, both of them gave their consent to his being made Emperour. After this manner was Valentinianus Junior seated on his own Fathers Throne. Further, you must know, that this Valentinianus was begotten by Valentinianus Senior, of Justina, which woman * he married whilest Severa his former wife was living, on this occasion. Justus, Father to Justina, (who heretofore, to wit, in Constantius's Reign, had been Governour of the Province Picenum,) had a Dream, wherein (to his own thinking) he saw himself delivered of the Imperial purple [which he brought forth] out of his right side. This Dream being divulged, at length came to Constantius's hearing also. He guessing at the meaning of the Dream, to wit, that an Emperour should * descend from Justus, sent one who dispatcht him. His daughter Justina, bereaved of her Father, for a considerable while continued a Virgin. Some time after, she became known to Severa, wife to the Emperour Valentinianus, and was continually conversant with the Empress. And after a firm familiarity was contracted between them, she bathed her self also together with her. When therefore Severa had seen Justina washing her self, she was † wonderfully taken with the Virgins beauteous composure of body, and discoursed concerning her in the Emperours presence; [saying] that that Virgin, Justus's daughter, was endowed with so admirable a compleatness of body, that she her self, although a woman, was notwithstanding inamoured with her delicate shape. The Emperour treasured up his Wives discourse in his mind, and consulted about his marriage of Justina; yet so as not to divorce Severa, of whom he had begotten Gratianus, and had created him Augustus but a little before. He therefore dictated a [b] Law, and made it publick throughout every City, that any one that would, might have two Lawfull wives. This Law was promulged. And he married Justina, by whom he had Valentinianus Junior, and three daughters, Justa, Grata, and Galla. The two former of which persisted in their resolution of continuing Virgins: but Galla was afterwards married to the Emperour * Theodosius the Great, of whom he begat a daughter, by name Placidia. For he had Arcadius and Honorius by [c] Flaccilla his former wife. But we shall speak in particular concerning Theodosius, and his sons, in due place.

* Or, persons unworthy of praise.

† That is, of the whole nation of the Sarmatæ.

‖ Or, trample upon.

[a] We met with a double mistake here, the one committed by Socrates's Transcribers, the other by Socrates himself. We have corrected the Transcribers errour (who, in stead of Acincum, had made it Aconcum,) from the Authority of the Sfortian and Florent. M. SS. It will be sufficient only to take notice of Socrates's mistake here; who calls Acincum a City of Italy, whenas it belonged to Pannonia. Vales.

* That is, To Gratianus.

† To wit, Valens's brother's son.

* That is, Valentinianus Senior.

[b] There is no mention of this law of Valentinianus's, any where. No, not in Amm. Marcellinus, who has with great accuracy recorded Valentinianus's affaires. Indeed such a law as this (in my judgment) is in no wise agreeable to Valentinian, a serious Prince, and a Christian. Therefore, this whole story of Justina's marriage, is in my opinion, of a credit doubtfull and uncertain. Vales.

* Or, Theodosius Senior.

[c] Epiphanius Scholasticus calls her (not Placida, but) Flaccilla; which is truest. For so the ancient Coynes term her. But, 'tis strange that Greek writers should so frequently be mistaken in this name. For we have remark't before, that Placitus is by Socrates often used, instead of Flaccillus, who was Bishop of Antioch. Further, this Flaccilla was the daughter of that Antonius, who was Consul with Sigrius, as Themistius informs us, in his Gratiarum Actione, to Theodosius, for the peace made with the Goths. Vales.

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning the Philosopher Themistius. And, that Valens, appeased by the Oration he spake to him, did in some measure mitigate his Persecution against the Christians.

VAlens, making his Residence at Antioch, continued in the interim undisturbed by forreign Wars. For the Barbarians did on every side contain themselves within their own Territories. But he * Persecuted those who embraced the Homoöusian opinion, in a most grievous manner, and every day invented greater and more acute punishments [to be inflicted] on them. Till such time as the Philosopher Themistius reduced his great cruelty to something of a moderation, ration, by that [a] Speech he ſpake to him; wherein the Philoſopher advertizes the Emperour, that he ought not to admire at the diſagreement of Opinions amongſt the Chriſtians. For, that the diſcrepancy of ſentiments amongſt them was ſmall, if compared with the multitude and confuſion of Opinions amongſt the Grecians. For they entertained above three hundred Opinions. [Further,] that as touching Opinion there would of neceſſity ariſe a wonderfull diſſent [from the variety thereof.] And yet, that God is delighted with this difference of Opinion [concerning himſelf,] to the end that all perſons may more highly revere his Majeſty, even upon this very account, becauſe 'tis not obvious and eaſie to have a knowledge of him. The Philoſopher having ſpoken theſe and ſuch like words as theſe to the Emperour, he became more mild in future. Notwithſtanding, his rage was not hereby perfectly and entirely appeaſed; but, inſtead of death, he impoſed Exile as a puniſhment, upon Eccleſiaſtick perſons; till at length, this fury of his alſo was repreſt by this accident.

[a] This Oration of Themiſtius's to Valens, is at this time extant, publiſhed in Latine by Duditius. For, what Socrates ſays Themiſtius ſpoke in that oration concerning the difference of Philoſophick opinions, occurs in Duditius's Verſion, at pag. 507: the words are theſe; Artes quidem, quarum magnus in vitâ uſus & delectatio eſt, &c. Indeed, thoſe Arts, of which there is great uſe in this life, and which are very delightfull, had never arrived at ſuch an height and elegancy, had there not been a diſcrepancy of judgments, and a certain ſtriſe amongſt the Artiſts themſelves. For, has not Philoſophy it ſelf (the Mother of all laudable Arts.) raiſed from mean and ſmall beginnings, increaſed by the diſſent of Learned men in ſuch a manner, that nothing may ſeem wanting to its abſolute perfection? Further, what Socrates ſays was ſpoken by Themiſtius in that oration, to wit, that God is deſirous of this variety of opinions concerning himſelf, that men may have a greater reverence for the Majeſty of his Deity, becauſe the knowledge of his divinity is in no wiſe obvious and eaſily attainable; occurs in Duditius's Verſion, at pag. 508: where 'tis thus worded: Quocirca quod à cognitione noſtrâ ſe longiſſimè removit, &c. Wherefore, in regard he has removed himſelf at the greateſt diſtance from our knowledge, nor does humble himſelf to the capacity of our wits; 'tis a ſufficient argument, that he does not require one and the ſame Law and Rule of Religion from all perſons, but leaves every man a Licence and faculty of thinking concerning himſelf, according to his own, not another mans liberty and choice. Whence it alſo happens, that a greater admiration of the Deity, and a more Religious veneration of his Eternal Majeſty, is ingendred in the minds of men. For, it uſually comes to paſs, that we loath and diſregard thoſe things which are readily apparent, and proſtrated to every underſtanding, &c. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXIII.

THoſe Barbarians who dwell beyond the Danube, having kindled a Civil War amongſt themſelves, were divided into two parties: the one of which was headed by Fritigernes, the other by Athanarichus. When 'twas apparent that Athanarichus's party was the ſtronger, Fritigernes flies to the Romans, and implored their aſſiſtance againſt his Adverſary. This is made known to the Emperour Valens: and he orders thoſe Souldiers, who were engarriſoned all over Thracia for the defence of that Country, to aſſiſt the Barbarians being at War againſt the Barbarians. And they obtain a Victory over Athanarichus beyond the Danube, having * routed his Forces. This was the reaſon, that many of the Barbarians became Chriſtians. For, Fritigernes, that he might expreſs his thankfulneſs to the Emperour for the kindneſs he had done him, embraced the Emperours Religion, and perſwaded thoſe under his command to the ſame. Wherefore, many of the Goths are even till this preſent addicted to Arianiſme, having at that time become Adherents to that Hereſie upon the Emperours account. At the ſame time alſo, Ulfila Biſhop of the Goths, invented Gothick Letters, and having tranſlated the ſacred Scriptures into the Gothick Language, undertook the inſtruction of the Barbarians in the divine Oracles. But, in regard Ulfila inſtructed not only thoſe Barbarians under Fritigernes, but them alſo who pay'd obedience to Athanarichus, in the Chriſtian Religion; Athanarichus, * as if violence were offered to the Religion of his Anceſtours, inflicted puniſhments on many of thoſe who profeſt Chriſtianity: in ſo much that at that time [ſeveral] Arianizing Barbarians were Martyrs. Indeed, Arius, unable to refute the Opinion of Sabellius the Lybian, fell from the true Faith, and aſſerted [a] the Son of God to be a new God. But the Barbarians, embracing Chriſtianity with a ſimplicity of mind, deſpiſed this preſent life in reſpect of the faith of Chriſt. Thus far concerning thoſe [Goths] who came over to the Chriſtian Religion.

* Or, having routed the Enemy.

VALENS.

* Or, in regard his paternal Religion was adulterated.

CHAP. XXXIV.

That the Goths vanquiſhed by other Barbarians, fled into the Territories of the Romans, and were received by the Emperour. Which [reception of theirs] was the occaſion, both of the deſtruction of the Roman Empire, and alſo of the Emperours own overthrow.

BUt, not long after, the Barbarians having entred into a league of friendſhip with one another, were again vanquiſhed by other Barbarians, their neighbours, called the Hunni; and being driven out of their own Country, they flie into the Roman Territories, promiſing they would ſerve the Roman Emperour, and do what ever he ſhould command them. This came to Valens's knowledge; who foreſeeing nothing, gave order that the Suppliants ſhould have a kind and mercifull reception, ſhewing himſelf in this one inſtance only, mild and compaſſionate. He aſſigns therefore to them [for their habitation] the parts of Thracia; judging himſelf to be in a moſt eſpecial manner fortunate upon this account. For, it was his ſentiment, that he ſhould in future be in poſſeſſion of a ready and well furniſhed Army againſt his Enemies: and he hoped, that the Barbarians would be a more terrible Gaurd [to the limits of his Empire] than the Romans. Upon this account, he in future neglected the increaſing and filling up of the Roman Milice. He deſpiſed thoſe old Souldiers, who in former Wars had fought againſt his Enemies with much courage and gallantry: and he [a] put a money-value upon that Militia, which the Inhabitants of Provinces were wont Village by Village to contribute and furnish out, ordering his Tribute Collectours to demand eighty * Crowns instead of each Souldier, although he had not before in the least lightened or abated their Impositions. This was the original cause of the Roman Empire's being very unfortunate for some small time.

[a] In the Florent. M. S. the reading is [ἐξηργείασεν, be reduced into money,] which, if I miſtake not, is the truer. Notwithſtanding, the common reading (to wit, ἐξηργύρησεν, he put a money-value upon,) is found, and needs no alteration. For Chryſoſtom uſes this term in this ſenſe, in his 67 Homily on Matth. 21. The old Gloſſes expound ἐξαργυρίζεται by Adarat, he values by money. Further, what Socrates remarks here, (to wit, that Valens, inſtead of ſupplies of Souldiers, did afterwards exact Gold of his Provinces,) is alſo related by Amm. Marcellinus, book. 31. pag. 441. which place, becauſe 'tis corrupt even in our Edition, I will here ſet down, as it ought to be amended: Eruditis adulatoribus in majus fortunam principis extollentibus: quod ex ultimis terris tot tirocinia [not, Thracenſes nec opinanti offerrent, But] trahens, ei nec opinanti offerret, ut collatis in unum ſuis & alieniginis viribus, invictum haberet exercitum; & pro militari ſupplemento quod provinciatim annuum pendebatur, theſauris accederet auri cumulus magnus. Valeſ.

* Χρυσίνους; they were Gold, and of about a Crown value.

CHAP. XXXV.

That the Emperour, by reason of his care and sollicitude about a War with the Goths, remitted something of his Persecution against the Christians.

FOr, the Barbarians having been put into possession of Thracia, and quietly enjoying that Roman Province, could not [with moderation] bear their fortunate success: but enter upon a War against those who had been their Benefactours, and subverted all places throughout Thracia and the adjoyning Countries. These things falling out after this manner, came to Valens's hearing, and made him desist from banishing those that embraced the Homoöusian Opinion. For, being troubled at this news, he left Antioch forthwith, and came to Constantinople. Upon the same account also, the War [he had waged] against the Christians in that City, was finished. Moreover, at the same time Euzoius, Bishop of the Arian faction at Antioch, departed this life, in the fifth Consulate of Valens, and in Valentinianus Juniors's first. And Dorotheus is constituted [Bishop] in his place.

CHAP. XXXVI.

That the Saracens also at that time embraced the Faith of Christ, (a woman, by name Mavia, being their Queen,) and took one Moses, a pious and faithfull person that led a Monastick life, to be their Bishop.

AFter the Emperours departure from Antioch, the Saracens, who before had been their Allies, revolted from the Romans at that time; they were led by one Mavia a woman, [the King] her Husband being then dead. All places therefore [a] towards the East, were at that time destroyed by the Saracens. But an Act of Divine providence repress'd their fury by this means. A person whose name was Moses, by extract a Saracen, leading a Monastick life in the Solitudes, became exceedingly eminent for his piety, Faith, and Miracles. Mavia, Queen of the Saracens, requested she might have this person to be Bishop over her Nation, [promising] upon this condition to put an end to the War. The Roman Commanders hearing this, supposed it would be gratefull, if a Peace were made upon these terms: and forthwith gave order for the performance hereof with all possible celerity. Moses therefore was seized, and brought from the Solitudes to Alexandria, [b] in order to his being initiated into the Sacerdotal Function.

[a] Instead of [κατὰ τὴν ἀνατολὴν, under the East] I read [πρὸς τὴν ἀνατολὴν, towards the East.] Vales.

[b] Instead of [δεξάμενον, having been initiated] we read [δεξόμενον, in order to his being initiated, &c.] Further, this story concerning Moses's being made Bishop of the Saracens, and concerning the Peace made with them, Socrates has taken out of Rufinus, book 2. chap. 6. Eccles. Hist. but has not observed Rufinus's order. For Rufinus has placed it about the beginning of Lucius's Episcopate, after the persecution of the Edessens, not at the latter end of Valens's Reign. And I had rather follow Rufinus's opinion, than that of Socrates and Sozomen. The motive I have to be of this opinion, is grounded on Socrates's words at the close of this chapter, where he says, that Mavia the Queen, having made a Peace with the Romans, betrothed her daughter to Victor the Roman Lieutenant General. Now, Victor, about the latter end of Valens's Reign, was too old to have any thoughts of marrying a wife. Vales.

VALENS.

But in regard he was brought before Lucius, who at that time was in possession of the Churches there, he refused Ordination, and express himself after this manner to Lucius. Indeed, I account my self unworthy of the Sacerdotal Function; But if this thing be advantagious to the affairs of the publick, Lucius shall not * Ordain me, for his right hand has been filled with bloud. When Lucius told him, that he ought not to give reproachfull language, but should rather learn the points of Religion from him; Moses replied; an account of the points [of Religion] is not now required. For the villanous actions you have committed against the Brethren, do sufficiently demonstrate, how Christian-like sentiments you have. For a Christian strikes not, reviles not, does not fight: for a Servant of the Lord ought not to fight. But your facts do loudly cry out, by those who have been exiled, who have been cast to the wild beasts, and who have been committed to the flames. [Moreover,] things seen by the eyes contain a greater and more convincing demonstration, than what is received by hearing. When Moses had said these and such like words as these, his friends carried him to the mountain, that he might receive Ordination from those [Bishops] who lived in Exile there. Moses therefore having been after this manner consecrated at that time, the Saracen War had an end put to it; and for the future Mavia continued so strict an * Alliance with the Romans, that she betrothed her daughter to Victor the Roman Lieutenant General. Thus much concerning the Saracens.

* Or, Lay his hand on me.

* Or, Peace.

CHAP. XXXVII.

That after Valens's departure from Antioch the Orthodox in the East (more especially those at Alexandria ) took courage; and having ejected Lucius, restored the Churches again to Peter, [who was returned] fortified with the Letters of Damasus Bishop of Rome.

AT the same time that the Emperour Valens left Antioch, those persons in all places who had been persecuted, were mightily encouraged, especially the Alexandrians; [a] Peter at that time returning from Rome with the Letters of Damasus the Roman Bishop, whereby the Homoöusian Faith and Peters Ordination were confirmed. The populace therefore resuming courage, turn out Lucius, and substitute Peter in his place. Lucius went immediately on board a ship, and sailed to Constantinople. But Peter, having lived but a little while after this, dyed, and left Timotheus his brother to succeed him in his See.

[a] Instead of [Πέτρου τοῦ ἐπαναλθόντος, and Peter being returned,] the reading should be [Πέτρου τότε ἐπαναλθόντος, Peter at that time returning:] and the full-point, which is (in some copies) placed before these words, must be expunged. Epiphanius Scholasticus seems to have followed this reading. Vales.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

That the Emperour arriving at the City Conſtantinople, and being reproach't by the people upon account of the Goths, marches out of the City againſt the Barbarians. And coming to an ingagement with them near Adrianople, a City of Macedonia, is ſlain by them; after he had lived fifty years, and Reigned ſixteen.

[MOreover,] the Emperour Valens coming into Conſtantinople about the thirtieth of May, in his own ſixth and in Valentinianus Junior's ſecond Conſulate, finds the people in a very ſad and dejected condition. For the Barbarians, who had already overrun and ruined Thracia, did now plunder and deſtroy the very Suburbs of Conſtantinople; there being then no Forces ready that were fit to make a reſiſtance againſt them. But when the Barbarians attempted to make nearer approaches, even to the very City walls, the Citizens were grievouſly troubled thereat; and murmured againſt the Emperour, as if he himſelf had brought the Enemy thither, and becauſe he did not forthwith march out againſt them, but deferred the War againſt the Barbarians. Moreover, when the Cirque Sports were exhibited, all with one conſent exclaimed againſt the Emperour, becauſe he was negligent of the publick affairs. They cried out therefore with a great deal of earneſtneſs, Give us Arms, and we our ſelves will fight. The Emperour was highly incenſed at the hearing of theſe Exclamations againſt himſelf: and about the eleventh of June [a] marches out of the City, threatning that if he returned, he would puniſh the Conſtantinopolitans, both for the reproaches they then caſt upon him, and alſo becauſe they had heretofore been Abettours of Procopius's Tyranny. Having therefore ſaid, that he would totally demoliſh the City, and * Plough it up, he march't out againſt the Barbarians. Whom he drove a great way from the City; and purſued them as far as Adrianople a City of Thracia, ſituate in the Frontiers of Macedonia. Ingaging the Barbarians at that place, he ended his life on the ninth of Auguſt, in the now mentioned Conſulate. This was the fourth year of the [b] two hundredth eighty ninth Olympiad. 'Tis reported by ſome, that he was deſtroyed by fire, after he had taken refuge in a certain Village, which the Barbarians aſſaulted and burnt. But others affirm, that having changed his Imperial habit, he ran into the midſt of the main body of Foot: and when the Horſe attempted a defection, and refuſed fighting; the Roman Foot were ſurrounded [by the Barbarians,] and wholly cut off in the ingagement: amongſt whom ('tis ſaid) the Emperour lay, but was not known, his Imperial habit (whereby it might have been manifeſted which was he,) being not upon him. He died after the fiftieth year of his age, having Governed the Empire thirteen years with his Brother, and Reigned three years after him. This Book containes [an account of affairs during] the ſpace of ſixteen years.

[a] The reading muſt be [ὑπεκβαίνει, marches out;] not [ὑπερβαίνει, paſſes by.] Moreover, the ſame days [which Socrates here aſſignes for Valens's entry into, and march out of, Conſtantinople,] are recorded in Idatius's Faſti, in theſe words: Valente VI. & Valentiniano II. &c. In Valens's ſixth and Valentinianus's ſecond Conſulate, Valens Auguſtus entred Conſtantinople, from the Eaſt, on the third of the Calends of June [that is, the thirtieth of May.] And on the ſame year Valens Auguſtus went out of the City to the Fort on the third of the Ides [that is, the eleventh] of June. THE

The PREFACE.

BEfore we begin the Hiſtory of our Fifth Book, we make a requeſt to thoſe who ſhall read this Work of ours, that they would not blame us; becauſe, deſigning to Write an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, we intermix therewith the Wars alſo which have at ſeveral times hapned, ſo far as we could procure a true Relation thereof. For we do this upon ſeveral accounts. Firſt, to bring [the Readers] to a knowledge of what has been Tranſacted. Secondly, that our Readers may not be cloy'd, [a] by being continually detained with [a peruſal of] the contentious diſagreements of Biſhops, and with the deſignes they framed againſt one another. But moſt eſpecially, that it might be made apparent, that when the Affairs of the State were diſturbed, thoſe of the Church alſo (by a certain ſympathy as it were,) became diſtempered and diſordered. For, let any man make an obſervation, and he will find, that the miſchiefs of the State, and troubles of the Church, have gathered ſtrength and ſpread together. For, he will perceive, that they have either had their riſe at one and the ſame time, or elſe have immediately followed one another. And ſometimes [the calamities] of the Church lead the way; then follow the [commotions of the] State: at others, on the contrary. So that, I cannot perſwade my ſelf, that the interchangeable courſe [of theſe things] does proceed from any fortuitous accident, but that they take their beginnings from our iniquities: and that calamities are ſent for the chaſtizement thereof. For, according to the Apoſtle, † Some mens ſins are open before hand, going before to judgment: and ſome [men] they follow after. Upon this account therefore, we have interwoven ſome affairs tranſacted in the State, with our Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. What was done in the Wars during the Reign of Conſtantine, becauſe 'tis ſo long ago, we could not find an account of. But we make a curſory mention of the Actions done ſince, according to the relation thereof, which we have received from perſons yet living. We do, without intermitting any one of them, include the Emperours in this our Hiſtory, becauſe from ſuch time as they began to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, the affairs of the Church have depended upon them; and the greateſt Synods have been, and at this preſent are * convened by their determination and appointment. Moreover, we have made mention of the Arian Hereſie, becauſe it has diſquieted the Churches. Let this be ſufficient to have been ſaid by way of Preface. We will now begin our Hiſtory.

GRATIANUS, VALENTINIANUS, Junior.

[a] Inſtead of [ἐκ τῦ μὴ γοᾶζειν] I read [ἐκ τῦ ἀεὶ γοᾶζειν, by being continually detained.] For a repetition of the negative particle is inelegant and nauſeous; in regard theſe words [may not be cloy'd] do precede. For, after them, an affirmation ought to follow. Valeſ.

CHAP. I.

How (after the death of Valens,) when the Goths laid Siege to Conſtantinople, the Citizens ſallied out of the City againſt them, having thoſe Saracens who were under Mavia's Command, to be their Auxiliaries.

AFter the Emperour Valens had ended his life by an unknown ſort of death, the Barbarians made their approaches again to the very walls of Conſtantinople, and ruined the Suburbs on every ſide of it. The Citizens, ſorely vexed thereat, on their own accord ſallied out againſt the Barbarians, every one taking what came next to hand for Arms. * Dominica, the Emperours Wife, gave every one that went out upon this piece of ſervice, ſuch pay out of the Imperial Treaſury, as was uſually allowed to Souldiers. Some few Saracens, their Confederates, aſſiſted them; being ſent from Mavia, whom we have mentioned before. When the Citizens had after this manner made a reſiſtance againſt them at that time, the Barbarians retreated farther off from the City.

* Or, Domnica.

CHAP. II.

That the Emperour Gratianus, having recalled the Orthodox Biſhops from their Exile, drove the Hereticks out of the Churches, and took Theodoſius to be his Colleague in the Empire.

GRratianus being together with Valentinianus Junior in poſſeſſion of the Empire, and deteſting his Unkle Valens's cruelty towards the Chriſtians, recalled thoſe who had been Exiled by him. Moreover, he made a [a] Law, that perſons of all Sects might, without any diſtinction, ſecurely meet together in their Oratories: only the Eunomians, Photinians, and Manichæans, were extruded out of the Churches. Being alſo ſenſible of the languiſhing condition of the Roman Empire, and of the growth of the Barbarians; and [perceiving alſo] that the State was in want of a valiant and couragious man; he chuſes Theodoſius (a perſon deſcended of a noble family in Spain, who had performed many a brave piece of ſervice in the Wars, and upon that account had by all men been long ſince judged worthy of the Empire, even before Gratianus's Election of him,) to be his Colleague in the Empire. Having therefore proclaimed him Emperour in Sirmium, a City of Illyricum, in the Conſulate of Auſonius and Olybrius, on the ſixteenth of January he divides with him the care of managing the War againſt the Barbarians.

[a] Sozomen mentions this Law of Gratianus's, book 7. chap. 1. and ſo does Theodoret, book 5. chap. 2. who ſays that Sapor, Lieutenant-General, was ſent by Gratianus into the Eaſtern parts of the Empire, to put this Law in Execution. That happened in the year of Chriſt 378.

This Law of Gratianus's is not now extant. And yet it ſeems to be mentioned in the fifth Law in the Theodoſian Code, de fide Catholica. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

What Biſhops were in poſſeſſion of the Preſidency over the greater Churches at that time.

AT this time Damaſus Preſided over the Church at Rome, who had ſucceeded Liberius. Cyrillus was as yet in poſſeſſion of the Church at Jeruſalem. The Antiochian Church (as I have ſaid,) was divided into three parts. For Dorotheus the Arian, ſucceſſour to Euzoïus, was poſſeſt of the Churches. Of the reſt one part paid obedience to Paulinus, the other to Melitius, who was recalled from Baniſhment. Lucius, although * living in Exile, Preſided over the Arians at Alexandria: the profeſſours of the Homoöuſian opinion in that City were headed by Timotheus, ſucceſſour to Peter. Demophilus was in poſſeſſion of the Churches at Conſtantinople, who ſucceeded Eudoxius in the Preſidency over the Arian Faction. Thoſe that abominated communion with him, celebrated their aſſemblies apart by themſelves.

* Ἐν φυγῇ διάγων; living in Exile. Lucius was not baniſhed; the people of Alexandria forced him to leave that City: See Socrates, book 4. chap. 37.

CHAP. IV.

How the Macedoniani, who had ſent an Embaſſy to Damaſus [Biſhop] of Rome in defence of the Homoöuſian Creed, returned again to their old Hereſie.

THe Macedoniani, after their Embaſſy ſent to Liberius, for ſome time held a perfect and entire communion with the Churches throughout every City; intermixing themſelves with thoſe, who from the beginning had embraced that Draught of the Creed [publiſh't] at Nicæa, But when the Emperour Gratianus's Law [was promulged, which] allowed a Liberty to [ſeveral] Sects, they made it their buſineſs * to hold ſeparate aſſemblies again. Being met together at Antioch in Syria, they determined again, that the term Homoöuſios was to be abominated, and that a communion was not in any wiſe to be held with thoſe who embraced the Nicene Creed. But † they proceeded not in their attempt. For many of their own party, finding fault with their [inconſtancy,] becauſe ſometimes they Decreed one thing, at others another, left them, and in future became firm Adherents to thoſe that embraced the Homoöuſian Creed.

GRATIANUS VALENS. Jun. THEODOSIUS

* Or, to diſſent again.

† Or, they reapt no benefit, or delight, from their attempt.

CHAP. V.

Concerning what hapned at that time at Antioch, upon Paulinus's, and Melitius's account.

MOreover, at the ſame time aroſe a great difference at Antioch in Syria, upon Meletius's account. We have told you * already, that Paulinus Biſhop of Antioch, by reaſon of his eminent piety, was not baniſhed: and that Melitius, after he had been reſtored by † Julianus, was again baniſhed by * Valens, and at length recalled in || Gratianus's Reign. At his return to Antioch, he found Paulinus very much decayed by reaſon of his great age. Immediately therefore all thoſe who were Meletius's favourers, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to make Melitius Paulinus's * Coadjutor. But, upon Paulinus's ſaying, that it was contrary to the Canons, to admit of a Coadjutor who had been Ordained by the Arians; the people make uſe of force, and cauſe him to be Conſecrated in one of the Churches without the City. Hereupon a great difference aroſe; But afterwards the people came to an agreement upon theſe terms. Having aſſembled † thoſe perſons that were reputed fit to be entruſted with the Biſhoprick, they find them to be in all ſix; of which number Flavianus was one. They bound theſe men by an Oath, that none of them ſhould make an intereſt for the Biſhoprick, after the death of one of the * Prelates; but that they ſhould permit the Surviver to continue poſſeſt of the See of the perſon deceaſed. Having given them an Oath after this manner, the people came to an agreement, nor was there any further diſſention amongſt them. But, the † Luciferiani made a ſeparation from the reſt, for this reaſon, becauſe Melitius, who had been Ordained by the Arians, was admitted to the Biſhoprick. Whilſt affairs at Antioch were in this poſture, a very urgent occaſion oblieged Melitius to take a journey to Conſtantinople.

That Gregorius of Nazianzum was by a general ſuffrage of the Orthodox conſtituted Biſhop of the Conſtantinopolitan Church; at which time the Emperour Theodoſius (after his Victory over the Barbarians,) fell ſick at Theſſalonica, and was Baptized by Aſcholius the Biſhop.

AT which time, Gregorius was tranſlated from the Biſhoprick of Nazianzum to that of Conſtantinople, by the common ſuffrage of many Prelates.

GRATIANUS VALEN. Jun. THEODOSIUS

Prelates. And this was done in such a manner [as I have declared.] About the same time the Emperours, Gratianus and Theodosius, got each of them a Victory over the Barbarians. Gratianus * returned immediately into the Gallia's, because the Alamanni overran those Provinces. But Theodosius, after [he had erected] his Trophies, hastned to Constantinople, and arrives at Thessalonica. There he fell sick, and earnestly desired that he might be vouchsafed Christian Baptism: for by his progenitours he had been bred up in the Christian Religion, and was a professour of the Homoöusian Faith. Being desirous with all possible speed to be baptized, because his distemper increased, and having [for that reason] sent for the Bishop of Thessalonica, he first enquired of him, what Faith he profest. And when the Bishop had made answer, that the opinion of the Arians had not invaded the Provinces of Illyricum, and that the novelty which Arius had given birth too, was not so prevalent as to prey upon the Churches in those Countries; but that they continued to preserve that Faith immoveable and unshaken, which from the beginning was delivered by the Apostles, and had been confirmed in the Nicene Synod; [upon this answer] the Emperour was most willingly baptized by Ascholius the Bishop. Not many days after [Theodosius] recovered of his distemper, and came to Constantinople about the twenty fourth of November, in Gratianus's fifth and his own first Consulate.

* Or, Marched.

CHAP. VII.

That when Gregorius was come to Constantinople, and some Bishops murmured at his Translation; he refused the presidency over the Church. And, the Emperour orders Demophilus the Arian Bishop, either to give his assent to the Homoöusian Faith, or else to go out of the City; which latter he chose rather to do.

AT that time Gregorius of Nazianzum, being [a] translated [to Constantinople,] celebrated his assemblies within the City, in a small Oratory. Whereto the Emperours afterwards joyned a stately Church, and named it [b] Anastasia. But Gregorius (a person for eloquence and piety far more eminent than all men of his own time,) perceiving that some murmured [at his translation,] because he was a stranger; after he had expresst his joy for the Emperours arrival, refused to make any longer stay at Constantinople. The Emperour finding the Church in this posture, was very sollicitous, how he might make Peace, procure an Union, and enlarge the Churches. Immediately therefore he opens his mind to Demophilus, who presided over the Arian Sect, [and makes a proposal to him] whether he would give his assent to the [Creed publisht at the] Nicene Synod, unite the people, and embrace Peace. Upon Demophilus's refusing to comply with his proposition; If then (said the Emperour) you eschew Peace and Concord, We order you to quit the Churches. When Demophilus had heard these words, and considered with himself how difficult it was to make a resistance against those in authority and power; he called the multitude together in the Church, and standing up in the midst of them, spake these words on his own account to his followers. Brethren, 'tis written (said he) in the * Gospel; if they shall Persecute you in this City, flee ye into another. In regard therefore the Emperour [c] excludes us from the Churches, take notice, that to morrow we will have our Meetings without the City. Having said these words, he went out: not so, as if he apprehended the true meaning contained in this Evangelick Oracle, [the import whereof is,] that such as flee out of the converse of this world, should seek the Jerusalem which is above. But he [following another sense of these words, went] out of the City-gates, where for the future he had his Meetings. Together with him went out Lucius of Alexandria, who having been ejected, as I said * before, made his escape to Constantinople, in which City he lived. After this manner therefore the Arians (who for the space of fourty years had been in possession of the Churches,) declining the agreement they were invited to by the Emperour Theodosius, departed out of the City, in Gratianus's fifth and Theodosius Augustus's first Consulate, on the twenty sixth of November. And the professours of the Homoöusian Faith, succeeding in their places, recovered possession of the Churches.

* See Matt. 10. 23. where 'tis thus worded in the Greek: ὅταν δὲ διώκωσιν ὑμᾶς ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ, but when they shall persecute you in this City. But here in Socrates the words are: ἐὰν ὑμᾶς διώκωσιν ἐκ τῆς πόλεως ταύτης; if they shall persecute you out of this City, &c.

* Book 4. chap. 37.

[a] Indeed, Socrates thought that Gregorius had been translated from the Bishoprick of Nazianzum, to that of Constantinople: which was the opinion of many others also. But Gregorius had never been Bishop of Nazianzum; he was only his father Gregorius's Assistant in that Bishoprick, being sent for thither by his father (then very aged,) out of the Solitudes; whither he had retired after he had accepted of and also refused the Bishoprick of Sasimi, in the year of Christ 371; as Baronius has remarked. Vales.

[b] I am not of Socrates's opinion, who says here, that that Church (wherein Gregorius Nazianzenus used to Preach the word of God at Constantinople,) was by the succeeding Emperours named Anastasia. For, in Gregorius's own life time this Church was called Anastasia; which is apparent, both from Gregorius's own Oration, wherein he bids farwell in expres words to Anastasia, and The Apostles; and also from his Elegiack concerning the Dream of Anastasia. Consult Baronius, at the year of Christ 378. Vales.

[c] We found a far different reading in our Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. For, in both those Copies 'tis thus expresst; ἐκλησιῶν χρήζει, stands in need of the Churches: this reading Epiphan. Scholasticus has followed, as appears from his Version. For he renders it thus: Quia igitur Imperator Ecclesiis opus habet, In regard therefore the Emperour has an occasion for the Churches. Nicephorus maintains the common reading: for instead of [excludes us from] his words are [drives us out of.] The Manuscript reading is in my judgment the better. Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the hundred and fifty Bishops convened at Constantinople, and concerning the determinations made by them, after they had Ordained Nectarius in that City.

[After this] the Emperour without any delay, summons a Synod of Bishops [who embraced] his own Faith; that by them the Nicene Faith might be confirmed, and a Bishop of Constantinople ordained. And because he had some hopes of being able to unite the Macedoniani to [a profession of] his own Faith; he summoned the Prelates of that Heresie also. There met therefore of [the Embracers of] the Homoöusian Faith, Timotheus from Alexandria; from Jerusalem Cyrillus, who having made a Retractation, at that time assented to the Homoöusian Creed: Melitius was come thither from Antioch before, having been sent for to that City on the account of Gregorius's Ordination: also [a] Ascholius from Thessalonica, and many others.

[a] In the Sfortian M. S. both here, and also before, in chap. 6. of this book; this person is called Acholius. The Latins do commonly give him that name. For so he is called by Ambrosius, by Prosper in his Chronicon, and by Jordanes in his book de successione Regnorum. But the Greeks do usually term him Ascholius. This is the Ascholius, concerning whose death, Virtues, and Miracles, Saint Ambrosius writes, in his 59th [b] Epistle to the Clergy of Thessalonica. Where he says, that Anysius his Schollar succeeded him. Vales.

GRATIANUS VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

They were in all an hundred and fifty. The principal perſons of the Macedonian party, were Eleuſius of Cyzicum, and Marcianus [Biſhop] of Lampſacus. [Of this Sect] there were thirty ſix [Biſhops,] moſt of whom came from the Cities about the Helleſpont. They met therefore in the Conſulate of Eucharius and Evagrius, in the month of May. The Emperour, and the Biſhops that embraced his Creed, did their utmoſt, to bring Eleuſius and his followers over to their own ſide; putting them in remembrance of the * Embaſſy, which they had ſent by Euſtathius to Liberius heretofore Biſhop of Rome: and [b] that not long ſince they themſelves had entred into a promiſcuous communion [with the Orthodox,] on their own accord: And that they, having once acknowledged and profeſt an agreement in the [points of] Faith, did not do what was right and honeſt, now to attempt a ſubverſion of what had been well and wiſely determined by themſelves. But the Macedoniani, little regarding either admonitions, or reproofs, choſe rather to profeſs the Arian opinion, than to give their aſſent to the Homoöuſian Creed. Having made this anſwer, they departed from Conſtantinople; and wrote to their followers in every City, ordering them in no wiſe to give their conſent to the Creed of the Nicene Synod. But the [Prelates] of the † other party ſtaied [at Conſtantinople,] and entred into a Conſult about the ordination of a Biſhop. For Gregorius, as we have told you a little before, refuſed the Biſhoprick, and prepared for his departure to Nazianzum. There was a perſon by name Nectarius, [a deſcendant] of a Senatorian family, a ſweet tempered man, admirable for his whole courſe of life, [c] although he bore the Prætors Office. This perſon the people ſeized upon, elected him Biſhop, and he was Ordained by the hundred and fifty Prelates then preſent. Moreover, at the ſame time [the ſaid Prelates] promulged a ſanction, that the Biſhop of Conſtantinople ſhould have the [d] priviledges of honour after the Biſhop of Rome, becauſe that City was New-Rome. They did again confirm the Nicene Creed; and conſtituted [e] Patriarchs, having made a [f] diviſion of the Provinces; that ſo

† That is, the Orthodox.

[c] Inſtead of [καὶ τοὶ, &c. although, &c.] I had rather read [καὶ τότε τῷ πρωτοθρόνῳ, &c. who alſo at that time bore the Prætor's Office.] Nicephorus confirms our emendation; for he words it thus: καὶ διὰ πάντων ὡς εἰπεῖν θαυμαζόμενον, &c. and admirable, as I may ſay, for all things; who then bore the Prætors Office. Valeſ.

[d] Τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς. They are the very words of the third Canon of the Conſtantinopolitan Synod. Whereby the Conſtantinopolitan Fathers do confer upon the Biſhop of Conſtantinople a Precedency, or Primacy of honour only; but give him nothing of a Metropolitical or patriarchical power, or juriſdiction. This is evident, not only from the cautious expreſſion which the Fathers of this Synod make uſe of; (for they give him, not τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς ἐξουσίας, the priviledges of power or juriſdiction, nor priviledges in general; but they beſtow on him only τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς, the priviledges of honour:) but alſo from theſe very words themſelves, compared with the ſecond Canon of this Conſtantinopolitan Synod. For, in that Canon the Fathers had made a poſitive ſanction, that a Diœceſis ſhould be governed by its Biſhops, (or, by a Synod of all the Biſhops in the ſame Diœceſis,) and that the ſaid Biſhops ſhould exerciſe their Eccleſiaſtical power in that Diœceſis only: καὶ τοὺς τῆς θρᾴκης τοὺς τῆς θρᾴκης μόνον οἰκονομεῖν, and that the Biſhops of the Thracican Diœceſis ſhould only govern the [Eccleſiaſtick] affairs of the ſaid Thracican Diœceſis: theſe are the very words of the Canon. Now, every body knows, that Conſtantinople is ſcituate in the Thracican Diœceſis. In regard therefore, that the preſent Fathers had committed the whole government of the Thracican Diœceſis to a Synod of all the Biſhops in the ſaid Diœceſis; there could nothing remain, which they might aſſign to any other ſingle Biſhop in the ſaid Diœceſis, before the reſt of them, ſave only the bare priviledge of honour; which alone they do here confer upon the Conſtantinopolitan See ſcituate in the ſame Diœceſis. And thus, by the order of this Canon, Anatolius Biſhop of Conſtantinople is placed next after Leo the Biſhop of Rome's Legates, in the ſubſcriptions of the Council of Chalcedon. See Concil. General. Edit. Bin. Paris 1636. Tom. 3. pag. 452, 453. There occurs an eminent inſtance of this honour due to the Conſtantinopolitan Biſhop by vertue of this Canon, in Synod. Chalced. Act. 1. vid. Concil. General. Edit. Bin. ut prius Tom. 3. pag. 61, 62. See the Learned Dr Beveredge's Annotat. on the third Canon Concil. Conſtantinop. pag. 95.

GRATIANUS VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

[e] The firſt mention (if I miſtake not,) of Chriſtian Patriarchs (ſo I term them, becauſe the Jews had Grand Officers amongſt them thus termed, long before this time;) in any Authour worthy of credit, is at this place in our Socrates. However, there is no ſmall ſtir amongſt Learned men, about defining the time wherein theſe Patriarchs were firſt conſtituted in the Chriſtian Church. Valeſius, in his notes on this chap. and in his third book of Eccleſiaſtick Obſervations upon Socrates and Sozomen, does in a great many words aſſert, that the Patriarchical authority was confirmed by the ſixth Canon of the Nicene Synod. This aſſertion of his is ſufficiently confuted by Dr Beveredge, in his Annotat. upon that ſixth Canon, pag. 52. &c. At which place, and in his notes on the ſecond Canon of the Conſtantinopolitan Council, pag. 93, 94; the ſaid Learned Doctor is of opinion (agreeable to our Socrates here,) that Patriarchs were firſt conſtituted by this ſecond Oecumenical Council held at Conſtantinople. Nevertheleſs, he grants, that moſt of thoſe priviledges, which Patriarchs afterwards challenged were given them by other Councils. Laſtly, Dr Barrow's ſentiment is, that this Diœceſan (or Patriarchical) Form did ſoon after the Nicene Council creep into the Church, without any ſolemn appointment, by a ſpontaneous aſſumption and ſubmiſſion. See his excellent Treatiſe of the Pope's ſupremacy, pag. 240, &c.

[f] The Roman Emperours who preceded Conſtantine the Great, committed the chief management of affairs in the Civill State of the Empire to one, or at moſt to two Præfects of the Prætorium. But Conſtantine the Great introduced a new partition of the Empire, (as Zoſimus tells us, book 2. of his Hiſtor. pag. 439, 440, † dit. Lugd. 1611;) and divided the management thereof amongſt four Præfects of the Prætorium: one whereof was Præfect of the Pretorium in the Eaſt, a ſecond of Illyricum, a third of Italy, and a fourth of the Gallia's. Each of theſe Præfects had ſeveral Diœceſis's under them: every ſingle Diœceſis was a Combination of divers Provinces together into one Territory. What Diœceſis's every one of theſe Præfects had under their diſtrict, and what and how many Provinces were included in each Diœceſis; the learned Reader may ſee in Guidus Pancirolus's notitia utraque, dignitatum, cùm Orientis, tùm Occidentis, Edit. Lugd. 1608. From which Author we will Tranſcribe the five Diœceſis's (for ſo many he has under him,) of the Præfect of the Prætorium of the Eaſt, as they occur at fol. 3, and 4, of his Comment: becauſe they are neceſſary in order to the clear underſtanding of what we have to ſay further here. Sub diſpoſitione virorum Illuſtrium Præfectorum Prætorio per Orientem. &c. Under the diſpoſe of the Illuſtrious the Præfects of the Prætorium throughout the Eaſt, are theſe Diœceſis's underwritten, The Eaſt, Egypt, the Aſian, Pontick, and Thracican Diœceſis's.

The Provinces of the Eaſt [or Eaſtern Diœceſis] are XV.	Paleſtina, Phœnice, Syria, Cilicia, Cyprus, Arabia. And the Dux (Commander) and Comes (Earl) of the Milites. Iſauria, Paleſtina Salutaris, Paleſtina ſecunda, Phœnice Libani, Euphratenſis, Syria Salutaris, Oſrhöena, Meſopotamia, Cilicia ſecunda.
The Provinces of Egypt [or Ægyptick Diœceſis.] are VI.	Libya ſuperior, Libya inferior, Thebais, Ægyptus, Arcadia, Auguſtanica.
The Provinces of the Aſian Diœceſis X.	Pamphylia, Helleſpontus, Lydia, Piſidia, Lycäonia, Phrygia Pacatiana, Phrygia Salutaris, Lycia, Caria, Inſulæ.
The Provinces of the Pontick diœceſis XI.	Galatia, Bithynia, Honorias, Cappadocia prima, Cappadocia ſecunda, Paphlagonia, Pontus Polemaniacus, Hellenopontus, Armenia prima, Armenia ſecunda, Galatia Salutaris.
The Provinces of the Thracican Diœceſis VI.	Europa, Thracia, Hæmimontis, Rhodope, Mœſia ſecunda, Scythia.

In conformity to this model of Government in the Civil State, the Regiment in the Church (which before had been metropolitical, when the Provinces were independent on each other in Eccleſiaſtical adminiſtrations,) was adapted. This Diœceſan form of Governance might, 'tis probable, privately creep into the Church, in that interval of time between the Nicene and Conſtantinopolitan Councils; which is the opinion of Dr Barrow (See note (e.) in this chapter.) But, 'tis certain, it was confirmed by the Fathers convened in this ſecond Oecumenical Synod; which ſanction they made upon this occaſion. A little before the ſummoning of this Synod, Melitius Biſhop of Antioch in the Eaſt, took a journey to Conſtantinople, where he, together with ſome other Biſhops promoted Gregorius of Nazianzum to the Conſtantinopolitan See. So Sozomen tells us, book 7. chap. 3 and 7. Soon after Melitius had done this, Peter Biſhop of Alexandria ſent ſome Biſhops from Egypt to Conſtantinople, who ordained Maximus the Cynick Biſhop of that City. See Sozomen book 7. chap. 9. Now, in the Political partition of the Roman Empire, (as you may ſee by that Draught we have here given you of the Oriental-Prætorian-Præfecture,) these three places were in three several Diœceses. For, Antioch in Syria (whence Melitius came) was in the Oriental Diœcesis: Alexandria (from whence the Bishops were sent by Peter) was in the Egyptick Diœcesis: and Constantinople (where these Bishops had celebrated their Episcopal ordinations) was Situate in the Thracican Diœcesis. In regard these proceedings had produced a great deal of disorder and confusion in the Church; to remedy this in future, the Fathers convened in this Synod, make a Sanction, (See Conc. Constantinopol. II. Can. 2. pag. 87, Edit. Bevereg.) that the Ecclesiastick Diœcesis's should have the same Limits with those of the State; and that it should be as unlawfull for Ecclesiastick persons to perform any Office, or do any business belonging to them, without that Diœcesis wherein they were placed; as it was for the Civil Minister to intermeddle with any affair without the Limits of his Diœcesis. That this had not been duly observed in the Church before this Synod, but that Prelates made frequent Excursions out of one Diœcesis into another, to ordain, &c; is evident, not only from the instances we have mentioned just now; (where we find Melitius who belonged to the Oriental Diœcesis, and other Bishops of the Egyptick Diœcesis, ordaining a Bishop of Constantinople, a City in the Thracican Diœcesis:) but also from the Testimony of our Socrates, a person who lived soon after the convention of this Constantinopolitan Synod; who speaking here concerning its Sanctions, καὶ πατριάρχας κατέστησαν (says he,) διανειμάμενοι τὰς ἐπαρχίας, &c. And they constituted Patriarchs, having made a division of the Provinces; that so those Bishops [who make their abode] without the bounds of their own Diœcesis, should not invade the Churches without their Limits. For this had been promiscuously done before by reason of the Persecutions. But, notwithstanding that this Diœcesan form (in imitation of the Civil State of the Empire) was brought into the Church, and thereupon Patriarchical Sees were erected: yet after this, several Provincial Churches had their ancient priviledges confirmed to them (which confirmation is grounded on the sixth Canon of the Nicene Council, as Dr Bevereдge has fully proved in his notes on that Canon, pag. 58;) and remained Independent from the Patriarchical Sees. For instance, the Cyprian Church was adjudged to be such an one, in the eighth Canon of the third General Council held at Ephesus, in the year of Christ 431. In which Canon, after the Ephesine Fathers had determined the Cyprian Church to be independent from the Bishop of Antioch; they add this clause: τὸ δὲ αὐτὸ καὶ περὶ ἄλλων διοικήσεων, καὶ περὶ ἀπαλλαχῆ ἐπαρχιῶν σῳζφυλαχθήσεται, &c. The same shall be observed in other Diœceses, and in the Provinces every where: that so, none of the most Religious Bishops may invade another Province, which has not been for many years before and from the beginning under his, or his predecessours hand. In like manner Armenia the Great was exempted from dependence on any Patriarchate; as 'tis apparent from That Order of the Presidency of the most holy Patriarchs, which Dr Bevereдge has published (at his notes on the 36ta Canon Concil. Trullan. pag. 135, &c.) from a very ancient Greek Manuscript in the Bodleian Library. In which Manuscript, neither England, Scotland, nor Ireland, are reckoned dependents on the Roman Patriarchate; as the Learned Reader, on perusall, will find. Though, 'tis as certain, that there was a compleat and absolute Church setled in this Island, long before this Manuscript Order was (or can be supposed to have been) drawn up; as that there was one at Antioch, or Rome it self. For (not to mention those unquestionable authorities which might be here produced to prove, that the plantation of the Gospel in this our Province was as early as the close of Tiberius's Reign;) we have many witnesses of an undoubted authority to attest, that before the times of the Nicene Council, there was a compleat Church setled in this Island. For first, in the subscriptions to the first Council of Arles (convened in France before the Nicene Council, that is, before the year of Christ 325, as the Acts of the said Council, publisht by Jacobus Sirmondus do attest;) we meet with the names of these persons who went thither from this our Island: (See Concilia Antiqua Gallia, Tom. 1. pag. 9. Edit. Sirmondi Paris. 1629.) Eborius, Episcopus de civitate Eboracensi, &c. Eborius Bishop of the City of York in the Province of Britania. Restitutus, Bishop of the City London, in the forewritten Province. Adelfius, Bishop of the City Colonia of the Londoners. From the same Province, Sacerdos a Presbyter, Arminius a Deacon. Secondly, Athanasius (in his second Apology against the Arians pag. 720. Edit. Paris.) does attest, that the Bishops of the Britannia's were present at the Sardican Council; which Synod was convened in the Consulate of Rufinus and Eusebius (see our Socrates book 2. chap. 20, note c.) on the year of our Lord 347. Lastly, to mention no more, Hilarius Bishop of Poictiers in France, in the beginning of his Book de Synodis (pag. 318. Edit. Paris. 1631. which book was written about the year of our Lord 350.) sends Greeting Britanniarum Episcopis, to the Bishops of the Britannia's. This is sufficient to prove we had a Church here in those times. And that this Church was governed by its own Bishops, till about the year of Christ 600, and subject neither to the Roman, nor to any other forreign Prelate, is a thing evidently apparent from what Venerable Bede has recorded in his Ecclesiastick History. For when Gregory Bishop of Rome, (supposing the Inhabitants of this Island to be still intangled in the errours of Paganism,) had sent hither Augustine the Monk to convert them to Christianity; he unexpectedly found, not only the Christian Religion disseminated amongst them long before his arrival, but Bishops also rightly and duely constituted: which Prelates could not (in my simple judgment) be supposed the Subjects of the Roman Bishop, because he was so far from having any knowledge of them, that he did not believe there was one single Christian in this Island. But, though Augustine at his arrival found not the Brittish Bishops dependants on the Roman See; yet, he resolves to use his utmost endeavour to make them such. In order to which, by the assistance of Ethelbert King of Kent (as Bede tells us, book 2. chap. 2. Eccles. Histor.) he summons together the Prelates of the adjacent Province of the Britons, advises them to alter their ancient usages, and to accept of him for their Arch-bishop. But they, having an Arch-bishop of their own already, to wit, the Bishop of Kaerleon, and looking upon it to be a strange and unheard-of thing, that they should become Subjects to a Forreigner; wholly refused him and his monstrous proposal; telling him, that they would not own him for their Arch-bishop; and, as to their ancient customs and usages, that they could not relinquish them without the consent and licence of their own Nation. Whereupon they desired a second Synod might be convened. At which these met seaven Brittish Bishops (whose names you may see in Sir Henry Spelmans Councils, Tom. 1. pag. 106;) and many other Learned men; who by Dionothus (or, as Bede calls him, Dinooth) Abbot of Bangor gave Augustine the Monk this answer: (See Sir Henry Spelman, as before, pag. 108, 109:) Be it known to you and without doubt, that we are, and every one of us obedient and subject to the Church of God and Pope of Rome, and to every true and pious Christian, to love every one in his degree with perfect charity, and to help every one of them by word and deed to be the sons of God. As for any other obedience, I do not know that I owe it to him, whom ye call the Pope, or that he hath right to challenge or require to be the Father of Fathers. This obedience we are ready to give and pay to him, and to every Christian continually. Besides, we are placed under the Government of the Bishop of Kaerleon upon Usk, who is to supervise under God over us, to make us keep the spiritual way. What treatment the Brittish Prelates found from Augustines hand, after they had given him this answer; the Reader may see in Bede, at the book and chapter now quoted. Where we find this Augustine, their pretended convertour, threatning them with a War. Which by his instigation (see Mr Wheelocks notes on Bed. Eccles. Hist. book 2. chap. 2. Ethelfridus King of the Northanhumbrians waged against them: wherein no less than 1200 Brittish Ecclesiasticks were slain at one time. After this, the Romish Bishop, for upwards of nine Centuries exercised a supream Ecclesiastick power in this Nation; though several of our Kings promulged severe Laws against it. But now at length, his Tyrannick yoak is broken off; and our Church enjoys its ancient priviledges: which may that God continue to it, by the most pretious bloud of whose eternal Son it was purchased! Amen.

Oriental

5 Τὰς τῶν διοικήσεων ἐπισκόπους. They are the words of the second Canon of the Constantinopolitan Synod; which Dionysius Exiguus renders thus: qui sunt super Diœcesim Episcopi, &c. the Bishops who are over a Diœcesis. There may be a twofold sence of these words. For first, They may be termed τῶν διοικήσεων ἐπίσκοποι, who are over a diœcesis, or preside over a whole Diœcesis: of which sort is the Bishop of Alexandria, or the Bishop of Antioch, who is constituted not over a Province, but over a Diœcesis. Or secondly, they may be termed τῶν διοικήσεων, who are without their own Diœcesis: So Zonaras explains these words, in his Comment on this Canon. Lucas Holstenius has embraced the former sense of these words. For, at the Margin of his copy he had made a remark, that this passage in Socrates is to be explained thus: ne Episcopi, &c. Least the Bishops set over their own Diœcesis's, should invade the Churches situate without their limits. But, the latter sense is the truer; which the Canon it self declares in the following words: for the Fathers add, ἀλλήτους δὲ ἐπισκόπους τῶν διοικήσεων μὴ ἐπιβαίνειν, that the uncalled Bishops come not beyond their Diœcesis. Wherefore τῶν διοικήσεων ἐπίσκοποι are the same with τῶν θείων, Prelates without their bounds; which title Socrates has given Gregory Nazianzen at chap. 7. of this book; because of his removal from the Bishoprick of Sasimi (which was in the Pontick Diœcesis) to Constantinople. Further, it is to be noted, that Diœcesis in this Canon does not signifie a Dioceſe (as that word is commonly used,) or a Province, as the Greek Interpreters Zonaras and Balsamon supposed; but it imports many Provinces joyned together which are subject to one Governour. Whence the title of this Canon is, περὶ διοικήσεων, concerning Diœceses. For, its expres's words are, φυλαττομένων δὲ τῶν ὑπογεγραμμένων περὶ τῶν διοικήσεων κανόνων, &c. the fore written Canon concerning Diœcesises being observed, 'tis manifest that a Provincial Synod will govern affairs throughout every Province. You see what the title of this Canon is, and how it distinguishes a Province from a Diœcesis. For, 'tis not forbidden by this Canon, that Bishops should goe out of one Province into another, to celebrate Ordinations: that being not to be done otherwise. To instance in the Asian Diœcesis, (see note f.) the Fathers prohibit not a removal out of Lycia into Pamphilia, nor out of Caria into Lydia, on account of Ecclesiastick business: but they only forbid them to pass out of one Diœcesis into another. Valet.

Gregorius [Biſhop] of Nyſſa a City alſo in Cappadocia, (who was Baſilius's brother; and Otreius [Biſhop] of Meletina in Armenia, had the [h] Patriarchate of the Pontick Diœceſis for their allotment. To Amphilochius of Iconium, and Optimus [Biſhop] of Antioch in Piſidia, was aſſigned the Aſian [Diœceſis.] To Timotheus [Biſhop] of Alexandria was given [the ſuperintendency over the Churches] throughout Egypt. The adminiſtration of the Churches throughout the Eaſt was committed to the Biſhops of that Region, [to wit] to Pelagius of Laodicea, and Diodorus of Tarſus; but to the Antiochian Church were reſerved the priviledges [of Honour,] which were given to Meletius then preſent. They likewiſe decreed, that if need required, a Provincial Synod ſhould determine the Eccleſiaſtick affairs of every Province. Theſe ſanctions were confirmed by the Emperours own conſent. Such was the concluſion of this Syond.

[h] The term πρωτοπαρχία is not here uſed in ſuch a ſenſe, as to ſignifie a Patriarchate ſtrictly ſo taken. Nor, muſt we think, that theſe Prelates here mentioned by Socrates, were conſtituted Patriarchs properly ſo called; becauſe (as Valeſius well remarks) there are more than one named here to be ſuperintendents over one Diœceſis; for inſtance, Helladius, Gregorius, and Otreius, are aſſigned for the Pontick Diœceſis. Now, what that power was, which is here given to theſe Prelates by the Synod (or rather by the Emperour Theodoſius himſelf,) will appear from an inſpection into the occaſion of their being intruſted with this power. The Emperour Theodoſius, perceiving the Churches to be notoriouſly peſtred with Arianiſme, took a reſolution to extirpate it. In order whereto, he publiſhed an Edict (which is mentioned by Sozomen, book 7. chap. 9; and is ſtill extant, being the third Law in the Theodoſian Code, Tit. de fide Catholicâ:) to this effect; that in all places, the poſſeſſion of the Churches ſhould be delivered to ſuch perſons only, as would acknowledge and profeſs one and the ſame Deity of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in a ſubſiſtency of three perſons equal in honour and power. In order to a more clear manifeſtation of thoſe perſons that owned this acknowledgment and profeſſion; ſuch of them as were in Conſtantinople and Thracia, were by this Imperial Law obliged to hold communion with Nectarius Prelate of the Conſtantinopolitan See; thoſe in the Pontick Diœceſis, with Helladius, Gregorius, and Otreius, &c. For theſe Prelates (ſays Sozomen) the Emperour himſelf approved of, after he had ſeen and ſpoken with them; and alſo, they had an eminent repute for their pious Government of their Churches. And the Emperour orders further in his Edict, that whoſoever diſſented from a communion of faith with theſe Prelates, in their ſeveral diſtricts; he ſhould be expelled out of the Church as a manifeſt Heretick. You ſee then, that the power given to theſe Prelates here was not properly Patriarchichal; but only this, that their faith was to be the ſtandard as it were, to meaſure that of others by, and a communion with them the Teſt for admitting perſons to, or expel ing them from, Eccleſiaſtick preferments. But, though we affirm, that the Prelates here mentioned by Socrates, were not conſtituted Patriarchs properly ſo called: yet we ſee no reaſon of making an inference from hence, (as Valeſius in his note here does,) that Patriarchs were not conſtituted by the Conſtantinopolitan Fathers. For this is plainly repugnant to our Socrates's fore-mentioned words in this chap. viz. πολιταρχας καθίστασαν, διανειμάμενοι τὰς ἐπαρχίας, they conſtituted Patriarchs, having made a diſtribution, or diviſion, of the Provinces. On which diſtribution of the Provinces, the entire conſtitution of Patriarchs has its ſole dependence. For, from it aroſe Diœceſis's, over which Patriarchs were ſet. See the Learned Dr Beveredge's notes on the 6th Canon of the Nicene Council, pag. 52, &c; and on the ſecond Canon of the Conſtant. Synod. pag 94.

CHAP. IX.

That the Emperour Theodoſius [ordered] the body of Paulus Biſhop of Conſtantinople to be honourably tranſlated from [the place of his] Exile. At which time alſo Meletius [Biſhop] of Antioch departed this life.

AT that time the Emperour tranſlated the body of Paulus the Biſhop from the City Ancyra: whom Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium had baniſhed upon Macedonius's account, and had ordered him to be ſtrangled in Cucuſus a Town of Armenia, as I have * already mentioned. [Theodoſius] therefore, having received [his body] with much honour and reverence, depoſited it in the Church which now bears his own name; which Church the embracers of Macedonius's opinion were heretofore in poſſeſſion of, at ſuch time as they were ſeparatiſts from the Arians: but were then expelled by the Emperour, becauſe they refuſed embracing of his faith. Moreover, at the ſame time, Melitius Biſhop of Antioch fell into a diſtemper, and died: in praiſe of whom Gregorius, Baſilius's brother, ſpoke a [a] Funeral Oration. Meletius's body was by his friends conveyed to Antioch. Such as were favourers of Meletius, did again refuſe to be ſubject to Paulinus: but cauſed Flavianus to be ſubſtituted in the place of Meletius. By reaſon whereof a new diviſion did again ariſe amongſt the people. Thus the Antiochian Church was afreſh divided into two parties, on account of their Biſhops, not of their faith.

CHAP. X.

That the Emperour ordered a Synod of all the Sects to be convened, at which time Arcadius his ſon was proclaimed Auguſtus; and that the Novatians (who as to their faith embraced the ſame ſentiments with the Homoöuſians) were the only perſons that had permiſſion to hold their aſſemblies within the City. But the other Hereticks were forced from thence.

BUt, there were diſturbances in other Cities alſo, [which hapned] at ſuch time as the Arians were ejected out of the Churches. On account whereof I cannot chooſe but admire the Emperours judiciouſneſs and prudence. For he ſuffered not (ſo far as it was in his power [to prevent them,]) the Cities to be filled with tumultuous diſturbances: but within a ſhort ſpace of time, ordered a Synod of all the Hereſies to be again convened, ſuppoſing that by a mutual conference of the Biſhops, one concordant opinion would prevail amongſt all men. I am of opinion, that this deſign of the Emperour's was the cauſe of that fortunate ſucceſs he [then] had. For, about the ſame time, by a particular diſpenſation of divine providence, the Barbarous Nations were reduced to a ſubjection to him. And amongſt others, Athanarichus King of the Goths made a Surrendry of himſelf with all his own people unto him, [a] who ſoon after died at Conſtantinople. Moreover, at that time the Emperour proclaimed his Son Arcadius, Auguſtus, in the ſecond Conſulate of * Merobaudes which he bore with † Saturninus, on the ſixteenth of January. Not long after theſe things, the Biſhops of every Sect arrived from all places, in the ſame Conſulate, in the month June. The Emperour therefore having ſent for Nectarius the Biſhop, conſulted with him, what project ſhould be made uſe of that the Chriſtian Religion might be freed from diſſentions, and the Church reduced to an Union. And he ſaid, that that Controverſie which cauſed a ſeparation in the Churches, ought to be diſcuſſed, that ſo by a removal of the Diſcord, an agreement might be effected in the Churches. At the hearing of this Nectarius was full of anxiety and ſollicitude. And having ſent for Agelius then then Bishop of the Novatians, (in regard he was a person that embraced the same sentiments with him as to the Faith,) he makes known to him the Emperours intent. He, as to other things, was indeed a very pious person: but being not very able to maintain a dispute, concerning the Doctrine [of Faith,] he proposes his Reader under him, by name Sisinnius, as a fit person to manage a Conference. But Sisinnius (an eloquent man, and well experienced in affairs, one who had an accurate skill in the expositions of the Sacred Scriptures, and in Philosophick opinions,) knew that these Disputations do not only not unite dissentions, but also raise Heresies to an higher degree of contention. Upon which account, he gave Nectarius this advice. In regard he very well knew, that the Ancients avoided the attributing a beginning of Existence to the Son of God; (for they apprehended him to be Coeternal with the Father;) he advises him to shun Logical disputes; and to produce for evidences the [b] Expositions of the Ancients: and that the Emperour should propose to the Chiefs of each Heresie this question, Whether they would entertain any respect for the Ancients who [c] flourished before the dissention in the Church, or whether they would reject them as estranged from the Christian Religion? For if they reject them [said he,] then let them dare to Anathematize them. And if they shall be so audacious as to do that, the multitude will forthwith extrude them by violence. Upon the doing whereof, the truth will undoubtedly obtain a manifest victory. But, if they shall refuse to reject the Ancient Doctours, then it will be our business to produce the Books of the Ancients, whereby our opinion will be attested and confirmed. Nectarius having heard all this from Sisinnius, goes in great hast to the Pallace; and makes the Emperour acquainted with the advice which had been given him. The Emperour embraces it with much eagerness, and handled the matter prudently. For, without discovering his design, he asked [the Chiefs of the Hereticks] this one question, Whether they had any respect for, and admitted of those Doctours of the Church [who lived] before [the rise of] the dissention? Upon their non-refusal of them, and their affirming that they highly revered and honoured them as being their Masters; the Emperour enquired of them again, whether they would * acquiesse in them as witnesses of the Christian Religion worthy to be credited? When the Chiefs of the Sects and their Logicians (for they had amongst them many persons well provided for the combat of dispute;) heard this, they knew not what to do. For every one of them fell into a disagreement of opinion; some affirming that the Emperours Proposal was good; others [thinking] it not conducive to their design. For some were one way affected towards the Books of the Ancients, others another. Nor could they any longer agree amongst themselves: and they dissented not only from other Sects, but those of the same Sect differed one from the other. Concordant malice therefore, like the tongue of those ancient Gyants, was divided, and their tower of mischief demolished. After the Emperour perceived their confused † Dissention, and [was sensible] that they confided in disputation only, and not in the Exposition of the Ancients; he betook himself to a second project. And orders every Sect to [d] set forth [and deliver in] to him in writing a Draught of that Creed which they owned. Then, those [of every Sect] amongst them that were skilfullest and most eloquent, wrote their own opinion, making use of a great deal of caution and circumspection in their expressions. A day also was pitcht upon, whereon the Bishops of each Sect upon summons met at the Pallace. At which time were present Nectarius and Agelius, Prelates of the Homoüsian Creed; of the Arians, Demophilus; of the [e] Eunomians, Eunomius himself; of those that embraced Macedonius's opinion, Eleusius [Bishop] of Cyzicum.

[a] Athanarichus King of the Gothſ, entred Conſtantinople in the Conſulate of Eucherius and Eugrius, on the eleventh of January, and died on the twenty fifth of the ſame month; as 'tis recorded in Idatius's Faſti, and in Marcellinus's Chronicon. On the year following, which was the year of Chriſt 382, when Antonius and Syagrius were Conſuls, the whole Gothick Nation ſurrendred it ſelf to Theodoſius, on the 3d of Octob. as ſays the ſame Idatius. † His name in the Greek is Saturnilus.

† Or Dispersion.

[d] Instead of [γνωρίζειν τὸ ὄρθον αὐτῷ, to make known their Draught of the Creed] I had rather read, as Nicephorus does, [γνωρίζειν τὸ ὄρον αὐτῷ, to set forth [and deliver in] to him in writing a Draught.] &c, Vales.

[e] This Draught of the Creed, which Eunomius then presented to the Emperour Theodosius, I have by me in Manuscript; for which I am obliged to the most famous and Learned Emericus Bigotius. In the Bavarian Manuscript, and in Livinius's Copy, this Draught of the Creed was placed at the latter end of Gregorius Nyssenus's Books against Eunomius, as Gretser attests. But, in the Florentine Copy, from which Bigotius transcribed this Creed, it was placed before those Books. Nor, will it be unusefull, to insert it here. For, though it contains Eunomius's whole impiety; yet some things occur in it, in no wise despicable.

EUNOMIUS's Creed.

Τῷ Θείῳ καὶ Σωτῆρι ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ, &c. Whereas God and our Saviour Jesus Christ according to a most just sentence has said, that he will confess before God and the Father, those which should confess Him before men, and that he will deny such as should deny Him: and whereas the Apostolick Doctrine does exhort us, to be always ready to [give] an account to every one that asketh it: Whereas [lastly,] the Imperial commands do require this Confession; with all readiness We confess what our Sentiments are, and that We Believe in one only true God, according to his own Doctrine, not honouring Him with a false voice. For He cannot lye. But is by nature and Glory truly one God: without beginning, always, and eternally alone. Not parted or divided into many as to his Substance, according to which he is one: nor existing sometimes one, at others another; nor receding from what he is: nor formed from one Substance into three Persons. For he is altogether and wholly one, continuing always alone in one and the same manner. Having no companion of his Divinity, no partaker of his Glory, no Consort of his power, no Assessour of his Kingdom. For he is one and the only Omnipotent God, God of Gods, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords. The Highest over all the earth, the Highest in the heavens, the Highest in the Highest, the Heavenly things: true in being what he is, and always continuing so. True in his Works, true in his Words. The begining of all Subjection, Power, Empire. Above Conversion, and free from change, as being incorrupt. Not dividing his own Substance in begetting, nor being the same begetting and begotten, or existing the same Father and Son. For he is incorrupt. In working in no wise wanting matter, or members, or natural instruments. For he stands in need of nothing. WE BELIEVE also in the Son of God, the only Begotten God, the First begotten of every Creature, Christ the true God, not unbegotten: not (before he was,) named the Son without Generation, begotten before every Creature. Not uncreated. The Beginning of the Wayes of God [in order to his] Works, and being the Word in the beginning: not without a beginning. The living Wisdom, the operating Truth, the subsisting Power, the begotten Life: as being the Son of God giving Life to the living; and restoring Life to the dead: the true Light, enlightning every man that cometh into the world: Good, and the Minister of Good things; in regard he is begotten of the Goodness and Power of the Father: who hath not divided with him that has imparted the Dignity, nor with any other, his Fathers Substance, or Kingdom. But by Generation is made Glorious, and the Lord of Glory. Who has received Glory from the Father, but has not partaken of the Fathers Glory. For, the Glory of the Almighty is incommunicable, as he himself has said, I will not give my Glory to another. Who has been glorified by the Father before ages. Who has been glorified by the Father through ages, and throughout the whole rational and created Substance. Whom the whole celestial Milice doth guard. For he is the Lord and King of Glory, as being the Son of God and God: the Framer of things immortal and mortal, the Framer of Spirits and of all flesh. For all things were made by him, and without him nothing was made. The King and Lord of all Life and breath of those [Creatures] that were made by him. For all things were delivered unto him by the Father, according to his holy expression, and the Father hath hath given all things into his hand. Obedient to the framing and creating of the things which are. Obedient to every Adminiſtration. Not receiving his being the Son, or God, from his obedience: but in that he is the Son, and is the only begotten, he is made God. Obedient in Works. Obedient in Words. The Mediatour in Sentences [or Decrees.] The Mediatour in Laws. Him we acknowledge to be the Son of God, and the only begotten God. Him alone [we acknowledge to be] like to him that begat him upon account of an eminent ſimilitude and a peculiar conception [or ſignification.] Not as the Father [is] to the Father. For there are not two Fathers. Nor as the Son [is] to the Son, there being not two Sons. Nor as the Unbegotten to the Unbegotten. For there is one only Unbegotten, [to wit] the Omnipotent; and one only begotten Son. But [he is like] as the Son to the Father: in regard he is the Image and Seal of every operation and power of the Almighty: the Seal of all the Works, Words, and Councels of the Father. Him we acknowledge to be one of thoſe who covered the earth with [a deluge of] waters. Who burnt the Sodomites with fire. Who inflicted puniſhment on the Egyptians. Who made Laws according to the Commandment of the Eternal God. Who in the times of the Prophets converſt with the Ancients. Who called thoſe that refuſed to obey. Who has received all power of Judging. For the Father judgeth no man: but hath given all judgment to the Son. Who in the laſt days was made fleſh: made of a woman. Made man in order to the deliverance and Salvation of us men. Who aſſumed man [or humanity] conſiſting of a Soul and Body. Who by his tongue and mouth Preached peace to thoſe that were near and ſuch as were remote. Who was made obedient unto the Croſs and unto death. And who ſaw not corruption, but roſe again the third day. And after his Reſurrection he compendiouſly expounded the myſtery to his [diſciples.] He ſits on the right hand of the Father: and ſhall come to judge the quick and dead. After this [perſon,] We Believe in the Paraclete, the Spirit of Truth. The Teacher of Piety. Made by the Only begotten, to whom he was once ſubject. Who is not to be reckoned after the Father, nor together with the Father. For there is one only Father, who is God over all. Nor is he to be equalled with the Son. For he is the Only begotten, and has no Brother begotten at the ſame time with him. Nor yet is he to be compared with any other thing. For he has tranſcended all other things that have been made by the Son, in Generation, Nature, Glory, and Knowledge. In regard he is the firſt and beſt, the greateſt and moſt beautifull work of the Only begotten. Who alſo himſelf being one, and the firſt, and the Only, and the moſt eminent of all the Sons compoſures, by reaſon of his ſubſtance and natural Dignity; does perfect every operation and Doctrine according to the Sons arbitrement, by whom he is ſent, and of whom he receives. And he makes a relation to thoſe that are inſtructed: teaching the Truth: ſanctifying the Saints: leading them who come to the Sacrament: dividing to the Spirit all his free gifts, who gives grace. And he cooperates with the faithfull, in order to their underſtanding and contemplation of the things commanded. Who groans with them that pray: is the Guide to what is profitable: gives ſtrength in order to Piety: enlightens Souls with the light of knowledge: purges the thoughts: chaſes away devills: cures the ſick: heals the diſeaſed: brings back the wanderers [into the way:] comforts the afflicted: erects thoſe that ſtumble and fall: refreſhes thoſe that labour: encourages with ſhouts thoſe that ſtrive: emboldens thoſe that are fearfull: is the Guardian and Overſeer of all men: takes all imaginable care, and makes proviſion for the promotion [or acceſs] of the well minded, and for the preſervation of the more faithfull. Further, We Believe in that Reſurrection which ſhall be [effected] by our Saviour; [to wit] of thoſe very Bodies which have been diſſolved, together with their proper members and particles: when nothing ſhall be wanting or changed, of thoſe things which compoſed every mans body in this preſent life. Moreover, [We Believe] the Judgment which ſhall be after this, of thoſe things which have been ill-thought or acted; and likewiſe of all the works, words, actions, practiſes, conceptions of the mind, and thoughts which have hapned in this preſent life: ſo that nothing at all, whether of the greateſt matters, or of the leaſt, ſhall be concealed: nothing of thoſe things, which have been legally done, or unjuſtly perpetrated, ſhall be neglected or overlookt: but a proportionate and juſt ſentence ſhall be given [or meaſured out.] And thoſe that have continued impious and ſinners to the end [of their lives,] ſhall be ſent away to an endleſs puniſhment. But ſuch as have led Holy and righteous lives, ſhall be taken up to an eternall life. Theſe are our Sentiments, which we have learned from the Saints, and thus we think and believe. We have omitted nothing of what we have learned, on account of ſhame, or out of fear. Nor have we by reaſon of turpitude or contentiouſneſs made any additions thereto, or perverted any thing therein. Neither are we conſcious to our ſelves of any ſuch falſity or deteſtable impiety as is framed againſt us by thoſe Sycophants, or ſlanderers; Whoſe damnation is juſt.

[b] Τὰς ἐκδόσεις τῶν παλαιῶν. Christophorson renders these word thus: the forms of the Creed delivered by the Ancients. Epiphanius Scholasticus thus: the traditions of the Ancients. I like neither Version. For Socrates means the Books of the Ancient Doctors of the Church; and more especially the interpretations of Sacred Scripture put forth by them. 'Tis certain, what he terms ἐκδόσεις [Expositions] here, he does a little after call τὰς βίβλους τῶν παλαιῶν, the Books of the Ancients. Wherefore I have here chosen to render it Expositions, as Musculus does. For, what Socrates here calls ἐκδόσεις, a little lower he terms ἀρχαίων ἔκθεσιν, the Exposition of the Ancients. Vales.

[c] Instead of [μεταρμοσάντων, accommodated,] it must undoubtedly be [μεταμπαύλων, flourished.] Which emendation is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus: for thus he renders it: De Antiquis Ecclesiæ Doctoribus, qui ante divisionem floruissent, concerning the Ancient Doctors of the Church who flourished before the division. Vales.

That this is the confeſſion of Faith, which was delivered by Eunomius to Theodoſius, in the month June, on the ſecond Conſulate of Merobaudes which he bore which Saturninus; is evident from theſe words which occur at the beginning of this confeſſion; to wit, ἐπὶ τῆς βασιλικῶν προσταγμάτων ταυτὴν ὁπωσδήποτε τῷ ὁμολογίαν, and whereas the Imperial commands do require this confeſſion. Valeſ.

The Emperour gave them a very kind reception at their meeting: and having received a Draught of the Creed in writing from every one of them, retired into a private apartment alone, where he prayed with much fervency, that God would give him his aſſiſtance, in order to an Election of the Truth. And having read over every one of the written Draughts of the Creed, he tore all the reſt, (diſapproving of them, in regard they introduced a ſeparation of the Trinity) except the Homoöuſian Creed only, which he commended and embraced. This was the reaſon of the Novatians flouriſhing again, [and of their being permitted] to celebrate their ſacred aſſemblies within the Cities. For the Emperour, admiring their conſent as to the Faith, [f] with thoſe of his own opinion, gave command by [the promulgation of] a Law, that they ſhould ſecurely enjoy their own Oratories; and that their Churches ſhould have the ſame priviledges with [g] thoſe [Churches] of his own Faith. But, the Prelates of the other Sects, by reaſon of their diſagreement amongſt themſelves, were condemned and deſpiſed even by their own diſciples. And being reduced to a deſperation, and overwhelmed with grief, they made their departure: and wrote Conſolatory Letters to thoſe of their own party, perſwading them not to be troubled, becauſe many relinquiſhed them, and became adherents to the Homoöuſian Creed. For many [they ſaid] were called, but few choſen. Which expreſſion they in no wiſe made uſe of, at ſuch time as the greateſt part of the people [*] through force and fear became their favourers. But neither were the profeſſours of the Homoöuſian Creed perfectly free from trouble and diſquietude. For the affairs of the Antiochian Church cauſed a diviſion amongſt thoſe that were preſent at the Synod. For, the Egyptians, Arabians, and Cypriots [†] gathering together again, ſaid that Flavianus ought to be expelled out of Antioch. But [the Biſhops] of Paleſtine, Phœnice, and Syria ſtood up in defence of Flavianus. What concluſion this affair had, I will declare in its due place.

[f] Inſtead of [περὶ τῶν ἰδικείως, about thoſe of his own opinion,] it muſt be thus mended [πρὸς τῶν ἰδικείως, with, or to thoſe of his own opinion.] The ſame errour occurs before in this chapter; where he ſays, ἄλλοι γὰρ ἄλλως εἶχον πρὸς τὰ βιβλία τῶν παλαιῶν; which we have corrected by rendring it thus: For ſome were one way affected towards the Books of the Ancients, others another. Valeſ.

[*] Ἐκ δυναστείας· perhaps he means the Imperial power; for Conſtantius and Valens were great favourers of theſe Sects.

GRATIANUS VALEN. Jun. THEODOSIUS

Justina (mother to Valentinianus Augustus,) a woman that was an Arian, during her Husbands life, had no power to be mischievous towards the Embracers of the Homoousian Creed. But after [her husbands death,] when her Son was very young, she went to Millain, and raised great disturbances against Ambrosius the Bishop, issuing out an Order that he should be banished. And whilest the people made a resistance [against this Order,] out of their excessive love to Ambrosius, and opposed those that endeavoured to hale him away into Exile; in that interim news came, that Gratianus was treacherously slain by the Tyrant Maximus. For Andragathius Maximus's Lieutenant (being hid in a Carriage put into the form of a womans Horse-litter, and carried by Mules; and having given the Guards a Command, that they should before-hand spread abroad a report, that the Emperour Gratianus's Wife was in that Litter;) meets the Emperour before Lyons a City in France, passing the River. The Emperour supposing it to be his Wife, was not aware of the Treachery: but, as a blind man does into a ditch, fell into the hands of his Enemie. For Andragathius leapt out of the Litter on a Sudden, and slew Gratianus. Gratianus therefore ended his life in the Consulate of * Merobaudes and Saturninus, after he had Reigned fifteen years, and lived twenty four. This accident cool'd the Emperours Mothers heat against Ambrosius. Moreover, Valentinianus, though against his will, complyed with the necessity of that juncture, and admitted Maximus to be his Colleague in the Empire. At which time Probus, afraid of Maximus's power, resolves upon a retreat into those parts of the Empire nearer to the East. Immediately therefore he departs out of Italy; and arriving in Illyricum, he fixt his Residence [b] in Thessalonica [a City] of Macedonia.

* Or, Merogaudus.

[b] I will here propose my doubt to the Reader. I am of opinion therefore, that Thessalonica, which was the chief City of Macedonia, was under Theodosius's Empire. My reasons are; (1.) because Theodosius, after he had been Proclaimed Augustus by Gratianus at Sirmium, went to Thessalonica, resided there a long while, and received the Embassies of the Cities of the East: and when he fell sick, he was baptized by Acholius Bishop of that City, as Zosimus, Prosper, Socrates, and others do relate. (2.) During his Residence in that City, he published many Laws, which are extant in the Theodosian Code, in the Titles de fide Catholica, and de Hæreticis; which Laws are dated at Thessalonica. (3.) Lastly, in the Constantinopolitan Synod, at which 'tis manifest the Eastern Bishops only were present, Acholius Bishop of Thessalonica is reckoned, as may be seen in the eighth chapter of this book. After Theodosius's times, there is no doubt but Thessalonica was under the Eastern Emperours. For 'twas the chief City of the Oriental Illyricum, which contained Macedonia and Dacia, as we are informed from The Notitia of the Roman Empire. But, whether or no it was under the Eastern Emperours, about the beginning of Theodosius's Reign; may deservedly be doubted. For Aurelius Victor, and Zonaras do expressly affirm, that Gratianus gave Theodosius only the East and the Thracia's. And Zosimus relates, that Valentinianus Junior (upon his division of the Empire with his Brother,) had Italy, Africk, and Illyricum. Neither had Constantius, or Valens (who governed the Eastern Empire before Theodosius) Illyricum under their Dominion. In the times of Valens, 'tis certain, Mamertinus Præfect of the Prætorium, Governed Italy, Africa, and Illyricum at the same time; as Amm. Marcellinus attests. Notwithstanding, Valens (after his Brother Valentinianus's death) seems to have annext Macedonia and Dacia to his own Empire, by the consent of his Brother's Sons, Which Collection I make from the close of Amm. Marcellinus's thirty first book: where he says, that Valens's Souldiers and Palatines, who had been besieged by the Goths at Adrianople, went out after that Siege was broken up, and hastned some into Dacia, others into Macedonia; supposing that Valens had retired thither. See Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 468. Edit. Par. 1636. Vales.

VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

CHAP. XII.

That the Emperour Theodosius having provided a numerous Army against Maximus, (at which time Flaccilla bore him his Son Honorius;) left Arcadius at Constantinople: but went himself to Millain, where he came to an Engagement with the Tyrant.

But the Emperour Theodosius was extreamly full of care and sollicitude; and formed a very powerfull Army against the Tyrant; being afraid lest he should treacherously murder Valentinianus Junior also. At the same time arrived Embassadours from the Persians, requesting Peace of the Emperour. Moreover, then also a Son was born to the Emperour, named Honorius, of whom his Wife Flaccilla was delivered, in the Consulate of * Richomeres and Clearchus, on the ninth of September. In the same Consulate died Agelius Bishop of the Novatians, a little before [Honorius's birth.] On the year following, whereon Arcadius Augustus bore his first Consulate with Bauton, Timotheus Bishop of Alexandria ended his life, who was succeeded in that See by Theophilus. A year after this, Demophilus Bishop of the Arian Heresie, concluded his life. The Arians sent for one Marinus, a Bishop of their own Heresie, out of Thracia, whom they entrusted with the Bishoprick. But Marinus sate [Bishop] not long. For under him the Arian Sect was divided into two parties, as we shall declare hereafter. Wherefore they sent for Dorotheus out of Antioch in Syria, and constituted him their Bishop. In the interim, the Emperour proceeded to a War against Maximus, and left his Son Arcadius Augustus at Constantinople. Arriving at Thessalonica, he finds [a] Valentinianus and those about him in great sadness and anxiety, because out of necessity they had admitted the Tyrant to be Emperour as it were. But Theodosius, in outward appearance, gave no indication of his mind [in favour of either side.] For he neither [b] rejected, nor admitted Maximus's Embassy. But he could not endure the sight of a Tyrannical Government over the Romans, covered with the specious pretence of an Imperial name. Having therefore Mustered his Military Forces, he marcht to [c] Millain. For thither Maximus was already come.

* Or, Richomelius.

[a] The phrase is τοὺς περὶ βαλεντινιανόν which Christophorson renders ill, thus, Valentinian's Souldiers. For Socrates means Valentinian himself who was on this year (when Valentinian himself was the third time Consul, with Eutropius,) conquered by Maximus, (as Sulpitius informs us, in his first book concerning the life of Martinus) and together with his mother Justina, his Præfects and Comites, fled to Thessalonica. Vales.

[b] But Zosimus says, that Maximus's Embassy was received by Theodosius; and that he acknowledged him to be Emperour, and admitted of his Statues: and ordered Cynegius Præfect of the Prætorium in the East, that Maximus's Statues should be proposed to publick view at Alexandria, and that he should declare to the people that Maximus was Colleague of his Empire. Which thing Sigonius (in his book de Occidentali Imperio) has done ill to place on the year of Christ 384, when Richomeres and Clearchus were Consuls; in regard it was done in Valentinianus's third Consulate, which he bore with Eutropius, on the year of Christ 387. For, on this year Cynegius was Præfect of the Prætorium. Vales.

[c] He should rather have said Aquileia. For thither Maximus went, as Zosimus and the other Chronologers do inform us. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the disturbance raised at Constantinople by the Arians.

About the same time that the Emperour was busied in the War, the Arians in Constantinople raised a disturbance, by this Artifice. 'Tis usual usual with * men to frame stories of things they are ignorant of. And if at any time they have gotten an occasion, they spread greater Rumours concerning the things they have a mind to, being always extreamly desirous of changes and alterations. This was the case of Constantinople at that time. For some framed and divulged one thing concerning the War which was waged at that great distance, others another; always presuming upon the worst event of affairs. And when nothing of action had hapned in the War, as if themselves had been Spectatours upon the very Spot, they discoursed concerning things which they knew not: [to wit,] that the Tyrant had gotten a victory over the Emperours Army, that thus many were slain on this side, and so many on that; and that the Emperour was just upon falling into the Tyrants hands. Then the Arians, at that time highly incensed, (for they were sorely vext, because those that had been persecuted by them heretofore, were now in possession of the Churches within the City:) began to enlarge the Reports. But afterwards, some of the stories that were told, induced even the Coyners themselves of these false rumours to believe, that the reports they had framed and divulged, were not feigned, but undoubtedly true. For, such persons as had taken them up upon here-say, affirmed to the authours of these lies, that the account of affairs was exactly agreeable to what they had heard from themselves. Whereupon, the Arians became emboldened, brake out into an irrational violence; threw fire into the Pallace of Nectarius the Bishop, and burnt it. This was done in Theodosius's second Consulate, [which he bore] with Cynegius.

* This Character does well befit too many persons of our own nation at this juncture.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the Emperour Theodosius's Victory, and the Tyrant's overthrow.

BUt whilest the Emperour was upon his March towards the Tyrant, the Forces under Maximus's Command, informed of the great Military preparations, could not so much as resist an assault of the fame thereof; but, being put into a consternation, bound the Tyrant, and delivered him to the Emperour. He was slain in the same Consulate, on the [a] twenty seventh of August. But Andragathius (he that slew Gratianus with his own hand,) after he understood that Maximus was routed, cast himself into the adjacent River, and was drowned. Then, both the Victorious Emperours made their Entry into Rome. Honorius, Theodosius's Son, a child very young, was with them. For after Maximus was vanquished, his Father sent for him from Constantinople. They continued therefore at Rome, celebrating their triumphal Festivals.

[a] Socrates is mistaken. For Maximus was slain, not on the 27th of August, but on the 28th of July, as Idatius says in his Chronicon. The same is recorded in those Fasti, which Jacobus Sirmondus has published under Idatius's name. For, these are the words there: Theodosio Aug. II. & Cynegio Coss. &c. In the second Consulate of Theodosius Augustus [which he bore] with Cynegius, on that year, Maximus the Tyrant that publick Enemy, is slain by Theodosius Augustus, three miles from Aquileia, on the fifth of the Calends of August [that is, on the 28th of July] Also, his Son Victor is slain a few days after, in the Gallia's, by Theodosius's Comes. Further, this Victor had been created first Cæsar, and then Augustus, by his Father; as we are informed from this Old Inscription recorded by Sigonius, in his 9th book, de Occidentali Imperio: DD. NN. MAG. CL. MAXIMO, ET FL. VICTORI PIIS FELICIBUS SEMPER AUGUSTIS BONO R. P. NATIS. Where you see Maximus has two Prænomina, to wit, Magnus Clemens. Sulpitius Severus (book 2. Histor. Sacr.) calls him Clemens Maximus. But, by Orosius he is termed Magnus Maximus. Vales.

At which time Theodosius the Emperour shewed a signal instance of his goodness and clemency, towards [b] Symmachus a person that had been Consul. For, this Symmachus was the eminentest person of the Senate at Rome, and was admired for his great skill in the Roman Literature. There are now extant many orations of his written in the Latine tongue. But, in regard he had composed an Oration in praise of Maximus whilest he was alive, and had spoken it to him in publick; he was afterwards charged with the crime of high-treason. Upon this account he was afraid of a capital punishment, and took sanctuary in the Church. But the Emperour had so great a Reverence for the Christian Religion, that he not only highly honoured the Prelates of his own Faith; but gave a gratious reception to the Novatians also, who embraced the Homoöusian Creed. Therefore, that he might gratifie Leontius Bishop of the Novatian Church at Rome, he pardoned Symmachus's crime. Symmachus having his pardon granted him, wrote an Apologetick to the Emperour Theodosius. Thus this War, which at the beginning seemed to threaten [the Empire] with great calamity, was terminated by this sudden conclusion.

VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

[b] Here is a mistake, either of Socrates, or of his transcribers; in calling Symmachus ἀνδρὸς ὑπάτου, a person that had born the Consulate. For Symmachus whose Epistles are extant at this day, had not at that time been Consul; but three years after he bore a Consulate with Tatianus. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning Flavianus of Antioch.

AT the same time, these affairs were transacted [a] at Antioch in Syria. After the death of Paulinus, the people who had been his followers, had an aversion for Flavianus. Upon which account they caused Evagrius to be ordained Bishop of their own party. He having not long survived his Ordination, no other person was afterwards constituted in his place; which was effected by the diligence and endeavours of Flavianus. Notwithstanding those that had an aversion for Flavianus, in regard he had violated his * Oath, kept their assemblies apart by themselves. But Flavianus left no stone unturned, (as the saying is,) that he might bring these persons also to own a subjection to him. Which he effected soon after, [to wit,] when he had appeased the anger of Theophilus then Bishop of Alexandria, by whose intercession Flavianus procured a reconciliation also with Damasus Bishop of Rome. For both these Prelates had been incensed against Flavianus, not only on account of his perjury, but also in regard he had given an occasion of a separation amongst that people who had been brought to an † agreement. Theophilus therefore being pacified, sent Isidorus a Presbyter, and reconciled Damasus, as yet offended; telling him, 'twas very conducive for the effecting an union amongst the people, to pass by the fault which Flavianus had committed. Communion being after this manner restored to Flavianus; the people of Antioch were within a small space of time reduced to a reconciliation. Such was the conclusion of this affair at Antioch. For the Arians in that city were ejected out of the Churches, and had their meetings in the Suburbs thereof. Moreover, in this interim died Cyrillus Bishop of Jerusalem, who was succeeded by Johannes.

[a] Instead of [περὶ τὴν συρίας ἀντιόχειαν, about Antioch in Syria] I had rather word it thus [ἐν τῇ συρίας ἀντιόχειαν, at Antioch in Syria.] Vales.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning the demoliſhment of the Idol Temples at Alexandria; and concerning the Fight betwixt the Pagans and Chriſtians, which happened on that account.

AT the very ſame time, this diſturbance alſo hapned at Alexandria. By the ſolicitation of Theophilus the Biſhop, the Emperour iſſued forth an Order, for the demoliſhment of the Heathen Temples at Alexandria; and gave command, that this Order ſhould be put in execution by Theophilus's care. Theophilus being thus empowered, uſed his utmoſt endeavours in order to the expoſing the Heathen Myſteries to ignominy and contempt. He cleanſed Mithra's Temple, and deſtroyed that belonging to Serapis. He alſo expoſed to publick view the bloudy Myſteries of the * Mithreum. And ſhewed how full of ridiculouſneſs the Myſteries of Serapis, and of the other Gods, were; ordering that the † Priapus's ſhould be carried through the midſt of the Forum. The Heathens at Alexandria, more eſpecially thoſe that profeſt Philoſophy, upon ſight of the doing hereof, were unable to repreſs their diſcontent: but made an addition to the * former tragick actions which they had perpetrated. For, upon a ſign given which they had agreed on before-hand, they made an unanimous aſſault upon the Chriſtians, and murthered every one they met: moreover, the Chriſtians defended themſelves; and thus miſchief was attended with miſchief. This Fight was continued ſo long, till a ſatiety of ſlaughter put an end to it. Few of the Heathens were deſtroyed in this Conflict: but of the Chriſtians [there fell] a great many. The wounded on both ſides were innumerable. After the perpetration of this Action, a fear ſeized the Heathens, who dreaded the Emperours anger. Wherefore, having done what they pleaſed, and ſatiated their minds with ſlaughters, they abſconded, ſome in one place, others in another. Moreover, many of them fled from Alexandria, and diſperſed themſelves into ſeveral Cities. Amongſt which number were the two Grammarians, [a] Helladius and Ammonius; whoſe Scholar I was at Conſtantinople, when very young. Helladius was ſtiled Jupiters Prieſt: Ammonius was † Simius's. This miſchief being thus compoſed, the [b] Præfect of Alexandria, and the Commander in chief of the Milice in Egypt, aſſiſted Theophilus in demoliſhing the Heathen Temples.

* That is, Mithra's Temple: what theſe Myſteries were, Socrates has told us, book 3. chap. 2.

† Pieces of wood made in faſhion of a mans privities.

[a] Some exceptions of this Helladius the Grammarian, are extant in Photius's Bibliotheca. Valeſ.

† Πιθήκης; that is, The Ape's Prieſt. For the Egyptians worſhip an Ape, as Lucian tells us, in his piece, περὶ θυσιῶν.

[b] Sozomen (book 7. chap. 15.) calls this Præfects name Evagrius: and the Commander in chief of the Milice in Egypt, he names Romanus. Eunapius likewiſe (in the Life of Ædeſius,) names both theſe perſons; and atteſts, that they gave a great aſſiſtance to Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria, in deſtroying the Temple of Serapis. I will inſert Eunapius's own words here, becauſe they want correcting; (See Eunap. in vitâ Ædeſii, pag. 63. Edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1616:) Καὶ τὸν μὲν τὸν Κανώβου ἱερὸν ταῦτὸ τοῦτο ἔπαθον, Θεοδοσίου μὲν τότε Βασιλεύοντος, Θεοφίλου δὲ τοῦ ταράττοντος τὰ ἐκείνων ἀνθρώπων; πνὸς εὑρομένου τοῦτο; ὃς πυθ' ὑπερθύμου μοίρης γενέσθαι Εὐρυμέδοντος; That is, the Temples about the City Canobus underwent the ſame thing, Theodoſius being at that time Emperour, and Theophilus Preſiding over thoſe execrable perſons; he was a certain Eurymidon, that reigned over the haughty Gyants. Evetius being then Governour of the Civill affairs: and Romanus intruſted with the Command of the Milice throughout Egypt. On my peril, correct it thus: Εὐαγρίου δὲ τῶν πολιτικῶν ἀρχόντος, Evagrius being then Governour of the Civill affairs. In the Theodoſian Code, (title, De Paganis,) there is a Law extant of Theodoſius's, directed to this Evagrius Præfect of Egypt, and to Romanus Comes of the Milice throughout Egypt; which Law was dated at Aquileia, in the Conſulate of Tatianus and Symmachus. From which Law it may be concluded, that Serapis's Temple was demoliſhed at Alexandria, in the year of Chriſt 391. But Marcellinus, in his Chronicon, contradicts this; and ſays this Temple was deſtroyed when Timaſius and Promotus were Conſuls; which was the year of Chriſt 389. And this, in my judgment, is the truer. For Cynegius Præfect of the Prætorium, at his being ſent into Egypt, had a command from Theodoſius, that he ſhould pull down the Heathen Temples; as Zoſimus relates in his firſt book. And he had executed that command, as Idatius atteſts in his Faſti. Now, Cynegius died in his own Conſulate, on the year of Chriſt 388. Valeſ.

The Temples therefore were ruined, but the Images of their Gods were molten into Caldrons, and into other utenſills neceſſary for the Alexandrian Church; the Emperour having given [the Images of] the Heathen Gods [to that Church,] for the relief of the poor. Wherefore Theophilus brake in pieces all [the Images of] the Gods, ſave one, to wit, the Image of the fore-mentioned God, which he ordered to be preſerved unmelted, and cauſed it to be ſet up in a publick place; leaſt (ſaid he) the Heathens ſhould in ages to come deny, that they had been worſhippers of ſuch Gods. At which action [of Theophilus's,] Ammonius the Grammarian was, to my knowledge, highly diſguſted: for he was wont to ſay, that the Religion of the Gentiles had ſuffered moſt horrid abuſes, [c] becauſe but one Image only was not melted down; but was preſerved meerly to render Gentiliſm ridiculous. ut Helladius made his boaſts in ſome perſons hearing, that in the Conflict he had ſlain nine men with his own hand. Such were the doings in Alexandria at that time.

[c] Inſtead of [ἵνα μὴ χῇ] it ſhould be [ὅτι μὴ χῇ becauſe but, &c.] Socrates means the Image of their God Similus, which Theophilus had ordered to be reſerved on purpoſe. And thus Epiphan. Scholaſticus has explained this place in Socrates; much better then Chriſtophorſon; who underſtood thoſe words of Socrates [τῶνδε τῶν θεῶν] as ſpoken concerning a certain (or rather uncertain) God. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning the Hieroglyphical Letters found in the Temple of Serapis.

[MOreover,] at ſuch time as Serapis's Temple was rifled and demoliſhed, there were Letters found [in it,] ingraven on ſtones; [a] which [Letters] they call Hieroglyphical. Theſe Characters had the forms and reſemblances of croſſes. When the Chriſtians and Heathens ſaw theſe Characters, each party * adapted them to their own Religion. For the Chriſtians, who affirm that the Croſs is the ſigne of Chriſts ſalutary Paſſion, thought this Character was properly and peculiarly theirs. The Heathens alledged it was ſome thing [that belonged in] common both to Chriſt, and to Serapis: for, a Character [ſaid they] made in form of a Croſs, betokens one thing amongſt the Chriſtians, another amongſt the Heathens.

* Fitted, or applied.

[a] Inſtead of [τὰ καλούμενα ἱερογλυφικὰ, called an Hieroglyphick;] it ought rather to be thus written [τὰ καλούμενα ἱερογλυφικὰ, which [Letters] they call Hieroglyphical:] ſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus ſeems, to have read. Indeed, Socrates and Sozomen do relate, that theſe Hieroglyphical Letters were found in the Temple of Serapis, cut upon the walls thereof. But Rufinus does not ſay they were found there: he tells us rather, that they were kept and expounded at Canopus. At his 2d book, Eccleſ. Hiſtor. chap. 26; theſe are his words: Jam vero Canopi quis enumeret ſuperſtitioſa flagitia? &c. But now, who can enumerate the ſuperſtitious impieties at Canopus? Where, under a prætext of their ſacerdotal Letters, (for ſo they call the ancient Letters of the Egyptians;) there was in a manner a publick School of Magick Art. Valeſ.

VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

Whileſt theſe things were controverted amongſt them, ſome of the Heathens (who were converted to the Chriſtian Religion,) having skill in theſe Hieroglyphical Letters, gave an interpretation of the Character made in form of a Croſs, and ſaid it ſignified Life to come. This the Chriſtians took hold of with much earneſtneſs, as being more advantageous to their Religion in particular; and were not a little proud of it. [b] But after it had been manifeſted by other Hieroglyphicall Letters, that Serapis's Temple would have an end, when a Character in form of a Croſs ſhould appear; (for thereby was ſignified Life to come:) then many more came over to the Chriſtian Religion, and after a Confeſſion of their ſins were baptized. This is a relation of what hapned upon account of the Character [that was diſcovered,] made in form of a Croſs; which relation I had from report. But, I am not of opinion, that the Egyptian Prieſts foreknew what ſhould happen to Chriſt, and therefore cauſed the figure of a Croſs to be ingraven on ſtones. For, if the Myſtery of [our Saviours] coming into the world were hid from Ages, and from Generations, as the Apoſtle * ſays; and if the Devill himſelf, the Prince of wickedneſs, knew nothing of it; 'twas much more unknown to his Miniſters, to wit, the Egyptian Prieſts. But divine providence deſigned the ſame thing ſhould happen at the enquiry made into this Character, which he had heretofore demonſtrated in the Apoſtle Paul's [Preaching.] For he, inſpired with wiſedom by the divine Spirit, made uſe of the ſame method towards the Athenians, and brought many of them over to the Faith [of Chriſt;] at ſuch time as he read the * inſcription upon [one of their] altars, and adapted it to his own diſcourſe. Unleſs any one ſhould perhaps ſay, that the word of God had the ſame operation upon the Egyptian Prieſts, that it had on Balaam and Caiaphas. For thoſe † two perſons (though they did it contrary to their will and knowledge,) uttered propheſies concerning good things. But, let thus much be ſaid concerning theſe things.

[b] Socrates borrowed this out of Rufinus's 2d book, Eccleſ. Hiſtor. chap. 29. He apprehended not Rufinus's meaning. For Rufinus ſays not, that it was predicted to the Pagans by other Sacerdotal Letters, that Serapis's Temple would then be deſtroyed, when that ſign of the Croſs ſhould appear: he only ſays, that the Egyptians received this as a tradition from their Anceſtours, to wit, that the Temples wherein they then worſhipped, ſhould ſtand ſo long, till that ſign ſhould come, wherein there was Life.

† See Numb. 24. & John. 11. 51.

But, becauſe mention is here made of Serapis's worſhip, and of the Letters found in his Temple; nothing hinders, but we may here explain, (in favour of the ſtudious) an Old Epigram concerning Serapis, which is recorded by Euſebius in his books de Demonſtratione Evangelicâ. For it contains both the manner how this God was worſhipped by the Egyptians; and beſides, Scaliger underſtood it not, in his Animadverſions on Euſebius, Number 1730. The Epigram therefore runs thus:

Ἑπτά με φωνήεντα θεὸν μέγαν ἄφθιτον αἰνεῖ
Γράμματα, τ' πάντων ἀκάματον πάτερα·

That is,

The ſeven Vowells do my praiſe reſound,
Who am the Great, Immortal Deity,
Th' unwearied Father of the Univerſe.

You muſt know, that the Egyptian Prieſts were wont to praiſe their God Serapis in no other manner, than by a recitation now and then of the ſeven Greek Vowells. Therefore, inſtead of Hymns and Songs, the Pipe and Harp; the ſound of the ſeven Vowells was heard in Serapis's Temple. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis does atteſt this, in his book περὶ ἐμμνείας, in the chapter de Colliſione Vocalium. Where after he has informed us, that the Colliſion of the Vowells is not ſo much to be avoided, in regard it ſometimes produces a pleaſant noiſe; he adds theſe words: ἐν αἰγύπτῳ δὲ καὶ πού θεὸς ὑμνῶσι διὰ μιᾶς ἑπτὰ φωνήεντων οἱ ἱερεῖς, &c. Moreover, in Egypt the Prieſts ſing praiſes to the Gods by [repeating] the ſeven Vowells, ſounding them out one after the other. And, inſtead of the Pipe and Harp, the ſound of theſe Letters is heard. Elias Vinetus (in his notes at Auſonius's eighteenth Epiſtle,) does declare that he had ſeen an old inſcription, which was found upon a golden plate, fixt on the breaſt of a dead body. This plate contained the ſeven Greek Vowells, repeated in ſeven Verſes, in ſuch order as you may ſee there. But I doubt not, but there were ſeven other Verſes on the reverſe of the ſaid plate, in the ſame order with thoſe on the foreſide. To wit, in ſuch a manner that the ſecond Verſe of the reverſe ſide began with Omicron, the fourth with Upſilon, the ſixth with Omega. Vinetus could not explain this Riddle. In my judgment Serapis's name is denoted by theſe Letters; which God (as Heſychius atteſts) was called Ἑπταγράμματον, not only becauſe there are ſeven Letters contained in his name, but in regard he was uſually praiſed by the ſeven Vowells. Now, it was an uſage amongſt the ſuperſtitious Heathens to engrave Serapis's name upon a brazen plate, and wear it hung about their necks in form of a Buckler. Artemidorus (book 4.) gives us an account of this uſage, in theſe words: ἔδοξέ τις τὸ ὄνομα τῦ σεραπιδ ἐγγεγραμμένον λεπίδι χαλκῇ περὶ τ τράχηλον δεδέσθαι, ὥσπερεὶ σκυτάλιν. Valeſ.

In what order the ſeven Greek Vowells were placed on the foreſide of this golden plate; the Learned Reader may ſee in Vinetus's notes on the 18th Epiſtle of Auſonius, written to Tetradius; Edit. Burdigal. 1590.

CHAP. XVIII.

That the Emperour Theodoſius, during his ſtay in Rome, did a great deal of good to that City, both by demoliſhing thoſe Receptacles for Thieves in the Bake-houſes, and alſo [by prohibiting] the obſcene [uſe] of Bells in the Stews.

MOreover, the Emperour Theodoſius, during his ſhort ſtay in Italy, was in many inſtances highly beneficiall to the City of Rome, partly by his donation of ſome things, and partly by his abrogating others. For his donations were many and great: and he * regulated two villanous and moſt infamous abuſes [frequently practiſed in] that City. The one whereof was this. There were in the † great City Rome houſes of a vaſt bigneſs and largneſs, long ſince [built,] wherein the bread was made which was diſtributed amongſt the Citizens. The Maſters of theſe houſes (whom the Romans in their language term [a] Mancipes,) in proceſs of time turned theſe Edifices into Receptacles for Thieves. For, in regard the Bake-houſes in theſe buildings were ſituated under ground; at the ſide of each of theſe Structures they built Victualling houſes, they were [Maneipati] bound to the Colledge of Bakers, and to the Trade of making Bread: and their goods and families were obnoxious to this Function. See the eighteenth Law of the Theodoſian Code de Piſtoribus. In which Law, they are the Decuriales, (concerning whom I have made ſeveral remarks in my notes on Amm. Marcel.) who were of the Decuriæ of the City of Rome. Theſe Officers had the cuſtody of all the publick Acts and Monuments; eſpecially the ſentences of Judges, Contracts, Adoptions, and the like. On which account (as Caſſiodorus tells us, book 5. Epiſt. 21,) the quiet and ſecurity of all men, and the publick Faith was kept in their Desks. There was over all theſe a Rector of the Decuriæ; concerning whoſe Office ſee Caſſiodorus, book 5. Epiſt. 21, 22. But, to return to the Mancipes; it is obſervable, that in the fore-mentioned Law the Function of the Mancipes or Bakers is termed Mancipatus. So alſo it is called in that One Law in the Theodoſian Code de Mancipibus: which Law was publiſhed at Rome by Theodoſius, in the Conſulate of Timaſius and Promotus; at the ſame time that theſe things (which Socrates here relates) were done. See Meurſius's Gloſſary in the word μαγκιπεῖον. It is further to be remarkt, that thoſe Conſtitutions made at Rome by Theodoſius (which Socrates treats of in this chapter, and places after the Emperours Victory over the Tyrant Maximus,) are by Cedrenus placed after Theodoſius's Victory over the Tyrant Eugenius. But Cedrenus's words (you will meet with this paſſage in Cedrenus, at pag. 266, Edit. Baſil.) are corrupt, which I mend thus: μετὰ δὲ τὸν νίκην τύτε εἰσελθὼν ἐν ῥώμῃ, πλεῖστον τῇ πόλει ἐχαρίσατο, καὶ τὰ ἐν τοῖς μαγκιπείοις κτ [in the fore-mentioned Edition of Cedrenus the word κτ againſt is omitted] πλῆθος ἐμπρόσθεν τῶν ξένων [in Cedrenus, inſtead of ξένων ſtrangers, it is ζῴων living creatures:] ἄχει γήρως τοῖς μύλωσι συγκλειομένοις, καὶ ἀλήθειν καταφρόμοις ἐποίησε; that is, making his Entry into Rome after his Victory over this perſon [Eugenius,] he did a great deal of good to that City, and aboliſhed what [had been uſually done] in the Bake-houſes againſt ſtrangers that fell in thither, whom they ſhut up in the Bake-houſes till they became aged, and forced them to grind. The Authour of this emendation in Cedrenus, is Theophanes, who alſo relates this fact of Theodoſius's, after his Victory over Eugenius. Concerning theſe Mancipes there is an eminent paſſage extant in the Excerptions of Joannes Lydus de Menſibus Græcorum, in the month March. Valeſ.

wherein they proſtituted Whores, by which device they * trapanned many perſons; ſome going in thither to ſupply themſelves with food, others to ſatisfie their libidinous and filthy deſires. For, by a certain Engin [purpoſely made on that account] they were † conveyed from the Victualling houſe down into the Bake-houſe. This trick was chiefly put upon ſtrangers that ſojourned at Rome. Such as were after this manner trapan'd, they forced to work in the Bake-houſes. In which places many continued till they were grown old; being not permitted to go out, and their relations taking it for granted that they were dead. One of the Emperour Theodoſius's Souldiers fell into this ſnare. But after the Souldier was ſhut up in the Bake-houſe, and not ſuffered to go out, he drew a Dagger that he had, and killed thoſe that oppoſed [his eſcape.] The reſt of them, affrighted at what had happened, let the Souldier go out. The Emperour having had notice hereof, puniſhed the Mancipes, and gave order that thoſe houſes, which were Receptacles for Thieves, ſhould be pulled down. This was one of the ignominious practiſes, from which the Emperour freed the Imperial City. Another was of this ſort. If a woman were taken in adultery, they puniſhed the delinquent, not with ſuch a ſort of puniſhment as might make her better, but in ſuch a manner rather as ſhould aggravate her offence. For they ſhut her up in a narrow Brothel-houſe, and forced her to play the whore in a moſt impudent manner. And, during the time of performing that moſt unclean act, they cauſed little [b] Bells to be rung, to the end that what was done [within] might not be concealed from thoſe who paſſed by; but that that ignominious puniſhment ſhould be made known to all people by the ſound of the Bells rung. When the Emperour had information of this impudent uſage, he would by no means tollerate it: but commanded thoſe Siſtra (for by that name theſe Stews were called,) to be pulled down; and gave order that women taken in adultery, ſhould be * puniſhed by other Laws. From theſe two moſt wicked and reproachfull † uſages, the Emperour Theodoſius freed the City of Rome. Who, after he had well ſettled all other affairs, left Valentinianus Junior Emperour at Rome. But he himſelf, together with his Son Honorius, returned to Conſtantinople, and entred that City in the Conſulate of Tatianus and Symmachus, on the tenth of November.

[b] I can ſcarce believe, that the Romans inflicted this ſort of puniſhment upon adultereſſes. For, after Conſtantine's time, they always puniſht adultery with a capital puniſhment. We are informed hereof from the Emperours Laws extant in Both the Codes, Tit. ad Legem Juliam de Adulteriis. I omit the teſtimony of Amm. Marcellinus, book 28. Further, any one may conjecture, that thoſe little Bells, mentioned here by Socrates were not found out to puniſh adultereſſes; but were commonly made uſe of by all whores who proſtituting themſelves in their Cells, by this ſign called Travellers unto them. Concerning which cuſtome Dio Caſſius (in the Fragments of his 79th book, which I have ſome time ſince publiſhed,) ſpeaks theſe words: ὁ δὲ τέλος, ἐν τῷ παλατίῳ οἴκημά τι ἀποδείξας, &c. In fine, having made a Cell within the Pallace, he acted his lechery therein, ſtanding naked before the door thereof, as whores uſually do, ſhaking his ſhirt which was hung up with golden rings, and with a ſoft, delicate, and broken voice, inviting his companions to him. Valeſ. Theſe words Dion Caſſius ſpeaks of Avitus or Heliogabalus, Emperour of Rome; the Learned Reader will find this paſſage, at pag. 912. Edit. Hanov. 1606.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning the Penitentiary Presbyters, how [theſe Officers in the Church] were at that time put down.

ABout the ſame time it was judged requiſite to extinguiſh [the Office of] thoſe Preſbyters in the Churches, whoſe charge it was to overſee Penitents: [which was done] upon this account. [a] From ſuch time as the Novatians made a ſeparation of themſelves from the Church, becauſe they were unwilling to communicate with thoſe that had Lapſed in the Perſecution under Decius; the Biſhops added a Presbyter, who was to have the charge of penitency, to the [b] Canon of the Churches; to the intent that by the Fathers during the firſt and pureſt times, reformed open Tranſgreſſours, by putting them into Offices of open penitence, eſpecially Confeſſion, whereby they declared their own crimes in the hearing of the whole Church, and were not from the time of their firſt convention capable of the holy Myſteries of Chriſt, till they had ſolemnly diſcharged this duty. During which times, offenders in ſecret alſo, knowing themſelves altogether as unworthy of admiſſion to the Lords Table, as the other who were withheld; and being perſwaded, that if the Church did direct them in the Offices of their penitency, and aſſiſt them with publick prayer, they ſhould more eaſily attain what they ſought, than by truſting wholly to their own endeavours; Laſtly, having no impediment to ſtay them from it but baſhfullneſs, which countervailed not the fore-mentioned inducements; and beſides, was greatly eaſed by that good conſtruction, which the charity of thoſe times gave to ſuch actions, (wherein mens piety and voluntary care to be reconciled to God purchaſed them much more love, than their faults were able to procure diſgrace;) theſe Offenders in ſecret, I ſay, were not nicè to uſe ſome one of Gods Miniſters, by whom the reſt might take notice of their faults, preſcribe them convenient remedies, and in the end, after publick confeſſion, all joyn in prayer to God for them. But, as profeſſours of Chriſtianity grew more numerous, ſo they waxed worſe; when perſecution ceaſed, the Church immediately became ſubject to thoſe miſchiefs, that are the product of peace and ſecurity; to wit, Schiſms, Diſcords, Diſſentions, &c: faults were not corrected in charity, but noted with delight, and treaſured up for malice to make uſe of, when the deadlieſt opportunities ſhould be offered. Whereupon, in regard publick confeſſions became dangerous and prejudicial to the ſafety of well minded men, and in diverſe reſpects advantageous to the Enemies of God's Church; it ſeemed firſt unto ſome, and afterwards generally requiſite, that voluntary penitents ſhould ceaſe from open confeſſion. Inſtead whereof, private and ſecret confeſſion was uſually practiſed, as well in the Latine, as in the Greek Church. The cauſe why the Latins made this change of publick confeſſion into private, Leo the Great declares, in his Decretall Epiſtles, Epiſt. 80, ad Univerſos Epiſcopos per Campaniam &c. pag. 148, 149. Edit Lugd. 1633. This alteration was made in the Greek Church, about ſuch time as the Hereſie of the Novatianiſts had its original, (which is our Socrates's Sentiment here, and is very probable;) upon this occaſion. The Church reſolving (contrary to the opinion of Novatus, or rather Novatianus, and his followers; concerning which, ſee Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſtor, book 6. chap. 43.) to admit the Lapſed in the Decian perſecution to communion, and judging it fit, that before that their admiſſion, they (and all other voluntary penitents in future) ſhould do pennance and make confeſſion in private only; (to the end that the Novatianiſts might not take occaſion at the multitude of publick penitents, of inſulting over the diſcipline of the Church, as they uſually had done, and did:) conſtituted in every Church a Penitentiary Presbyter: whoſe Office it was, to take the confeſſions and appoint the pennances of ſecret offenders. So that, if penitents in ſecret, being guilty of crimes whereby they knew they had made themſelves unfit Gueſts for the Table of our Lord, did ſeek direction for their better performance of that which ſhould ſet them clear; it was in this caſe the Penitentiarie's duty to take their confeſſions, to adviſe them the beſt way he could for their ſouls good, to admoniſh them, to counſell them; but not to lay upon them more than private pennance. As for notorious wicked perſons, whoſe crimes were known; to convict, judge, and puniſh them, was the Office of the Eccleſiaſtical Conſiſtory; Penitentiaries had their inſtitution to another end. This Office of the Penitentiary was continued in the Greek Church for the ſpace of above ſome hundred years; till Nectarius, and the Biſhops of Churches under him begun a ſecond alteration, aboliſhing even that confeſſion which their Penitentiaries took in private, upon that occaſion which Socrates mentions here in this chapter. VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

[a] The courſe of diſcipline in relation to penetency, as it was practiſed

[b] In Rob. Stephens Edit. the reading is οἱ ὁπίσκοποι τὸν ἐκκλησίων κανόνι τὸν πρεσβύτερον τὸν ἐπὶ τῆς μετανοίας προσέθεσαν, The Biſhops added a Presbyter, who was to have the charge of penitency, to the Canon of the Churches. In the Sfortian M. S. the reading is [τῷ ἐκκλησιαστικῷ κανόνι, to the Eccleſiaſtick Canon;] which reading Epiphanius Scholaſticus and Nicephorus found in their copies, as appears by the Verſion of the firſt, and the Greek Text of the ſecond. Which two Authours took Canon to ſignifie a Rule or Eccleſiaſtick Decree. Petavius, in his notes on Epiphanius, pag. 242, took theſe words of Socrates in ſuch a ſenſe, as if the import of them were, that the Biſhops, by publiſhing of a Canon then newly found out, added a Presbyter who ſhould take charge of the penitents; which opinion of his he confirms by theſe following words of Socrates: ὅτῳ ὁ κανὼν, &c. this Canon is in force to this day amongſt other Hereſies; where the term Canon is manifeſtly taken for a Rule and Decree. But Valeſius is not of Petavius's opinion. His reaſons are, (1) The propriety of the Greek tongue admits not of this ſenſe. (2) If a new Canon were then made concerning the inſtitution of a Penitentiary Presbyter, he queries, where, and in what Councill it was publiſhed. Valeſius's Sentiment therefore is, that the term Canon is here to be taken for the Matricula, or Roll of Eccleſiaſtick Officers belonging to the Church. In which ſenſe, he ſays, tis taken in the 2 Can. Concil. Chalcedon. pag. 112 Edit. Beveredg. where (tis true) it muſt be taken in a more comprehenſive ſenſe, than to ſignifie the Clerus only; that is, thoſe who are ordained by impoſition of hands: becauſe the Fathers in that Canon ſpeak of all the Eccleſiaſtick Officers, ſuch as were the Oeconomi, the Defenſores, the Manſionarii, &c. concerning whom ſee Dr Beveredge's Notes, pag. 109. But, whether it is to be uſed in this ſenſe here, I determine not; let the Learned judge.

ſuch perſons as had ſinned after Baptiſm, might make a confeſſion of their crimes [c] before this Presbyter inſtituted for that purpoſe. This Canon is in force to this day amongſt other Hereſies. Only the Homoöuſians, and (who embraced the ſame Sentiments with them, as to the Faith,) the Novatians, have refuſed [making uſe of] the Penitentiary Presbyter. For the Novatians admitted not of this *additional Function at its firſt inſtitution. But [the Homoöuſians] who are at this preſent in poſſeſſion of the Churches, after they had retained [the Office of the Penitentiaries] for a † long time, abrogated it in the times of Nectarius the Biſhop, on account of this accident which hapned in the [Conſtantinopolitan] Church. There came a [d] Gentlewoman to the Penitentiarie [of the Church of Conſtantinople; to whom] ſhe made particular confeſſion of thoſe ſins, which ſhe had committed after Baptiſm. The Presbyter adviſed the woman to faſt, and pray continually, that together with her confeſſion, ſhe might have ſome [e] work alſo worthy of Repentance to ſhew. [f] Some time after this the woman detected her ſelf of another crime. For ſhe confeſſed that a Deacon of that Church had lain with her. Upon her diſcovery hereof, the Deacon was ejected out of the Church: and the [g] people were in a kind of tumult diſturbed. For they were not only offended at what was done, but alſo becauſe that fact had brought an infamy and diſgrace upon the Church. When therefore Eccleſiaſtick perſons were reproacht upon this account, one Eudæmon a Presbyter of that Church, by birth an Alexandrian, adviſed Nectarius the Biſhop, to [h] aboliſh the Penitentiary Persbyters [Office;] and to leave every perſon to his own conſcience, for the participation of the [Holy] Myſteries: VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

[c] What the courſe of diſcipline in relation to penitency was, as it was practiſed by the Fathers during the firſt and pureſt times, before Penitentiaries were inſtituted; we have declared at note (a.) in this chapter,

[e] Valeſius ſays here, he can't be induced to believe, that this Gentlewoman did publick pennance. His reaſons for this are (1) Women were very rarely compelled to do publick pennance, the Church being indulgent towards the modeſty of Matrons. (2) Nothing occurs at this paſſage, which may make us think this Matron's pennance was publick. (3) in regard ſhe is injoyned to faſt and pray continually; that may be underſtood of private ſatisfaction, which ſhe performed at home and in ſecret. To which reaſons of Valeſius's, a fourth may be added, drawn from the Penitentiaries Office: which was to take the Confeſſions of ſecret penitents, to adviſe them the beſt way he could for their ſouls health, to admoniſh and councel them, but not to lay on them more than private pennance. See note (a) in this chapter.

[f] In the original, 'tis thus expreſt, ἡ δὲ γυνὴ μεθυβάινσα· μεθυβάινσα has the ſame import here with μετὰ ταῦτα, That is, in proceſs of time, or ſome time after this. For Socrates's meaning is, that this was the womans ſecond confeſſion. Which is confirmed by Nicephorus, and Sozomen; who (in his Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 7. chap. 16,) words this paſſage thus; τῆς χάριν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ διατελέσασα, &c. Whileſt ſhe made her abode in the Church upon this account, [to wit, of performing the pennance injoyned her by the Penitentiary,] ſhe confeſſed that ſhe had been debaucht by a Deacon. It may alſo not unfitly be thus: ἡ δὲ γυνὴ μεθυβάινσα, &c. But the woman came to [the Penitentiary,] and detected, &c. Valeſ.

[g] Here ariſes a difficulty, to wit, how this fact could come to the peoples knowledge, if the womans confeſſion were ſecret? How alſo the Biſhop could know this wicked fact, who degraded the Deacon on account thereof? My Sentiment is, that the Penitentiary-Presbyter, to whom the woman had confeſſed this impious act, firſt ſent for the Deacon, reproving him before the woman, and forced him to a confeſſion of his crime: then, he made a report of the whole matter to Nectarius the Biſhop, by whom he had been ſet over the penitents: and whoſe deputy he was in that Office. For the Penitentiary heard confeſſions only, and enjoyned pennances. But the Biſhop himſelf reconciled penitents. Nor ought any one to make this objection, viz. if we admit what you have ſaid to be true, it follows that the ſecrets of confeſſion may be diſcovered. I deny that conſequence. For the Penitentiary-Presbyter made known the Deacon's wickedneſs only to the Biſhop; the Matron's name he concealed. Further, the Deacon's degradation does plainly confirm what I have aſſerted. For Nectarius the Biſhop could not have depoſed him, had he not had intimation from the Penitentiary, who had detected the Deacon of whoredom. Valeſ.

[h] The Learned Reader muſt have obſerved, that there is nothing wherein the Romaniſts do more diſagree amongſt themſelves, than in their accounts of this fact of Nectarius. Petavius (in his notes on Epiphanius, pag. 243,) does maintaine, that Nectarius abrogated publick pennance only, but continued confeſſion, that is private confeſſion; for publick, he ſays, was never in uſe in the Church. Valeſius (in his note at this place) does aſſert, that neither confeſſion, nor pennance were aboliſhed by Nectarius; but that the Biſhop removed this particular Penitentiary-Presbyter only, and that but for a time, becauſe of the diſcontented people's indignation. One John Haſſelius, (who is mentioned by Pamelius, in his 98th note on Saint Cyprian's Treatiſe de Lapſis,) worte a book on purpoſe to ſhew that Nectarius did but put the Penitentiary from his Office, and abrogated not the Office it ſelf. But all theſe aſſertions are palpably contradicted (1) by the whole advice which Eudæmon gives Nectarius in this chapter, to wit, of leaving the people from that time forward to their own conſciences; (2) by the conference between our Socrates and Eudæmon, which follows in this chapter; wherein complaint is made of ſome inconvenience which the want of this Office would breed: (3) by that which the Hiſtory declares concerning other Churches, who did as Nectarius had done before them, not in deposing the ſame man (for that was impoſſible) but in removing the ſame Office out of their Churches, which Nectarius had abrogated in his. All theſe particulars are evident from this chapter in Socrates; with whom Sozomen (book 7. chap. 16.) agrees, and adds further that mоſtly in Mr Hookers own words. Which incomparable Authour, in the forecited book of his Eccleſ. Politie, has by unexceptionable authorities made it evident, (whatever the Learned Reader may find ſaid to the contrary by Baronius at the year of Chriſt 56, by Petavius in his Diatriba about this point which occurs at pag. 225, of his notes on Epiphanius, or by Bellarmine:) that the ancient ἐξομολόγησις, or confeſſion, which the Primitives uſe to ſpeak of in the exerciſe of repentance, was made openly in the hearing of the whole both Eccleſiaſtical Conſiſtory and aſſembly. After the inſtitution of Penitentiary Presbyters in every Church, this publick confeſſion was abrogated; and ſuch as were guilty of crimes, confeſſed them not ὀπὶ τῷ λαῷ, in the preſence of the people, but (as Socrates here ſays) ἐπὶ τῷ μεθυβληθέντι τῷ πρεσβυτέρῳ, before this Presbyter inſtituted for that purpoſe. The ſame is confirmed by Sozomen, book 7. chap. 16. where he tells us, how a Presbyter Elected to the Office of a Penitentiary, was to be qualified. One of his qualifications was, that he ought to be ἐγκέμυθος, a perſon that could hold his tongue: by which 'tis plain, that the confeſſions made to him were private, and to be kept concealed.

* That is, the Office of the Penitentiary. For theſe Hereticks admitted no perſon to their communion upon any repentance, who was once known to have ſinned after Baptiſm: ſee Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 6. chap. 43. which practiſe of theirs, how fair ſoever their pretence might ſeem, made ſinners not the fewer, but the cloſer, and the more obdurate.

† To wit, from the Perſecution under the Emperour Decius, till after the Election of Nectarius to the Epiſcopate of Conſtantinople.

[d] Valeſius, in his note here, ſtarts this query; whether the confeſſion made by this Gentlewoman were publick, or private? In order to the anſwering whereof, he remarks, that ſhe confeſt twice before the Penitentiary. At her firſt confeſſion, ſhe made known all her ſins; whereupon ſhe is adviſed to continue in faſting and prayer. At her ſecond, ſhe diſcovered her having been debaucht by the Deacon. Theſe two confeſſions (continues Valeſius,) were different both in time and manner. The firſt was of all her faults κατὰ μέρος, particularly (as Socrates words it;) the ſecond was of one crime only. All which may perhaps be true. After this remark made, Valeſius concludes both theſe confeſſions to have been ſecret; which (ſays he) is apparent from theſe two reaſons (1) becauſe publick confeſſion was never in uſe in the Church: (2) in regard Socrates ſays, that this woman accuſed not her ſelf before the people, but before the Penitentiary. Valeſius's firſt reaſon appears evidently falſe, not only from Mr Hookers words quoted before, and the unqueſtionable authorities he there produces to prove what he aſſerts; but from a paſſage in Sozomen book 7. chap. 16. where that Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorian, (giving reaſons of the alteration which the Grecians made, by abrogating publick confeſſion, and inſtituting Penitentiaries throughout all Churches to take the confeſſions and appoint the penances of ſecret offenders,) aſſignes this for one: φορτικὸν, ὡς εἰκὸς, ἔξ ἀρχῆς τοῖς ἱερεῦσιν ἔδοξεν, &c. It did from the beginning deſervedly ſeem burthenſome to the Prieſts, that ſins ſhould be declared before the whole congregation of the Church as witneſſes, in a Theatre as it were; from which words 'tis evident that publick confeſſion was once in faſhion in the Church. Valeſius's ſecond reaſon we have before cleared and confirmed by the joynt Teſtimony of Socrates and Sozomen. See note (c.)

that in his time (he lived in the reign of the Younger Theodosius,) the same abolition did still continue, and that the Bishops had in a manner every where followed the example given them by Nectarius. But, though the Romanists differ (as you see) in their Sentiments about this fact of Nectarius's: yet they all unanimously agree in this, to wit, that Nectarius did not abrogate Auricular Confession. The reason of their consent in this assertion is plain: should it be acknowledged, that Nectarius did abrogate Auricular (or private) Confession, (as 'tis evident he did, from the attestation both of Socrates and Sozomen,) it would enforce them to grant, that the Greek Church at that time held not Confession, as the Latine Church now doth, to be the part of a Sacrament instituted by our Saviour Jesus Christ, which therefore the Church till the worlds end hath no power to alter. See Mr Hookers Eccles. Politie, pag. 343, &c. Edit. Lond. 1666.

VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

For this [in his judgment] was the only way of freeing the Church from obloquie and disgrace. I my self having heard these words from Eudæmon, have taken the boldness to insert them into this my History. For, as I have often said, I have used my utmost care and industry, to procure an account of affairs from those that knew them best; and to make accurate researches into them, lest I should record any passage which is untrue. But my answer to Eudæmon [when he told me hereof] first, was this; [i] Whether your advice, O Presbyter! hath been for the Churches good, or otherwise, God knoweth. But I see that it has given an occasion, of our not reprehending one anothers faults any more, nor of our observing that Apostolick Precept, which saith, [*] have no fellowship with the unfruitfull works of darkness, but rather reprove them. But, let thus much be sufficient to have been said concerning these things.

[i] From this answer of Socrates's to Eudæmon, 'tis apparent, that Nectarius's abolition of the Penitentiary-Presbyter's Office, displeased our Socrates.

* Ephes. 5. 11.

Whence we may evidently conclude, (what ever Baronius and Petavius have said to the contrary, at the places before quoted) that our Socrates was no Novatianist. For, had he embraced that Heresie, he would doubtless never have found fault with that Sanction of Nectarius's, whereby he abrogated the Penitentiary: nor would he have doubted to pronounce these words concerning the advice Eudæmon suggested to Nectarius, to wit, whether it were usefull or hurtfull to the Church: for the Novatians never admitted either of penitency, or of the Penitentiary-Presbyter. Besides, Socrates in this place terms the assembly of the Homoousians barely and simply The Church: which he would questionless never have done, had he been a follower of the Novatian Heresie. Vales.

CHAP. XX.

That there were [at that time] many Schisms amongst the Arians, and other Hereticks.

But I think it fit, not to leave unmentioned those things also which hapned amongst others, I mean the Arians, Novatians, and those who had their denominations from Macedonius and Eunomius. For the Church being divided, rested not in that division once made. But turning again, came to an engagement one with another; and taking hold of a small and frivolous pretence, raised mutual separations and divisions. Now, in what manner, when, and for what reasons, each party were the Authours of dissentions amongst themselves, we will manifest in the procedure of our History. But this you must know, that the Emperour Theodosius persecuted none of them, except Eunomius: who holding his meetings in private houses at Constantinople, and reciting the books he had written, was by the Emperours order sent into banishment, in regard he corrupted many persons with his doctrine. But the Emperour molested none of the other [Hereticks,] nor did he force them to a communion with himself. But permitted every one of them to meet at their private Conventicles, and to entertain such Sentiments concerning the Christian Faith, as every of them * could attain to in their conceptions thereof. He gave the other Hereticks a Licence of building themselves Oratories without the Cities. But ordered, that the Novatians, (in regard they embraced the same Sentiments with himself, as to the Faith,) should without any fear continue in their Churches within the Cities, as I have said before. Concerning whom I judge it opportune to relate some passages, and shall make a short repetition of what has been said before.

VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

* Or, could comprehend in their opinion thereof.

CHAP. XXI.

That the Novatians also disagreed amongst themselves.

Agelius Presided over the Church of the Novatians at Constantinople during the space of fourty years, from the times of Constantine untill the sixth year of the Emperour Theodosius, as I have * somewhere related before. Being near his death, he ordains Sisinnius to succeed him in his Bishoprick. He was a Presbyter of that Church over which Agelius Presided; a person of great eloquence, and had been instructed in Philosophy by Maximus the Philosopher at the same time [that he read to] the Emperour Julian. But when the Novatian Congregation found fault with this Ordination, because [Agelius] had not rather ordained Marcianus, a person of an eminent piety, by † whose interest the Novatians had continued unmolested during Valens's Reign; Agelius, desirous to appease the people's discontent, ordained Marcianus also: and being somewhat recovered from his distemper, he went into the Church, and spake these words to the people on his own account: After my decease, (saies he) take Marcianus [for your Bishop,] and after Marcianus, Sisinnius. Having survived these words a small time, he ended his life. Marcianus therefore being constituted Bishop over the Novatians, there arose a division in their Church also, upon this account. One Sabbatius, (a person that had turned Christian from being a Jew,) being by Marcianus promoted to the dignity of a Presbyter, continued notwithstanding a zealous promoter of Judaism, wherewith he had been leavened before. Moreover, he was extreamly ambitious of being made a Bishop. Having therefore procured two Presbyters (Theoctistus and Macarius, who were privy to his ambitious design,) to be his Assistants, he took a resolution of defending that innovation [made by the Novatians] in Valens's Reign, concerning the Festival of Easter, at Pazum a Village in Phrygia; which I have mentioned || before. And first of all, under pretence of [following] an Ascetick and more austere course of life, he secretly withdrew from the Church, saying that he was aggrieved upon the account of some persons; in regard he had a suspicion, that they were unworthy of a participation of the * Mysteries. But in process of time his design was discovered, to wit, that his desire was to hold private and separate meetings. When Marcianus understood this, he himself complained of his own mistake in ordaining, to wit, because he had promoted persons so ambitious of vainglory to the † Presbyterate. And being grieved, did frequently use to say, that it had been better he had laid his hands on thorns, than when he preferred Sabbatius to the dignity of a Presbyter.

VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

Moreover, * he procured a Synod of Novatian Biſhops to be convened at [a] Sangarum; which is a Mart-Town in Bithynia, lying near Helenopolis. [The Biſhops] being convened there, ſent for Sabbatius, and ordered him to ſet forth before the Synod the reaſons of his grief. Upon his affirming, that the diſſention about [the obſervation] of the Feaſt [of Eaſter] was the cauſe of his being troubled, (for it ought [as he ſaid] to be kept in the ſame manner that the Jews obſerved it, and agreeable to that Sanction which thoſe convened at Pazum promulged:) the Biſhops preſent at the Synod, having a ſuſpition, that Sabbatius pretended all this on account of his being deſirous of a Biſhoprick, bound him with an oath, that he ſhould never accept of a Biſhoprick. When he had ſworn to this, they publiſhed a * Rule concerning the Feaſt of Eaſter, to which Canon they gave this Title, † Adiaphoros: affirming that a diſagreement about the Feſtival [of Eaſter] was not a ſufficient reaſon for a ſeparation from the Church; and that thoſe convened at Pazum did no prejudice to the Catholick and univerſal Rule. For, the Ancients [they ſaid,] and thoſe who lived neareſt the Apoſtles times, although they differed in the obſervation of this Feſtival, yet communicated one with another, and in no wiſe raiſed any diſſention [on that account.] Beſides, the Novatians [they added,] who inhabit the Imperial City Rome, never followed the Jewiſh uſage; but always kept Eaſter after the Æquinox; and yet they ſeparated not from thoſe of their own Faith, who obſerved not the Feaſt of Eaſter after the ſame manner that they themſelves did. Upon theſe and many ſuch like mature conſiderations, they made that Indifferent Canon (which I have mentioned) concerning Eaſter: whereby it was left to every ones arbitrement, to celebrate Eaſter according to that uſage which by a prejudicate opinion he had embraced: and that there ſhould be no diſſention in relation to communion, but that thoſe who celebrated that Feſtival after a different manner, ſhould notwithſtanding continue in the unity and agreement of the Church. This Rule therefore concerning the Feaſt of Eaſter: having at that time been conſtituted and confirmed by them; Sabbatius being bound by his oath, (if at any time there hapned any diſcrepancy in the celebration of the Feaſt of Eaſter,) himſelf anticipated the Faſt by keeping it in private by himſelf, [b] and having watched all night, he celebrated the ſolemn day of the Sabbath of the Paſſover. And again, on the day following, he came to the Church at ſuch time as the whole congregation were aſſembled there, and together with them partook of the Myſteries. This he did for many years: and therefore could not avoid being taken notice of by the multitude. Upon which account ſome of the ſimpler ſort of people, more eſpecially the Phrygians and Galatians, thinking they ſhould be juſtified by this fact, imitated Sabbatius, and kept the Paſſover in ſecret agreeable to his faſhion. But ſome time after this, Sabbatius diſregarding his oath, held Schiſmatical Meetings by himſelf, and was conſtituted Biſhop over thoſe that were his own followers, as we ſhall manifeſt in the procedure of our Hiſtory.

† That is, Indifferent.

[b] This place is corrupted; nor is this fault of a ſhort ſtanding. For, even in Epiphanius Scholaſticus's age, this miſtake had crept into the copies of Socrates, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For Epiphanius renders it thus: Cum hæc ab eis tunc fuiſſet regula definita, &c. When this determination had at that time been made by them, Sabbatius bound by his oath, (if at any time there hapned any diſcrepancy in the Paſchal ſolemnity,) faſted by himſelf, and by night celebrated the ſolemn day of the Paſſover on the Sabbath; and again, met with the whole congregation in the Church, and partook of the Myſteries. Chriſtopherſon has expreſt the ſame ſenſe in his Verſion. Nicephorus alſo (Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 12. chap. 31,) has followed the ſame ſenſe. For he ſays, that Sabbatius, (as often as the Chriſtians differed from the Jews in the celebration of Eaſter,) was wont to faſt in private by himſelf, and to celebrate the Paſſover on the Paſchal-Sabbath about evening, after the Jewiſh manner. Then on the Sunday following, after the Solemn Vigills, his uſage was to celebrate Eaſter with the reſt of the Chriſtians, or rather Novatians. But this interpretation does in no wiſe pleaſe me. For thus Sabbatius (as often as the Jewiſh Paſſover differed from the Chriſtian-Paſchal-Feaſt,) could not have celebrated the firſt Paſchal-ſolemnity with the Jews. Then, if Sabbatius always celebrated the firſt Paſchal-ſolemnity on the Sabbath day at evening after the Jewiſh manner, how is it poſſible, that he could celebrate the Solemn Vigills in the Church on the ſame Sabbath-day? For this is atteſted in expreſs words by Socrates here, and by Sozomen, book 7. chap. 18. My Sentiment therefore is, that the words in this place of Socrates are tranſpoſed, and muſt be put into their Priſtine order after this manner: ὁ Σαββάτιος τοῖς ὅρκοις δεθεὶς, εἴ ποτε διαφωνημάτιόν ἐγίνετο ἢ περὶ τὰ πάσχα ἑορτὴ, αὐτὸς καθ' ἑαυτὸν ἐνήστευε, καὶ ἐπετέλει τὸ πάσχα. Καὶ νυκτερεύων τῷ νενομισμένην τῆς Σαββάτου ἡμέραν, πάλιν τῇ ἑξῆς ἅμα πᾶσι καὶ τῷ ἐκκλησίαν συνήγετο, καὶ τῶν μυστηρίων μετελάμβανε; that is, Sabbatius being bound by his oath, (if at any time a diſagreement hapned in the celebration of the Paſchal-Feſtival,) himſelf by way of anticipation faſted in private at home, and celebrated the Paſſover. And watching all night on the ſolemn day of the Sabbath, again on the next day he went to Church together with the reſt of the congregation, and partook of the myſteries. Sozomen does evidently confirm this our emendation, in his ſeventh book chap. 18; where he ſets forth the ſame thing much more clearly in theſe words: ἐξ ἐκείνου δὲ Σαββάτιος τοῖς ἰουδαίοις ἐπόμενος, &c. But from that time Sabbatius following the Jews, (unleſs it by chance hapned that all perſons [as well Chriſtians, as Jews] did celebrate the Feaſt [of Eaſter] at one and the ſame time,) faſted before hand, as the manner is, and celebrated the Paſchal ſolemnity in private by himſelf, according to the ſanctions [of the Moſaick Law.] But on the Sabbath, from the evening to a fit time, he continued watching and making the uſuall prayers, and on the day following met in the Church in common with the congregation, and partook of the myſteries. Sabbatius therefore kept the Paſchal ſolemnity twice in one and the ſame year; the firſt time with the Jews, the ſecond with the Chriſtians: unleſs it by chance hapned, that the Chriſtians agreed with the Jews in the time of celebrating the Paſchal Feaſt. Which could very rarely happen. Valeſ. Our Engliſh-rendition of this paſſage agrees with the Greek Text in Rob. Stephens's Edition, and that in this Edition of Valeſius's.

CHAP. XXII.

This Hiſtorian's Sentiment concerning the diſagreements which appear in ſome places, in relation to the Feaſt of Eaſter, Baptiſms, Faſts, Marriages, the order of celebrating the Euchariſt, and other Eccleſiaſtick Rites and Obſervances.

But, I think it not unſeaſonable to declare in ſhort what comes into my mind concerning Eaſter. Neither the Ancients, nor the Moderns who have ſtudiouſly followed the Jews, had in my judgment any juſt or rational cauſe of contending ſo much about this Feſtival. For they conſidered not with themſelves, that when the Jewiſh Religion was changed into Chriſtianity, thoſe accurate [obſervances] of the Moſaick Law, and the Types [of things future] wholly ceaſed. And this carries along with it its own demonſtration. For, no one of Chriſt's Laws has permitted the Chriſtians to obſerve the Rites of the Jews. Moreover, on the contrary, the Apoſtle has expreſly forbid this, and does not only reject Circumciſion, but alſo adviſes againſt contending about Feſtival days. Wherefore, in his Epiſtle to the Galatians, his words are theſe, * Tell me, ye that deſire to be under the Law, do ye not hear the Law? And having ſpent ſome few words in his diſcourſe hereof, he demonſtrates, that the people of the Jews are ſervants, but that thoſe who have † followed Chriſt are called to Liberty. Moreover, 'tis his admonition, that days and months and years ſhould in in no wise be observed. Besides, in his Epistle to the Colossians he does loudly affirm, that [such] observations are a shadow. Wherefore he says, * Let no man judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of any holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath-days; which are a shadow of things to come. And in the Epistle to the Hebrews, this very [Apostle] does confirm the same things in these words: † For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. The Apostle therefore, and the Gospels have no where imposed the yoak of servitude on those who have approached the Preaching [of the Faith:] but have left the Feast of Easter, and the other Festivals, to be honoured by their gratitude and benevolence, who have had benefits conferred upon them [on those days.] Wherefore, in regard men love Festivals, because thereon they have a cessation from their labours, each person in every place, according to his own pleasure, has by a certain custom celebrated the memory of the saving Passion. For neither our Saviour, nor his Apostles, have enjoyned us by any Law to observe this Festival. Nor have the Gospels or the Apostles threatned us with any mulct, punishment, or curse, as the Mosaick Law does the Jews. For, 'tis meerly for the History's sake, in order to [a publishing of] the reproach of the Jews, (because they polluted themselves with bloud on their very Festivals,) that it has been recorded in the Gospells that our Saviour suffered even on the days of unleavened bread. Moreover, it was not the Apostles design, to make Laws concerning Festival days, but to introduce good life and piety. And it seems to me, that, as many other things in several places have been established by custom, so the Feast of Easter also hath had a peculiar observation amongst all persons from some old usage, in regard none of the Apostles, as I have said, have made any determinate Decree about it. Now, that the observation of this Festival had its original amongst all men in the Primitive times from custom rather than Law, the things themselves do demonstrate. For, in Asia the Less, most people kept the fourteenth day of the Moon, disregarding the Sabbath day. And though this was their practise, yet they never made a separation from those who celebrated the Feast of Easter otherwise: till such time as Victor Bishop of Rome, over-much heated with anger, sent an * Excommunicatory Libell to the † Quartodecimani in Asia. For which fact Irenæus Bishop of Lyons in France severely reproved Victor by Letter; blaming him for his immoderate heat; and informing him, that although the Ancients differed in their celebration of the Feast of Easter, yet they did in no wise separate from a mutual communion. Also, that Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna, [a] who afterwards suffered Martyrdom under Gordianus, communicated with Anicetus Bishop of Rome, and made no separation from him on account of this Festival, although Polycarp himself, according to his own country usage [practised] in [the Church of] Smyrna, kept Easter on the fourteenth day of the Moon, as Eusebius says in the * Fifth Book of his Ecclesiastick History. Some therefore in Asia the Less, as I have said, kept the fourteenth day of the Moon. Others in the [b] Eastern parts, celebrated that Feast on the † Sunday indeed; but they differed concerning the month. Those [first mentioned] were of opinion, that the Jews were to be followed, although they observed not an exact Rule. [c] These celebrated Easter after the Æquinox, refusing to keep that Feast with the Jews. For they affirm that Easter must always be kept when the Sun is in Aries, on that month which the Antiochians term Xanthicus, and the Romans April. And in their practise hereof, they followed [as they affirmed] not the modern Jews who mistake almost in all things, but the Ancients of that Nation, and Josephus; agreeable whereto are the words of that Authour in his Third Book of the Jewish Antiquities. And thus these persons disagreed amongst themselves. But, all other [Christians] in the Western parts as far as the Ocean it self, are found to have celebrated Easter after the Æquinox, from a very ancient tradition. For all these persons keep it after this manner, and have never disagreed amongst themselves. Nor did the * Synod under Constantine alter this Festival, as [d] some have noysed it abroad. For Constantine himself writing to those persons who differed about this Festival, advised them, in regard they were but few, to become followers of those who exceeded them in number. You will find the Emperours Letter entire, in the Third Book of Eusebius's Life of Constantine. But that part of it [which treats] concerning the Feast of Easter, runs thus: ——* And since 'tis a decent Order, which all the Churches in the Western, Southern, and Northern parts of the world do observe; and some places also in the East. Upon which account, all persons have at present judged it good and right, (and We Our Self also have engaged it will please Your Prudence;) [to wit,] that what is observed with one concordant mind in the City of Rome, throughout Italy, Africa, all Egypt, Spaine, the Gallia's, the Britannia's, the Libya's, all Greece, the Asian and Pontick Diœcesis, and Cilicia; will willingly be embraced by Your Prudence also: which will attentively consider, not only that the number of Churches in the forenamed places is greater; but also, that 'tis most just and commendable, that all persons should chiefly and in common desire that, which

[a] But Socrates is mistaken. For Polycarp did not suffer Martyrdom in Gordianus's reign, but in that of Marcus Antoninus, as 'tis manifest from Eusebius, and other writers. 'Tis certain, that Irenæus does relate, (in his third book against Heresies, which piece he wrote during Eleutherius's presidency over the Roman Church, that is, in the times of Marcus Antoninus,) that Polycarp had at that time suffered Martyrdom. Wherefore these words [who afterwards suffered Martyrdom under Gordianus] are rather to be placed a little above, after these [Irenæus Bishop of Lyons in France.] For they are more accommodate to Irenæus, than to Polycarp. But let the prudent Reader determine hereof according to his own arbitrement. I know indeed, that in S[t] Benignus Divionensis's Chronicle, the Martyrdom of Irenæus Bishop of Lyons is placed before Polycarp's. For the Authour of that Chronicle does relate, that Irenæus, after his Martyrdom, appeared to Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna in his sleep, and commanded him to send Benignus into the Gallia's. But these are meer trifles. Vales.

† In the Greek 'tis on the Sabbath.

[b] He seems to mean the Syrians, Cilicians, and Mesopotamians, who kept Easter with the Jews before the Nicene Council, as Athanasius informs us, in his Epistle to the Africans, in these words: ἐπειδὴ ὅτι κατὰ συνέλευσιν, &c. in regard the Syrians, Cilicians, and Mesopotamians differ from us, and celebrate [Easter] at the same time that the Jews keep it. Those Eastern people therefore, concerning whom Socrates speaks, followed the Jews indeed, in that they observed the fourteenth day of the Moon of the first month before the Æquinox. But they celebrated not Easter on the same day whereon the Jews kept it, but on the Sunday following. Wherefore, Athanasius says, that they kept Easter at the same time with the Jews, but not on the same day; as his Translatour has ill rendred it. Vales.

[c] He means (I think) the Montanistæ, and Pepusiani, who kept Easter indeed after the Æquinox. But always fixt that Festival on the month Xanthicus or April, before the eight of the Ides (that is, the sixth day) of April; as Sozomen attests, book 7. chap. 18. Vales.

VALEN. Jun. THEODOSIUS

which strict reason seems to require; and [e] to have no society with the perjury of the Jews. Such is the Emperours Letter. Further, the Quartodecimani do affirm, that the observation of the fourteenth day of the Moon was delivered to them by John the Apostle. But the Romans, and those in the Western parts say, that the usage in force with them was delivered by the Apostles Peter and Paul. Notwithstanding, neither of these two parties can produce any written testimony in confirmation hereof. Moreover, that the Feast of Easter is kept in all places from some usage and custom, I do from hence conjecture. No Sect of Religion observes the same ceremonies, [f] although it embraces one and the same opinion concerning God. For they that are of the same Faith, differ amongst themselves concerning Rites. Wherefore, it will not be unseasonable to add a few words concerning the different usages of Churches. First therefore, you may find that the Fasts before Easter are observed one way by some, and in a manner different by others. [g] For they at Rome fast three continued weeks before Easter, excepting Saturdays and Sundays. The Inhabitants of Illyricum, those throughout all Achaia, and [h] they at Alexandria, observe a Fast of six weeks before Easter, which they [e] Instead of [ἔχει have,] the reading in the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. is [ἔχειν, to have] so it is in Eusebius; and so Epiphan. Scholasticus read, as appears by his Version. Vales.

[f] Instead of [καὶ πλὴν αὐτῶ τῷ περὶ τῶν ἡμερῶν δόξαν ἀσπάζηται,] in my judgment the reading should be [καὶ πλὴν αὐτῷ τῷ περὶ τῆ Θεῆ δόξαν ἀσπάζηται, although it embraces one and the same opinion concerning God.] Socrates's meaning is this; all Religions and Sects have different Rites and Ceremonies, although they entertain the same Sentiments concerning God. But the following words do plainly confirm our emendation. For Socrates adds, for they that are of the same Faith, &c. Nicephorus also favours this our amendment; for he has expresst this passage in Socrates thus: For though all men are of the same opinion, yet they observe not the same traditions throughout the Churches. Vales.

[g] Baronius, at the year of Christ 57 and 391, accuses Socrates of a double mistake; First, because he says that the Romans fasted three weeks only in Lent before Easter; Secondly, in regard he asserts, that in those three weeks, Saturdays were excepted, on which days the Romans fasted not. As to the first, Socrates's opinion is defended against Baronius, by Halloixius in his notes on the 11th chapter of Ireneus's Life, pag. 678. That which makes me incline to Socrates's opinion, is the authority of Cassiodorus, who in his Tripertite History has put this passage in Socrates into these words: Romani enim tres ante pascha Septimanas, præter Sabbatum & dominicam, sub continuatione jejunant, the Romans fast three weeks before Easter without intermission, except on Saturday and Sunday. Could Cassiodorus be ignorant of the custom of the Roman Church in the observation of the Lent Fast, who was himself a Senatour, Consul, and Præfectus Prætorio in the City of Rome? Who can believe he would have put these words of Socrates into his History, if he had known the thing had been otherwise? Doubtless, Cassiodorus, had he known this to have been false, would on purpose have omitted Socrates's words, lest he should leade his Reader into a mistake. Which in regard Cassiodorus has not done, but was resolved to have Socrates's testimony concerning the Romans Lent Fast read in the History which bears his name; from thence 'tis apparent, that what Socrates has said concerning the Romans Fast is true. In the Catholick Church, though the Lent Fast was always observed by all persons, yet they fasted not after one and the same manner, as Irenæus informs us in his Epistle to Victor Bishop of Rome; a considerable part whereof is quoted by Eusebius Eccles. Hist. book 5. chap. 24. wherefore Baronius is impertinent in opposing Socrates with the testimony of Gregorius Magnus. For the Romans fasted in Lent after one manner in Socrates's age, after another in the days of Gregory the Great. In the times of Pope Leo, with which Socrates was in a manner equall, the Romans fasted three days of the week only in Lent, to wit, on Munday, Wednesday, and Friday, as 'tis apparent from that Pope's Sermons concerning Lent. In the Roman Order I have in my judgment found a foottstep of that ancient Custom, which Socrates relates here. For, that Sunday of Lent vulgarly termed Dominica de passione Domini, is called Dominica Mediana; which name, 'tis said, was given it by command of the Roman See. Now, I see no other reason why it should be so termed, than, that of the three weeks wherein the Romans fasted in Lent, this was the second Sunday. Bede (in his Book concerning the Vernal Æquinox) relates, that in Italy some fasted twenty days, others seven. But now, what Socrates says concerning Saturday, may be truly defended. For in Pope Leo's age, the Romans fasted not on Saturdays in Lent; as 'tis apparent from the close of that Pope's fourth Sermon concerning Lent. Add hereto Bede's testimony, in his book de Officiis; where he relates, that most people fasted not in Lent on Thursdays and Saturdays. Vales.

[h] Sozomen attests the same, book 7. chap. 19. Moreover, the Alexandrians began the Lent Fast, not from the Sunday of the sixth week before Easter, (as Johannes Filesacus supposed, in the 7th chapter of his book concerning Lent,) but from the Munday which followed that Sunday. Therefore, the first Sunday of the Alexandrians Lent was the fifth Sunday before Easter. And this is manifestly asserted by Theophilus and Cyrillus, in their Homilies or Paschal Epistles. Which I wonder Filesacus perceived not, who produces Theophilus's testimony against himself. Vales.

term * the fourty days Fast. [i] Others in a different manner from them, begin their fast from the seventh week before Easter, and though they fast three five days only [part of three weeks,] and that by intervalls; yet nevertheless they also call that time the fourty days Fast. And I cannot but wonder, how these persons, (though they disagree about the number of the days, yet) should in common give it the same name, [to wit,] the fourty days fast. Of which appellation some assign one reason, others another, according to their particular fancies and humours. You likewise find several persons disagreeing not only [k] about the number of the days, but differing also in their abstinency from meats. For some abstain wholly from [eating of] living creatures: others, of all living creatures feed on fish only. Othersome, together with fish, eat fowl also; affirming, according to Moses's * words, that these were made likewise of the waters. Some abstain from all manner of fruits of trees, and from eggs. Others feed upon dry bread only: othersome eat not even this. Others, having fasted till the [l] ninth hour, [m] feed upon any sort of food whatever making no distinction. [n] Again, amongst other Nations, there are other usages: for which innumerable reasons are assigned. And in regard no one can produce a command in writing concerning this thing, 'tis manifest that the Apostles left every one to his own will and free choice in this case; to the end that no person might be compelled through fear or necessity, to the performance of what is good. Such is the disagreement throughout the Churches about their fastings. Nor is the variety [amongst them] less, [o] about their performances in their Religious Assemblies.

[m] In the Greek the reading here is [διάφορον ἔχουσι πλὴν ὄψεσιν, make use of a different sort of food:] but I am of opinion it should be [ἀδιάφορον ἔχουσι πλὴν ὄψεσιν, feed upon any sort of food without making any difference.] So Epiphanius Scholasticus read this place; for thus he renders it; alii usque ad nonam jejunantes horam, sine discrimine ciborum reficiuntur, others having fasted to the ninth hour, refresh themselves without making any difference about the sorts of food. Vales.

[n] After these words [Again, amongst other nations, there are other usages] Sr Henry Savill in his Manuscript had placed a Subdistinction, (that is, a single point, which Greek writers usually placed at the bottom of the Letter; See Valesius's Preface to his Edition of Eusebius:) but I had rather place a middle distinction (that is a Colon) here. Which is confirmed by Nicephorus, who has expresst this passage of Socrates thus: ἀλλαχοῦ δὲ ἄλλοις ἄλλοι νόμοις χρῶνται· ἐν οἷς καὶ μυεῖαι εἰσὶ πίστεων εἰσὶν; and there are other usages amongst other Nations and Tribes: amongst whom also there are infinite causes of such [customs] as these. Vales.

[o] Περὶ συναξέων. Synaxis is a word used by Christian Writers in several senses. (1) 'Tis sometimes a general term, and contains all things usually done in the Religious Assemblies of Christians; in which sence we suppose it to be taken here. (2) The celebration of the Lord's Supper is by a peculiar name termed Synaxis. (3) 'Tis used so as to signifie the Christian Conventions or Assemblies, without any respect had to the Eucharist. (4) Synaxis is sometimes expressly distinguished from the celebration of the Sacrament: in which sense our Socrates uses it a little lower in this chapter; where his words are these, πάντα τὰ συναξέως χάριτος, πλὴν τῆς ἁγίας μυστηρίων τελετῆς, and all things are performed which belong to the Church-Assembly, except the celebration of the Mysteries [or, the Eucharist.]

VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

For, though [almoſt] all Churches over the whole world do celebrate the Sacred Myſteries on the Sabbath day at the period of every week; yet the Alexandrians and they at Rome, on account of ſome ancient tradition, refuſe to practiſe this. The Egyptians who are neighbours to the Alexandrians, and the Inhabitants of Thebais, have their Religious Meetings on the Sabbath: notwithſtanding, they participate not of the Myſteries, in ſuch a manner as is uſual amongſt the Chriſtians. For after they have feaſted, and filled themſelves with all manner of victuals, in the evening they * offer, and partake of the Myſteries. Again, at Alexandria, on the † fourth Feria, and on that termed the ‖ Preparation day, the Scriptures are read, and the Doctours expound them; and all things are performed which belong to the Church Aſſembly, except the celebration of the Myſteries. And this is an uſage of great antiquity at Alexandria. For 'tis manifeſt that Origen moſt commonly taught in the Church on theſe days. Who, being a very Learned Doctor, and perceiving that the ſecret of the Moſaick Law was not to be expounded literally, reduced his diſcourſe concerning the paſſover to a Myſticall ſenſe; aſſerting that there had been one only true Paſſover, [to wit,] that which our Saviour celebrated, at ſuch time as being faſtned to his Croſs, he vanquiſhed the adverſe powers, making uſe of this Trophy againſt the Devill. In the ſame City Alexandria, as well the Catecumens, as the Faithfull, are without difference or diſtinction made Readers and [p] Pſalm ſetters, whereas in all other Churches, the Faithfull only are promoted to this dignity. [q] I my ſelf, when I was in Theſſaly, knew another cuſtom alſo. A Clergy-man in that Country (if after his taking Orders, he does lie with his wife, whom he had legally married before his being Ordained) is [r] degraded: whereas in the Eaſt all [Clergymen] [s] of their own accord do abſtain [from their wives,] even the Biſhops themſelves; notwithſtanding, they do this [voluntarily,] not by force or compulſion of a Law. For many of them, during even the time of their being Biſhops, have begotten children of a lawfull wife. Moreover, the Authour of this uſage in Theſſaly was Heliodorus, [Biſhop] of Trica in that Country, under whoſe name there are Love-Books extant, which he [t] compoſed when he was a young man, and entitled them Æthiopici. This ſame cuſtom is obſerved in Theſſalonica, in Macedonia, and in Achaia. I have alſo known another cuſtom in Theſſaly. They baptize there on the days of Eaſter only. Upon which account all of them, except a very few, die unbaptized. At that Antioch which is in Syria, the ſite of the Church is inverted. For the Altar * ſtands not towards the Eaſt, but towards the Weſt. In Achaia, at Jeruſalem, and in Theſſaly, they go to [u] Prayers when the Candles are lighted, in the ſame manner that the Novatians do at Conſtantinople. Likewiſe, at Cæſarea, in Cappadocia, and in Cyprus, on Saturdays and Sundays, always in the Evening, after the Candles are lighted, the Presbyters and Biſhops expound the Scriptures. Thoſe Novatians in the Helleſpont perform not their Prayers wholly after the ſame manner, with them who live at Conſtantinople: but they are [vv] in moſt things conform to [the uſages of] the Catholick Church.

p Ὑποδοχεῖς. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred this term very ill, thus, interpretes, Expounders. But Epiphanius tranſlates it Pſalmi Pronunciatores, Pronouncers [or Setters] of the Pſalm; which rendition is good. It ſeems to have been theſe perſons Office, to begin to ſing the firſt words of the Pſalm; and then the people ſang the reſt after them, Ὑποδοχεῖς were heretofore termed Monitores who prompted the Players whileſt they were Acting: they put the Actours in as oft as they forgot any paſſage in the Play, and were out. There were Monitores alſo in the prayers, of whom mention is made by Tertullian in his Apology; where he ſays, that the Chriſtians prayed without a Monitour, becauſe they prayed by heart. But Nicephorus at this place reads Ὑπογεγραφεῖς, Notaries; inſtead of Ὑποδοκεῖς, Monitours: which reading diſpleaſes me not. For the Biſhops had their Notaries, who were Learned young men. Thus Proclus is ſaid to have been Atticus's Notary, as Socrates atteſts, book 7. chap. 41. And long before that, Athanaſius was Notary to Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria, as Sozomen relates, book 2. chap. 17. In Pope Gelaſius's Decrees, cap. 2. amongſt the firſt Eccleſiaſtick degrees, the Lectores, Notarii, and Defenſores are reckoned. In Cæſarius Arelatenſis's Life, chap. 22. are theſe words: Lector aut Notarius coram illo non ceſſabat clamare, that is, the Reader or Notary ceaſed not to cry before him. In the Firſt Action of the Epheſine Synod, Epaphroditus is termed the Reader and Notary of Hellanicus Biſhop of the Rhodii. From all which authorities 'tis apparent, that the Notaric's and Reader's Office was in a manner the ſame; to wit, to read the Pſalms or other books of the Sacred Scripture, either in the Church, or in the Biſhops preſence. And this Simeon Metaphraſtes confirms, in the Acts of the Notaries Marcianus and Martyrius, which occur in Surius at the twenty fifth day of October. Theſe Notaries regiſtred the Acts which were made in the Church; on which account they ſeem to have had this name given them. In the Geſta Collationis inter Catholicos ac Donatiſtas, we meet with this Title: Excipientibus quoq; Januario & Vitale Notariis Eccleſiæ Catholicæ, Victore & Creſconio Notariis Eccleſiæ Donatiſtarum, &c. that is, alſo Januarius and Vitales Notaries of the Catholick Church, Victor and Creſconius Notaries of the Church of the Donatiſts, regiſtring [the Acts, &c.] There was over theſe a Primicerius Notariorum, [or the Chief of the Notaries,] who was uſually choſen out of the Presbyters, as we are informed from the firſt Action of the Epheſine Council, wherein Petrus Presbyter of Alexandria, and Primicerius of the Notaries, recites the Emperour Theodoſius's Edict to Cyrillus and the other Metropolitanes. But the chief duty of the Notaries was, to carry the Virge or Staff before the Biſhop, as 'tis related in the ſecond book concerning the Life and Miracles of Cæſarius Arelatenſis. Valeſ.

q In Rob. Stephens's Edition, this place is pointed thus: Ἔγνων δὲ ἐγὼ κὴ ἕτερον ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ, ῥωμαῖος ὢν κληρικὸς ἐκεῖ. I my ſelf knew another cuſtome alſo in Theſſaly, being made a Clergy-man there: If this punctation were true, it would follow, that Socrates was a Clergy-man in Theſſaly. But this is in no wiſe probable, in regard Socrates does every where ſtile himſelf Scholaſticus, that is, an Advocate. Wherefore, I doubt not but this place muſt be otherwiſe pointed, to wit, after this manner: Ἔγνων δὲ ἐγὼ κὴ ἕτερον ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ ῥωμαῖος· κληρικὸς ἐκεῖ, &c. I my ſelf when I was in Theſſaly knew another cuſtom alſo. A Clergy-man in that Country, &c. Notwithſtanding. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have followed another punctation here, to wit, this; Ἔγνων δὲ ἐγὼ κὴ ἕτερον ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ· ῥωμαῖος κληρικὸς ἐκεῖ, &c. I my ſelf knew another cuſtom alſo in Theſſaly. One being made a Clergy-man there, &c. Which diſtinction I can't approve of. For the term ῥωμαῖος would be ſuperfluous, and the word γίνεσθαι would be too often repeated in the ſame period. Further, that Socrates had been converſant in Theſſaly, is apparent from his following words. For a little after this he adds, κὴ ἄλλο δὲ ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ οἶδα γενόμενον, alſo I have ſeen [or known] another cuſtom in Theſſaly. Although the term οἶδα is ambiguous, and may be meant as well of an abſent, as a preſent perſon. Valeſ.

r Ἀποκήρυκτος γίνεται. In Nicephorus the reading is ἀπόκληρος, put out of his orders, or, made no Clergy-man; which diſpleaſes me not. Notwithſtanding, the term ἀποκήρυκτος ſeems to denote ſomething that is heavier, to wit, his being excommunicated. Valeſ.

s We owe the amendment of this place to the Florentine M. S. For, whereas in the common Editions the reading here was [ὅτι ἐν ἀναζολῇ πάντων γνωρίμων ἀπεχομένων, whereas all the moſt illuſtrious perſons in the Eaſt do abſtaine;] in that M. S. the reading is [ὅτι ἐν ἀναζολῇ πάντων γνώμη ἀπεχομένων, whereas in the Eaſt all [Clergymen] of their own accord do abſtain, &c.) Which emendation is confirmed by Nicephorus. Valeſ.

t Inſtead of [ἔταξε] I had rather read [συνέταξε, compoſed;] in Nicephorus 'tis [συνετάξατο:] But what Nicephorus adds, [to wit, that Heliodorus was ordered in a Synod either to burn his Love-Books, or elſe to relinquiſh his Biſhoprick,] ſeems to me to be fabulous. For there is no ſufficient evidence, whether thoſe books concerning the Amours of Theagenes and Chariclea, were written by Heliodorus the Biſhop, or by ſome body elſe. Valeſ.

u This Office the Greek Church terms λυχνικὸν, the Latine, Lucernarium; as Jacobus Syrmondus has obſerved in his notes on Ennodius. See Meurſius's Gloſſary, in the word λυχνικὸν; and the notes on Caſſianus, at the words Lucernaris Hora. Valeſ.

vv I doubt not but inſtead of [ὡς τὰ πολλὰ] Socrates wrote [ὡς ἁπλῶς δὲ τὰ πολλὰ, but they are in moſt things conform;] and ſo Nicephorus has worded it. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon read thus alſo. For Muſculus has rendred it thus: Sed in multis ſe imperiali conformant Eccleſiæ, but in many things they conform themſelves to the Imperial Church. Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it after this manner: Sed tamen ex multò majore parte, primariæ apud illos Eccleſiæ conſuetudinem ſequuntur, but yet by much the greater part, they follow the Cuſtom of the Primary Church amongſt them. Neither of theſe theſe Tranſlatours underſtood what was meant by theſe words here, to wit, ἡ κεφαλὴ ἐκκλησία. Socrates uſually gives this appellation to the Catholick Church, becauſe at that time it had gotten the chief power and authority. So in chap. 19. of this book, to the Novatians he oppoſes τοὺς κεφαλὰς τῆς ἐκκλησιῶν, thoſe who are in poſſeſſion of the Churches, that is, the Catholicks: Νεωτεριστοὶ μὲν γὰρ (ſays he,) εἰσὶ τῷ αἰρεῖν τῷ προσθήκῃ πιστεύειν· οἱ δὲ νῦν τῆς ἐκκλησιῶν κεφαλὰς, &c. For the Novatians admitted not of this additional Function at its firſt inſtitution. But [the Homoöuſians] who are at this preſent in poſſeſſion of the Churches, &c. Valeſ.

In ſumme, in all places, and amongſt all Sects, you will ſcarcely find two Churches exactly agreeing about their prayers. At Alexandria, a Presbyter does in no wiſe Preach. And this [uſage] had its beginning from ſuch time as Arius raiſed a diſturbance in that Church. At Rome they faſt every [x] Saturday. [y] At Ceſarea in Cappadocia they exclude thoſe from Communion who have ſinned after Baptiſm, as the Novatians do. The ſame is alſo practiſed by the Macedoniani in the Helleſpont, and by the Quartodecimani in Aſia. The Novatians in Phrygia admit not of [*] Digamiſts. Thoſe Novatians who inhabit Conſtantinople, neither openly admit, nor openly reject them. But in the Weſtern parts they are openly [†] received. The Biſhops, who in their ſeverall times Preſided over the Churches, were (in my judgement) the Occaſioners of this diverſity. And thoſe who received theſe Rites and uſages, tranſmitted them to poſterity in manner of a Law as 'twere. To give in a Catalogue of all the Rites and Cuſtoms in uſe throughout all Cities and Countries, is a thing difficult, or rather impoſſible. But theſe we have produced, are ſufficient to demonſtrate, that the Feaſt of Eaſter was by reaſon of ſome certain uſage celebrated in a different manner in every particular Province. Wherefore, they are too profuſe in their talke, who have ſpread abroad a rumour, that [the time of celebrating] Eaſter was altered in the Nicene Synod. For the Fathers convened in that Synod made it their buſineſs to reduce the people, (who at firſt diſſented from the far greater part of the Church,) to an agreement. Now, that there hapned many differences upon this account, even in the Apoſtles times, was a thing not unknown even to the Apoſtles themſelves, as the Book of the Acts does atteſt. For when the Apoſtles underſtood, that a diſturbance was raiſed amongſt the faithfull, by reaſon of a diſſention of the Gentiles; being all met together, they promulged a Divine Law, drawing it up in form of a Letter: whereby they freed Believers from a moſt burthenſome ſervitude and vain contention about theſe things; and taught them a moſt exact [*] way of living well, which would lead them to true piety; mentioning to them only ſuch things as neceſſarily ought to be obſerved. The Epiſtle it ſelf is recorded in the Acts of the Apoſtles: yet nothing hinders but we may inſert it here. VALENT. Jun. THEODOSIUS

* The Apoſtles, and Elders, and Brethren, ſend Greeting unto the Brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia. For as much as we have heard, that certain which went out from us, have troubled you with words, ſubverting your ſouls, ſaying, ye muſt be circumciſed, and keep the Law, to whom we gave no ſuch commandment: it ſeemed good unto us, being aſſembled with one accord, to ſend choſen men unto you, with our Beloved Barnabas and Paul: Men that have hazarded their lives for the name of Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. We have therefore ſent Judas and Silas, who ſhall alſo tell you the ſame things by mouth. For it ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burthen than theſe neceſſary things: that ye abſtain from meats offered to Idols, and from bloud, and from things ſtrangled, and from fornication: from which if you keep your ſelves, ye ſhall do well: fare ye well. Theſe things pleaſed God. For theſe are the expreſs words of the Letter, it ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt to lay upon you no greater burthen than theſe neceſſaries to be obſerved. Notwithſtanding there are ſome, who diſregarding theſe [Precepts,] ſuppoſe all Fornication to be a thing indifferent: but contend about Holy days, as if it were for their lives: [theſe perſons] invert the commands of God, and make Laws for themſelves, not valuing the Decree of the Apoſtles: nor do they conſider, that they practiſe the contrary to thoſe things which ſeemed good to God. It were indeed poſſible, to have extended our diſcourſe concerning Eaſter, much farther, and to have demonſtrated, that the Jews obſerve no exact Rule, either in the time, or manner of [celebrating] the Paſchal ſolemnity: and that the Samaritans, who are a Schiſm of the Jews, do always celebrate this Feſtivall after the Æquinox. But this Subject requires a particular and more copious Treatiſe. I only ſay this, that they who ſo affectedly imitate the Jews, and are ſo ſolicitouſly accurate about Types and Figures, ought in no wiſe to diſſent from them, [in any particular whatever.] For, if they have taken a reſolution of obſerving all things with an accuracy; they muſt not only obſerve days and months, but all other things alſo, which Chriſt (conſtituted under the Law) did after the manner of the Jews, or which he ſuffered unjuſtly from the Jews, or [Laſtly] which he wrought typically whileſt he was doing good to all men. [For inſtance,] he entred into a Ship and taught: He ordered the paſſover to be made ready in an upper room: he commanded the Aſs that was tied to be looſed: he propoſed him, who bore a pitcher of water, as a ſign to them for haſtning their preparations of the paſſover: [theſe things, I ſay they muſt obſerve] and infinite others of this nature which are recorded in the Goſpels. And yet they who ſuppoſe themſelves to be juſtified by this Feſtival, make it their buſineſs to obſerve none of theſe things in a bodily manner. For no Doctor ever Preach't out of a Ship: no perſon ever went up to an upper room, and celebrated the paſſover there: they never tyed, and again unlooſed an Aſs that was tyed:, [in fine] no perſon ever enjoyned another to carry a pitcher of water, to the end that the Symbolls might be fulfilled. For they thought that theſe and ſuch like things as theſe [*] favoured rather of Judaiſm. For the Jews are ſolicitous about keeping

* Acts 15. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29.

[x] Except thoſe Saturdays in Lent, and in the Ember-weeks. For in Lent the Romans faſted not on Saturdays, as we have ſhown before, at note (g.) in this chapter, from Pope Leo's Sermon concerning Lent. Nor did the Romans faſt on Saturdays in the Faſt of the Ember-weeks; but only on Wedneſdays and Frydays: on Saturdays they watched at S[t] Peters Church, as the ſame Leo informs us in his Sermons concerning the Faſt of the tenth month, concerning the Faſt of Pentecoſt, and concerning the Faſt of the ſeventh month. Wherefore, Baronius, Petavius, and Halloixius do undeſervedly reprove our Socrates, becauſe he has ſaid that the Romans faſted not on Saturdays in Lent. Valeſ.

[y] Petavius in his notes on Epiphanius, at the Hereſie of the Quartodecimani, does affirm that Socrates is here miſtaken; and ſays, that the Penitential Canons of Baſilius the Great are ſufficient to confute this errour. But it may be anſwered, that after Baſilius's death, there was perhaps another uſage obſerved in the Church of Caſarea. For Socrates ſpeaks of a Rite then in uſe, when he wrote this Hiſtory. Valeſ.

ing their [z] solemn Rites and Ceremonies in their bodies, rather than in their souls. Upon which account they are obnoxious to the Curse, because they conceive the Law of Moses [to consist] in Types and Figures, but [understand it] not according to the truth. But those persons, who are favourers of the Jews, do indeed refer these things to an allegoricall sense and meaning: but they raise an irreconcilable War about days and months; contemning an allegoricall interpretation of them: in so much that, as to this particular, they themselves as well as the Jews, are of necessity condemned, and bring the sentence of Execration upon themselves. But I think this sufficient to have been said concerning these things. Let us now return to our Subject, whereof we have made mention a little * before: to wit, that the Church [once divided] rested not in that first division; and that those who were divided, did again engage one another, and taking hold of a small and very frivolous pretence, raised mutuall separations and †Chap. 21. divisions. The Novatians as I have † said were divided amongst themselves on account of the Feast of Easter: Nor was the division among them concerning this [Festivall] single. For some throughout divers Provinces [observed it] after one manner, others after another; and they disagreed amongst themselves not only about the month, but about the days of the week also, and about other matters of a small importance, part of them holding separate Assemblies, and part joyning in a promiscuous communion.

[z] The reading here is [τὰ συμβαίνοντα, The accidents;] in which, what sense there can be, I see not. I am of opinion it should be [τὰ σύμβολα, the Symbolls] which term Socrates makes use of a little above, where he says to the end that the Symbolls might be fulfilled. By Symbolls, Socrates means the Legal ceremonies and commands; for instance, Circumcision, which the Jews kept in their bodies, but not in their hearts. Nicephorus has worded this passage in Socrates thus; καὶ γὰρ Ἰουδαῖοι τὰ συμβαίνοντα μᾶλλον τοῖς σώμασιν ἢ ταῖς ψυχαῖς σώζειν σπουδάζουσι. Which words Langus renders thus: Siquidem & Judæi ea quæ sic in corporibus accidunt, majore studio, quàm si animabus eveniant, observare contendunt, for the Jews also with a greater industry strive to observe those things which so happen to their bodies, than if they happned to their Souls. You see, that neither Nicephorus, nor his Translatour, apprehended Socrates's meaning. Socrates speaks concerning the Jews, who observed the law of works in their bodies, rather than their hearts; whom the Apostle (Rom. 2. 28.) terms Jews outwardly. CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning the Arians at Constantinople, who were also termed the Psathyriani.

MOreover, there arose dissentions amongst the Arians, upon this occasion. The contentious questions daily [started] amongst them, had reduced their discourses to some absurdities. For, whereas it has been always believed in the Church, that God is the Father of the Son the Word; there hapned this Query amongst them, whether or no God could be called Father even before the Son existed? And, in regard they asserted, that the Word of God was not begotten of the Father, but existed of * nothing; being thus mistaken about the first and chiefest Article of Faith, they deservedly fell into an absurd contentiousness about a bare word. Dorotheus therefore † who had been sent for from Antioch by them, maintained, that [God] neither was nor could be termed a Father, before the Son existed. But Marinus (whom they had called out of Thracia before Dorotheus) having got a fair opportunity, (for he was next because Dorotheus had been preferred before him:) undertook to defend the contrary opinion. For this reason there hapned a dissention amongst them: and being divided on account of the foresaid Term, each party held separate Meetings. Those under Dorotheus continued possest of their own Meeting-houses. But Marinus's followers built themselves private Oratories, wherein they had their Assemblies; and asserted that the Father was always the Father, even when the Son existed not. Moreover, the maintainers of this assertion were termed [a] Psathyriani, because one Theoctistus by Country a Syrian, a * Psathyropola by Trade, was a zealous defender of this Opinion. Selenas Bishop of the Goths became a follower of these persons Tenets: † He was a man of a mixt descent, a Goth by his fathers side, by his mothers a Phrygian. And upon this account he taught in the Church very readily in both these Languages. Further, this faction soon after quarrelled amongst themselves; Marinus disagreeing with Agapius, whom he himself had preferred to the Bishoprick of Ephesus. But these two contended not one with another about [any point of their] Religion, but about * Primacy; the Goths sided with Agapius. Wherefore, many of the Ecclesiasticks under their jurisdiction (abominating the contest raised between them two, as being the product of their vain glory,) deserted them, and became adherents to the Homoousian Faith. When therefore the Arians had continued divided amongst themselves during the space of [b] thirty five years, afterwards, [c] under the Reign of Theodosius Junior, in the Consulate of Plintha Master of the Milice, the Heresie of the Psathyriani being perswaded to cease from contending, were again united in one body [with the rest of the Arians.] And they made a Sanction [amongst themselves] in form of a Law as it were, that that Query, which had caused the separation between them, should in future never be mentioned. But they could bring this to effect no where save at Constantinople only. For in other Cities (if any of these two parties chanced to be inhabitants therein,) they perfitled in their former separation. Thus much concerning the division amongst the Arians.

What thoſe ſlight and trifling words were, about which they differed, I judge it unworthy to be recorded in this Hiſtory, leſt I ſhould too far digreſs from my purpoſe. There was alſo for ſome time a diſſention amongſt the Macedoniani, when one Eutropius a Presbyter held Separate Aſſemblies; and Carterius would in no wiſe agree in opinion with him. And there may perhaps be ſome other Sects deſcended from theſe in other Cities. And theſe things hapned not at one and the ſame time, but at different times. Now, if any perſon be deſirous of knowing the names of the various Sects, he may have an account hereof, by reading that Book entitled Ancoratus, which Epiphanius Biſhop of Cyprus compoſed. CHAP. XXV.

Concerning Eugenius's Tyranny, and the death of Valentinianus Junior; alſo, concerning the Emperour Theodoſius's Victory over the Tyrant.

IN the Weſtern parts, a Grammarian by name Eugenius, having ſometime been a Teacher of the Latine tongue, afterwards left his School, and undertook a Military employment in the Emperours Pallace, where he was made * Maſter of the Emperours Desks. And in regard he was a perſon of great eloquence, and upon that account more highly eſteemed than others, he could not with moderation bear his proſperous ſucceſs. But, taking one Arbogaſtes (born in [b] Galatia the Leſs, who was Maſter of the Milice, a perſon of a rough temper, cruell and bloudy-minded,) to be his aſſiſtant, he reſolved to uſurp the Imperial Crown. Both theſe perſons therefore determine to murther the Emperour Valentinianus, having [c] hired the Eunuchs that belonged to the Emperours Bed-Chamber, to be partakers in their deſign. Theſe Eunuchs, having received [from them] promiſes of greater places than they had at preſent, [d] ſtrangled the Emperour in his ſleep. Eugenius therefore immediately poſſeſt himſelf of the ſupream management of affairs in the Weſtern parts of the Empire, and did ſuch things as were likely to be acted by a Tyrant. The Emperour Theodoſius, informed hereof, was again extreamly diſturbed and diſquieted, in regard a way was hereby made for other troubles after [the War waged againſt] Maximus. Having therefore ſummoned together his Military Forces, and proclaimed his Son Honorius Auguſtus in his own third Conſulate [which he bore] with Abundantius, on the tenth of January he marched again in great haſt into the Weſtern parts, [e] leaving both his Sons [now created] Auguſti at Conſtantinople. Many of the Barbarians [inhabitants] beyond the Danube followed him in this expedition he undertook againſt Eugenius, coming in voluntarily to give him their aſſiſtance againſt the Tyrant. After ſome ſhort time, he arrived in the Gallia's with a very numerous Army. For there the Tyrant * had put himſelf into a poſture of receiving him, who alſo had a vaſt Army. They came to an Engagement therefore neer the River named Frigidus, which is diſtant [f] from Aquileia thirty ſix miles. In that part of the Armies where the Romans engaged the Romans, the Fight was doubtfull. But where the Barbarians (who were the Emperour Theodoſius's Auxiliaries,) engaged, Eugenius's Forces had much the better. When the Emperour ſaw the great ſlaughter that was made by the Enemy amongſt the Barbarians, being in a great Agony, he caſt himſelf upon the ground, calling upon God a Ἀνθιστορεὺς τῶν Βασιλέως: which I have rendred thus, Magiſter Scriniorum Imperatoris, Maſter of the Emperours Desks: for the Greeks call thoſe ἀνθιστορεῖς, whom the Latins term Magiſtros Scriniorum, Maſters of the Desks; as Cujacius has truly remark't. But Salmaſius, in his notes on Vopiſcus pag. 481, affirms that the ἀνθιστορεῖς were the Proximi of the ſacred Desks, not the Maſters. For his opinion is, that there was only one Maſter of all the Desks, who had under him four Antigraphei or Proximi [that is, Clerks:] to wit, one in each Desk. But Salmaſius is diſproved, firſt by the Theodoſian Code, and ſecondly by the Notitia Imperii Romani. For, in the Notitia Imperii Romani, there are four Maſters of the Desks of the Roman Emperours reckoned; to wit, the Maſter of the Memory, the Maſter of the Letters, the Maſter of the Libells, and the Maſter of the Greek Letters. And, in the Theodoſian Code, in the ſixth Book, there is a particular Title de Magiſtris ſacrorum Scriniorum, whom the Emperours will have preferred before the Vicarii. But concerning the Proximi, there follows another Title, at a great diſtance from this: wherein the Emperours give order only, that the Proximi after two years ſpace ſhould leave the Scrinia, and be followed by the Vicarii. From whence 'tis evident, that the Proximi of the Desks are diſtinguiſhed from the Maſters: for the Maſters were choſen by the Emperours Codecill [or Letters Patents,] as were the reſt of the Officers of the Pallace. But the Proximi came to that place by degrees and order of promotion: and they were more than one in every Desk; whereas there was but one Maſter in each Desk. The Proximi therefore are not the ἀνθιστορεῖς; in regard there were only four ἀνθιστορεῖς, as we are informed from the Gloſſes of Julianus Antecеſſor. See Petrus Patricius in Excerpt. Legationum. Philoſtorgius relates, that Eugenius was preferred to the dignity of a Maſter, before he broke out into his Tyranny. Valeſ.

b Inſtead of [Gallia the Leſs,] the reading in the Florentine M.S. is truer, thus [Galatia] Although Arbogaſtes was not born in Gallia, but in Francia, as all Hiſtorians agree. Valeſ.

c Inſtead of [ἐπεισταλδόντες, introduced] we read [ὑπεισταλδόντες, hired.] Valeſ.

d Valentinianus Junior was murthered at Vienna, in Arcadius's ſecond Conſulate which he bore with Rufinus; as Idatius rightly informs us in his Faſti. But Marcellinus ſays, that fact was perpetrated in the Conſulate of Tatianus and Symmachus, on the Ides of March. Notwithſtanding, this appears to be falſe, from the fourth and fifth Law in the Theodoſian Code de Apoſtatis. Valeſ.

e Zoſimus (in his fourth book) ſays, that only Arcadius was left by Theodoſius at Conſtantinople; and that Honorius followed his Father in his Expedition againſt Eugenius. The ſame is aſſerted by Marcellinus in his Chronicon. But Philoſtorgius agrees with Socrates. Valeſ.

* Or, made preparations.

f Here there is a defect in the Greek Text; theſe words [from Aquileia thirty ſix miles] being wanting. Which Valeſius ſays he perfected from Antoninus's Itinerary, and from Sigonius in his ninth book de Imperio Occidentali.

THEODOSIUS God to be his assistant; and was in no wise frustrated of his request. For Bacurius his own Master of the Milice was so far encouraged, as to run with his Van-guard to that part where the Barbarians were *hardest prest upon by the Enemy; who broke through their Ranks; and routed those that a little before were on the pursuit. There hapned another accident also, worthy of admiration. For a very violent wind arose on a sudden, which retorted the darts cast by Eugenius's Forces, upon themselves; and moreover, it carried those thrown by Theodosius's Souldiers with a greater force against the Enemy. So prevalent was the Emperours Prayer. The success of the Battell being after this manner turned, the Tyrant cast himself at the Emperours feet, and requested his life might be saved. But the Souldiers beheaded him as he lay prostrate at the Emperours feet. These things were done on the sixth of September, in Arcadius's third and Honorius's second Consulate. But Arbogastes (who had been the Authour of these great mischiefs) being on his flight upon the third day after the battell; as soon as he knew there were no hopes of life for him, ran himself through with his own sword.

* Or, routed.

CHAP. XXVI.

How the Emperour falling ill after his Victory, sent for his Son Honorius to Millain; and thinking himself somewhat recovered from his distemper, [he ordered] that * Cirque-Sports should be exhibited, on which very day he dyed.

THEODOSIUS * Or, running of horses.

But, the Emperour Theodosius contracted an ill habit of body, from the troubles and disquietudes he underwent in this War. And supposing that his life would be ended by that distemper which was upon him, he was more sollicitous about the publick affairs, than [concerned] at his own death; considering with himself, how great calamities do usually befall Subjects after the death of their Emperour. Wherefore, he sends forthwith for his Son Honorius from Constantinople, being desirous to settle * the State of the Western Empire. After his Sons arrivall at Millain, he seemed to be somewhat revived from his distemper; and gave order for the celebration of Triumphant Cirque-Sports. And before Dinner he was very well, and was a Spectatour at the Cirque-Sports. But after Dinner he was taken very ill on a sudden, and could not come to see † the Games. But, having given his Son order to Preside at the Cirque-Sports, he died on the night following, in the Consulate of Olybrius and Probinus, on the seventeenth day of January. This was the first year of the two hundredth ninety fourth Olympiad. The Emperour Theodosius, lived sixty years; and reigned sixteen. This Book contains [an account of affairs transacted] during the space of sixteen years and eight months.

THE SIXTH BOOK OF THE Ecclesiastical History OF SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS.

The PREFACE.

WE have finished the task enjoyned by You (most Sacred man of God Theodorus!) in the five foregoing Books; wherein, according to our best ability, we have comprized the History of the Church from the times of Constantine. But you must know, that we have not been curious about our Stile; for we considered, that should we have been carefull about an Elegancy of expression, we might peradventure have mist of our design. Besides, could we have accomplished [our design,] yet we were altogether unable to write such things, as are extant in the Composures of Ancient Historians; whereby any one of them might suppose himself able either to amplifie, or disimprove Transactions. Further, such a Stile would in no wise have edified the Many and the Simpler sort of persons; who are desirous of knowing affairs only, not of admiring the Stile for its elegant compoſure. That therefore our work might not be unuſefull to both theſe ſorts of perſons; to the Learned, becauſe 'tis unworthy of being compared with the Elegant Stile of Ancient Writers; and to the unlearned, in regard they cannot attain to [the knowledge of] affairs, being concealed by a pride and over-elegancy of Expreſſion: We have deſignedly made uſe of ſuch a Stile, * as ſeems indeed to be lower and more mean, but is notwithſtanding plainer and more perſpicuous.

* Or, as ſeems indeed to be plainer and more perſpicuous, but is notwithſtanding lower and more mean.

But, before we begin our Sixth Book, we muſt give this premonition: In regard we undertake [the writing a Narrative] of the affairs which have hapned in our own age; we are afraid, leſt we ſhould ſeem to record ſuch things as will diſpleaſe many perſons: [a] either becauſe (according to the proverb,) Truth is bitter: or in regard we mention not their names, whom [all men] have a great love for, with an Encomium: or [Laſtly] becauſe we extoll not their Actions. The Zealots of our Religion will condemn us, becauſe we do not give the Biſhops the Title of Moſt dear to God, or Moſt Holy, or ſuch like. Others alſo will ſometimes make curious remarks, becauſe we term not the Emperours Moſt Divine, and Lords; nor [do give them] thoſe other titles which are uſually attributed to them. But, in as much as I am able to prove and demonſtrate from the Teſtimony of Ancient Writers, that a [b] Servant amongſt them did uſually call his Maſter by his proper name, and made no account of his Dignity [or Title,] by reaſon of the urgency of affairs; and in as much as [my indeavour is] to obey the Laws of Hiſtory, which do require a ſincere, pure, and true Narrative of Tranſactions, free from all manner of Masks and Covers; I will in future proceed in the ſame Narration; Recording thoſe things which either I my ſelf ſaw, or could learn from thoſe who had ſeen them; and making a judgment of the Truth from their not varying in their Relations, who told me them. But, my Labour in diſcovering the Truth hath been great, in regard many, and thoſe different perſons gave me an account of affairs; ſome of whom affirming they were preſent at the tranſacting of theſe things; and others aſſerting they knew them better than any other perſons.

[a] This whole clauſe [either becauſe (according to the proverb,) truth is bitter] is in my judgment to be expunged, in regard it diſturbs the ſenſe. Or, if it has a place here, it muſt be put at the cloſe of the period, after theſe words [extoll not their actions.] If this diſpleaſes any one; 'twill be ſufficient, to expunge the particle [ἤ, either,] and put this clauſe to the head of that following. Valeſ.

[b] To wit, in the Comœdies of Menander, and others. You may ſee the ſame in Plautus's and Terentius's Latine Comœdies; wherein the Servants do uſually call their Maſters barely by their names. Valeſ.

CHAP. I.

That after the death of the Emperour Theodoſius, when his Sons had divided the Empire [between them,] and Arcadius had met the Army returning from Italy, after ſome ſhort ſtay there; Ruſinus the Præfectus Prætorio was killed by the Souldiers at the Emperours feet.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

THE Emperour Theodoſius having ended his life in the Conſulate of Olybrius and Probinus, on the ſeventeenth of the month January; his Sons ſucceeded him in the Roman Empire. Arcadius had the Government of the Eaſtern Empire, and Honorius of the Weſtern. [The Biſhops] who Preſided over the Churches at that time, were Damaſus in the Imperial [City] Rome; Theophilus at Alexandria; Johannes was in poſſeſſion of the Churches at Jeruſalem; and Flavianus of thoſe at Antioch. At Conſtantinople [termed alſo] New Rome, Nectarius filled the [Epiſcopall] Chair, as we have related in the foregoing Book. About the eighth of the month November, in the ſame Conſulate, Theodoſius's body was brought [to Conſtantinople,] and interred by his Son Arcadius with an honourable and ſolemn Funeral. Not long after this, on the eight and twentieth of the ſame month, the Army alſo arrived, which had been employed in the War againſt the Tyrant, under the Emperour Theodoſius's command. When therefore the Emperour Arcadius (agreeable to the uſuall cuſtom) had met the Army without the City-gates, the Souldiers at that time ſlew Ruſinus the Emperours Præfectus Prætorio. For Ruſinus lay under a ſuſpicion of turning Tyrant, and 'twas believed, that he had called the [a] Hunni (a Barbarous Nation) into the Roman Territories. For at that time they deſtroyed Armenia, and ſome parts of the Eaſt, by making incurſions into thoſe Provinces. Moreover, on the ſame day whereon Ruſinus was killed, Marcianus Biſhop of the Novatians died. He was ſucceeded in that Biſhoprick by Siſinnius, of whom we have made mention * above.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

[a] Zozimus (book 5.) relates, that Alaricus and the Goths, not the Hunni, were ſollicited by Ruſinus, to inyade the Roman Provinces. The ſame is aſſerted by Marcellinus in his Chronicon. But Sozomen (book 8. chap. 1.) agrees with Socrates. Nor, is there any diſagreement between the forecited Authors. For Ruſinus called in both thoſe Nations againſt the Romans; the Goths firſt, under their Chief, Alaricus: after the Goths were routed by Stilichon, he excited the Hunni to aſſiſt the Goths, as Claudian tells us, in his firſt book againſt Ruſinus; and in his ſecond book, he ſets forth the ſame more clearly, neer the beginning thereof. But Sigonius, in his tenth book de Occidentali Imperio, where he makes it his buſineſs to relate this whole ſtory, ſpeaks not one word concerning this irruption of the Hunni; which negligence of his is inexcuſable. Valeſ.

* See book 5. chap. 21.

CHAP. II.

Concerning Nectarius's death, and the Ordination of Johannes.

WIthin a ſmall intervall of time, Nectarius alſo, Biſhop of Conſtantinople, departed this life, in the Conſulate of Cæſarius and Atticus, about the twenty ſeventh of the month September. Forthwith therefore, a * Contention aroſe about the Ordination of a Biſhop; and ſome deſired one perſon, others another. When a Conſult had been ſeverall times held about this matter, it was at laſt concluded on, that † Johannes a Presbyter of the Antiochian Church, ſhould be ſent for from Antioch. For a fame was ſpread concerning him, for his ‖ Learning and Eloquence. Within ſome ſmall ſpace of time therefore, the Emperour Arcadius (with the common conſent of all perſons, I mean the Clergy, Clergy, as well as Laity) sends for him. And, to the end that his Ordination might be accomplished with more of firmness and authority, by the Emperours order many other Prelates were present, as was also Theophilus [Bishop] of Alexandria; who made it his business to * blacken Johannes's glory, and to promote Isidorus (a Presbyter under himself) to the Bishoprick; whom he had a great love for, because Isidorus had undertaken a very dangerous affair upon his account. What that business was, we must now declare. When the Emperour Theodosius was actually ingaged in a War against the Tyrant Maximus, Theophilus sent presents by Isidorus to the Emperour, and delivered two Letters to him, ordering him, to present the Gifts and Letters to him that should be Conquerour. Isidorus, in obedience to these commands, arriving at Rome, stayed there expecting the * Event of the War. But this business could not lie long concealed; for a Reader who accompanied him, stole the Letters privately. On which account Isidorus being in a great fear, fled forthwith to Alexandria. This was the occasion of Theophilus's being so highly concerned for Isidorus. But [the Grandees] of the Imperial Palace, gave Johannes the preference And in regard many persons raised accusations against Theophilus, and presented Libells (some upon one account, others on another) against him, to the Bishops that were present; Eutropius the Chief person of the Bed-chamber to the Emperour, took the written Accusations, and shewed them to Theophilus, bidding him take his choice, whether he would Ordain Johannes, or be brought to his Tryall and answer the Accusations on foot against him. Theophilus terrified herewith, Ordained Johannes. Johannes therefore being Ordained, was seated in the Episcopall Chair in order to [his bearing] the Office of a Bishop, on the twenty sixth of February, in the following Consulate, [a] which the Emperour Honorius celebrated at Rome, and Eutychianus (at that time [b] Præfectus prætorio) at Constantinople, with Games and Sports. But in regard this Johannes is famous, both for the Books he left written, and also for the many troubles he fell into, I judge it fit not to pass his affaires over in silence, but relate as compendiously as 'tis possible, what might be declared more at large; and to set forth, whence he was, from whom extracted, how he was called to the Episcopate, after what manner he was deprived of it; and [lastly] upon what account he was more honoured after his death, than whilest he was living.

* Or, the Victory.

[a] Instead of [ἣν ἐπέλεων] it must be [ἣ ἐπέλεων, which the Emperour, &c.] A small fault, but which (being not perceived by Translatours) led them into a great mistake. For thus they have rendred it: On the following Consulate wherein Honorius the Emperour at Rome, and Eutychianus at Constantinople Governed the publick. But, ἐπιτελεῖν ὑπατείαν signifies Consulatum dare, that is, to publish or shew the Ludi Circenses, on account of succeeding well in their Office of Consul. Vales. See Socrat. book 5. chap. 29. note (e.)

[b] Christophorson has rendered it ill, thus, Præfect of the Emperours; whenas he should have translated it Præfectus Prætorio. For in the Greek it must be [ἐπὶ Καισαρείων.] The same mistake in the same word I have taken notice of before. Eutychianus therefore was Consul and Præfectus Prætorio on the same year; which was the common usage of those times, as 'tis apparent from the Theodosian Code. Vales.

CHAP. III.

Concerning the Descent and Education of Johannes Bishop of Constantinople.

JOhannes therefore was born at Antioch [a City] of Syria-Cœle, the Son of Secundus, and his mothers name was Anthusa, persons of a noble family in that Country. He was Scholar to Libanius the Sophista, and an hearer of Andragathius the Philosopher. Being ready to betake himself to the practise of the Civil Law, and perceiving how laborious and unjust a life they lead, [a] who are conversant in the * Forum, he chose rather to follow a quieter sort of life. And this he did, in imitation of [b] Evagrius; who having been educated under the same Masters, had long before betaken himself to a more sedate and quieter course of life. Changing therefore forthwith his garb and his gate, he applied his mind to reading the Sacred Scriptures, and frequently went in great hast to the Church [on account of praying.] Moreover, he perswades Theodorus and Maximus (who had been his Schoolfellows under Libanius the Sophista) to leave their profession which had a respect to nothing but gain, and betake themselves to a more simple and meaner course of life. Of these two persons, Theodorus was afterwards Bishop of Mopsuestia a City in Cilicia; and Maximus of Selcucia in Isauria. But being at that time very studious and diligent about vertue, they were instructed in a monastick course of life by Diodorus and Carterius, who then presided over the [c] Monasteries.

* Or, Courts of Judicature.

[a] That conjecture displeases me not, which came heretofore into my mind, to wit, that at this place, instead of [τὸν ἐν τοῖς δικαστηρίοις] it should be [τοὺς ἐν τοῖς δικαστηρίοις.] Further, Socrates and Sozomen do indeed affirm, that John Chrysostome did not follow the Practise of the Civil Law. For they say, that he went from Libanius's School, when it was supposed he would have pleaded causes, and on a sudden betook himself to a quieter sort of life. Notwithstanding, there are those who do affirm, that for some time he did plead Causes. Which seems to be intimated by Libanius's Epistle, which Isidorus Pelusiota records book 2. Epistol. But that Epistle of Libanius's is, I fear, written to some other Johannes, who then pleaded Causes at Constantinople, and spoke a panegyrick there to Theodosius, on account of his assuming his Sons to be his Colleagues in the Empire. Now, our Chrysostome (who went from Libanius's School about the beginning of Valens's Reign,) neither left Antioch, that Libanius (who profest Rhetorick at Antioch) might write Letters to him being absent; nor could he praise Theodosius, who at that time was not Emperour. Nor can Libanius's words be understood of any other Emperour, than of Theodosius, who took in his Sons to be partners with him in the Empire. However, that Chrysostome did for some time practise the Civil Law, is apparent from the beginning of his first book de Sacerdotio. Vales.

[b] What Evagrius this should be, who having left Libanius's Auditory long before Chrysostome, had embraced a pious and Religious course of life, 'tis hard to determine. For I cannot think it was Evagrius of Pontus, who was afterwards a Deacon at Constantinople, under Gregorius Nazianzenus, and under Nectarius; and thence removed into the Solitudes of Egypt. Baronius, at the year of Christ 382, calls this Evagrius, Chrysostome's School-fellow, Evagrius Junior, Son of the most noble Evagrius a Citizen of Antioch; and says that he went into the desart before Chrysostome, and lead a monastick life under Diodorus and Carterius. But, I know not what authority Baronius had for this, nor why he should term this person Evagrius Junior, Unless perhaps he has called this person Evagrius Junior, to distinguish him from Evagrius Senior the Antiochian, whom he had made mention of before at the year of Christ 372. from Basilius Magnus's Epistle to Eusebius of Samosata; the words whereof are these: ὁ πρεσβύτερος Εὐάγριος ὁ υἱὸς πομπηιανῦ τῦ ἀντιοχέως, ὁ συναπάρας ποτὲ ἐπὶ τὴν δύσιν τῷ μακαρίῳ Εὐσεβίῳ, The Presbyter Evagrius, the Son of Pompeianus of Antioch, who sometime went into the West with the Blessed Eusebius. The Latine Translatour has rendred it Evagrius Senior, &c; whereas he should have translated it, Evagrius the Presbyter, &c; concerning whom Hieronymus (in the Chronicon of Eusebius) writes thus: Zenobia apud Immas, haud longe ab Antiochia Vincitur, &c. Zenobia is conquered at Immæ, not far from Antioch; in which fight Pompeianus the Commander, surnamed Francus, fought most valiantly against her: his family continues at this day at Antioch, from whose race our dearest Evagrius the Presbyter descended. Jerome makes mention of the same person in his book de Scriptor. Eccles. And in my judgment, this is the Evagrius, Chrysostome's School-fellow, whom Socrates mentions here. For, what Baronius writes concerning Evagrius Junior, is founded on no authour. Vales.

[c] Instead of [ἀσκητηείῳ] which is the Dative case, the rules of Grammer do require it should be [ἀσκητηείων, over the monasteries] in the Genitive case: the reading in Sozomen is the same, as was also that in Epiphanius Scholasticus's Copy, as appears from his Version. Further, Baronius (following indeed the Greek Writers) is of opinion, that these Monasteries of Diodorus, and Carterius, were ſituated without the City. But a Learned perſon, who has lately publiſhed the Life of John Chryſoſtome in French, does affirm they were within the City Antioch: to whom notwithſtanding I cannot aſſent. 'Tis more probable, that theſe Little Houſes were placed in the Suburbs, to the end that pious and Religious perſons, who were continually imployed in contemplation and reading of the ſacred Books, might be far remote from noyſe and diſturbance. But what the ſame Learned perſon objects out of Theodoret, (to wit, that Diodorus was continually converſant in Antioch, and made a couragious reſiſtance againſt the rage and force of the Arians;) does in no wiſe weaken our opinion. For Diodorus, as often as he pleaſed, could eaſily come out of a Monaſterie in the Suburbs, into the City. Valeſ.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

Of theſe two Diodorus, afterwards made Biſhop of Tarſus, wrote many books, being intent upon the bare Letter [and obvious ſenſe] of the Sacred Scriptures; but avoiding the [d] Allegoricall interpretation thereof. Thus far concerning theſe perſons. Moreover, Johannes, (who [e] converſt frequently and familiarly with Baſilius [f] at that time ordained a Deacon by Meletius, but afterwards conſtituted Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia) was made Reader of the Antiochian Church, by [g] Zeno the Biſhop in his return from Jeruſalem.

[d] Sozomen ſays the ſame of Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus; to wit, that he expounded the Sacred Scriptures, τῆς τὸ ῥητὸν, literally; but avoided the more abſtruſe and myſticall ſenſe. Jerome ſays the ſame concerning him, in his book de Scriptor. Eccleſ. Extant ejus in Apoſtolum Commentarii, &c. his Comments upon the Apoſtle are extant, and many other pieces, belonging rather to Euſebius Emiſenus's Character: whoſe ſenſe although he has followed, yet he could not imitate his eloquence, becauſe of his ignorance in Humane [or Secular] Learning. Jerom ſays, that Diodorus has followed Euſebius Emiſenus's ſenſe, that is, his method in explaining the Scriptures. Let us ſee therefore, what ſenſe Euſebius Emiſenus has followed. Jerome himſelf will inform us; whoſe words concerning Euſebius Emiſenus are theſe: Magiſque Hiſtoriam Secutus, ab iis qui declamare volunt, ſtudioſiſſime legitur, and having rather followed Hiſtory, he is moſt ſtudiouſly read by thoſe, who have a mind to declaim. From whence it appears that Euſebius in his expoſition of the Scriptures, has chiefly followed the Hiſtoricall and Literal ſenſe; but has not touched the Myſtick and Allegoricall. For the term θεωρία comprehends theſe ſenſes. Allegoria therefore differs from Theoria, as a ſpecies does from the Genus. Indeed, Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus, of whom we now ſpeak, had written a Book with this Title, Τὶς διαφορὰ Θεωρίας καὶ Ἀλληγορίας, that is, what may be the difference between Theoria and Allegoria. But I wonder at Jerome, who ſays that Diodorus was inſtructed neither in Eloquence, nor in the knowledge of humane Learning. And yet Theodoret (Hiſtor. book 4.) compares his eloquence to a moſt limpid River; and Photius in his Bibliotheca does atteſt, that in his diſcourſes he was clear and perſpicuous. Valeſ.

[e] That Chryſoſtome converſt familiarly with Baſilius, 'tis evident from Chryſoſtome's books de Sacerdotio. But who that Baſilius was, concerning whom Chryſoſtome ſpeaks in thoſe books, 'tis uncertaine. Socrates does in this place affirm, that it was Baſilius Magnus. Photius (in his Bibliotheca) ſays it was Baſilius Biſhop of Seleucia. Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 382,) does deſervedly diſprove both theſe opinions. Chryſoſtome ('tis certain) does atteſt in the beginning of his book, that himſelf and that Baſilius, concerning whom he there ſpeaks, had always the ſame maſters. Now Baſilius Magnus learnt Rhetorick at Athens: but Chyſoſtome was Libanius's hearer at Antioch a long while after that. If that were Baſilius the Great, whom Chryſoſtome affirms to have obtained the principall place amongſt his own companions and friends, doubtleſs ſome footſteps of his friendſhip would at this day be extant in Baſilius's Epiſtles. But, amongſt ſo many of his Epiſtles which have been preſerved to our times, there occurs not one, written to our Johannes. Wherefore I agree with Baronius, who ſays, that that Baſilius who was companion to Chryſoſtome, was Baſilius Biſhop of Raphanea, or elſe Baſilius Biſhop of Byblus. For both theſe perſons were Chryſoſtomes contemporaries, in regard they ſubſcribed the Conſtantinopolitan Council. Valeſ.

[f] Inſtead of [τῷ ποτὲ μὲν διακόνῳ, ſometimes made a Deacon, &c.] In my judgment it ſhould be [τῷ τότε μὲν διακόνῳ, at that time made a Deacon, &c.] For it follows: but afterwards conſtituted Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia.] Epiphanius Scholaſticus confirms our conjecture, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion; for thus he renders it, qui tunc à Meletio factus erat Diaconus, who was then made Deacon by Meletius. Further, Amphilochius (in his Life of Baſilius the Great,) does relate that Baſil was made Deacon by Meletius Biſhop of Antioch. But that book is ſtuft with fables and lies. Doubtleſs, in regard Baſil the Great was by lawfull degrees promoted to be Reader and Presbyter at Cæſarea, (as Gregorius Nazianzenus does atteſt, in his Funerall Oration concerning the praiſes of the ſame Baſilius) 'tis ſcarce credible, that he ſhould have been made Deacon any where elſe, but at Cæſarea. Valeſ.

[g] Nicephorus (what Authour he follows, I know not,) makes this Zeno, Biſhop of Gaza or Majuma. But, whereas Zeno was created Biſhop of Majuma in the Reign of Theodoſius, (as Sozomen relates book 5. chap. 8;) he muſt neceſſarily be a different perſon from that Zeno who ordained Chryſoſtome Reader; in regard Chryſoſtome was made a Reader in Valens Auguſtus's Reign, about the year of our Lord 370. But Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 382,) ſays that this Zeno (by whom Chryſoſtome was ordained a Reader of Antioch) was Biſhop of Tyre, the ſame perſon who was preſent at the Conſtantinopolitan Councill; and was then (Meletius being abſent) his Deputy in the Church of Antioch. In which thing I do readily aſſent to Baronius. But whereas he repoves Socrates there, for his ſaying, that that Zeno was Biſhop of Jeruſalem; therein the Cardinal is evidently miſtaken. For Socrates does not make Zeno Biſhop of Jeruſalem; he only ſays, that Zeno the Biſhop, returning from Jeruſalem, Ordained Chryſoſtome Reader of Antioch. Now Zeno had made a journey to Jeruſalem, either on the account of prayer, (as it was the cuſtom of thoſe times,) or by reaſon of ſome Eccleſiaſtick affair. But here ariſes a difficulty. For, if Zeno in his return from Jeruſalem, ordained Chryſoſtome Reader of Antioch; the City of which he was Biſhop, muſt neceſſarily be farther remote from Jeruſalem, than Antioch was; or at leaſt it muſt lie at the ſide of Antioch. Which cannot be ſaid of the Cities Tyre, and Gaza. For both thoſe are far nearer to Jeruſalem, than Antioch is. Therefore, this Zeno, who ordained Chryſoſtome Reader of Antioch, was Biſhop of ſome other City. In Baſil the Great's 69th Epiſtle, there is mention of one Zeno a Biſhop, who was preſent at the Antiochian-Council under Meletius: but the name of his See is not ſet down. I know Palladius (in the Life of Chryſoſtome) does relate, that Chryſoſtome was ordained Reader by Meletius. But this, in my judgment, is ſo to be underſtood, that that may be ſaid to have been done by Meletius, which was performed by Zeno ſupplying his place. Valeſ.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

Whileſt he continued in the degree of a Reader, he wrote a book againſt the Jews. Having not long after obtained the dignity of a Deacon from Meletius, he wrote his books concerning Prieſthood, and thoſe againſt Stagirius: Moreover, thoſe concerning the incomprehenſible nature of God, and thoſe concerning * ſubintroduced women. After this, when Meletius was dead at Conſtantinople; (for he had made a journey thither, on account of Gregorius Nazianzenus's ordination:) Johannes made a ſeparation from the † Meletianiſts, nor did he communicate with Paulinus; but lived quietly for the ſpace of three whole years. Afterwards, when Paulinus was dead, he is ordained Presbyter by [h] Evagrius, Paulinus's ſucceſſour. This (to ſpeak compendiouſly) was Johannes's courſe of life, before his being made Biſhop. He was a perſon (as 'tis ſaid) ſower and moroſe, by reaſon of his [overmuch] zeal for temperance; and (as one of his intimadoes has reported;) from his younger years more addicted to anger, than baſhfullneſs. Becauſe of his * Sanctity of Life, he was not cautious and circumſpect in relation to things future; and by reaſon of his ‖ plainneſs, he was open and eaſie. He uſed too great a liberty in ſpeaking to thoſe who diſcourſed him. In his teaching, he made it his chief buſineſs to improve the Moralls of his hearers: and in his conferences, he was ſuppoſed by thoſe who knew him not, to be proud and arrogant.

[h] This is the Evagrius, of whom we have ſpoken at note (b.) in this chapter. But, what Socrates ſays, (to wit, that Chryſoſtome was ordained Preſbyter, by Evagrius,) has but little of probability. For, if that be true which Socrates ſays, (I mean, that Chryſoſtome, after Meletius's death, abſtained from Paulinus's communion;) how can it be ſuppoſed that Chryſoſtome ſhould admit of Evagrius's ordination, who was ſucceſſour to Paulinus? It is better therefore to follow Palladius, Simeon Metaphraſtes, and others, who relate that Chryſoſtome was promoted to the Preſbyterate by Flavianus the Biſhop. Valeſ.

Concerning Serapion the Deacon, and how by his inſtigation Johannes became offended with, and an enemy to his Clergy.

THis being the humour and diſpoſition of Johannes, after his promotion to the * Epiſcopate, he was more ſupercilious and ſevere towards his Clergy than was fitting; his deſign in that being (as he expected,) to rectifie the lives of thoſe under him. Immediately therefore fore at his very entry [upon the Bishoprick] he seemed rough and austere to the Ecclesiasticks, and incurred their * Odium, many of them became his enemies, and declined him as an angry person. Serapion his Deacon incited him to † alienate all mens minds from himself. And on a time, when all the Clergy were present, he spake aloud to the Bishop, after this manner, You will never be able (O Bishop !) to get the mastery over these persons, unless you drive them all out with one rod. This expression of his excited an Odium against the Bishop. Not long after the Bishop ejected many persons out of the Church, some for one reason, others for another. But they (as it usually happens in such violent proceedings of Governours,) enter into a Combination against him, and calumniated him to the people. That which induced the hearers to a belief of what was spoken against him, was, that the Bishop would not eat with any body, nor would he upon any invitation go to a Feast. Upon which account most especially, the calumny against him improved, and grew greater. Upon what design || he refused to eat with any person, no one could ever certainly tell. For those who are desirous of defending him, say that he had a very weak stomack, and could hardly digest meat; for which reason he did eat alone. Others affirm, he did this on account of his Ascetick and most severe course of life. What-ever of truth there was in this matter, it was of no small advantage to his Accusers, in order to their calumniating him. Notwithstanding, the people did highly approve of him upon account of the Sermons he Preach't in the Church, loved the man exceedingly, and disregarded those persons who attempted to accuse him. Moreover, what his Sermons were, (as well those published by himself, as them taken by the Notaries from his mouth as he Preach't them,) how elegant, inviting and perswasive; it is needless now to declare, in regard those that are desirous may read them, and reap abundant benefit from them.

CHAP. V.

That Johannes differed not only with the Clergy, but with the Magistracy also. And concerning Eutropius the Eunuch.

AS long as Johannes was offensive to the Clergy only, the designes framed against him were weak, and infirm. But after he attempted to reprove many of the Magistracy also, beyond the bounds of what was fit, then the envy against him was much more enkindled. Many things were spoken against him; most whereof were in future believed by the hearers. But that which made an addition to the calumny, was the Oration at that time spoken by him against Eutropius. For Eutropius the Eunuch (the chief person of the Bed-chamber to the Emperour, the * first Eunuch that was vouchsafed the dignity of a Consul by the Emperour,) desirous to be revenged upon some persons who had taken sanctuary in the Church, made it his business to get an Edict published by the Emperours, prohibiting any person from flying into the Churches for sanctuary, but that such as had fled thither should by force be drawn out thence. But [divine] vengeance followed immediately hereupon. For the Law was promulged, and not long after Eutropius himself, having offended the Emperour, made his escape into the Church. The Bishop therefore (whilest Eutropius lay under the Altar, and was terrified with fear,) [a] sitting in the Pulpit (out of which it had before been his usage to Preach, in order to his being heard more easily;) made an Oration in reproof of him. Whereupon he seemed to give a greater offence to some persons, because he was not only incompassionate towards an unfortunate man, but on the contrary even reproved him. Eutropius therefore at that time bearing the Consulate, was by the Emperours order beheaded, for some crimes [he had committed.] His name also was rased out of the * Fasti Consulares, and only Theodorus's name, who had been his Colleague in the Consulate, was [b] Recorded therein. 'Tis reported likewise, that Bishop Johannes, making use of his usuall freedom and boldness in speaking, did sharply reprove Gaina also, at that time Master of the Milice, because he took the confidence to make a request to the Emperour, that one of the Churches within the City might be assigned to the Arians, who were of the same opinion with himself. He also reproved several other of the Grandees upon various accounts, with much freedom and boldness; by reason of which liberty of his, he gained the Ill-will of many persons. Wherefore, Theophilus also Bishop of Alexandria, soon after Johannes's Ordination, began to consider, how he might undermine and ruine him. And with some persons that were present he discoursed privately concerning that affair; but he imparted his own design [by Letters] to many others, who were at a great distance. For he was not only vexed at Johannes's too great boldness; but also because he had not been able to promote Isidorus, a Presbyter under him, to the Bishoprick of Constantinople. In this posture were Bishop Johannes's affairs; and immediately, at the very beginning of his Episcopate, he felt the pangs of mischief and disquietude. But we will declare the matters that concern him, in the procedure of our History.

* Or, the first of the Eunuchs.

* Or, the Catalogue of Consuls.

[a] From this place 'tis apparent, that the Bishops heretofore did not usually Preach to the people out of the Pulpit. For this Socrates takes notice of as a thing singular in Chrysostome, to wit, that being about to make an Oration, he went up into the Pulpit, that he might be the easier heard by the people. Most commonly the Bishops Preached standing on the steps of the Altar. We are informed hereof from King Childebert's Constitution, which Sirmondus has recorded, in his first Tome of the Councills of France, pag. 300; but it is there imperfect. We will make good one defect in it, from the most ancient Corbeiensian Manuscript, after this manner: Qualiter in sacrilegos dei injuria vindicetur, nostrum est pertractandum. Et quia fides nostra ut verbo de altario sacerdote faciente quæcunque de Evangelio, Prophetis vel Apostolo fuerit adnuntiatum, in quantum Deus dat intellectum: ad nos querimonia processit, &c. The sense of these words, which are very corrupt, is this. Because the Priests have complained, whilest they make Sermons to the people, that the Bansatrices [what the import of that word is, I cannot find] walk through the fields and recall the people from the Church; Therefore we command, &c. See Baronius at the year of Christ 407, number 17. Valef.

[b] Hence 'tis, that in the Fasti of Prosperus, Idatius, and Cassiodorus, this year has only Manlius Theodorus Consul, Eutropius's name being expunged. Concerning Eutropius's death, consult Zosimus. Valef.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Tyranny of Gaina the Goth, and the disturbance he raised at Constantinople; and concerning his death.

I Will now relate an affair worthy to be recorded, which hapned at this very time; and will demonstrate, how divine providence freed the City and Roman State from the greatest danger imaginable, by unexpected assistances. What that was, must now be declared. Gaina was by extract a Barbarian. Having made himself a

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

Subject to the Romans, and ingaged in a Military Employ, he roſe by degrees, and was at length conſtituted Generall both of the Roman Horſe and Foot. When he had gotten ſo great a power, he knew not himſelf, nor could he moderate his own mind. But (as the ſaying is) moved every ſtone, that he might render the Roman Empire ſubject unto himſelf. He ſent for the whole nation of the Goths, out of their own Country. [a] And took care, that ſuch as were his relations ſhould have the Command of the Military Forces. [Moreover,] when Tribigildus (one of his kindred, Tribune of thoſe Souldiers lodged in Phrygia,) * raiſed a Rebellion by Gaïna's inſtigation, and ruined the whole Province of Phrygia; Gaïna orders the matter ſo, that the care of affairs there ſhould be committed to himſelf. To which the Emperour Arcadius, foreknowing nothing [of his deſign,] readily yielded. Gaïna therefore forthwith made an Expedition, pretendedly indeed againſt Tribigildus; but in reality, with a reſolution to turn Tyrant. He took along with him a vaſt multitude of the Barbarous Goths. And when he was arrived in Phrygia, laid all places deſolate. The Romans were on a ſudden mightily diſturbed, not only by reaſon of the vaſt number of Barbarians who were with Gaïna, but alſo in regard the [fertileſt and] moſt uſefull Provinces of the Eaſt were highly endangered. But then the Emperour, in relation to the preſent juncture of affairs, made uſe of a prudent and uſefull advice, and by ſubtlety made an attempt upon the * Barbarian. Having therefore ſent [Embaſſadours] to him, he took a reſolution of appeaſing him as well by words, as deeds. Upon Gaïna's demanding two of the eminenteſt Perſonages of the Senatorian Order (who had born the Conſulate, to wit, Saturninus and Aurelianus, [b] perſons whom he look't upon as hinderers of his deſignes;) to be Hoſtages; the Emperour, in compliance with the neceſſity of that time delivered them, though unwillingly. Theſe two perſons, prepared to undergo death for the good of the publick, with a couragious mind obeyed the Emperours Command. And went forth to meet the Barbarian, ſome diſtance from Chalcedon, at a place termed the Hippodrome; being ready to endure whatever he ſhould inflict. However, they ſuffered no harm. But Gaïna made uſe of * diſſimulation, and came to Chalcedon. Whither the Emperour Arcadius alſo went to meet him. The Emperour and the Barbarian going both into that Church where the body of the Martyr Euphemia is depoſited, bound themſelves in a mutuall Oath, that they would not frame deſignes one againſt the other. The Emperour, a perſon that had a pious and religious eſteem for an Oath, and was upon that account beloved by God, kept the ingagement he had entred into. But Gaïna violated it, and receded not from the deſign he had propoſed to himſelf; but was intent upon cauſing Burnings and Plunderings, both at Conſtantinople, and alſo (if he could have effected it) over the whole Roman Empire. The * City therefore was turned into a Barbary, by reaſon of the innumerable multitudes of Barbarians, and its inhabitants had the treatment of Captives. [Moreover,] ſo great was the danger which hung over the City, that a vaſt Comet which reached from heaven even to the earth, the like to which no man ever ſaw before, gave an indication thereof. Gaïna therefore in the firſt place impudently attempted to make plunder of the ſilver publickly expoſed to ſale in the ſhops. But when, by a preceding Rumour thereof, [the Money-changers] abſtained from expoſing their ſilver on their Tables; he betook himſelf to another deſigne. And in the dead of the night he ſends a great number of Barbarians to burn down the Pallace. At which time it was perſpicuouſly manifeſted, how great a care God had of the City. For a multitude of Angels appeared to the Traytors, in the form of armed men of a vaſt Stature; whom the Barbarians conjecturing to be in reallity a numerous and valiant Army, were aſtoniſhed thereat, and departed. When this was told to Gaïna, it ſeemed incredible to him. For he well knew, that the greateſt part of the Roman Army was then abſent, being engariſoned in the Cities [of the Eaſt.] On the next night therefore, and on many nights afterwards, he ſent other perſons. But when he had ſent [c] ſeverall men, who ſtill brought him the ſame news; (for God's Angels always appeared in the ſame form to the Traytors:) at length he himſelf went accompanied with a great multitude, to be a ſpectatour of the Miracle. Suppoſing them really to be an * Army of Souldiers, which on the daytime lay concealed, and in the night oppoſed his attempts; he framed a deſign, prejudiciall (as he thought) to the Romans, but which (as the event demonſtrated) was of great advantage to them. For feigning himſelf to be poſſeſt with a devill, upon a pretence of prayer, he goes to the Church of John the Apoſtle, which is ſeaven miles diſtant from the City. The Barbarians went out with him, and carried out their Arms covertly, hiding them partly in Tuns, and partly making uſe of other devices. But when the Guard that kept the City-gates, having diſcovered the trick, would not ſuffer them to carry out their weapons, the Barbarians drew their ſwords, and ſlew thoſe that guarded the Gates. Hereupon aroſe a horrid tumult in the City, and death ſeemed to be impendent on all perſons. Notwithſtanding, at that time the City ſuffered no harm, all its Gates being ſtrongly fortified. But the Emperour made a ſeaſonable uſe of prudent advice, and having proclaimed Gaïna a publick Enemy, he commanded thoſe Barbarians who were left in the City to be ſlain. One day [d] after the men that guarded the Gates had been ſlain, the Souldiers that were preſent engage the Barbarians within the City-gates, near the Church of the Goths: For all the Barbarians who were left in the City flock't thither. They burnt the Church, and ſlew a great many of the Barbarians. Gaïna, informed that thoſe of his party who could not get out of the City

City

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

City were slain, and perceiving that his Artifices were unsuccessfull to himself, left [S^t John's] Church, and went in great hast into Thracia. Being come to Cherronesus, he endeavoured to pass over from thence, and take Lampsacus, that from that place he might make himself Master of the Eastern parts. But upon the Emperour's sending forces immediately both by Land and Sea, there appeared another admirable effect of divine Providence. For whilest the Barbarians, wanting Vessells patch't up Ships in great hast and disorder, wherein they might make their passage; on a sudden the Roman Navy appeared in sight, and a West-wind blew hard. The Romans had a safe and easie passage in their Ships. But the Barbarians together with their horses in their Ships were tossed up and down and dispersed by a Storm, and at length perished in the Sea. Many of them also were destroyed by the Romans. After this manner a numerous multitude of Barbarians at that time lost their lives in their passage. But Gaina got away from thence, and flying through Thracia, falls into the hands of another party of the Roman Forces, by whom he is slain together with the Barbarians in his company. Let thus much be sufficient to have been said [c] cursorily concerning Gaina. If any one be desirous of having an accurate account concerning the transactions of that War, let him read The Gainëa written by Eusebius [f] Scholasticus, who at that time was an Auditour of Troilus the Sophista: and having been a Spectatour in that War, he related the transactions thereof in four Books written in Heroick Verse. For which Poem he was much admired, whilest the memory of things was fresh. And very lately, Ammonius the Poet has made a Poem upon the same subject, and recited it before the Emperour Theodosius Junior, in his sixteenth Consulate which he bore with Faustus; on account whereof he has gotten a great repute. Moreover, this War was ended on the Consulate of Stilichon and Aurelianus. And the year following, Fravitus bore a Consulate, a Personage by extract indeed a Goth, but one who had expreſt much of kindness and fidelity towards the Romans, and had done them excellent service in this very War. On which account he had the dignity of a Consulate bestowed upon him; in whose year the Emperour Arcadius had a Son born, Theodosius the Good, on the tenth of * April. Let thus much be said concerning these things. [Further,] whilest the affaires of the Roman State were thus tempestuous, those intrusted with the Prelacy, abstained not in the least from framing Designes and Plots one against another, to the reproach and disgrace of the Christian Religion. For at this very time the Bishops employed their thoughts about raising tumults and insurrections against one another. Which mischief took its beginning from Egypt, upon this account.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the Dissention which hapned between Theophilus [Bishop] of Alexandria, and the Monasticks in the Solitude. And how Theophilus Anathematized Origen's Books.

A Little before this, a question had been started, whether God were a body, and had an humane shape; or whether he were incorporeall, and forreign, not only to an humane, but to any other bodily shape and figure whatever. By reason of this question, strifes and contentions were raised amongst many persons: some favouring this opinion; others patronizing that. The greatest part of the plainer and simpler sort of Ascetick asserted, that God was corporeall, and had an humane shape. But most [other persons] condemned their opinion, affirming God to be incorporeall, and wholly void of all manner of bodily shape. Whose Sentiment was embraced by Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria; in so much that he invieghed publickly in the Church, in the presence of the people, against those who asserted God had an humane shape; and did himself expresly determine, that he was incorporeall. The Egyptian Ascetick understanding this, left their Monasteries and came down to Alexandria. And raised a tumult against Theophilus, condemning him of impiety; and were resolved to kill him. Theophilus, acquainted herewith, was sorely perplexed, and employed his mind about a device, how he might avoid the death he was threatned with. Being come into the presence of these men, he addrest himself to them in a flattering way, and spoke to them on this wise: * Whilest I behold you, to my thinking I see God's Countenance. These words mollified the fury of the Monks. Their return to him was: If you speak true, [to wit,] that God's Countenance is like ours, then Anathematize Origen's Works. For some persons have disputed out of those [a] Books, and contradicted our Opinion. But, if you refuse to do that expect from us the Treatment due to impious persons and enemies to God. I will do whatever seems good to you, (replied Theophilus) and therefore be not incensed against me. For I my self do abominate Origen's Books, and judge those persons worthy of reprehension, who admit of them. Theophilus therefore having after this manner given the Monks a repulse, dismissed them. And perhaps the controversie about this matter, which had come to this height, might have been quieted and appeased; had there not another accident forthwith hapned, of this nature. There presided over the Monasteries in Egypt four pious men, Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius. These persons were own Brothers; and from their [stature of] body were termed The Long. They were eminent both for their [Sanctity of] life, and eloquence. And upon that account their fame was very great at Alexandria. Moreover, Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria had an high esteem for these men. For which reason he constituted one of them, to wit, Dioscorus, Bishop of Hermopolis; having by force constrained him [to undertake that Ecclesiastick Charge.] Two more of them he intreated to continue with him, and could scarcely perswade them to it: but in regard he was Bishop, at length he forced them them [to ſtay ;] and [b] having honoured them with the Dignity of Clergy-men, he committed the diſpoſall of [the Revenue of] the Church to them. They, neceſſitated thereto, ſtayed ; and diſcharged their office of Stewardſhip very well. Notwithſtanding, they were diſpleaſed, becauſe they could not Philoſophize, as they had a mind to do, nor be intent upon [their ſtudies of] an Aſcetick Diſcipline. But when in proceſs of time, they were of opinion that their ſouls received harm, in regard they perceived the Biſhop wholly intent upon Lucre, and making it his chief concern to amaſs money together, (and upon that account, as 'tis commonly ſaid moving every ſtone ;) [c] then they refuſed to live any longer with him, ſaying they were in love with the Solitude, and preferred that before a City-life. The Biſhop, as long as he was ignorant of the true reaſon [why they reſolved to be gone,] entreated them to ſtay. But after he perceived himſelf condemned by them, he was filled with rage, and threatned to do them all manner of miſchief. When they, diſregarding his menaces, were departed into the Solitude ; Theophilus being (as may be conjectured) a perſon of an hot and haſty temper, raiſed no ſmall diſturbance againſt theſe perſons : but ſet all engines on work to create them trouble. He forthwith entertained an hatred for their Brother Dioſcorus alſo, Biſhop of Hermopolis. For he was ſorely vexed at him, becauſe the Aſceticks were his favourers, and had an high veneration for him. He very well knew, that he could no ways damnifie theſe perſons, unleſs he could make the Monks their enemies. He therefore makes uſe of this method. 'Twas certainly known to him, that thoſe men, in their frequent diſputes with him, [had ſtrongly aſſerted] that God was incorporeall, and in no wiſe had an humane ſhape. For, humane paſſions do of neceſſity accompany an humane ſhape. And this had been diligently inquired into by the Ancients, eſpecially by Origen. Although this was Theophilus's own Sentiment concerning God, yet that he might be revenged of his enemies, he was not aſhamed of contradicting what he and they had well and truly aſſerted. But * impoſed upon moſt of the Monks, perſons innocent indeed and ſincere, but who were unskillfull in learning, yea moſt of them illiterate. For he ſends Letters to the Monaſteries in the Solitudes, giving them advice that they ought not to be perſwaded by Dioſcorus, nor his Brethren, who affirm God to be incorporeall. For God (ſaid he,) according to the [teſtimony of the] Sacred Scripture, hath eyes, ears, hands, and feet, as men have. But thoſe perſons about Dioſcorus, being followers of Origen, do attempt to introduce an * impious opinion ; to wit, that God has neither eyes, nor ears, nor feet, nor hands. With this impoſture he deceives moſt of the Monks ; and there ariſes a very hot diſſention amongſt them. Such as had their minds † cultivated with Learning, were in no wiſe caught with this fraud ; but continued their adherence both to Dioſcorus and Origen. But the ſimpler ſort, who were the moſt in number, and had the greateſt warmth and zeal, forthwith made an inſurrection againſt the Brethren. A diviſion therefore was made amongſt them, and they reproach't one another as impious perſons. Theophilus's party termed the Brethren Origeniſts and impious perſons. On the contrary, the other Faction ſtiled thoſe inſtigated by Theophilus || Anthropomorphitæ. Whereupon no ſmall contention aroſe, and an irreconcileable War was kindled between the Monks. As ſoon as Theophilus underſtood, that his deſign ſucceeded according to his own mind, he went to Nitria (where the Monaſteries are,) accompanied with a great multitude, and [d] Arms the Monks againſt Dioſcorus and his Brethren. They having been in great danger of looſing their lives, at length with great difficulty made their eſcape. Johannes Biſhop of Conſtantinople was in the interim wholly ignorant of what had been done in Egypt : and he grew famous for his Learning and Eloquence, on account whereof he became eminent [in all places.] He was alſo the firſt perſon that inlarged the Prayers [uſually made] in the Nocturnall Hymns, [which he did] for this reaſon.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

For, they were forced from thence, becauſe they were defenders of Origen, whom, together with his errours, Theophilus had condemned in the Alexandrian Synod. Socrates ſeems to have been impoſed upon by ſome perſon that was an Origeniſt, who favouring Ammonius and his Brethren, had given Socrates a Narrative of that buſineſs, otherwiſe than it really was. Baronius, not content to fix the Novatian Hereſie upon our Socrates does openly call him an Origeniſt. But we only ſay this, that Socrates had this his relation from ſome one of Ammonius's friends. I do not in the leſt doubt, but Theophilus, out of a grudge and hatred towards Ammonius and his brethren, made the Errours of Origen and the crime of Hereſie his pretext only ; as he did afterwards frame the ſame calumny againſt John Chryſtoſtome. Valeſ.

[b] Johannes Launoius (in his book concerning the true interpretation of the ſixth Canon of the Nicene-Council) produces this paſſage in Socrates, to prove, that the Biſhop of Alexandria ordained all the Biſhops, Presbyters, and Deacons, throughout all Egypt. For he remarks, that Theophilus did two things here. Firſt, he made Dioſcorus Biſhop of Hermopolis ; then he ordained his two Brothers Clergy-men, and joyned them to the ſame Dioſcorus. 'Twas indeed Launoius's opinion, that Ammonius and his brother were by Theophilus made Clergy-men of the Hermopolitane Church. Which was alſo the Sentiment (as I ſee) of the Author of the Sacred Geography. But in my judgment, both theſe perſons are miſtaken. For Theophilus made them not Clergy-men of the Hermopolitane Church ; but kept them with himſelf, and ordained them Clerks of his own (that is, of the Alexandrian) Church. This is atteſted by Socrates, in theſe words : Δύο δὲ ἐξ αὐτῶν παρεκάλεσε συμένειν αὐτῷ, Two more of them he entreated to continue with him. Beſides the following words in Socrates do more clearly evince this : for Socrates adds, that being made Stewards of the Church by Theophilus, in the firſt place they were diſpleaſed, becauſe being raviſhed from the Solitude, they had no further leiſure to mind the Monaſtick Philoſophy. But at length, when they diſcerned Theophilus's incredible Avarice and deſire of riches, and perceived themſelves vitiated by converſing with him, they requeſted a diſmiſſion from him. From which words the proof is ſufficient, that they converſt with Theophilus ; and being as it were his companions and domeſticks, had an inſight into his Vices and Rapines : For they were the œconomi, that is, the Stewards of the Revenue of the Church. Moreover, theſe Learned men were impoſed upon by Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion ; who has rendred this paſſage in Socrates thus : Quamobrem Dioſcorum violenter tractum, &c. Wherefore he took Dioſcorus by force, and made him Biſhop of Hermopolis. Two more of them he intreated to dwell with him, and (although a Biſhop) ſcarcely prevailed : having ordained them, he made them Stewards of the Church. Valeſ.

Concerning the Prayers of the Nocturnall Hymns [ſung] by the Arians and Homoüſians ; and concerning the engagement which hapned between them : and that the ſinging of Hymns in parts, wherein one ſang one verſe, another another, had its originall from Ignatius [a] Theophorus.

[a] So the holy Martyr Ignatius is uſually ſtiled. This term is differently accented in the Greek, which makes its import different alſo. For if it be written Θεοφόρος, it denotes a Divine perſon, one whoſe ſoul is full of God. If it be Θεόφορος, its import is paſſive, and implies one born or carried by God. We are told by many Learned men, that Ignatius had this title from our Saviours taking him up in his arms. For, he was that very child (they ſay) whom our Saviour (Mar. 9. 36.) took up, and ſet in the midſt of his diſciples. Others, on the contrary, affirm this ſtory to be groundleſs and uncertain. See Dr Cave's Life of Ignatius.

The

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

THe Arians, as we have ſaid, had their Meetings without the City. Every week therefore, as often as the Feſtivall days occurred, (I mean the Sabbath, and Sunday,) whereon Aſſemblies were uſually held in the Churches; they flock't together within the City, about the publick * Piazza's, and ſang Hymns adapted to the Arian Hereſie, anſwering one another by turns. And this they did for the moſt part all night long. Early in the morning they ſang the ſame alternative Hymns, paſſed through the midſt of the City, out of its Gates, and ſo went to the places where they met. But in regard they would not deſiſt from making uſe of ſuch terms as gave a provocation to the Aſſertours of the Homoöuſian opinion: (For they frequently Sang ſuch words as theſe, Where are they who affirm Three to be one power?) Johannes being afraid, leſt any of the more ignorant ſort might be drawn away from the Church by ſuch Hymns, in oppoſition to them appoints ſome of his own people, that they alſo might imploy themſelves in ſinging of Nocturnall Hymns, and by that means both obſcure the Sedulity of the Arians about theſe things, and alſo confirm his own party [the Orthodox] in the profeſſion of their Faith. This deſign of Johannes's was ſeemingly good and uſefull; but the concluſion of it was diſturbance and dangers. For, in regard the Hymns of the Homoöuſians, in their ſinging of them in the night, were performed with more of pomp and Show: (for Johannes invented Silver Croſſes, whereon were carried wax-tapers lighted; the Empreſs Eudoxia being at the charge hereof:) the Arians, who were very numerous, and poſſeſt with an envious emulation, reſolved to be revenged, and to make an Attack againſt them. For, by reaſon of that power and ſway which they had formerly had, they were as yet hot and ready for ſuch conflicts, and likewiſe they deſpiſed their adverſaries. Without delay therefore, on one of thoſe nights they ingaged. Eriſo, the Empreſſe's Eunuch, who at that time was the Singers Inſtructour, received a wound in his forehead by a ſtone: and moreover, ſome perſons on both ſides were ſlain. The Emperour incenſed hereat, prohibited the Arians from ſinging their Hymns any more in publick. Such, as we have declared, were the tranſactions then. We are further to relate, whence this uſage of ſinging alternative Hymns in the Church had its original. [b] Ignatius the third Biſhop of Antioch in Syria from the Apoſtle Peter, who alſo converſt with the Apoſtles themſelves, ſaw a Viſion of Angells, praiſing the Holy Trinity by ſinging of Alternative Hymns, and he delivered that way of ſinging, which he had ſeen in his Viſion, to the Antiochian Church. Whence the ſame Tradition was ſpread over all other Churches. This is the account we have received concerning Alternative Hymns.

* Covered, or, Arched walks.

[b] I cannot imagine whence Socrates had this ſtory. For 'tis manifeſt, that Flavianus and Diodorus were the firſt perſons, who in Conſtantius's Reign divided the Quires of Singers at Antioch into two parts, and gave them David's Pſalms, to be ſung alternatively, or by turns: which uſage being firſt practiſed at Antioch, afterwards ſpread over all the Churches of the world. Theodoret atteſts this in his Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 24; as does alſo Theodorus Mopſueſtenus (a perſon ancienter than he) who lived in the ſame times with Flavianus and Diodorus. Theodorus's words are quoted by Nicetas in Theſauro Orthodoxæ fidei, lib. 5. cap. 30. Although that way of ſinging of Pſalms ſeems to have been uſed by the Syrians, before Flavianus and Diodorus's times. For Theodorus writes, that Flavianus and Diodorus were the firſt perſons, who tranſlated that kind of Pſalmodie which they term Antiphonæ [That is, when one ſingeth one verſe, another another] out of the Syrian Language into the Grecian; and that thoſe two perſons appeared almoſt the only Authours of this thing, to all the parts of the world. What therefore the Syrians had done long before Flavianus's time, (to wit, in ſinging of David's Pſalms alternatively in Syriack,) that Flavianus and Diodorus ordered to be done, by the Grecians of Antioch in their ſinging the Pſalms in Greek. CHAP. IX.

Concerning thoſe termed The long Monks, and how Theophilus having conceived an implacable hatred againſt Johannes upon their account, made it his buſineſs to get him depoſed [from his Biſhoprick.] ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

NOt long after this, the Monks together with Dioſcorus and his Brethren, went from the Solitudes to Conſtantinople. They were accompanied by Iſidorus, a perſon for whom Theophilus had heretofore had a great * Love; [a] but was then become his moſt deadly Enemy, upon this account. One Peter was [b] Chief-Presbyter of the Alexandrian Church. Theophilus had conceived an hatred againſt him, and took a reſolution of ejecting him out of the Church. He charged him with this accuſation, that he had admitted a woman, by Sect a Manichæan, to [a participation of] the Sacred Myſteries, before he had brought her off from the Manichæan Hereſie. But in regard Peter ſaid that the woman had renounced her Hereſie, and that ſhe had not been admitted [to the Euchariſt] contrary to Theophilus's mind, Theophilus was for that reaſon highly incenſed, in regard he was calumniated. For he affirmed himſelf to be wholly ignorant of what had been done. Peter therefore ſummoned Iſidorus to atteſt, that the Biſhop was not ignorant of what had been done concerning the woman. It hapned that Iſidorus was at that very time at the Imperiall City Rome. For he had been ſent by Theophilus to Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, that he might make a reconciliation between him and Flavianus Biſhop of Antioch. For Meletius's adherents made a ſeparation from Flavianus, on account of his Oath, as has been declared * before. Iſidorus therefore being returned from Rome, and ſummoned by Peter to give in his Evidence, affirmed that the Manichæan woman was admitted [to the Sacrament] agreeable to the Biſhop's conſent: and that the Biſhop himſelf adminiſtred the [Sacred] Myſteries to her. Hereupon Theophilus was highly enraged, and out of anger ejected them both [out of the Church.] This was the occaſion of Iſidorus's accompanying Dioſcorus and his Brethren to Conſtantinople; that the deſigns which had fraudulently been formed againſt them, might be inſpected and laid open before the Emperour himſelf, and Johannes the Biſhop. Johannes informed hereof, gave the men an honourable reception; and excluded them not from communion of

* See the ſecond chapter of this book.

[a] Beſides this reaſon of Theophilus's hatred againſt Iſidorus, Sozomen (book 8. chap. 12.) relates two other cauſes. The firſt was, becauſe Iſidorus had refuſed to give evidence in favour of Theophilus's Siſter. The ſecond, becauſe he had reproved Theophilus for his over much diligence in building Churches, whereby he waſted the money of the Church, which ought rather to have been beſtowed on the poor. I am eaſily induced to believe, that theſe were the reaſons of Theophilus's hatred againſt Iſidorus; in regard both Socrates and Sozomen do expreſsly atteſt it. Notwithſtanding, Iſidorus was not for theſe reaſons ejected out of the Church; but was condemned by the ſentence of the Biſhops, on account of Origen's Errours, which he maintained; as Baronius has long ſince informed us from Palladius in Lauſiaca. Valeſ.

[b] So Arſacius, who ſucceeded Chryſoſtome in his Biſhoprick, is termed ἀρχιπρεσβύτερος, Chief-Presbyter, in the Acts of the Synod ad Quercum; and one Martyrius is ſtiled πρωτο-διάκονος, Chief-Deacon. Sozomen calls this Peter Arch-Presbyter. This is a name of honour, not of ancientneſs. For the Biſhops Elected whom they pleaſed out of the College of Presbyters to be Arch-Presbyters, as Liberatus informs us in his Breviarium, chap. 14. Valeſ.

of the Prayers; but ſaid he would not allow them a communion of the [Sacred] Myſteries, before cognizance had been taken of their Caſe. Whileſt the affair was in this poſture, a falſe report is brought to the hearing of Theophilus, as if Johannes had both admitted them to the Sacred Myſteries, and was alſo ready to give them aſſiſtance. Wherefore [Theophilus] made it his whole buſineſs, that he might not only be revenged upon Dioſcorus and Iſidorus, but caſt Johannes alſo out of his [Epiſcopall] Chair. He ſends Letters therefore to the Biſhops of every City, concealing indeed his own deſign, and to appearance blaming therein Origen's Books only: [notwithſtanding,] Athanaſius, (who lived long before him,) in confirmation of his own Faith, has frequently made uſe of the authority and Teſtimony of Origen's writings, in his Orations againſt the Arians.

CHAP. X.

That Epiphanius [Biſhop] of Cyprus being alſo led away by Theophilus*'s frauds, convened a Synod of Biſhops in* Cyprus, to determine againſt Origen*'s Writings, and reproved* Johannes for reading Origen*'s Books.*

HE became reconciled alſo to Epiphanius Biſhop of Conſtantia in Cyprus, with whom he had heretofore diſagreed. For Theophilus [a] had been angry with Epiphanius, in regard he entertained abject thoughts of God, and ſuppoſed him to have an humane ſhape. Although Theophilus embraced theſe Sentiments concerning God, and reproved thoſe who ſuppoſed the Deity had an humane ſhape; yet by reaſon of the hatred he had conceived againſt ſome other perſons, he openly denyed his own thoughts: and at that time entred into a friendſhip with Epiphanius (with whom he had before been at difference,) as if he had altered his mind, and entertained now the ſame Sentiment with him concerning God. He was very earneſt with Epiphanius likewiſe to convene a Synod of the Biſhops in Cyprus, that therein Origen's Writings might be condemned. Epiphanius being by reaſon of his ſingular piety a perſon of a plain diſpoſition and unacquainted with ſubtlety, was ſoon induced into Errour by Theophilus's Letters. And having aſſembled a Synod of the Biſhops within the Iſland [Cyprus,] prohibits the reading of Origen's Books. He ſent Letters alſo to Johannes, intreating him to abſtain from reading Origen's Works; and [requeſting] that he alſo would convene a Synod, and make the ſame determination he had done. Theophilus therefore having wound in Epiphanius, a perſon famous for his piety, to embrace his own opinion, and perceiving that his deſign throve according to his wiſh; became more confident, and he alſo himſelf [b] Aſſembled many Biſhops: in which convention (agreeable to what had been done by Epiphanius) a ſentence of condemnation was ponounced againſt the Writings of Origen, who had been dead [c] almoſt two hundred years: Not that this was Theophilus's principall deſign, but [he did it chiefly] to be revenged on Dioſcorus and his Brethren. Johannes gave little heed to what he was acquainted with either from Epiphanius, or Theophilus himſelf; his mind being wholly imployed about Preaching in the Churches. And for that indeed he was extraordinarily eminent: but he altogether ſlighted the plots and deſignes formed againſt him. But after it came to be apparently known to moſt perſons, that Theophilus made it his buſineſs to diveſt Johannes of his Biſhoprick, then all thoſe men who had an hatred for Johannes, joyned in their raiſing calumnious complaints againſt him. And many, as well of the Clergy, as of the Grandees who had a great intereſt in the Imperiall Pallace, ſuppoſing they had a very fair opportunity offered them of being revenged upon Johannes, procured a Grand Synod to be convened at Conſtantinople, ſending into divers parts [for the Biſhops,] partly by Letters, and partly by Meſſengers.

[a] 'Tis falſe that Epiphanius was ever ſo ſimple, as to be addicted to the Hereſie of the Anthropomorphitæ: he had indeed once received a check upon that account from John [Biſhop] of Jeruſalem. But Jerome has refuted this Calumny, and alſo Epiphanius himſelf, in that Sermon he Preach't at Jeruſalem in the preſence of John himſelf; as Jerome (in his book to Pammachius concerning the Errours of John of Jeruſalem) and Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 393) do relate. Wherefore, there was no need of Theophilus's feigning himſelf an Anthropomorphite, to curry favour with Epiphanius. Both Socrates and Sozomen were impoſed upon by ſome Origeniſts, a favourer of Ammonius and Dioſcorus, who told them theſe things. For 'twas uſuall with the Origeniſts, (as Baronius has truly remarked,) to fix the crime of this Hereſie upon the Catholicks, by whom they were condemned. Valeſ.

[b] Socrates (and Sozomen who has followed him herein) is miſtaken here, in ſuppoſing that the Alexandrian Synod (wherein Theophilus condemned Origen's books, together with Origen himſelf,) was held after that Synod convened at Conſtantia by Epiphanius. 'Tis manifeſt, that Theophilus did firſt of all convene a Synod at Alexandria, and condemn that Hereſie in the year of Chriſt 399. Which was done after many conferences concerning that matter held by the Biſhops who came thither, as Poſtumianus informs us in Sulpicius's Dialogues de Vita B. Martini. After this Theophilus ſent a Synodick Letter to all the Biſhops, and he wrote a particular Letter to Epiphanius, beſeeching and intreating him that he would convene all the Biſhops of the Iſland, condemn the ſame Hereſie himſelf, and ſubſcribe his Synodick Letter. This Letter of Theophilus's is at this day extant, tranſlated by S^t Jerome. Valeſ.

[c] Περὶ διακοσίων καὶ ὀλίγου ἐστίν. The particle καὶ muſt be expunged. Moreover, Socrates here uſes a perfect number for an imperfect. And for this reaſon he adds the Term ὀλίγου, That is, almoſt, or, thereabout. But if we would ſpeak exactly, above fifty years muſt be taken from this number. For Origen died on the year of Chriſt 252, as may be made out from what we have ſaid at note (b.) and (c.) on Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. book 7. chap. 1. From which year, to the year of Chriſt 399, wherein Origen was condemned in the Alexandrian Synod, there are 147 years. Valeſ.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the [two] Syrian [Biſhops] Severianus and Antiochus, how, and for what reaſons they diſagreed with Johannes.

MOreover, the Odium againſt Johannes was increaſed by another accident of this nature. There were two Biſhops who flouriſhed at one and the ſame time, by extract they were Syrians, [their names] Severianus and Antiochus. Severianus Preſided over the Church of Gabali, which is a City of Syria; and Antiochus over that of Ptolemaïs ſcituate in Phœnice. Both of them were famous for their eloquence. Severianus, though he ſeemed to be very Learned, yet did not pronounce the Greek tongue exactly and diſtinctly: but whileſt he ſpoke Greek, his voice had the ſound of Syriack. Antiochus came firſt to Conſtantinople from Ptolemaïs; and having for ſome time Preached in the Churches [of the Imperiall City] with much Labour and Diligence, and from them procured a great ſumme of money; at length he returned to his own Church. Afterwards, Severianus being informed that Antiochus had gotten a great deal of money at Conſtantinople, made it his buſineſs to follow his example. Having therefore exerciſed himſelf very much, and made many Sermons, he alſo comes to Conſtantinople. Where being curteouſly received by Johannes, for ſome time time he ſoothed and flattered him, and was notwithſtanding beloved and honoured by Johannes: in the mean while he grew famous for his Sermons, and on that account came to be taken notice of by *many great perſonages [of that City,] and moreover, by the Emperour himſelf. It hapned that the Biſhop of Epheſus died at that time, and Johannes was neceſſitated to make a journey thither, to ordain a Biſhop there. Being come to that City, and finding ſome endeavouring to promote one perſon to the Biſhoprick, others another, (who alſo ſtrove very earneſtly amongſt themſelves upon their account, for whom they gave their ſuffrages;) Johannes perceiving that both parties contended moſt pertinaciouſly, and would in no point be obedient to his admonitions; reſolved to put an end to their contention *without offending either faction. He himſelf therefore preferred one Heraclides his Deacon, by Nation a Cypriot, to the Biſhoprick. And ſo both parties deſiſted from their mutuall contentiouſneſs, and were at quiet. On this account Johannes was neceſſitated to ſtay at Epheſus a long time. In the interim that he reſided there, Severianus gained a greater eſteem and affection from his Auditors at Conſtantinople. Nor was this thing unknown to Johannes. For he was with all imaginable ſpeed acquainted with what-ever hapned. When therefore Serapion †(of whom we have made mention † before,) ſuggeſted this to him, and told him the Church was diſturbed by Severianus, Johannes was provoked to an Emulation. And having ‖ incidently taken away many Churches from the Novatianiſts and Quartadecimani, he returned to Conſtantinople. Where he renewed the care of the Churches which was incumbent on him. But no body was able to endure Serapion's haughtineſs and arrogancy. For in regard he was in poſſeſſion of a great *intereſt and favour with Johannes the Biſhop, his inſolence towards all perſons was immeaſurable. For which reaſon the Odium alſo againſt the Biſhop became more enkindled. Upon a time, when Severianus paſſed by him, Serapion refuſed to give him the Honour due to a Biſhop: but continued in his ſeat, demonſtrating thereby that he had but a very ſlight eſteem for Severianus's preſence. Severianus could not bear this contempt of Serapion's; but ſpake with a loud voice to thoſe that were preſent, If Serapion dies a Chriſtian, Chriſt hath not been Incarnate. Serapion having gotten this occaſion, did openly render Severianus odious to Johannes: He concealed the firſt clauſe of the ſentence, [to wit, this] if Serapion dies a Chriſtian; and affirmed that Severianus ſaid theſe words only, doubtleſs Chriſt was not incarnate. He produced a company of his own [faction] who atteſted that the words were ſpoken ſo. Johannes therefore forthwith expells Severianus out of the City. This coming to the knowledge of the Empreſs Eudoxia, ſhe reproves Johannes ſeverely; and gave order that Severianus ſhould forthwith be recalled from Chalcedon in Bithynia. He returned immediately. But Johannes declined his friendſhip; nor could he be induced thereto by the intreaty of any one. [a] Till at length the Empreſs Eudoxia, in that Church called The Apoſtles, caſt her Son Theodoſius (who now Reigns ſucceſsfully, but was then a very young child;) before Johannes's knees, and [b] having adjured him frequently by her Son, with much adoe prevailed with him to admit of a friendſhip with Severianus. After this manner therefore theſe two perſons were to appearance reconciled: nevertheleſs, they retained a rancoured mind one towards another. Such was the occaſion of Johannes's grudge againſt Severianus.

[b] Κατ' ἀνάγκην καθορκώσασα; that is, having adjured him by her Son. The Ancients were wont to ſwear by their Children. So in Virgil,

Per caput hoc juro, per ſpem ſurgentis Iüli:
I ſwear by this head, by the hopes of growing Iülus.

After the ſame manner, when they would earneſtly entreat others, they beſeeched them by their own children, and whatever they accounted moſt dear to themſelves. In this manner therefore Eudoxia ſpake to John Chryſoſtome at that time. By this little child of mine, and your ſpirituall Son, whom I brought forth, and whom you received out of the ſacred Font; be reconciled with Severianus. 'Tis certain Chryſoſtome had received Theodoſius Junior out of the ſacred Font, as Nicephorus relates at this place, from Simeon Metaphraſtes, as I ſuppoſe. Further, Baronius places this reconciliation between Severianus and Chryſoſtome, on the year of Chriſt 401, in the Conſulate of Vincentius and Fravitus. But I had rather place it on the year following. For if it be true that Theodoſius was then baptized, as we have before related from Nicephorus: (which is indeed highly probable; for Eudoxia would not have brought her Son into the Church of the Apoſtles, had he not been baptized:) this reconciliation of the Biſhops muſt neceſſarily happen on the year of Chriſt 402. For Theodoſius Junior was born in the Conſulate of Vincentius and Fravitus, (which was the year of Chriſt 401,) on the tenth of April. For ſo 'tis recorded in the Alexandrian Chronicle, and in Marcellinus's which was put forth by Onufrius. The reading in Sirmondus's Edition is falſe, where it is on the eleventh of April. Nor is it credible, that he could be baptized, except in the Eaſter of the year following. If any one notwithſtanding ſhall maintain, that he was baptized a few days after his birth, (as Marcus ſeems to intimate in the life of Porphyrius;) we will allow this, if he pleaſes. But who can believe, that Theodoſius would have been brought into the Church by his Mother, and placed at Chryſoſtome's knees, before he was a year, or ten months old? Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

That Epiphanius coming to Conſtantinople, held Aſſemblies, and performed Ordinations contrary to Johannes's mind; that he might gratifie Theophilus.

NOt long after this, Epiphanius the Biſhop comes again out of Cyprus to Conſtantinople, induced thereto by Theophilus's * perſwaſives: he brought along with him † a copy of a Sentence of a Synod, wherein he had not declared Origen to be Excommunicate, but had condemned his Books only. Arriving therefore at Saint John's Church, (which is diſtant from the City ſeven miles,) and coming aſhoar, he celebrated an Aſſembly, [a] and ordained a Deacon; after which he entred into the City. That he might gratifie Theophilus, he declined Johannes's invitation, and lodged in a little private houſe. And having called together thoſe Biſhops who were then at Conſtantinople, he produced a copy of the Sentence of condemnation againſt Origen's Books, and recited it to them: [b] having nothing to ſay againſt

* Or, Arguments.

† Τὰ κεφάλαια.

[a] Baronius does at this place charge Socrates with a miſtake, becauſe he has ſaid, that Epiphanius ordained a Deacon at Conſtantinople without the conſent of the Biſhop of that City. Epiphanius had done that before indeed, in the Dioceſs of John Biſhop of Jeruſalem, as 'tis manifeſt from Jerome's Epiſtles. Socrates therefore, and thoſe that follow him, being deceived by the likeneſs of the name, thought that was done by Epiphanius in the Church of John Biſhop of Conſtantinople. This device Baronius has invented to excuſe Epiphanius. But, who ſees not, that there is no reaſon, why we ſhould charge Socrates with a lie in thoſe things which he himſelf was able to ſee? For what had been once done already by Epiphanius in Paleſtine, why could it not afterwards be made uſe of by the ſame perſon at Conſtantinople? For there was not ſo great a crime in ordaining a Deacon, whom notwithſtanding Epiphanius ordained not, but by the entreaty of the multitude that ſtood by. Valeſ.

[a] Inſtead of [ὡς χὴ ἢ Βασίλισσα, in ſo much that the Empreſs,] in my judgment it ſhould be [ἕως ἧς ἢ Βασίλισσα, till at length the Empreſs.] Nor do I doubt but Socrates wrote thus. Nicephorus words it expreſsly according to our emendation. And in Sozomen the reading is [εἰσότε, until,] which is the ſame. Valeſ.

[b] Inſtead of [οὐκ ἔχων, I have nothing;] it muſt doubtleſs be [οὐκ ἔχων, having nothing:] in the next line, we read [ἐδέκετο, were pleaſed] inſtead of [δοκεῖ, is pleaſed.] Valeſ.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

againſt thoſe Books, only he and Theophilus were pleaſed to reject them. Some [of the Biſhops] out of that reverential reſpect they bore Epiphanius, ſubſcribed [this Decree of the Synod :] but very many of them refuſed to do it. Amongſt which number was Theotimus Biſhop of Scythia, who made this anſwer to Epiphanius. I (ſaid he) will neither be injurious (O Epiphanius !) to a perſon who has long ſince ended his life pioufly ; nor dare I attempt ſo impious a fact, as to condemn what our Predeceſſours have in no wiſe rejected ; eſpecially when I do not [c] know of any ill doctrine in the Books of Origen. After this he produced a Book of Origen's, which he began to read, and ſhewed the Eccleſiaſtick expoſitions [of Scripture which occur'd] therein. And then he ſubjoyned theſe words. They who are injurious towards theſe writings, perceive not that they fix a reproach upon thoſe very Books, concerning which theſe are written. This was the return, which Theotimus (a perſon eminent for his piety and rectitude of life,) made to Epiphanius.

[c] I agree with Chriſtophorſon, who inſtead of [εἰπὼν, ſaying,] read [εἰδὼς, know,] and at the end of this clauſe placed a full point. Notwithſtanding, 'tis my opinion, that there is ſomething more wanting here And after the word [Origen,] I think the place is to be made perfect thus, παῦτα εἰπὼν, βιβλίον συγκομίσας τὲ βιβλίον, having ſaid theſe words, and produced a book, &c. Which is confirmed by Sozomen and Nicephorus. And Epiphanius Scholaſticus ſeems to have read thus, as may be collected from his Verſion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIII.

What this Writer can ſay in defence of Origen.

BUt in regard ſuch as delight in reproaching, have impoſed upon many perſons, [and diſſwaded them] [a] from reading Origen, as being a blaſphemous Authour ; I judge it not unſeaſonable to diſcourſe a little concerning them. Vile and deſpicable men, who of themſelves cannot arrive at an eminency, are deſirous of getting a name from diſcommending thoſe who are better than themſelves. The firſt perſon affected with this diſtemper was Methodius, Biſhop of a City in Lycia named Olympus. Then, Euſtathius, who for ſome ſmall time Preſided over the Church in Antioch. After him, Appollinaris, and laſtly Theophilus. This Meſs of Revilers have calumniated Origen, but proceeded not in one and the ſame method. For one has broke out into an accuſation againſt him upon one account, another upon another ; whereby each of them hath ſufficiently demonſtrated, that he has fully approved of whatever he has not found fault with. For, whereas one has blamed him in particular for one opinion, another for another ; 'tis manifeſt that each of them has wholly admitted as true what he hath not cavilled at ; his ſilence approving of that which he has not found fault with. Methodius indeed, when [in his books] he had in many paſſages ſeverely inveighed againſt Origen, does notwithſtanding afterwards unſay as [b] Baronius, it were what he had written, and [b] admires the man, at the year of Chriſt 402, does charge Socrates here with a lie and with calumny, becauſe he has ſaid, that Methodius (when he had before reproach't Origen,) did afterwards unſay what he had written, and ſet forth his praiſes, in his Dialogue intitled Xenon, or, the Houſe of entertainment. But Baronius affirms, that Methodius did the contrary. For when he had at the beginning praiſed Origen, afterwards having detected his Errours, he inveighed againſt him. Baronius confirms this by the teſtimony of Euſebius, who in the ſixth book of his Apologie in defence of Origen, writes thus : Quomodo auſus eſt Methodius nunc contra Origenem ſcribere, qui hæc & hæc de Origenis locutus eſt dogmatibus, How dares Methodius write againſt Origen now, who has ſpoken theſe and theſe things, concerning Origen's opinions. Which paſſage in Euſebius St Jerome quotes in his Apologie againſt Rufinus, to ſhew that he had done the ſame thing which Methodius did before. But Euſebius, in the place now cited, does not ſay plainly, that Methodius had heretofore ſpoken in defence of Origen. For he does not ſay [who had ſpoken theſe and theſe things concerning Origen's opinions ;] but only [who has ſpoken, &c.] which may be taken on either ſide. Therefore Socrates is not to be charged with a lie. Valeſ.

[a] Inſtead of [ὡς βλασφήμως προσέχειν τῷ Ὠριγένει ;] the reading in the Sfortian M. S. is [ὡς βλασφήμῳ, &c.] And ſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus found it written in his copy. For thus he renders it : Sed quoniam detractores, &c. But, in regard Revilers, ſtealing privily upon many perſons, do reject Origen as being a blaſphemous Authour. I reade therefore, ὡς βλασφήμῳ μὴ προσέχειν τῷ Ὠριγένει, from reading Origen, as being a blaſphemous Authour. Valeſ.

in the [c] Dialogue to which he gave the Title of Xenon. But, I do affirm, that an addition is made to Origen's commendation from his being accuſed by theſe perſons. For they who have gotten together whatever they ſuppoſed blame-worthy [in Origen,] and notwithſtanding have not in the leaſt found fault with him in theſe their Collections for entertaining ill Sentiments concerning the Holy Trinity ; [theſe men, I ſay] do moſt evidently demonſtrate and bear witneſs to his true and Orthodox piety. And by their not blaming him in this particular, they commend him by their own teſtimony. But Athanaſius a couragious defender of the Homoöuſian Faith, in his Orations againſt the Arians, does with a loud voice cite this Authour as a witneſs of his own faith, interweaving his words with his own, after this manner ; The moſt Admirable and Laborious Origen (ſays he) does by his own teſtimony confirm our Sentiment concerning the Son of God, affirming him to be coëternall to the Father. They therefore who reproach Origen, have forgot themſelves [and conſider not] that they ſpeak calumniouſly of Athanaſius, Origen's praiſer. But, let thus much be ſaid concerning Origen. We will now return to the Sequell of our Hiſtory.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

[c] Methodius wrote his books commonly in the way of Dialogues, as 'tis apparent both from his Convivium, which is lately publiſhed by two Learned men ; and alſo from his books concerning the Reſurrection, which he had written againſt Origen, out of which books Epiphanius produces ſome Excerptions.

Of the ſame ſort alſo was this Dialogue of his, entitled Xenon, that is, the houſe of entertainment wherein ſtrangers lodge. For, as παρθενὼν is a place for Virgins to dwell in : ſo ξενὼν is an houſe for ſtrangers to lodge in. This book is mentioned in Photius's Bibliotheca, in his Excerptions out of Methodius's book περὶ ἀναστάσεως, where theſe words occur ; ὅτι τὸ μὴ βάλητε τὸ ἅγιον τοῖς κυσὶ, μηδὲ βάλητε μαργαρίτας ὑμῶν ἔμπροσθεν τῶν χοίρων, μαργαρίτας μὲν τὰ ξενῶνος τὰ μυστήρια τῆς θεοσεβοῦς θρησκείας ἐκλαμβάνων· μαθήματα δὲ, &c. ὁ μέγας μεθόδιος φησὶν, &c. Which place the Tranſlatour has rendred very ill : it is thus to be tranſlated : That paſſage in the Goſpel [caſt not that which is Holy to dogs, nor your Pearls before ſwine] is thus explained by Xenon, that by Pearls are meant the more ſecret Myſteries of the Religion given by God : But the hogs, &c. the great Methodius ſays, &c. In this Dialogue therefore, the title whereof was περὶ ἀναστάσεως, an Origeniſt was introduced, by name Xenon, againſt whom Methodius diſputed, not in his own name, but under another perſon, as Photius atteſts in the ſame Excerptions. Hence 'tis apparent, that that Dialogue of Methodius's, which Socrates calls Xenon, was the ſame to which Photius gives the title of περὶ ἀναστάσεως ; and that Xenon is not to be taken for a place of entertainment, but rather for a perſon of the Dialogue. But ſome one will object that in that Dialogue intitled Xenon, Origen was highly commended by Methodius ; but in the Dialogue intitled περὶ ἀναστάσεως Methodius terms him a Centaure. For ſo 'tis extant in two places in Photius's Excerptions. My anſwer is, 'tis poſſible that in the beginning of that work Methodius might have been ſharp upon Origen ; but in the end or procedure of it, he might ſound a Retreat as it were, and praiſe him highly. Notwithſtanding, if any one has a mind ſtifly to maintain, that the Dialogue Xenon differed from that intitled περὶ ἀναστάσεως ; then it muſt be ſaid, that Xenon was not the proper name of any man, but that thereby is rather meant the whole School of Origen, wherein the Auditors and Schollars, coming from divers parts of the world, were converſant. Which in my judgment is the trueſt. 'Tis certain, if ξενῶν were a proper name, it would have the accent in the laſt ſyllable ſave one. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIV.

How Johannes (having invited Epiphanius to come to [his Pallace] and he refuſing, and continuing his holding of ſeparate Aſſemblies in the Church of the Apoſtles,) admoniſhed and reproved him, becauſe he did many things contrary

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

ry to the Canons. Whereat Epiphanius was terrified, and returned into his own Country.

[a] This beginning is too abrupt, especially in regard that digression concerning Origen went before. Therefore in my judgment [ὁ μὲν] should precede here; and the beginning of the next period should run thus, ὁ δὲ ἐκ ἕξιν, &c. But his answer was, &c. Vales.

[a] Johannes was in no wise angry, because Epiphanius had made an Ordination in his Church, contrary to the Canon: but invited him to come and lodge with him in the Bishops Pallace. But his answer was, that he would neither abide nor pray with him, unless he would expell Dioscorus and his Brethren out of the City, and with his own hand subscribe the condemnation of Origen's Books. Upon Johannes's deferring to do these things, and saying that nothing ought rashly to be done * before a determination of a Generall Councill; those that hated Johannes put Epiphanius upon another design. For they contrive, that at the next Religious meeting which was to be held in that Church named The Apostles, Epiphanius should come forth publickly, † condemn Origen's Books in the presence of all the people, Excommunicate Dioscorus with his followers, and reproach Johannes as being their favourer. These things were declared to Johannes: and on the day following he sends this message to Epiphanius (who was then come into the Church) by Serapion: Epiphanius, You do many things contrary to the Canons: first, you have made an Ordination in the Churches under my jurisdiction: then, without any order from me, you have made use of your own authority and ministred in the said Churches: Further, when [b] heretofore I invited you hither, you refused to come, and now you allow your self that liberty. Take heed therefore, least a tumult being raised amongst the people, even you your self incur danger therefrom. Epiphanius having heard this, was fearfull and went from the Church: and after he had very much blamed Johannes, he began his voyage to Cyprus. Some persons report, that at his going a-board, he spake these words to Johannes, I hope you will not die a Bishop. And, that Johannes made him this return, [c] I hope you will not arrive in your own Country. I cannot positively affirm, whether they who told me these things spake true. Notwithstanding, the event was agreeable to both their wishes. For Epiphanius arrived not at Cyprus: but [d] after his departure died on Shipboard. And within a small time afterwards Johannes was deposed from his Bishoprick, as we shall manifest in the procedure of our History.

* Or, before a Catholick, or, generall disquisition.

† Or, reproach.

[b] Instead of [πάλιν πὲ, and again] it should in my judgement be [πάλαι πὲ, heretofore;] (although this reading be disagreeable to all our copies.) For 'tis opposed to what follows, to wit, νῦν, and now. Valesius.

[c] The reading in the Florentine M.S. pleases me best; which is, ἔλπιζε μὴ ἐπιβῆναι τῆς σαυτῆ παλείδος, do not hope, Epiphanius, to arrive in your own Country. Moreover, Baronius does deservedly deride these predictions of Epiphanius and Chrysostome, as fabulous and forged. Socrates relates them not for true and certain; and in my judgment they are altogether misbecoming Holy men and Bishops. Vales.

[d] Baronius does indeed place that contest between Epiphanius and Chrysostome on the year of Christ 402. But concerning Epiphanius's death he dissents from Socrates, Sozomen, and the other writers, who tell us that Epiphanius died soon after, in his return to his own Country. And yet Baronius confesses he knows not what year Epiphanius died on. Which I cannot wonder at enough. For, whereas Baronius follows Socrates and Sozomen in the fore-going account of that contest which hapned between those two eminent men, what reason had he to dissent from them about the death of Epiphanius? They might indeed have been mistaken in their relating the mutual predictions between Epiphanius and Chrysostome: nor is it sufficiently manifest, whether or no they predicted those accidents to one another. But the things which hapned to each of them are most certain, nor could Socrates and Sozomen be ignorant hereof; the latter of whom was born at Salamine, over which City Epiphanius had been Bishop; and both of them were almost Epiphanius's contemporaries. It ought therefore to be look't upon as certain from the Testimony of these Writers, that Epiphanius died at the close of the year 402; or at least on the beginning of the year following, before the Synod ad Quercum. Theophilus informs us hereof in his Epistle to Saint Ferome, which Epistle Ferome has prefixt before Theophilus's Paschal Epistles, which he translated into Latine. For in that Epistle Theophilus speaks these words concerning Chrysostome then condemned: Sed ille ut cætera ejus flagitia taceam, &c. But he, not to mention his other Crimes, admitted the Origenists to a familiarity with himself, and preferred many of them to the Sacerdotall Office; on account of which fact he sadned the heart of that man of God Epiphanius of Blessed memory, (who shined a bright Star in the world amongst the Bishops;) and therefore has deserved to hear, Babylon is fallen, is fallen. Where you see Theophilus does speak of Epiphanius, as then dead; for he terms him a man of blessed memory: and he intimates, that he was dead before Chrysostome's condemnation. Vales.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

CHAP. XV.

How after Epiphanius's departure, Johannes made an Oration against women, and upon that account (by the care of the Emperour, and Empress,) a Synod was convened against him at Chalcedon, and he is ejected out of his Church.

FOr, after Epiphanius's departure, Johannes received information from some persons, that the Empress Eudoxia had animated Epiphanius against him. And being a person of an hot disposition, and of a ready expression; without delay he made an Oration in the presence of the people, the contents whereof were the discommendation of all women in generall. The multitude understands that Oration so, as if it had been * Ænigmatically spoken against the Empress. This Speech is taken in writing by malevolent persons, and brought to the knowledge of the Emperours. The Empress, informed hereof, complains to the Emperour of the injury done to herself, and tells him that her injury was his. She takes care therefore, that Theophilus should forthwith convene a Synod against Johannes: which was in like manner urged by Severianus: for he still retained his grudge [against Johannes.] Within a small intervall of time Theophilus arrived, accompanied with many Bishops of severall Cities [whom he had summoned together by his Letters.] [a] For, the Emperour had given him this order by his Rescript. They flock't together most especially, who were displeased with Johannes, some upon one account, others on another. They came also, whom Johannes had turned out of their Bishopricks. For Johannes had deposed many Bishops in Asia, when he went to Ephesus upon account of ordaining Heraclides. All of them therefore by agreement met together at Chalcedon [a City] of Bithynia. One Cyrinus was at that time Bishop of Chalcedon, by country an Egyptian: he prated [against Johannes] before the Bishops, terming him an Impious, arrogant, and [b] inexorable person. With which words the Bishops were mightily pleased. But Maruthas Bishop of Mesopotamia, against his will trod upon Cyrinus's foot. By reason of which [a] Instead of [τοῦτο δὲ ἐκ τοῦ βασιλέως, &c. Moreover, the Emperour, &c.] I had rather it should be [τοῦτο γὰρ ἐκ, &c. For the Emperour, &c.] Moreover, Chrysostome affirms the contrary to what is said here, in his Epistle to Innocentius. For he says that the Emperour commanded Theophilus to come to Constantinople alone, to plead his cause: but, that he came thither, accompanied with many Bishops. Notwithstanding, these things may be reconciled, if we say that the Emperour gave Theophilus this order at the beginning, when the Monks had gone to him. But afterwards, at the instigation of his Wife Eudoxia, who was angry with Johannes, the Emperour commanded Theophilus to bring the Bishops out of Egypt with him. Vales.

* Darkly, or, obscurely.

[b] Ἀγόνατον. Musculus renders it inflexible. Christophorson, contumacious. I would rather translate it inexorable; for we fall down at their knees, whom we entreat. Vales.

which [bruiſe] he was in very great pain, and could not accompany the reſt of the Biſhops in their paſſage to Conſtantinople. He therefore continued at Chalcedon; but the reſt ſailed over to Conſtantinople. None of the Eccleſiaſticks went out to meet Theophilus, nor ſhewed him the uſuall reſpect and honour: for he was known to be [Johannes's] open enemy: The Alexandrian Mariners, whoſe Corn-fleet hapned to be there at that time, went forth to meet him, and received him with acclamations of joy. Theophilus refuſed to go into the Church; but took up his lodgings in one of the Emperours houſes, named Placidiana. Thence-forward many accuſations were raiſed againſt Johannes. Nor was there the leaſt mention now made concerning Origen's Books: but they betook themſelves to other abſurd criminations. Proviſion being made before-hand after this manner, the Biſhops met at a place * near the City Chalcedon termed the † Oake, whither they cited Johannes immediately, that he might make his defence in reference to the Crimes he ſtood charged with. Together with him they ſummoned in Serapion [his Deacon,] Tygris the Eunuch a Presbyter, and Paulus a Reader. For theſe perſons were accuſed together with Johannes. But, in regard Johannes made uſe of an [c] Exception, and refuſed thoſe that ſummoned him in, as being his enemies, and appealed to a generall Councill; without any delays they cited him in four times. And when he refuſed to appear, but gave them always the ſame anſwer, they condemned and depoſed him; laying no other crime to his charge but this only, that upon his being ſummoned he would not appear. This buſineſs being divulged about Evening, put the multitude into the greateſt tumult immaginable: wherefore they watched all night long, and would in no wiſe ſuffer him to be taken out of the Church: but cryed out, that cognizance ought to be taken of his caſe in a greater Synod. But the Emperour iſſued out an Order, that he ſhould be forthwith ejected, and carried into baniſhment. Johannes underſtanding this, ſurrendred himſelf about [d] Noon on the third day after his depoſition, the people not knowing of it. For he was afraid, leaſt a diſturbance might have been raiſed upon his account. So, he was conveyed away [and baniſhed.]

claimed both againſt the Emperour, and the Synod of Biſhops. But in a more eſpeciall manner they fix't the occaſion of this calumny upon Theophilus. For his frauds could no longer continue concealed: but [were diſcovered] both by many other indications, and alſo becauſe he communicated with Dioſcorus and thoſe termed the Long Monks, [a] ſoon after Johannes's depoſition. Moreover, at that time Severianus alſo (in a Sermon he Preach't in the Church,) ſuppoſing he had a fair opportunity of reproaching Johannes, ſpake theſe words: Although Johannes had been condemned for nothing elſe, yet his proud and arrogant diſpoſition was crime ſufficient [juſtly to have occaſioned] his depoſition. For men are forgiven all other ſins, but God reſiſteth the proud, as the Sacred Scriptures inform us. Theſe words provoked the populace to an higher degree of obſtinacy and contention. Upon which account the Emperour gave order he ſhould be recalled immediately. Briſo therefore the Empreſſe's Eunuch being ſent, found him at [b] Prænetum, which is a Mart-Town ſcituate over againſt Nicomedia, and ordered him, to return to Conſtantinople. But in regard Johannes, after he was recalled from Exile, refuſed to enter the City before he had been declared innocent by a greater Judicature; in the interim therefore he abode in a [c] Village at ſome diſtance from the City, termed Marianæ. Upon his making delays and refuſing to enter the City, the multitude was incenſed, and forthwith began to caſt forth opprobious words againſt the Emperours. For which reaſon Johannes was forced to return. The populace therefore went forth to meet him with [expreſſions of] the greateſt veneration and honour, and bring him directly to the Church: entreating him to place himſelf in the Epiſcopall Chair, and (according to his former uſage) pray for peace upon the people. Upon his refuſing to do that, and ſaying that that ought to be done by a determination of the Judges, and that it was neceſſary his condemners ſhould acquit him; the multitude grew more inflamed, they being extreamly deſirous to ſee him ſitting in the [Epiſcopall] Chair, and to hear him Preach again. At length the people prevailed to have theſe things done. And Johannes, after he had ſeated himſelf in the Epiſcopall Throne, according to his uſage prayed for peace upon the people: and moreover, being conſtrained thereto, he Preached a Sermon to them. This thing gave Johannes's adverſaries an occaſion of [raiſing] another calumnious accuſation againſt him. But concerning that they ſpake not one word then.

* Ἐν περαστείῳ. See Euſeb. book 7. chap. 11. note (k.)

[c] Inſtead of [παρεγγέφετο] it muſt be [παρεγέφετο;] which is a Civill Law term: and we have rendred it accordingly. For παρεγγραφὴ ſignifies an Exception. Now, one kind of an Exception is a refuſall of the Judges. Valeſ.

[d] John Chryſoſtome, in his Epiſtle to Innocentius, does atteſt, that he was put on Shipboard late in the Evening, and carried into baniſhment. Upon which account Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 403.) charges Socrates with a miſtake here. But, if we weigh Socrates's words more attentively, we ſhall find them in no wiſe differing from Chryſoſtome's Narrative. For Socrates ſays only, that John Chryſoſtome ſurrendred himſelf to the Emperours Officers about Noon: therefore the Emperours Officers might detain him in cuſtody till the Evening, that he might be conveyed into baniſhment with more ſecreſie in the night. Valeſ.

[a] Yea, he communicated with them, before Johannes's caſe was inquired into: So Sozomen tells us, book 8. chap. 17. Valeſ.

[b] This Town's name is written variouſly. Hierocles, Theophanes, Cedrenus, Nicephorus, and Moſchopulus, call it Prænetum. Sozomen terms it Pronetum. In Stephanus 'tis named Pronectus. In the Putingerian Table it is called Pronetio. Valeſ.

[c] Mannours, or Farms in the Country, which were at ſome diſtance from the City, were termed περάστεια, (as we have remark't in our notes on Euſebius, book 7. chap. 11. note (k.) which the Latines do ſometimes call Suburbana. Wherefore Ortelius (in his Theſaurus Geographicus) is miſtaken, in his ſuppoſing Marianæ to be the Suburbs of Conſtantinople; whenas it was a Village, ſo called from its builder. Sozomen (book 8. chap. 18.) ſays this Village was then in the Empreſs Eudoxia's poſſeſſion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVI.

That the people being tumultuous becauſe of Johannes*'s baniſhment*, Briſo the Empreſſe's Eunuch, was ſent to bring him back again to Conſtantinople.

BUt the people were intollerably tumultuous. And (as it uſually happens in ſuch caſes,) thoſe who had conceived an hatred againſt him, changed it into a compaſſion, and affirmed him to be calumniated, whom a little before they deſired to ſee depoſed. Upon this account therefore, they were the moſt numerous, who ex-

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

BUt in the first place Theophilus made an attempt to call in question Heraclides's [a] Ordination; that so, if possible, he might make that an occasion of deposing Johannes [again.] Heraclides was not present: but was judged in his absence, as if he had unjustly beaten some persons, bound them with chains, and caused them to be led thorow the midst of the City Ephesus. And when Johannes and his favourers affirmed, that judgment ought not to be * passed upon those that were absent; the Alexandrians on the contrary stifly maintained, that Heraclides's accusers ought to be admitted, although they accused him in his absence. A tumult therefore and a sharp conflict was forthwith raised between the Constantinopolitans and Alexandrians. And a Fight hapned, wherein many persons received wounds, and some few were slain. Upon sight hereof, Theophilus fled forthwith to Alexandria: the same was done by the other Bishops, excepting a few who were of Johannes's side. And all of them made their escape and went to their own [Sees.] These things hapning thus, Theophilus was condemned in the judgment of all men. Moreover, the Odium against him was increased, by his being in no wise ashamed of reading Origen's Books constantly after this. Being asked therefore by one, why he would again embrace those Books which he had condemned; his answer was this: Origen*'s Books are like a Medow adorned with all manner of flowers. If therefore I find any thing that is good amongst them, I gather it. But, if any thing appears thorny to me, that (in regard it pricks) I let alone.* This was Theophilus's answer; but he considered not this * saying of wise Solomon: that, † the words of the wise are as goads, and they ought not to kick against them, who are pricked by the precepts [contained therein.] For these reasons Theophilus was condemned in all mens judgments. Moreover Dioscorus (one of those termed The Long Monks) Bishop of Hermopolis, [b] died a little after Theophilus's flight, and was honoured with a splendid Funerall, being buried in the Church at The Oak, wherein the Synod upon Johannes's account had been convened. But Johannes imployed himself about Preaching. And ordains Serapion (for whose sake the Odium against him had been raised,) Bishop of Heraclea in Thracia. Not long after, these things also hapned.

[a] Instead of κατὰ τὸν χειροτονίαν] it must undoubtedly be [τὸν κατὰ τὸν, &c.] which is the reading in Georgius Alexandrinus's Life of John Chrysostome. Vales.

* The first clause of this saying occurs at Eccles. 12. 11.

[b] Dioscorus Bishop of Hermopolis was dead before the convention of the Synod at the Oak, nor was he buried in the Church at the Oak, but in S[t] Mocius's Church; as Sozomen attests book 8. chap. 17. S[t] Mocius's Church was at Constantinople, as we are informed by Procopius and others. Wherefore Socrates is mistaken, who attributes that to Dioscorus, which was rather to have been said concerning his brother Ammonius. For, at such time as the Synod ad Quercum [that is, the Synod at the Oak] was summoned, Ammonius fell into a distemper. And having passed over to The Oak, he died soon after, and was honoured with a splendid funerall, in the Monastery of that place, as Sozomen tells us book 8. chap. 17. Vales.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning Eudoxia's Silver Statue, and how Johannes was ejected out of his Church again on account of that, and conveyed into banishment.

[a] A Silver Statue of the Empress Eudoxia, clothed in a womans stole, had been erected upon a pillar of Porphyry. It stood upon an high Basis, not very near, nor yet at any great distance from that Church named Sophia: but there was the distance of half the breadth of the street between them both. At that Statue publick sports were usually celebrated. Johannes supposing what was performed [at those sports] to be done in contempt to the Church, reassumed his usuall freedom and boldness of speech, and armed his tongue against those who did these things. And whereas he ought to have perswaded the Emperours by an Exhortatory Oration, to abstain from such sports; he did not doe that: but made use of his sharp tongue, and reproach't those who had ordered these [sports] to be performed. The Empress did again apply these expressions to her self. And supposing Johannes's words [to be spoken] in contempt to her, she makes it her business to have another Synod of Bishops convened against him. Johannes, made sensible hereof, Preach't that famous Sermon of his in the Church, the beginning whereof is this: * Herodias rages again, she is again disturbed, she dances again, she again desires to receive John*'s head in a Charger.* Hereby the Empress was more highly exasperated. And not long after the Bishops arrived, to wit, Leontius Bishop of Ancyra in Galatia the Less: Ammonius of Laodicea which is in Pisidia, [b] Briso of Philippi in Thracia: Acacius of Berœa in Syria, and some others. After these Prelates were come, those who had accused Johannes before, were set up again. Johannes was emboldened with a greater degree of confidence before these Judges: and desired that the Crimes he was accused of, might be inquired into. [In the interim, the Feast of] Our Saviour's Nativity approached, and the Emperour, as he had usually done before, went not to the Church: but gave Johannes notice, that he would not communicate with him, till such time as he should clear himself of the Crimes he stood charged with. Farther, in regard Johannes's accusers shewed a despondency and fearfulness of mind, by reason of his great confidence; the Bishops that were present superseded their researches into any thing else, and affirmed that a scrutiny was to be made concerning this only, to wit, that after his deposition he had thrust himself into his Episcopall Chair, without having had it adjudged to him by the authority of a Synod. When Johannes made answer, that sixty Bishops who held communion with him, had decreed that; Leontius rejoyned [in these

[a] Marcellinus (in his Chronicon) reports this Statue to have been made in the Consulate of Theodosius Junior and Rumoridus, which was the year of Christ 403: his words are these: Eudoxiæ Arcadii uxoris super porphyreticam Columnam argenteæ Statua juxta Ecclesiam posita hactenus stetit, a Silver Statue of Eudoxia, wife to Arcadius, placed upon a Porphyry-pillar near the Church still stands. Theophanes relates the same, who says, that that Statue was erected in that place called Pittacia, neer the Church of S[t] Irene; and that at the dedication thereof the Præfect of the City (who was a Manichæan and a Semipagan) excited the people to shout and daunce in such a manner, that the divine Service could not quietly be performed in the Church, because of the noyse made by the multitude of Dauncers. Notwithstanding, Baronius places the dedication of this Statue on the year of Christ 404. But in regard Marcellinus Comes, in his Chronicon does in expres words place it on the Consulate of Theodosius Junior and Rumoridus, I judge it more safe to follow his opinion; provided it be said to have been made after the Synod ad Quercum, and after Chrysostome's first condemnation, that is about the close of the year 403. And this is confirmed by Socrates. For he adds a little after, that when the Nativity of our Lord drew neer, Arcadius gave Johannes notice, that he could not come to the Church. Now, John was deposed a little before Easter, in the year of Christ 404. Vales.

* Πάλιν ἡρωδιὰς μαίνεται, πάλιν ταράσσεται, πάλιν ὀρχεῖται, &c. This Homily occurs at Tom. 7. pag. 545. of S[r] Hen. Savils Edition of Chrysostome.

[b] This Briso seems to be a different person from Briso the Bishop, who (as Cedrenus tells us) was one of John Chrysostome's Scholars. And Socrates seems to have put Philippi instead of Philippopolis. For Philippopolis is an eminent City of Thracia. But Philippi is a City of Macedonia. Vales.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

these words,] [c] But they were the more in number, O Johannes! who condemned you in the Synod. Again, when Johannes urged, that that was not a Canon of the Catholick Church, [d] but of the Arians making; (For the Bishops * heretofore convened at Antioch in order to the subversion of the Homoöusian Faith, out of their hatred to Athanasius, made that Canon;) [Leontius and his party] rejected his defence, and pronounced sentence against him: not considering, that by making use of that Canon, [e] they deposed Athanasius also. These things were transacted at the approach of the Feast of Easter.

* See Socrat. book 2. chap. 10.

[c] Baronius (at the year of Christ 404,) charges Socrates with a lie here. For, in the Synod at the Oak thirty six Bishops only had condemned Johannes: of which twenty nine were Egyptians, the rest were of divers Provinces, as Theodorus (in Palladius, in his Dialogue concerning the Life of Chrysostome,) relates from the Acts of the Synod at the Oak. But when he was afterwards recalled to Constantinople, he had been admitted to communion by sixty five Bishops. Either therefore Socrates must necessarily be mistaken, who has said that Chrysostome was condemned by more Bishops than those by whom he had been admitted to communion and restored; or else it must be said that Palladius is out. Unless any one will reconcile these things by saying thus, viz. That Leontius the Bishop has here reckoned the suffrages of the Bishops together, who had condemned John Chrysostome in both Synods, as well that held at the Oak, as the other assembled at Constantinople. For although, at such time as Leontius spake these words, the Bishops present in the Constantinopolitane Synod had not pronounced sentence against Chrysostome, yet Leontius, who knew they were incensed against Chrysostome, made not the least doubt of their suffrages. Vales.

[d] Palladius tells us, that this very answer was given by John Chrysostome's defenders, against the Canon of the Antiochian Synod; to wit, that that Canon was made by the Arian Bishops. But Chrysostome's adversaries rejected this defence, asserting that Canon to have been made by the Catholick Bishops. And when Elpidius, a Bishop of Chrysostome's party, urged them to subscribe that draught of the Creed then promulged by those Bishops; they answered in presence of the Emperour, that they were ready to subscribe it: but they put off that business to another time. Therefore, what must we determine concerning this question? Athanasius indeed, in his book de Synodis, does wholly reject that Antiochian Synod, together with its draught of the Creed, as having been held by the Arians with a design to subvert the Nicene Creed. But to Athanasius (who cannot be a sufficient witness in his own case,) we in the first place oppose Hilarius, then Pope Julius, and lastly, all the Eastern and Western Bishops, who have now at length by a generall consent admitted of that Synod. Hilarius, 'tis certain, (in his book de Synodis) does fully admit of it, and commends that form of the Creed drawn up there, as being usefull and necessary, on account of the Heresies which sprang up after the Nicene Councill. Moreover, Pope Julius wrote a Synodick Epistle to all the Bishops who had been convened in that Synod; amongst whom were Eusebius, Narcissus, Theodorus, and Marin. Which Synodick Epistle Athanasius does record intire, at pag. 739, &c. Tom. 1. Edit. Paris. 1626. In the title and body of that Letter, Julius terms them Beloved Brethren; which undoubtedly he would never have done, had he lookt upon them to have been Arians. Now, what reason had he to look upon them to be Arians, who as yet had not been condemned by the sentence of any Synod; and amongst whom there were very many stiff maintainers of the Nicene Creed, which Baronius himself does not deny? Of which sort was Dianius Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, whom Julius names in the first place; concerning whose praises Basil the Great has a peculiar Epistle extant. Lastly, all the Easterns have acknowledged that Synod to be Catholick, and inserted its Sanctions into the book of Canons, soon after John Chrysostome's times, as appears from the Chalcedon-Councill. And at length the Western Church has by degrees admitted of those Canons, rendred into Latine by Dionysius Exiguus. Notwithstanding, in John Chrysostome's times they might be rejected, in regard they were not received by a generall consent of the whole Church, nor as yet admitted by the Romish Church. Pope Innocentius, in his Epistle to the Constantinopolitan Church, (which Sozomen has recorded, book 8. chap. 26.) does in no wise admit of these Canons. Vales.

[e] Christophorson supposed that these words were spoken by Socrates concerning the Bishops convened in the Antiochian-Synod. But I think they are to be understood concerning the Bishops then assembled at Constantinople against John Chrysostome. And in this sense Epiphanius Scholasticus and Musculus took this place: for Epiphanius has rendred it thus, non intelligentes, quod dum hâc regulâ utcrentur, Athanasium quoque deponerent, not understanding, that whilest they made use of this Canon, they deposed Athanasius also: and Musculus has translated it happily after this manner: nec cogitantes, non Johannem se modò, sed & ipsum Athanasium hoc Canone utentes deponere, nor thinking, that by using of this Canon, they deposed not only Johannes, but even Athanasius himself. Vales.

The Emperour therefore gives Johannes notice, that [f] he could not come to the Church, because two Synods had condemned him. Wherefore Johannes desisted in future, and went not any more to the Church. On which account those of his party left the Church immediately, and celebrated Easter in the publick Baths termed Constantianæ. There were with them many Bishops, Presbyters, and others of the Ecclesiastick Function; who were termed Johannitæ, because from that time they held Meetings in severall places apart by themselves. Johannes appeared not at all in publick, for the space of two months, till such time as the Emperour issued out an Order for his being carried away into Exile. By virtue whereof he was drawn out of the Church, and conveyed into banishment. On which very day some of the Johannitæ set the Church on fire. Whilest that was burning, an Easterly wind blew, which conveyed the fire to the [g] Senate-house, whereby that was burnt. This hapned on the twentieth of June, in Honorius's sixth Consulate, which he bore with Aristænetus. Moreover, what mischiefs the Præfect of Constantinople (whose name was [h] Optatus, an Heathen as to his Religion, and therefore an hater of the Christians) did to Johannes's friends upon account of this fire, and how he destroyed many of them by a capitall punishment, I think fit to omit.

ARCADIUS & HONORIUS.

[f] Christophorson thought these words were spoken concerning John, who after this was withheld from entring the Church. But I had rather they should be understood of the Emperour himself; in which sense Epiphanius and Musculus takes them. Our sentiment is confirmed by that passage in Socrates which occurs a little before in this chapter; where he relates, that Arcadius at the approach of Christmas, gave John notice, that he could not come into the Church, unless John (who had been condemned by the sentence of a Synod,) should first clear himself. After the same manner therefore, at the approach of Easter, Arcadius gives John notice, that he could not go to the Church, as long as John, condemned now by two Synods, resided therein. Vales.

[g] This Edifice was called the Senate-house. The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, at the sixth Consulate of Honorius which he bore with Aristænetus, has these words: ἡ αὐρισδίω ἐκαὶ ἡ μεγάλη ἐκκλησία συὺ τῷ συνάτῳ ὑπὸ κρατούντων αὐτὴς φὴ λεγομένων ξυλοκεραπίω ἡμέρᾳ δ δίᾳ ὥρᾳ ς'. And on a sudden the Great Church was burnt together with the Senate-house, [fired] by those who held it, termed the Xyloccretæ, on the second day, at the sixth hour. See Chronic. Alexandr. pag. 714. Edit. Monach. 1615. Zosimus describes this Structure about the middle of his fifth book. It was in the second Ward of the City Constantinople, as we are informed from the Old description of that City, published before the Notitia Imperii Romani. Vales.

[h] This (if I mistake not) is the Manichæan and Semipagan Præfect of the City, who, at the dedication of Eudoxia's Statue, had mocked the Christians, as we have related before (see note (a.) in this chapter.) from Theophanes. Palladius (in the Life of Chrysostome) speaks concerning the same Optatus; that when he was Præfect of the City, he compelled the Noble Matrons either to communicate with Arsacius, who had been put into John Chrysostome's Bishoprick, or else to pay two hundred pounds of Gold into the Exchequer. Vales.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning Arsacius, who was Ordained Johannes's successour, and concerning Cyrinus [Bishop] of Chalcedon.

SOme few days after, Arsacius is Ordained Bishop of Constantinople; he was brother to Nectarius, who had been Johannes's predecessour in that Bishoprick, and had governed it well: but he was very aged. For he was above eighty years old. During his calm and peaceable presidency over that Bishoprick, by reason of his singular mildness, Cyrinus Bishop of Chalcedon, * whose foot Maruthas Bishop of Mesopotamia had unawares trod upon, was in so very ill a condition, that his foot putrified, and he was forced to have it cut off. Nor was this abscission performed once only, but it was many times iterated. For † the Gangrene preyed upon his whole body, body, in so much that it seized his other foot, which he was forced to have cut off also. I have mentioned this thing for this reason, in regard many persons did affirm, that Cyrinus suffered all this on account of the opprobrious words he had spoken against Johannes; for he frequently termed him an inexorable person, as I have said * before. And because [about the same time] there fell an hail, [the stones whereof were] of a vast bigness, at Constantinople and in the Suburbs round that City; (which hapned in the † fore-mentioned Consulate, about the thirtieth of September:) this was said to have been an act of divine vengeance for Johannes's unjust deposition. These reports had more of credit given to them and were improved by the Empresse's death, which hapned soon after. For she ended her life on the fourth day after the hail fell. Others affirmed, that Johannes was deservedly deposed, because, when he was in Asia and Lydia, he had seized upon many Churches belonging to the Novatianists, Quartadecimani, and some other [Hereticks, to wit,] at such time as he made a journey to Ephesus on account of Heraclides's Ordination. But, whether Johannes's deposition were just, agreeable to their saying who were incensed against him; or whether Cyrinus underwent a due punishment for his reproachfull language; and whether the hail fell, and the Empress died, upon Johannes's account; or whether these things hapned for other reasons; or for both; God knows, who is the discerner of things secret, and the just Judge of Truth it self. I have recorded what the common reports of men were at that time.

CHAP. XX.

How, after Arsacius, Atticus obtained the Constantinopolitan See.

BUt Arsacius did not long survive his taking the Bishoprick. For, on the following Consulate, which was Stilichon's second and Anthemius's first, about the eleventh of November he died. Many persons being exceedingly desirous of obtaining the Bishoprick, and for that reason much time having been spent, on the following Consulate, which was Arcadius's sixth and Probus's first, a Religious person was promoted to the Bishoprick, his name Atticus. By originall extract he was of Sebastia in Armenia, but had followed an Ascetick course of life from his younger years; and, besides his being furnished with a competency of Learning, he was endowed with a greater degree of natural prudence. But I shall speak concerning this person hereafter.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning Johannes*'s departure to the Lord in exile.*

JOhannes being carried into banishment, died at Comani upon the Euxine Sea, on the fourteenth of [a] September, in the following Consulate, which was Honorius his seventh and Theodosius's second. He was a person (as I have said * before) by reason of his zeal for temperance, more addicted to anger than bashfullness, and because of his sanctity of life, he always made use of too great a liberty of speech. But it is to me a wonder, how he, who was so zealous a follower of Temperance, should teach in his Sermons, that Temperance was to be contemned. For, whereas the Synod of Bishops allowed repentance but once to those who lapsed after Baptism, he was so bold as to say, [[b] although] you have repented a thousand times, approach. For which doctrine many of his acquaintance rebuked him; but more especially Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatianists: who wrote a book against this saying [of Chrysostome's,] and reproved him sharply for it. But, these things hapned long before this time.

[b] In what Homily this was said by Chrysostome, I cannot find. And yet we have little reason to question Socrates's authority, because he lived in the same times, and could have heard the Sermons, as well of Chrysostome, as of Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatians. Moreover, it may be more certainly concluded from this passage, than from any other, that Socrates was a Novatianist. For he does both put an ill interpretation upon Chrysostome's saying, and also openly favours Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatian party, against John Chrysostome. —— You must know further, that this saying was objected to Chrysostome by Bishop Isaacius in the Synod ad Quercum; because he gave sinners a liberty, in regard he taught, if you have sinned again, repent again. And, as often as you sin, come to me and I will heal you. Vales.

[a] Instead of [November,] it must be [September,] as it is in the Sfortian M. S. and in Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Nor did Nicephorus read otherwise, who adds, that the day whereon John Chrysostome died, was dedicated to the Exaltation of the Holy Cross. For so it was agreeable, that he who had passed his whole life under the Cross, and had gloried in nothing but in the Cross of his Lord, should be loosed from the Frame of his body on that Festivall, as the same Nicephorus does elegantly write. Vales.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatianists, what expressions he is said to have used in his discourses with Johannes.

BUt, I judge it not inopportune, to speak something briefly concerning Sisinnius. He was (as I have often said) an eloquent person, and an excellent Philosopher. But in a more especiall manner he had taken pains about Logick, and was incomparably well versed in interpreting the Sacred Scriptures. In so much that Eunomius the Heretick would [out of fear] frequently avoid his judicious and powerfull acuteness in discourse. His diet was not slender. But though he was eminently temperate, yet his Fare was sumptuous and magnificent. His way of living was splendid and delicate, [he was clad] in a white garment, and bathed himself twice a day in the publick Baths. Being on a time asked by one, why he that was a Bishop, would bathe twice a day; his answer was, because I cannot bathe thrice. At another time, when out of respect he went to give Arsacius the Bishop a visit, he was asked by one of those about Arsacius, why he would wear a garment misbecoming a Bishop? And where it was written that a Priest should be cloathed in a white garment? His answer was, tell me first where is it written, that a Bishop should wear a black garment? And when he that asked him, was in doubt [how to return answer] to this contrary question, Sisinnius added: You, said he, can never shew that a Priest ought to wear black. But Solomon is my Authour, whose words are, * Let thy garments be white. And our Saviour in the † Gospels, appeared clothed in a white garment. Moreover, he shewed Moses and Elias, wearing white garments, to the Apostles. Having with readiness said these and many other such words as these, he was greatly admired by those that were present. When Leontius Bishop of Ancyra in Galatia latia the Leſs, had taken the Church [there] from the Novatianiſts, and was [at that time] come to Conſtantinople, Siſinnius went to him, and entreated him to reſtore the Church. But Leontius in an heat made anſwer, and ſaid to him, You Novatianiſts ought not to have Churches, [in regard] you take away Repentance, and exclude the loving kindneſs of God. After Leontius had ſpoken theſe and more ſuch ill words againſt the Novatianiſts, Siſinnius made anſwer, But no perſon repents in ſuch a manner as I do. When Leontius added again, How do you Repent? Siſinnius, ſubjoyned, becauſe I have ſeen you [a]. One time, Johannes reproved Siſinnius, and ſaid to him, a City cannot have two Biſhops; Siſinnius's anſwer was, Nor has it. Johannes being angry hereat, and ſaying, you ſeem deſirous of being the only Biſhop; Siſinnius replyed, I do not ſay that, but that I am not a Biſhop in your account only, when as notwithſtanding other perſons look upon me to be ſuch. Johannes incenſed at that anſwer, I (ſaid he) will make you leave Preaching; for you are an Heretick. To which Siſinnius made this pleaſant return: But I will give you a reward, if you will free me from ſo great pains. Johannes being mollified with this anſwer, replied, I will not make you leave off Preaching, if that Office be troubleſome to you. So facetious was Siſinnius, and ſo ready at anſwering. It would be tedious to write and record all his ſayings. Wherefore, I have accounted it ſufficient, by theſe few to ſhew what manner of perſon he was. I will only add this, that he was very eminent for his Learning; on which account, all the Biſhops that were his ſucceſſours, loved and honoured him. Moreover, all the eminent perſonages of the Senatorian order had a great affection for, and admired him. He wrote many Books: but *he is too ſtudious about words in them, and intermixes Poetick terms. He was more admired for his ſpeaking, than his writing. For, in his face and voice, in his garb and aſpect, and in the whole motion of his body, there was a gracefullneſs. By reaſon of which [accompliſhments,] He was beloved both by all Sects, and chiefly by Atticus the Biſhop. But, I think thus much ſufficient [to have been ſaid] concerning Siſinnius.

[a] In Suidas, at the word Σισίννιος, this whole paſſage in Socrates is tranſcribed, where the word [ἀπεκρίνατο, he anſwered] is wanting. CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning the death of the Emperour Arcadius.

NOt long after the death of Johannes, the Emperour Arcadius died; a man of a mild and quiet temper, and who at the cloſe of his life got the repute of a perſon beloved by God, for this reaſon. There is at Conſtantinople a very ſpacious houſe, which is termed * Carya. For, in the Court of this houſe there is a Nutt-tree, on which ('tis reported) the Martyr Acacius was hanged, and compleated his Martyrdom. On this account a ſmall Church was built near that tree. The Emperour Arcadius deſirous to ſee this Church, went into it [one day:] and when he had ſaid his prayers, came out again. All thoſe perſons who dwelt near that Church, ran together to ſee the Emperour. Some went out of the houſe, and made it their buſineſs to take their ſtandings before hand in the ſtreets, from whence they ſuppoſed they might have a plainer view of the Emperour's countenance, and of the Guards that were about him. Others followed, untill all perſons, together with the women and children, were got out of the Church. After which, all that great houſe, the buildings whereof encloſed the Church on every ſide, fell down immediately. Hereupon followed an outcry, together with an admiration, becauſe the Emperours prayer had delivered ſo great a multitude of perſons from deſtruction. This hapned thus. [Moreover, Arcadius] leaving his Son Theodoſius, then but eight years old, ended his life in the Conſulate of Baſſus and Philippus, on the firſt of May: this was the ſecond year of the two hundredth ninety ſeventh Olympiad. He reigned with his Father Theodoſius thirteen years: after his Fathers death [he reigned] fourteen; he lived one and thirty years. This book contains the † Hiſtory of twelve years and ſix months.

* In other Copies this following paſſage occurs, not as if it were omitted, but worded in a different manner. We judged it therefore meet to annex it. On which account we have added it at this place.

* This Appendix is part of the eleventh chapter of this book, worded in a different manner only. Muſculus, Grynæus, and Dr Hanmer have omitted it in their Verſions. Chriſtophorſon, Curterius, and Valeſius have inſerted it in their tranſlations. The Greek Text of it occurs in Stephens's Edition, and in Valeſius's; from which latter we have rendred it into Engliſh.

BUt, in regard the Biſhop of Epheſus hapned to die in the interim, Johannes was neceſſitated to go to Epheſus, to ordain a Biſhop. Being arrived in that City, and ſome endeavouring to promote one perſon, others another; he preferred one Heraclides, his own Deacon, by Country a Cypriot, to the Biſhoprick. Whereupon a diſturbance being raiſed in Epheſus, becauſe Heraclides was [reputed] unworthy of the Epiſcopate; Johannes was forced to ſtay at Epheſus for ſome time. During his reſidence there, Severianus grew more beloved and eſteemed by his Auditors at Conſtantinople. Nor was this unknown to Johannes. For he was ſpeedily acquainted with what hapned by Serapion, whom he had a ſingular affection for, and to whom he committed the whole care of his Epiſcopate, in regard of his piety, his fidelity in all concerns, his prudence in the management of all matters, and his ſtudiouſneſs about defending the Biſhops Rights. After ſome time, Johannes returns to Conſtantinople, and perſonally undertook again a becoming care of the Churches. But between Serapion the Deacon, and Severianus the Biſhop, there aroſe a great * diſſention; Serapion oppoſing Severianus, becauſe he ſtrove to out-do Johannes in his Preaching; and Severianus envying Serapion, becauſe Johannes the Biſhop favoured him highly, and entruſted him with the whole care of his Epiſcopate. Being thus affected one towards the other, the vehemency of their hatred hapned to be much increaſed by this reaſon. To Severianus on a time paſſing by, Serapion † ſhewed not that honour which is due to a Biſhop: but continued in his ſeat; whether it was becauſe he ſaw him not, (as Serapion afterwards affirmed upon oath before the Synod;) or whether it was becauſe he ſlighted the preſence of a Biſhop, (as Severianus averred,) [which of theſe was trueſt] I cannot ſay: God only knows. But Severianus could not then bear Serapion's contempt; tempt; but immediately, even before cognizance had been taken of the cauſe in a publick Synod, with an [a] oath condemns Serapion, and not only [diveſts him] of the dignity of a Deacon, but excommunicates him alſo from the Church. Johannes hearing this, took it very ill. But afterwards, when the buſineſs came under ſcrutiny before a Synod, and Serapion excuſed the fact, and averred that he ſaw him not, and alſo produced witneſſes [in confirmation thereof;] the whole Synod of Biſhops then convened pardoned him, and entreated Severianus to admit of Serapion's excuſe. But Johannes the Biſhop, that he might fully ſatisfie Severianus, removes Serapion and ſuſpends him from the * Office of a Deacon for a weeks ſpace: although he uſed him as his right hand in all buſineſſes, in regard he was a moſt acute and diligent perſon about Eccleſiaſtick Diſputes and Anſwers. Notwithſtanding, Severianus could not thus be prevailed with: but made it his whole buſineſs to get Serapion not only wholly degraded from his Diaconate, but excommunicated alſo. Johannes was ſorely vexed hereat, went out of the Synod, and left the Biſhops then preſent to determine the cauſe, having ſpoken theſe words to them: Do you inquire into the cauſe, and make ſuch a definitive determination as you ſhall think fit. For I refuſe to determine the difference between them. After Johannes had ſpoken theſe words, and was riſen up, the whole Synod aroſe likewiſe, and left the cauſe in the ſame ſtate it was in, blaming Severianus rather, becauſe he † acquieſced not in what had been ſaid by Johannes the Biſhop. But Johannes admitted not Severianus to a familiarity any more in future: but adviſed him to return into his own Country, ſignifying thus much to him: Severianus, (ſaid he,) 'tis not expedient, that the Dioceſs you are intruſted with ſhould for ſo long a time continue unlookt-after, and deſtitute of the preſence of its Biſhop. Wherefore, haſten your return to your Churches, and neglect not the Gift [which God hath beſtowed] upon you. When Severianus had begun his journey, the Empreſs Eudoxia, informed hereof, reproves Johannes, and cauſes Severianus to be forthwith recalled from Chalcedon in Bithynia. He came back immediately. But Johannes declined a friendſhip with him, and could by no perſons entreaty be prevailed upon: till ſuch time as the Empreſs Eudoxia, in that Church called the Apoſtles, caſt her Son Theodoſius Junior, then a very young child, before Johannes's knees, and having conjured him frequently by her Son, with much a-do perſwaded him to admit of a friendſhip with Severianus. After this manner therefore, ‖ &c.

[a] He means the oath mentioned before, at the 11th chapter, to wit, if Serapion dies a Chriſtian, Chriſt hath not been incarnate. Further, theſe words [condemns] and [excommunicates] denote Severianus's menaces, rather than the thing it ſelf. For Severianus Biſhop of Gabali had no power of condemning or depoſing a Deacon of another Dioceſs; but he only threatned to do this, and committed his complaint to the judgment of the Biſhops. Valeſ.

THE Emperour Arcadius having ended his life on the firſt of May, in the Conſulate of Baſſus and Philippus; Honorius his Brother [ſtill] Governed the Weſtern Empire: the Eaſtern was under the Government of * his Son Theodoſius Junior, at that time eight years of age. Anthemius the Præfectus Prætorio had the chief management of the publick affairs. For ſo I render χερσαῖα τείχη, that is, walls to the Landward, and not as Langus does, Brick-walls. But Nicephorus ſeems to be miſtaken, who attributes that to Anthemius, which was done long after tinople with a great wall. Of all the men of his own times, he was accounted and in reality was the moſt prudent perſon. He never did any thing without advice, but conſulted with many of his acquaintance concerning what ought to be done; chiefly, with [b] Troïlus the Sophiſta, who, beſides the [c] wiſdom that was in him, was Anthemius's equall in Politicall knowledge. Wherefore, almoſt all things were done with Troïlus's advice.

[b] This Troïlus the Sophiſta was one of Anthemius's chiefeſt friends, as (beſides Socrates) Syneſius informs us in his Epiſtle to Troïlus. Socrates mentions the ſame Troïlus, at chap. 6. book 6. where he ſpeaks concerning Euſebius Scholaſticus, who wrote Gaina's war in verſe. Suidas has mentioned the ſame perſon, in the word Τρωΐλος, where he affirms that he wrote Politick Orations, and Books of Epiſtles. Concerning Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, what manner of perſon he was as to his temper and diſpoſition.

DUring therefore the Emperours being in the eighth year of his age, Atticus was in the third year of his Epiſcopate over Conſtantinople, and was highly eminent. He was a perſon, (as we have ſaid * before,) beſides his great Learning, pious and prudent. Wherefore, he much augmented the Churches under his juriſdiction. For he not only defended thoſe of his own Creed, but cauſed the Hereticks alſo to admire his prudence. He was in no wiſe vexatious to them; but when he had attempted to terrifie them, afterwards he ſhewed himſelf mild towards them. Nor was he careleſs about his ſtudies. For he beſtowed much pains in reading ancient Writers, ſpending whole nights in peruſing them. Wherefore, he was not unacquainted with the diſcourſes of the Philoſophers and Sophiſtæ. Moreover, to thoſe that addreſt to him, he was pleaſant and delectable: He groaned with ſuch as were ſorrowfull: and, that I may ſpeak ſummarily, according to the Apoſtle's [example,] * he was made all things to all men. Formerly, during his being a Preſbyter, he made Sermons, gat them by heart, and Preach't them in the Church. But afterwards, by his aſſiduity, he procured ſuch a readineſs of expreſſion, as to be able to ſpeak † extemporè, and followed a panegyricall way of Preaching. Notwithſtanding, his Sermons were not ſuch, as were either received by his Hearers with applauſe, or committed to writing. But, concerning his Temper, Moralls, and Learning, let this ſuffice. I will now relate thoſe memorable paſſages which hapned in his times.

CHAP. III.

HONORIUS & THEOD. Jun.

Concerning Theodoſius and Agapetus Biſhops of Synnada.

IN [a] Synada a City of Phrygia Pacatiana, one Theodoſius was Biſhop, who ſeverely perſecuted the Hereticks in that City, wherein there were many of the Sect of the Macedoniani: he drove them not only out of the City, but from the [adjacent] Villages alſo. Which practiſe of his was not [b] agreeable to that of the Orthodox Church, which does not uſe to perſecute; nor was [He incited hereto] by a zeal for the true Faith: but being a perfect ſlave to the love of money, he made it his buſineſs to amaſs riches together, [by taking them] from the Hereticks. Wherefore, he made all imaginable attempts againſt thoſe that embraced the Sect of the Macedoniani, putting the Clergy that was under him in Arms; and practiſed a thouſand ſtratagems againſt them: nor did he forbear [c] binding them [over] to the Courts of Judicature.

[a] It would be more truly written Synnada, with a double n. For ſo the name of this City is more frequently inſcribed on old Coyns. Johannes Triſtanus has produced a Coyn of the Emperour Caracalla's, which has this inſcription, Συνναδέων [Synnadeon.] Yet 'tis ſometimes written with a ſingle n. So it is in an old Coyn of the Emperour Nerva's; in the reverſe whereof Jupiter is engraven with this Inſcription, ΔΙΑΠΑΝΔΙΜΟΝ CΥΝΑCΙS.

This Coyn was in the Archives of that illuſtrious perſonage the Lord Bryennius, concerning the meaning whereof when I was asked by the Learned Franciſcus Ogerius, (to whom Patinus had communicated that Coyn,) my anſwer was, it was to be read thus, διὰ πάνδημον συναδεῖς. For the Synnadenſians worſhipped Jupiter under the name of Pandemos, becauſe having heretofore been gathered together out of many ſorts of people in Greece, by Acamas, Theſeus's ſon, they inhabited the City Synnada. Whence ſays Stephanus, the City was ſo named, ἀπὸ τῆς σὺν ναίειν, from their dwelling together. Further, thoſe people out of whom the Colony of the Synnadenſians was firſt collected, were of two ſorts; to wit, the Macedonians, and the Athenians, or Ionians, who were in Aſia; as the ſame Stephanus relates. Whence we underſtand, why (in the Emperour Caracalla's Coyn, which Johannes Triſtanus has ſet forth,) the Synnadenſians, are termed Dorienſes and Ionians. For, this is the inſcription, συναδέων δωριέων ἰώνων. For the Macedonians, a Colony whereof Acamas brought thither, were originally Dorienſes. But the Athenians who went thither with Acamas Theſeus's ſon, and the Colonies which Acamas is reported to have gathered out of Aſia, were Ionians, ſo termed from Ion the Athenian. Valeſ.

[b] It is a famous queſtion, and uſually diſputed on both ſides, whether it be lawfull for Catholicks, eſpecially Biſhops, to perſecute Hereticks. In the determination whereof, I am of opinion, that a diſtinction is requiſite. For 'tis certain, that on account of amaſſing money together it is not lawfull for Catholicks to moleſt and vex Hereticks; which thing Theodoſius Biſhop of Synnada at that time did. Alſo, to perſecute them by criminall ſentences, and to thirſt after their bloud, is in like manner unlawfull; as Idatius and ſome other Prelates of Spain did in their perſecution of the Priſcilianiſts. To whoſe communion when S[t] Martin had for ſome time joyned himſelf, he acknowledged, that great detriment befell him from that thing, as Sulpicius Severus does relate in his Life. Notwithſtanding, it is and always was lawfull for Catholicks, to implore the aid of Princes and Magiſtrates againſt Hereticks, that they be reſtrained, and kept within the bounds of duty; leaſt they ſhould behave themſelves inſolently over the Catholicks, or leaſt they ſhould inſult over and ſcoff at the Catholick Religion. S[t] Auguſtine confeſſes indeed, that heretofore this was his Sentiment, to wit, that Hereticks were not to be moleſted and vexed by Catholicks, but that they were to be invited by all inſtances of manſuetude and mildneſs. But afterwards he altered his opinion, being moſt certainly informed, that the Laws of Princes made againſt Hereticks, are uſefull to Hereticks themſelves in order to their converſion. And he ſays this was acknowledged by the Donatiſts themſelves, who had afterwards returned to the Catholick Church. For they affirmed, that they had never returned to the Church, but had always continued in their errour, had they not been provoked and drawn as it were by thoſe penalties and mulcts [contained in] the Imperial Laws. There is a moſt elegant paſſage of Auguſtine's [about this matter] in his 48th Epiſtle to Vincentius; to which is to be added another paſſage of the ſame Authour, in his firſt book againſt Gaudentius, chap. 23. Valeſ.

[c] Δικαστηρίοις αὐτὸν παρεστήσειν. That is, he drew and bound them as it were to Judges Tribunals. Tranſlatours thought theſe words were ſpoken concerning bonds, as if Theodoſius the Biſhop had brought the Hereticks bound before the Judges. In which ſenſe Nicephorus alſo took this paſſage. But Socrates's words will not bear this meaning. Valeſ.

HONORIUS & THEOD. Jun.

More especially, he did severall ways disquiet their Bishop, whose name was Agapetus. But in regard the Governours of Provinces in no wise had (as he supposed) a sufficient power to punish [Hereticks,] he ran to Constantinople, and petitioned for Edicts from the Præfecti Prætorio. In the interim therefore that Theodosius stayed at Constantinople on this account, Agapetus, who as I have told you presided over the Sect of the Macedoniani, betook himself to a [prudent and] good [a] course. For, having communicated the affair to his whole Clergy, and called together the people under him, he perswades them to embrace the Homoöusian Faith. Having effected this, he went directly into the Church, accompanied with a great multitude, or rather with the whole body of the people in generall. Where * when he had solemnized the prayers, he took possession of the Chair, wherein Theodosius was wont to sit. And having united the people, and professing in future the Homoöusian Creed, he became possest of the Churches belonging to Synada. These things having been after this manner transacted, Theodosius arrives within a short time, and brings along with him a Præfecturian assistance: and being ignorant of what had been done, goes immediately to the Church. From whence he was driven by all persons unanimously, and went again to Constantinople. Being arrived there, he made complaint before Atticus the Bishop, of what had been done against him, to wit, that he had been [c] unjustly ejected out of his Bishoprick. Atticus knowing that this accident was advantagious to the Church, gave Theodosius comfortable words, perswading him with patience to embrace a quiet course of life, and informing him that he ought to prefer the good of the publick before his own private concern. But he wrote to Agapetus, [ordering him] to continue in possession of the Bishoprick, and [bidding] him not to be suspicious of any molestation from Theodosius's displeasure.

CHAP. IV.

Concerning the Paralyticall Jew, who was cured by Atticus the Bishop in divine Baptism.

THis was one usefull accident which befell the Church in the times of Atticus. Nor was the state of these times without Miracles, or Cures. For a Jew, who had been a * Paralytick for many years, was confined to his bed. And when all medicinall remedies had been applied to him, and no prayers of the Jews could do him any good; at length he betook himself to Christian Baptism, hoping that this would be his only true and Salutary Physitian. Atticus the Bishop was soon acquainted herewith. Having therefore instructed him in the rudiments of Christianity, and declared to him the hope in Christ, he ordered him to be carried in his bed to the Font. The Paralyticall Jew receiving Baptism with a sincere faith, immediately upon his being taken out of the water in the Font, was freed from his disease, and continued sound and healthy in future. This [admirable] Cure the power of Christ vouchsafed to shew to men even in our times: by reason whereof many Heathens believed and were baptized. But the Jews, although they seek after Signs, notwithstanding could not be induced [to believe,] by present miracles. Such benefits as these were conferred upon men by Christ.

CHAP. V.

How Sabbatius, who from being a Jew had been made a Presbyter of the Novatianists, deserted those of his own opinion.

BUt many persons slighting these things, persisted in their impiety. For the Jews did not only disbelieve these Miracles which happned; but such persons also as were studious followers of them, were found to hold the same Sentiments they did. For Sabbatius, of whom we have made mention a little * before, not willing to continue in the degree of a Presbyter to which he had been promoted, but being from the beginning ambitious of a Bishoprick, in these times separated from the Church of the Novatianists, making the observation of the Jewish Passover his pretence. Holding therefore assemblies that were Schismaticall and separate from his own Bishop Sisinnius, in a place of the City which is termed Xerolophus, where Arcadius's Forum now is, he attempted an audacious fact * that deserved many punishments. For, on one of his meeting-days, he read a passage in the Gospell, whereat these words occur, † Now, it was a Feast called the Passover of the Jews; to which he made an addition of his own, that was never written, nor ever heard of before; to wit, these words Cursed (says he) be that person who celebrates the Passover [a] not on the days of unleavened bread. These words of his being heard, spread immediately. And the simpler sort of the Novatian Laity, circumvented by this Artifice, betook themselves to him. But his fraud proved unsuccessfull to himself. And his forgery had an unhappy event. For not long after [b] he celebrated the Festivall by way of Anticipation; when many persons flockt to him. And whilst they were keeping the [c] Solemn Vigills by watching all night in the Church, a Dæmoniacall terrour seised them; as if Sisinnius their Bishop was come with a great multitude, [to fall] upon them. Hereupon a disturbance was raised, as it usually happens, and they being shut up by night in a streight place, trod upon one another: in so much that above seventy persons of them lost their lives. For this reason many deserted Sabbatius. Notwithstanding, some possest with a * rude anticipate opinion, continued with him. But, how Sabbatius violated his oath, and got into a Bishoprick, we will declare by and by.

[a] Ἔξω ἀζύμων. I like not the Version of Langus and Christophorson, who have rendred this place thus: maledictus qui absq; azimis pascha celebrat, cursed is he who celebrates the Passover without unleavened bread. In my judgement it must be rendred thus, beyond [or, not on] the days of unleavened bread. For in the Greek it is not ἄνευ or χωρὶς, that is, without: but ἔξω, which imports beyond, out of, or saving on. Vales.

[b] Τὴν δὲ περιλήψεως ἑορτὴν ἐπιτελῆ. Which Langus and Christophorson render thus: cum ex anticipatâ opinione Festum Paschæ celebraret, when he celebrated the Paschall Festivall by an anticipated opinion. I like Musculus's Version better, who translates it thus: per anticipationem celebraret, he celebrated [the Festivall] by way of anticipation. For Sabbatius celebrating the Paschall solemnity after the Jewish manner, prevented the Christians, and kept that Festivall before the Sunday. If these words are thus to be understood; it must be written, πρὸ ἑορτῆ δὲ περιλήψεως. Socrates uses the same term a little lower in this Chapter; where speaking concerning the same thing, his words are: τῇ ἀγροικικῇ περιλήψει κεκαλάμωσε, possest with a rude anticipate opinion. Where notwithstanding, περίληψις seems to be taken for an anticipate opinion. Vales.

[c] I understand The Vigill of the Paschall Festivall. Nor can ἡ ἐξ ἔθους παννυχὶς be any other then the Vigill of the Paschall Festivall. For Sabbatius (although he anticipated Easter, and celebrated it with the Jews yet) kept the Vigills on the Paschall Sabbath with the rest of the Christians; with whom also he celebrated Easter-day in a dissembling and negligent manner, as Socrates has related before, in book 5. chap. 21. And thus this passage in Socrates was understood by Nicephorus, whose words his Translatour hath not rendred well. Nicephorus's words words are theſe: τῇ δὲ ἐωθινῇ παννυχίδι τὸ πρεσπῆκον γέρας ἀφοσιωθῶν, &c. Which are to be tranſlated thus, But in regard they celebrated the ſolemn Vigill with a congruous worſhip meerly for faſhions ſake, &c. Moreover, why Sabbatius (although he followed the Jews in the obſervation of Eaſter, notwithſtanding) would feign a celebration of Eaſter with the Chriſtians, this in my judgement is the reaſon; becauſe he feared the Laws of the Emperours who had made a Sanction that they ſhould be accounted Hereticks, who kept not Eaſter on one and the ſame day with all other Chriſtians. This was the command of the Emperour Theodoſius, in the ninth Law of the Theodoſian Code de Hæretick. Valeſ.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning thoſe who at that time were the Ring-leaders of the Arian Opinion.

DOrotheus Biſhop of the Arian Hereſie (who had been tranſlated by the Arians from Antioch to Conſtantinople, as we have related * before,) having lived an hundred and nineteen years, died in Honorius's ſeventh and Theodoſius Auguſtus's ſecond Conſulate, on the ſixth of November. After this perſon Barba preſided over the Arian Sect. In whoſe time the Arian Hereſie was very happy in having two eloquent men, both whom were dignified with a Presbyterate. The name of the one was Timotheus; the other was called Georgius. Georgius was furniſhed with more of Grecian Literature: but Timotheus had beſtowed greater pains about the Sacred Scripures. Moreover, Georgius had Ariſtotle's and Plato's books always in his hands: but Timotheus was † an admirer of Origen: and in his Expoſitions of the Sacred Scriptures in publick, he [ſhewed himſelf] not to be unskilled in the Hebrew Tongue. Timotheus, had formerly been an adherent to the Sect of the || Pſathyriani. But Georgius had been ordained by Barba. I my ſelf diſcourſed with this Timotheus, and evidently perceived how ready and expedite he was in returning anſwers to thoſe who queſtioned him, and in explaining the moſt obſcure places which occur in the Sacred Scriptures. He always quoted Origen as a moſt evident witneſs of what he aſſerted. I cannot therefore but wonder, how theſe two perſons ſhould perſiſt [in their adherence] to Arianiſm; the one of whom had Plato always in his hand; and the other had Origen in his mouth. For neither does Plato aſſert, that the Second and Third Cauſe (as he uſually terms them,) took a beginning of Exiſtence. And Origen every where acknowledges the Son to be coeternal with the Father. But, though they continued in their own Church, yet the Arian hereſie was by them reduced to a better and more moderate temper. For by their own doctrine they baniſhed many of Arius's blaſphemies. But thus far concerning theſe perſons. Not long after this, Siſinnius Biſhop of the Novatianiſts dyed, in the ſame Conſulate, and Chryſanthus is ordained, concerning whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter.

How Cyrillus ſucceeded Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria.

SOme little time after this, Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria fell into a * Lethargick diſtemper, and died in Honorius's ninth and Theodoſius's fifth Conſulate, on the fifteenth of the month October. And a contention being raiſed there alſo about the Biſhoprick, ſome endeavoured to place Timotheus the Arch-deacon in the Epiſcopal Chair; others Cyrillus, [a] who was Theophilus's ſiſter's ſon. When a Sedition aroſe hereupon amongſt the people, Abundatius Commander of the Milice [in Egypt] favoured Timotheus's party. Wherefore, on the third day after Theophilus's death, Cyrillus was placed in the Chair, and came to the Biſhoprick with a greater power than Theophilus had done. For from that time, the * Biſhops of Alexandria [b] ſurpaſſing the Sacerdotall degree and bounds, exerciſed a principality, and took upon them the [ſecular] Government of affairs. Cyrillus therefore forthwith ſhut up the Churches of the Novatianiſts at Alexandria; and in the firſt place he took away all their ſacred veſſells and ornaments; after which he deprived their Biſhop Theopemptus of all he had.

Wherefore I rather believe he was Cyrillus's mother's brother. In Sozomen there is mention of Theophilus's Siſter. Facundus Hermianenſis and Epiphanius Scholaſticus term Theophilus Cyrillus's Couſin-german; which is ill done: but from thence 'tis clearly intimated, that Cyrillus was related to Theophilus by his Siſter. Valeſ.

Concerning Maruthas Biſhop of Meſopotamia, and how the Chriſtian Religion was by him propagated in Perſia.

ABout the very ſame time, the Chriſtian Religion hapned to be propagated in Perſia, upon this account. Between the Romans and Perſians frequent Embaſſies are continually ſent. [a] For there are ſeverall reaſons, why they ſhould frequently ſend Embaſſies to one another. There hapned therefore to be a neceſſity at that time, that Maruthas Biſhop of Meſopotamia (whom we have mentioned a little * before,) ſhould be ſent by the Roman Emperour to the King of the Perſians. The Perſian King having found that this perſon was endewed with an eminency of piety, honoured him highly, and gave him attention, as being really and truly a friend of God. The Magi, [b] whoſe intereſt is great with the Perſian King, were incenſed hereat. For they were afraid leaſt he ſhould perſwade the King, to turn Chriſtian. For Maruthas by his prayers had cured the King of a pain in his head wherewith he had been a long while troubled, which the Magi could not cure him of. Wherefore, the Magi betake themſelves to the inventing of a fraudulent deſign. And whereas the Perſians worſhip fire, and the King was wont to adore a fire which was always burning in a certain houſe; they hid a man under ground, whom (at ſuch time as the King

King usually * worshipped) they ordered to speak [to this effect,] that the King ought to be thrust out of doors: for he had done impiously, because he supposed a Priest of the Christians to be dear to God. Isdigerdes (for that was the Persian King's name,) having heard these words, although he reverenced Maruthas, notwithstanding had thoughts of sending him away. But Maruthas, a man truly acceptable to God, was very earnest in putting up his prayers, whereby he detected the fraud which the Magi had framed. [He addressed himself] therefore to the King in these words, Be not deluded, O King! But go into [the house,] and when you shall hear the voice, dig up the ground, and you will discover the Fraud. For the fire speaks not, but the invention of men does this. The King of the Persians is perswaded by Maruthas, and goes into the little house again, * where fire is kept always burning. And when he had heard the same voice again, he ordered the place to be dug up where he that uttered the words which were supposed to be God's, was found. Therefore, the King was highly incensed, and gave order that the * Tribe of the Magi should be || decimated. After this was done, he spoke to Maruthas, to build Churches wheresoever he pleased. From that time the Christian Religion was propagated amongst the Persians. Moreover, Maruthas having then left Persia returned to Constantinople. But, not long after he was sent Embassadour again to the Persians. And the Magi betook themselves to the invention of Plots and intreagues again, to hinder his being admitted by the King. [c] For by a device they raised a most horrid stink in that place, [d] into which the King usually came; and they calumniously accused the Christians, as if they had caused it. But when the King, in regard he already had a suspicion of the Magi, made a more exact scrutiny about the occasioners [of this stink,] the Magi were found again to be the causes of this ill smell. Wherefore he punished many of them again: but he had a greater honour and esteem for Maruthas. And he loved the Romans, with whom he embraced a friendship. Yea, the King himself wanted but little of turning Christian, after Maruthas, together with [e] Abdas the Bishop of Persia, had shewed another * Miracle. For both these persons, when they had fasted long, and been earnest in prayers, cast out a devill that vexed the Kings Son. But Isdigerdes, before he became a perfect Christian, was prevented by death. His Kingdom devolved to his Son Vararanes: in whose time the League between the Romans and Persians was broken, as we shall declare hereafter.

That Rome became subject to the Barbarians at that time, and was destroyed by Alarichus.

AT that very time Rome hapned to be taken by the Barbarians. For one Alarichus a Barbarian, (who had been an Allie of the Romans, and had assisted the Emperour Theodosius in the War against the Tyrant Eugenius, on which account he was honoured with [a] Roman dignities,) could not bear his fortunate success. (book 5.) relates, that Alarichus, after the expedition against the Tyrant Eugenius, wherein he had done excellent service, was Commander of no Roman Forces, but returned into Thracia, and kept with him those Barbarians only, whom he had commanded. But, a little afterwards, when being sent for by Rufinus, he had ruined Gracia and Epirus, he was created Master of the Milice throughout Illyricum; as Claudian informs us in his second book against Eutropius.

He presumed not indeed to seize the Empire: but retired from Constantinople, and went into the Western parts. Being arrived in Illyricum, he laid all places desolate immediately. The Thessalians resisted him in his march, about the mouthes of the River Peneus, from whence there is a passage * over the mountain Pindus to Nicopolis [a City] of Epirus. And coming to an engagement, the Thessalians killed about three thousand [of his Forces.] After this the Barbarians that were with him, burnt and ruined what ever was in their way and in fine took Rome it self. Which City they destroyed, and burnt the greatest part [b] of the admirable works and structures therein: but they made plunder of the money, and divided it [amongst themselves.] They also forced many of the Senatorian Order to undergo various punishments, and [afterwards] slew them. [Alarichus] likewise, in contempt to Empire, proclaimed one Attalus Emperour. Whom he ordered to go guarded like an Emperour one day; and the next made him appear in a servile habit. After he had done all this, he fled, being terrified with a Rumour, as if the Emperour Theodosius had sent an Army to fight him. Nor was this Rumour false. For an Army did really come. And he was unable to bear the same thereof; but, as I have said, fled away. 'Tis reported, that as he went to Rome, he was met by a pious person that led a monastick life, who advised him not to rejoyce in [perpetrating] so great and notorious mischiefs, nor to delight in slaughter and bloud. To whom Alarichus made this return, *I go not thither of my own accord. Concerning the Biſhops of Rome.

After Innocentius, Zoſimus was poſſeſt of the Churches at Rome, for the ſpace of two years. After whom, Boniſacius preſided over that Church three years, who was ſucceeded by Celeſtinus. And this Celeſtinus deprived the Novatianiſts alſo at Rome of their Churches, and forced their Biſhop Ruſticula to hold his Meetings in private and obſcure houſes. For till this time, the Novatianiſts flouriſhed mightily at Rome, had many Churches, and aſſembled numerous congregations therein. But envy * impaired them alſo; the Roman Biſhoprick, having (like that of Alexandria,) ſurpaſſed the Sacerdotall degree and bounds, and degenerated long before into a ſecular principality. And for this reaſon the [Roman] Biſhops would not permit even thoſe who agreed with them in the faith, peaceably and quietly to celebrate their meetings: but took from them all they had; only they praiſed them for their agreement in the faith. Notwithſtanding, the Conſtantinopolitan Biſhops were not thus affected. For they not only permitted [the Novatianiſts] to have their meetings within the City, but had a ſingular love and affection for them alſo, as I have ſufficiently declared already.

* Or, ſeized, or, devoured.

Concerning Chryſanthus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts at Conſtantinople.

After Siſinnius's death, Chryſanthus was by force made Biſhop. He was the ſon of that * Marcianus, who had been Biſhop of the Novatianiſts before Siſinnius. From his younger years he had had a Military Employ in the Pallace; afterwards in the Reign of Theodoſius the Great, he was made Conſularis of Italy, and after that Vicarius of the Britannick Iſlands; for his management of both which charges he was much admired. Being grown elderly, he returned to Conſtantinople; and deſiring to be made Præfect of that City, he was againſt his will compelled to take the Biſhoprick. For Siſinnius having mentioned him at the time of his death, as a fit perſon for the Biſhoprick; the Novatian people, with whom Siſinnius's words were a Law, attempted to draw him by force, even againſt his will. But when Chryſanthus fled, Sabbatius ſuppoſing an opportune ſeaſon was offered him, wherein he might be made poſſeſſour of the Churches, gets himſelf ordained Biſhop by ſome obſcure [Prelates] and ſlights the oath which he had bound himſelf in. Amongſt thoſe who ordained Sabbatius Biſhop, Hermogenes was one, who had been Excommunicated and curſed by Sabbatius, for his blaſphemous books. But Sabbatius's deſign proved unſucceſsfull to him. For the people hating * his unreaſonable ambition, (becauſe [a] he did all things with a deſign of getting into the Biſhoprick,) made it their whole buſineſs to find out Chryſanthus. Whom they found abſconding in Bithynia, whence they brought him by force, and preferred him to the Biſhoprick. He was a perſon of as great prudence and modeſty, as any man was: and by his means the Church of the Novatianiſts at Conſtantinople was preſerved and increaſed. He was the firſt perſon who diſtributed Gold * of his own to the poor. He received nothing from the Churches, ſave only [b] two Loaves of the Bleſſed Bread every Sunday. Moreover, he was ſo carefull about his Church, that he took [c] Ablabius the eloquenteſt Oratour of his own time, from Troilus the Sophiſta's School, and ordained him Presbyter. Whoſe elegant and acute Sermons are now extant. But Ablabius was afterwards conſtituted Biſhop of the Novatianiſts Church at Nicæa, in which City he taught Rhetorick at the ſame time alſo.

* Or, his immorality.

[a] Πάντα σκοπὸν τῷ παρεισδῦναι εἰς τὸν ἐπισκοπὸν ἔπραξε. This expreſſion is not in my judgment good Greek. Nicephorus in regard he liked it not, altered it thus: πάντα καλὸν ἐκίνει τὴν Ἐπισκοπὴν παρεισδῦναι, he moved every rope to get into the Biſhoprick. But in my mind, this place in Socrates is to be thus reſtored: ὅτι πάντα σκοπὸν τὸ παρεισδῦναι εἰς τὸν Ἐπισκοπὸν ἔπραξε, becauſe he did all things with a deſign of getting into the Biſhoprick. Of theſe Loaves ſome were taken for the Euchariſt: the reſt were allotted for the food of the Clergy by the Biſhop; who alſo took ſome of them himſelf, as much as he would, as we are informed from this place. You muſt note further, that Socrates ſays ἀπὸ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, from the Churches. But in my judgment, it muſt be thus written, ἀβλάβιον ἐφ' ἑαυτῷ, &c. The beſt Oratour of his own time, &c. The Schollars of the Sophiſts, who learned Rhetorick were heretofore termed Rhetoricians. Notwithſtanding, all the Sophiſts Schollars had not that appellation, but the eminenteſt of them only, who being initiated by a certain Rite, wore a Rhetorician's Pallium, which was red or ſcarlet-coloured. We are informed hereof by Cyrillus in his Lexicon: τείβωνες, παραλλήματά τινα. Concerning the Fight which hapned at Alexandria between the Chriſtians and Jews, and concerning Cyrillus the Biſhops difference with Oreſtes the Præfect.

About the ſame time, the Jewiſh Nation were driven out of Alexandria by Cyrillus the Biſhop, for this reaſon. The Alexandrians are more ſeditious and tumultuous, than any other people: and if at any time they get an occaſion, they [uſually] break out into intollerable miſchiefs. For their rage is not appeaſed without bloud. It hapned at that time, that the populace of that City were tumultuous amongſt themſelves, not upon any weighty or neceſſary occaſion, but by reaſon of that miſchief which abounds in all Cities, I mean an earneſt deſire of looking upon Dancers. For in regard a Dancer gathered great multitudes together on the Sabbath day, becauſe the Jews work not on that day, nor are buſied in hearing their Law, but [ſpend their time in ſeeing] Theatricall Shews; that day uſually occaſioned mutuall factions and diviſions among the people. And although this was in ſome meaſure regulated and repreſſed by the Præfect of Alexandria, nevertheleſs the Jews continued enraged againſt thoſe of the contrary faction: and beſides their being always enemies to the Chriſtians, they were much more incenſed [a] againſt them on account of the Dancers. Therefore, when Oreſtes Præfect of Alexandria [b] made a Police (ſo the Alexandrians do uſually term publick Orders,) in the Theatre; ſome of Biſhop Cyrillus's favourers were preſent there alſo, being deſirous to know the Orders that were made by the Præfect. Amongſt whom was a perſon by name Hierax, a teacher of the [c] meaner ſort of Learning.

[a] Inſtead of [κατ' ἑαυτὸν] Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon read κατ' ἀυτὸν, againſt them.] Which reading I like better.

Notwithſtanding, Nicephorus retains the common reading. Valeſ.

[b] Πολιτείαν ἐν τῷ θεάτρῳ ποιοῦντος. Epiphanius Scholaſticus was miſtaken in thinking there was a Feſtivall which the Alexandrians called Politia. Nor was Chriſtophorſon leſs out, in ſuppoſing the publick Edicts of the Imperiall Præfects to be ſo termed by the Alexandrians, which Oreſtes publiſhed then in the Theatre. In which he is doubly miſtaken. Firſt, becauſe he thought that all the Imperiall Edicts were by the Alexandrians called Politia; whereas, thoſe Edicts only had that name, which belonged to the quiet and profit of the City. Agreeable whereto, thoſe Orders made in reſpect to the prizes of Corn and other vendible commodities uſually expoſed to ſale in the Market, at Paris we now term in French a Police, and the Orders of Police. Secondly, Chriſtophorſon miſtakes in ſuppoſing that theſe Edicts were publiſhed by Oreſtes in the Theatre. For Socrates does not ſay ſo, but only that Oreſtes made (that is, dictated, or rehearſed to his officers) theſe orders in the Theatre. For the Roman Magiſtrates were wont to ſit in judgment and decide matters in the Law, in the Theatre, Circus, or in any other place they had a mind to. So Amm. Marcellinus relates (book 15.) concerning Leontius Præfect of the City. Moreover, the orders then made by Oreſtes, reſpected the Theatre, and the publick ſhows. Valeſ.

[c] Περὶ γράμματα (which are the terms here uſed,) do import the firſt Ruaiments which children learn. The teachers hereof are by the Greeks termed Grammatiſtæ, and by the Latines Literatores. Valeſ.

He was a zealous hearer of Cyrillus the Biſhop, and always mighty diligent about raiſing the * Clappings at his Sermons. The Jewiſh multitude ſpying this Hierax in the Theatre, cried out immediately, that he came into the Theatre for nothing elſe, but to raiſe a Sedition amongſt the people. Moreover, Oreſtes had long before conceived an hatred againſt the ſecular Government of Biſhops, becauſe it diminiſhed much of their power who had been appointed Governours of Provinces by the Emperour; and alſo more eſpecially, becauſe Cyrillus was deſirous of prying into his Acts and Orders. Having ſeized Hierax therefore, he made him undergo tortures publickly in the Theatre. With which Cyrillus being acquainted, ſends for the chief of the Jews, and threatned them with condign puniſhment, unleſs they deſiſted from being tumultuous againſt the Chriſtians. Of which menaces after the Jewiſh multitude were made ſenſible, they became more pertinacious; and contrived plots to damnifie the Chriſtians. The chiefeſt of which deſigns of theirs, and which occaſioned their expulſion out of Alexandria, I will relate here. Having † agreed upon a ſign amongſt themſelves, [which was,] that every one of them ſhould wear a ring on their fingers made of the bark of a Palm-tree-branch, they took a reſolution of making an attack upon the Chriſtians by a night-fight. One night therefore they ſent ſome perſons provided for that purpoſe, who cried out in all the * ſtreets of the City, that Alexander's Church was on fire. The Chriſtians hearing this, ran ſome one way, others another, that they might preſerve the Church. Then the Jews ſet upon them immediately, and ſlew them: they abſtained from killing thoſe of their own party, by ſhewing their rings; but they murdered all the Chriſtians they hapned to meet with. When it was day, the Authours of this nefarious fact were not concealed. Cyrillus highly incenſed hereat, went accompanied with a great multitude to the Jews Synagogues (ſo they term their houſes of prayer,) which he took from them: he alſo expelled the Jews out of the City, and permitted the multitude to make plunder of their goods. The Jews therefore, who had inhabited that City from the days of Alexander the Macedonian, were all forced to remove naked from thence at that time, and were diſperſed ſome in one place, others in another. Adamantius, [one of them] [d] a profeſſour of Phyſick, went to Conſtantinople, and fled to Atticus the Biſhop; and having turned a profeſſour of Chriſtianity, returned afterwards to Alexandria again, and fixt his reſidence there. But Oreſtes Præfect of Alexandria was highly incenſed at what was done; being exceedingly troubled, becauſe ſo great a City was on ſuch a ſudden emptied of ſo numerous a company of inhabitants. Wherefore, he acquainted the Emperour with what had been done. Cyrillus himſelf likewiſe made known the Jews wickedneſſes to the Emperour; nevertheleſs, he ſent meſſengers to Oreſtes, on account of procuring a reconciliation. For the people of Alexandria compelled him to do this. And when Oreſtes would not admit of any conferences about a reconciliation, Cyrillus [e] held forth the Book of the Goſpells to him, thinking he ſhould by that ſtrike a reverence into Oreſtes. But when he would not be mollified even by this means, but continued an irreconcileable War between himſelf and Cyrillus; This accident hapned afterwards.

Such a one was Magnus Medicus, who profeſſed Phyſick publickly at Alexandria; but was a better Orator then Phyſitian; as Eunapius informs us, in his book De Vitis Sophiſtarum. Such a one alſo was Geſius the Phyſitian in the times of the Emperour Zeno; concerning whom ſee Stephanus Byzantius, in the word γάζα. Damaſcius (in the Life of Iſidorus) ſpends a great many words about this Geſius; and from him Suidas, in the word γέσιος. That the Monks of Nitria came down to Alexandria in defence of Cyrillus, and raiſed a Sedition againſt Oreſtes the Præfect.

SOme of the Monks who inhabited the mountaines of Nitria, retaining an heat of mind from Theophilus's times, who had armed them unjuſtly againſt Dioſcorus and his Brethren, were incenſed with a zeal then alſo, and took a reſolution of fighting couragiouſly in defence of Cyrillus. About five hundred perſons therefore of them went out of their Monaſteries, came down to the City, and obſerve the Præfect going forth in his Chariot. They came to him, and called him Sacrificer and Pagan, and gave him many other reproachfull terms. The Præfect, having a ſuſpicion that a plot was framed againſt him by Cyrillus, cryed out that he was a Chriſtian, and had been baptized by Atticus the Biſhop at Conſtantinople. But when the Monks heeded not what he ſaid, one of them, by name Ammonius, flings a ſtone and ſtrikes Oreſtes on the head. By which wound he was all over beſmeared with bloud: and his * Appa- ritors that attended him, except a very few, receded, ran some one way, others another, [and hid themselves] in the Crowd, to avoid being killed by the throwing of stones. In the interim the Alexandrians flockt together, with a resolution to be revenged upon the Monks on the Præfect's account. They put all the rest of them to flight; but seized Ammonius, and bring him before the Præfect. He, agreeable to the Laws, [a] put him to The Question publickly, and tortured him to such a degree, that he died. Not long after, he acquainted the Emperours with what had been done. But Cyrillus gave the Emperour a Narrative [of the business] contradictory [to Orestes's.] And he took Ammonius's body, deposited it in one of the Churches, altered his name calling him Thaumasius, ordered he should be stiled a Martyr, and extolled his magnanimity publickly in the Church, as if he had undergone the combat in defence of piety. But the modester and more sober persons even of the Christians, approved not of this favour of Cyrillus's shown towards Ammonius. For they certainly knew, that Ammonius had undergone the punishment of his rashness, and died not under his tortures, as forced to renounce Christ. Wherefore, Cyrillus himself caused the memory of this affair to be by little and little buried in silence. But that fierce contention between Cyrillus and Orestes stopt not here. For it was [b] rekindled by another accident not unlike those foregoing.

[a] That is, tortured him. Instead of [ὑπολαβὼν, undertaking,] it must undoubtedly be [ὑποβαλὼν, put him to, or made him undergo,] as Sr Henry Savil had mended it at the Margin of his Copy. Nor did Musculus read otherwise, who has rendred this place thus: quem ille publicè secundum leges torturæ subjicit, whom he makes to undergo torture in publick, agreeable to the Laws. Where you see Musculus took the word δημοσίᾳ for an adverb, and is therein followed by Christophorson. For thus he renders it: Præfectus palàm, uti leges postulant, de eo quæstionem exercere, The Præfect, as the Laws required, put him to the Question openly. Notwithstanding, δημοσία may be taken adjectively in the same sense. I have observed a little before from Amm. Marcellinus, that the Roman Magistrates were wont to take Criminalls openly and in publick, and torture them; in regard they had their Apparitors always about them. Therefore, even whilest they rode in their Chariots, they put offenders to the Question, as Marcellinus relates concerning Leontius, and Socrates at this place concerning Orestes. Vales.

[b] The Verb, ἀπέσβεσε, extinguished, is in no wise agreeably used here. I had much rather make it ἀνέφλεξε, rekindled. For ἀνῆψε (which Verb Sr Henry Savil and the Geneva Printers have set in the margin from Christophorson's Copy,) is not to be born with, in regard it signifies, was kindled, not, was renewed. I found here no alteration in the M.SS. Copies. Nicephorus has also followed the common reading. For, instead of ἀπέσβεσε, extinguished, he makes use of ἠμαύρωσε, was obscured, or, obliterated. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning Hypatia the Philosophéress.

[a] The incomparably Learned Sr Henry Savil, at the margin of his Copy, had made this remark, which we thought good to communicate to the studious Reader.

THere was a woman at Alexandria, by name Hypatia. She was daughter to [a] Theon the Philosopher. She had arrived to so eminent a degree of Learning, that she excelled [all] the Philosophers of her own times, and succeeded in [b] that Platonick School derived from Plotinus, and expounded all the precepts of Philosophy to those who would hear her. Wherefore, all persons who were studious about Philosophy, flockt to her from all parts. By reason of that eminent * Gracefullness and readiness of expression, wherewith she had accomplished her self by her Learning, she addressed frequently even to the Magistrates, with a singular modesty. Nor was she ashamed of appearing in a publick Assembly of men. For all persons revered and admired her, for her eximious modesty. Envy armed it self against this woman at that time. For, because she had frequent conferences with Orestes, for this reason a calumny was framed against her amongst the Christian populace, as if she hindred Orestes from coming to a reconciliation with the Bishop. Certain persons therefore of fierce and over hot minds, who were headed by one Peter a Reader, conspired against the woman, and observe her returning home from some place. And having pulled her out of her Chariot, they drag her to the Church named [c] Cæsareum. Where they stript her, and murdered her with Shells. And when they had torn her piece-meal, they carried all her members to a place called Cinaron, and consumed them with fire. This fact * brought no small [d] disgrace upon Cyrillus and the Alexandrian Church. For, murthers, fights, and things of that nature, are wholly forreign to the Embracers of Christianity. These things were done on the fourth year of Cyrillus's Episcopate, in Honorius's tenth and Theodosius's [e] sixth Consulate, in the month of March, in Lent.

* Παῤῥησίαν; confidence and freedome in speaking.

* Or, wrought no small disgrace to, &c.

[d] 'Tis certain, that Damascius (in the life of Isidorus the Philosopher, which by Gods assistance I will ere long set forth larger by half, than it is) does make Cyrillus the Authour of Hypatia's murder. Damascius's words are these: ἤδη γοῦν ποτὲ σωέβη τὸν ὑποστρατηγοῦντα τῷ ἀντικειμένῳ αἵρεσιν κύριλλον, παρελθόντα διὰ τὸ οἶκον τῆς ὑπατίας, and so on, which occur in Suidas. 'Tis a most elegant passage, which in favour to the studious Reader, I will render into English, and annex it here, repeating Damascius's words a little higher. The Governours also of the City Alexandria, as soon as they came into that City, visited her in the first place. Which has been usually done at Athens also. For, though the thing it self be lost, yet the name of Philosophy seems as yet magnificent and venerable to persons who hold the principall place in the government of the publick. It happened therefore one time, that Cyrillus a Bishop of the Christian Religion, passing by Hypatia*'s house, saw a great company before her door, both of men and horses; some of whom came, others went away, and others stayed. And when he had inquired what that multitude meant and why so great a tumult was made, he was answered by his followers, that they then saluted* Hypatia the Philosophéress, and that that was her house. Which when Cyrillus had been acquainted with, he was so galled with envy, that he forthwith contrived her murder, and that in the most nefarious manner. For when Hypatia went out of her house as she was wont to do, many inhumane Ruffians, who fear neither the punishment of the Gods, nor the revenge of men, assault and kill her; defiling their own country with a most horrid crime and disgrace. The Emperour was highly incensed thereat, and had revenged it, had not Ædesius corrupted the Emperours friends. The Emperour pardoned the Assassines. But he drew the revenge upon his own head, and on his own family: For his Nephew underwent the punishment. Thus far Damascius. Where by Nephew he means, as I suppose, Valentinianus the son of Placidia, who was Aunt to Theodosius Junior. Vales.

sided; as Damascius (in the Life of Isidorus, pag. 1038,) and Æneas Gazæus (in Theophrasto,) do inform us. But the Succession of this School is not to be deduced from Plotinus. For Plotinus never taught Philosophy at Alexandria. Plotinus was indeed instructed in Philosophy at Alexandria, by Ammonius; but he himself never kept a School there, but continued teaching at Rome for the space of twenty six years compleat, untill his death; as Porphyrius relates in his Life. Wherefore, instead of Plotinus, I would more willingly put Ammonius here. Unless we should say, that the Alexandrian School had associated Plotinus to themselves, as being the eminentest Master and Instructor of the Platonick Philosophy. By this means our Socrates may be excused. Vales.

phorſon has done ill to mend it thus, Theodoſius's ſeventh Conſulate; whoſe verſion led Baronius into a miſtake, as you may ſee at the year of Chriſt 415. From the incomparable Florentine and Sfortian M.SS. I have mended this place thus, Theodoſius's ſixth Conſulate; which emendation is confirmed by the Faſti Conſulares. Valeſ.

That the Jews entring upon another War againſt the Chriſtians, were puniſhed.

SOme time after this, the Jews renued their abſurd and impious practiſes againſt the Chriſtians, and were puniſhed [again for them.] At a place named Inneſtar, which is ſcituate between Chalcis and Antioch of Syria, the Jews (as 'twas their uſage) exhibited ſome ſports. During their ſports they performed many mad actions, excited thereto by their drunkenneſs; and in their recreations reproach't not only the Chriſtians, but even Chriſt himſelf. And in deriſion to the Croſs, and to them who put their truſt in him that was crucified, they attempted this villanous fact. Having ſeized a Chriſtian boy, they bound him to a Croſs, and hung him up. At firſt they laughed at and jeered him. But becoming afterwards inraged, they ſcourged the boy till he died. For this reaſon there hapned a ſharp conflict betwixt them and the Chriſtians. And after the Emperours were acquainted with this fact, an Order was iſſued out to the Governours of the Province, to find out and puniſh the Authours thereof. Thus the Jews, who inhabited that place, were puniſhed for the wickedneſs they had committed in their ſports.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning Paulus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts, and concerning the Miracle done by him, when he was about to have baptized a Jewiſh Impoſtour.

AT the ſame time, Chryſanthus alſo Biſhop of the Novatianiſts, having preſided ſeaven years over the Churches * of his own Sect, ended his life in the Conſulate of Monaxius and Plintha, on the twenty ſixth of Auguſt. He was ſucceeded in the Biſhoprick by Paulus: who before had been a Teacher of Roman Eloquence: but afterwards bad adieu to the Roman tongue, and betook himſelf to an Aſcetick courſe of life. And having gathered together a Monaſtery of Religious men, he followed a way of living not unlike that led by the Monks in the deſart. For I found him to be really ſuch a perſon, as Evagrius ſays the Monks who live in the Solitudes ought to be. For he imitated them exactly in all things, in continued faſts, in ſpeaking little, and in abſtaining from eating creatures that have life. Moreover, for the moſt part he abſtained from oyl and wine. Beſides, his care and ſolicitude about the poor was eminent and extraordinary. He was very diligent in his viſits to the impriſoned; he interceded likewiſe for many perſons with the Judges, who readily hearkned to him on account of his eminent piety. What need I be large in my relation concerning him? I will mention one action of his, highly worthy to be recorded in writing. A Jewiſh Impoſtour pretending himſelf converted to the Chriſtian Religion, had been frequently baptized, and by that device had gathered much money.

* Or, under him.

When he had deceived many Sects [of the Chriſtians] by this fraud: (for he had receved baptiſm from the Arians and Macedonians:) having no more perſons whom he might put tricks upon, at length he came to Paulus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts: and affirming that he earneſtly deſired Baptiſm, requeſted he might obtain it from his hand. He approved of the Jews deſire: but ſaid he would not give him Baptiſm, before he had been inſtructed in the grounds and principles of the Faith, and had exerciſed himſelf with faſtings ſeverall days. The Jew therefore having contrary to his own mind, been compelled to faſt, was ſo much the more urgent in his intreaties for Baptiſm. Wherefore Paulus, becauſe he would not offend him, now grown importunate, by any longer delays, makes proviſion for his Baptiſm. And having bought him a white veſtment, and ordered the * Font to be filled with water, he brought the Jew to it with a deſign to Baptize him. But † an inviſible act of divine power cauſed the water to vaniſh [on a ſudden.] In regard the Biſhop and thoſe that were preſent, (having not the leaſt ſuſpicion of any ſuch thing as had happened,) ſuppoſed the water to have run out by the paſſage underneath, whereby it was uſually let out; they filled the Font again, having with great accuracy ſtopt up its paſſages every where. And when the Jew was brought the ſecond time to the Font, all the water diſappeared again. Then Paulus ſpake theſe words: either you are an Impoſtour, O man, or elſe, being ignorant, you have been baptized already. A great multitude of people therefore running together to ſee this Miracle, one of them knew the Jew, and was certain that it was the ſame perſon who had been baptized before by Atticus the Biſhop. This Miracle was performed by the hands of [Paulus] Biſhop of the Novatianiſts.

CHAP. XVIII.

How, after the death of Iſdigerdes the Perſian King, the League between the Romans and Perſians was broken, and a bloudy War hapned, wherein the Perſians were worſted.

AFter the death of Iſdigerdes King of Perſia, by whom the Chriſtians in that country were not perſecuted in the leaſt, his Son by name Vararanes ſucceeded in that Kingdom; and being induced thereto by the Magi, he vexed the Chriſtians ſeverely, inflicting on them various puniſhments and Perſian tortures. The Chriſtians therefore in Perſia, conſtrained thereto by neceſſity, flie to the Romans, entreating them not to neglect and ſee them wholly deſtroyed. Atticus the Biſhop receives the ſuppliants kindly; and made it his buſineſs to aſſiſt them to the utmoſt of his power. Likewiſe, he acquainted the Emperour Theodoſius with what had hapned. It fell out at the very ſame time, that the Romans were offended with the Perſians upon another account: becauſe the Perſians would not reſtore the Miners of Gold, whom they had hired of the Romans; and in regard they had deprived the Roman Merchants of their * effects. To this occaſion of difference, the flight of the Chriſtians in Perſia to the Romans made an acceſſion. For the Perſian King diſpatch't away an Embaſſie immediately, to demand the Fugatives. But the Romans would in no wiſe deliver up thoſe who had fled to them, not only becauſe they were deſirous of preſerving them as being ſuppliants, but in regard likewiſe of their readineſs to do any thing in defence of the Chriſtian Religion. Wherefore they choſe rather to have a war with the Perſians, than permit the Chriſtians to be miſerably deſtroyed. Hereupon the League was broken, and a fierce War broke out, concerning which I judge it not inopportune to give a ſhort narrative. The Roman Emperour ſent part of an Army firſt, which was commanded by Ardaburius. He made an irruption into Perſia through Armenia, and ruined one of the Perſian Provinces termed Azazene. Narſæus the Perſian King's Generall marched out to oppoſe him, at the head of a great Perſian Army. And coming to an Engagement, was worſted, and fled. [Afterwards] he judged it advantagious to make a ſudden irruption through Meſopotamia into the Roman territories being unguarded, [thinking] by this means to be revenged on the Romans. But this deſign of Narſæus's was not unknown to the Generall of the Romans. Having therefore in a ſhort time laid Azazene deſolate, he likewiſe marched into Meſopotamia. Wherefore Narſæus (notwithſtanding he was furniſhed with a numerous army, yet) could not invade the Roman Provinces. But, coming to Niſibis, (which is a City ſcituate in the confines [of both Empires,] and belongs to the Perſians,) he ſent a meſſage from thence to Ardaburius, deſiring they might come to an agreement between themſelves about the management of the War, and that a place and day for an Engagement might be ſet. Ardaburius, gave the meſſengers this anſwer: Tell Narſæus [thus,] the Roman Emperours will not fight when you have a mind they ſhould. Moreover, the * Emperour perceiving that the Perſian muſtered up the whole force of his Kingdom for the carrying on of this war, placed all his hopes of Victory in God, and beſides ſent vaſt ſupplies of Forces. Now, that the Emperour (in regard he put his whole confidence in God,) received benefit from him immediately, 'twas from hence evident. The Conſtantinopolitans being very anxious, and doubtfull about the event of the war, the Angells of God appeared in Bithynia to ſome perſons going to Conſtantinople about their private concerns, and bad them tell [the Conſtantinopolitans,] that they ſhould be of good courage, and pray to God, and be confident that the Romans would be Conquerours. For they ſaid, that they themſelves were ſent from God to be the managers of the War. At the hearing hereof, the City was not only encouraged, but the Souldiers alſo became more bold and valiant. Whereas therefore (as I have ſaid,) the war had been removed from Armenia into Meſopotamia, the Romans ſhut up the Perſians in the City Niſibis, to which thy laid ſiege. And having made wooden Towers, which moved upon Engines, they brought them to the walls, wherewith they killed many of thoſe who fought from the walls, and [of them] who ran to their aſſiſtance. Vararanes King of Perſia hearing that his Country Azazene was laid deſolate, and his Army beſieged within the City Niſibis, reſolved to go in perſon with all his forces againſt the Romans. But, being afraid of the Roman Army, he called the Saracens to his aſſiſtance, who were then governed by Alamundarus, a valiant and warlike man. He brought a numerous multitude of Saracens with him, and ſpake to the King of Perſia to be confident and couragious, he likewiſe promiſed, that he would quickly make the Romans his priſoners, and deliver Antioch in Syria to him. But the event ſucceeded not according to his promiſe. For God poſſeſt the Saracens with a vain and irrationall terrour. Who ſuppoſing the Roman Forces to be falling upon them, became terrified, and not finding how they might make their eſcape, caſt themſelves armed as they were into the River Euphrates, wherein about an hundred thouſand men were drowned. Theſe things fell out after this manner. But the Romans who laid ſiege to Niſibis, being informed that the King of Perſia was bringing many Elephants along with him were terrified, and having burnt all their Engines which they had made uſe of in the ſiege, [a] retreated into their own Country. But, what engagements hapned afterwards; and how Arſobindus, another Roman Generall, killed the valianteſt perſon amongſt the Perſians in a ſingle duell; and how Ardaburius deſtroyed ſeven valiant Perſian Commanders in an Ambuſcade; or after what manner [b] Vitianus another Roman Generall vanquiſhed the Remains of the Saracen-forces, I think fit to omit, leaſt I ſhould ſeem to digreſs too far from my Subject.

* Or, Wares, or, Merchandizes.

HONORIUS & THEOD. Jun.

* Theodoſius.

[a] We read ὑπεχώρησαν; not ἐπεχώρησαν. Valeſ.

[b] In the Tripartite Hiſtory which Epiphanius Scholaſticus rendred into Latine, this Roman Commander is termed Beatianus. Which name I like beſt. This Victory of the Romans over the Perſians hapned in the Conſulate of Euſtathius and Agricola, on the year of Chriſt 401, as Marcellinus informs us in his Chronicon; the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle ſays the ſame; who relates, that the Emperour Theodoſius had news of that Victory, in the month Gorpieus, on the eighth of the Ides of September, on the third Feria. This was the fourteenth year of Theodoſius Junior's Reign. Wherefore Theophanes is miſtaken in his Chronicle, who places this Victory of the Romans over the Perſians on the eighteenth year of Theodoſius. Valeſ.

Concerning Palladius the Courier.

MOreover, the Emperour Theodoſius was in a very ſhort time acquainted with the Actions [of his Forces.] After what manner the Emperour had ſo ſudden an account of what was done in places at ſo great a diſtance, I will relate. It was his good fortune to have a * ſervant of a vigorous mind and ſtrong body, his name was Palladius. This perſon could ride on horſe-back at ſuch a rate, that in three days ſpace he could go to thoſe places which are the boundaries of the Roman and Perſian Territories, and again in as many days return to Conſtantinople. The ſame man paſſed through all other parts of the world with an incredible ſwiftneſs, whitherſoever the Emperour ſent him. Wherefore, an eloquent perſon uttered this ſaying on a time concerning him: This man by his ſwiftneſs makes the Roman Empire, which in it ſelf is large, ſeem to be little. Moreover, the King of the Perſians was amazed, when he heard theſe things of this man. But, let thus much be ſaid concerning Palladius.

CHAP. XX.

How the Persians had another severe overthrow given them by the Romans.

THe Roman Emperour residing at Constantinople, and being informed of a Victory apparently given him [a] by God, was so good, that although his Forces had managed the War very fortunately, nevertheless he embraced a Peace. He sends Helion therefore (a person whom he had a mighty esteem for) with Orders to make up a Peace with the Persians. Helion arriving in Mesopotamia, [at that place] where the Romans had made a great Ditch for their own security, sends one Maximinus (an eloquent person, who was [b] Assessour to Ardaburius the General,) Embassador about a Peace. When this person was come to the Persian King, he acquaints him with his being sent about a Peace, not from the Roman Emperours, (for he affirmed that the Emperour as yet was wholly ignorant of that War: and when he knew of it, he would look upon it as contemptible:) but from his chief Commanders. When the Persian King was resolved readily to embrace the Embassy: (for his Army was in great distress, by reason it wanted provisions;) those Souldiers, who amongst the Persians are termed The Immortalls, (their number is ten thousand [and they are] valiant men,) came to the Emperour, and said, that a Peace was not to be admitted of, before [c] they had made an attack upon the Romans, then careless and negligent. The King is perswaded by them; shuts up the Embassadour in prison; and sends The Immortalls to put their design upon the Romans in execution. Being come [to the place appointed,] they divided themselves into two parties, and took a resolution of surrounding part of the Roman Army. The Romans seeing but one party of the Persians, made provision to receive their attack. The other party was not seen by them. For they rush't forth to fight on a suddain. But when the Engagement was just beginning, the Roman Army under the command of [d] Procopius Master of the Milice (divine providence so ordering the matter,) appears from an eminence. Procopius seeing his Fellow-Souldiers in danger, attacks the Persians in the Rear; and so they who a little before had surrounded the Romans, were themselves encompassed. After the Romans had in a short time slain every man of these, they set upon those who issued forth upon them from the Ambuscade, every man of whom likewise they dispatch with their Darts. Thus, those termed The Immortalls amongst the Persians, were all of them manifestly proved to be Mortalls; Christ inflicting this punishment upon the Persians, because they had murdered many pious persons that were his worshippers. The Persian King, informed of this overthrow, pretended himself wholly ignorant of the Action: and having given admission to the Embassy, he spake to the Embassadour in this manner: We embrace a Peace, not that We yield to the Romans: but We [do it to] gratifie You, because We have found You to be the prudentest person of all the Romans. [e] Thus the War which had been undertaken upon the account of those Christians who lived in Persia, was concluded. Which thing hapned in the Consulate of the Two Augusti, Honorius being the thirteenth and Theodosius the tenth time Consul, on the fourth year of the three hundredth Olympiad. The persecution [which had been raised] against the Christians in Persia, ceased at the same time also.

a The Florentine M.S. inserts two words here, altogether necessary, after this manner: τῷ ἐναργῶς [ἐκ Θεοῦ] ᾠδαχθεῖσαν νίκην, a victory apparently given him [by God.] Which words (before I had gotten that Manuscript,) I had put in at this place, from Nicephorus, and Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Vales.

b ἀξδαβουρίου συνεδρεύσαντος. Christophorson has rendred it ill, Ardaburius the Commanders Colleague. Musculus has translated it better, Assessour. Epiphanius Scholasticus renders it Councellour, which is the same. Concerning the Councellours or Assessours of Judges, as well Civill as Military, I have made many remarks in my notes on Amm. Marcellinus; which 'tis unnecessary to repeat here. Further, this Maximinus seems to be the same person, who was afterwards sent Embassador by the Emperour Theodosius to Attalas; as Priscus relates in his Excerpta Legationum: where he attests, that he was nobly descended, and had been very usefull to the Emperour in many affairs. Vales.

c Instead of [αὐτοῖς] it must undoubtedly be [αὐτοὶ, they.] that is, the Immortalls: So Christophorson and Sr Henry Savil read. Vales.

d Sidonius makes mention of this Procopius, in his Panegyrick of Anthemius Augustus; where he relates, that he was son-in-law to Anthemius heretofore Consul and Præfectus Prætorio; who during Theodosius Junior's minority, had had the chief management of affairs in the Empire. Vales.

e I doubt not but this place is thus to be restored: ἔτῳ μὲν δὴ τῶν ἐν Περσίδι χειρισάντες γλώσσῃ, ὁ πόλεμος καλεσάλη· ὃ γέγονεν ἐν ὑπατείᾳ δύο αὐγούστων, Thus the war which had been undertaken upon the account of those Christians who lived in Persia, was concluded. Which thing [that is, which conclusion of the war] hapned in the Consulate of the two Augusti. So Epiphanius Scholasticus read, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For thus he renders it: Et hoc modo bellum propter Christianos exortum de Parthorum regione cessavit. Contigit autem Consulatu Honorii XIII. & Theodosii X. 'Tis certain, in this Consulate the Persian war was not waged, but concluded. For it had been begun on the foregoing year, when Eustathius and Agricola were Consuls, as I have remarked before; see chap. 18, note (b.) This is confirmed by Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon, in these words: Honorio XIII. & Theodosio X. Coss. Persæ cum Romanis pacem pepigere, in Honorius's thirteenth and Theodosius's tenth Consulate, the Persians made a Peace with the Romans. Vales.

CHAP. XXI.

MOreover, the good action of Acacius Bishop of Amida, rendred him much more eminent at that time amongst all men [than he had been before.] For, when the Roman Souldiers would by no means restore the Persian Captives (whom they had taken when they ruined [a] Azazene,) to the King of Persia; and the Captives, in number about seaven thousand, were in the interim destroyed by famine; (which thing was the occasion of no small grief to the King of Persia) Acacius thought that business was in no wise to be then neglected. [b] Having [therefore] called together the Clergy under himself: Men [and Brethren,] said he, Our God stands not in need of Dishes or Cups. For he neither eats, nor drinks, in regard he wants nothing. Whereas therefore the Church is possest of many vessells of gold and silver by the beneficence and liberality of those who belong to it, 'tis agreeable that by a sale of these vessells we should both [c] redeem the Captives from the Souldiers, and also provide them food.

a So he has termed this Province before, at chap. 18. Theophanes in his Chronicon, calls it Arxanes, or Arzanes; for so 'tis in some copies. One of the five Provinces beyond Tigris was called Arzanene, as Amm. Marcellinus attests, book 25. which is sometimes termed Arxanene, and Araxiane, and Araxene, as I have remarked at the forestid book of Amm. Marcellinus. Vales.

b Instead of [συσκαλέσας δὲ τοὺ ὑφ' αὐτῷ κληρικοὺς ἀνδρας, ἔφη. But having called together the Clergymen under himself, he said,] this place would be written more elegantly, thus [συσκαλέσας τοὺ ὑφ' αὐτῷ κληρικοὺς· ἄνδρες, ἔφη, &c. Having [therefore] called together the Clergy under himself: Men [and Brethren] said he, &c.] And so Epiphanius Scholasticus read, as 'tis apparent from his Version. Our emendation is plainly confirmed also by Nicephorus. Vales.

c Ῥύσασθαι δὲ τοὺς τῶν αἰχμαλώτους. Christophorson renders it ill, to redeem the Captive Souldiers: for those who had been taken prisoners by the Romans in Arzanene, were unarmed; most of them them being Boors, who inhabited that Country. Besides, the Romans are termed Souldiers by way of Emphasis, to distinguish them from the Barbarians, as I have noted at Amm. Marcellinus. So our Socrates calls the Romans, Souldiers, almost in the next words after these. Vales.

HONORIUS & THEOD. Jun.

Having discourst of these and many other such like things as these to them, he ordered the vessells to be melted down, and having paid the Souldiers a ransom for the Captives, and fed the Captives [for some time,] he afterwards gave them money to bear their charges, and sent them home to their King. This action of the admirable Acacius highly astonished the King of Persia, because the Romans made it their business to conquer their Enemies both ways, as well by War, as by Beneficence. And 'tis said, that the Persian King was very desirous that Acacius should come into his presence, to the end he might enjoy a sight of the man; and that that was effected by the Emperour Theodosius's order. When therefore God had given so eminent a Victory to the Romans, many persons who excelled for their eloquence, wrote * Panegyricks in praise of the Emperour, and recited them in publick. Moreover, the Emperour's Wife wrote a Poem in Heroick Verse: for she was a woman of a great eloquence. For, being the daughter of [d] Leontius the Athenian-Sophist, she had been instructed by her Father, and cultivated with all manner of Literature. When the Emperour was about marrying of this woman, Atticus the Bishop made her a Christian, and at her Baptism, instead of Athanaïs, named her Eudocia. Many persons therefore, as I have said, recited Panegyricks; some with a design to make themselves taken notice of by the Emperour; others endeavouring to publish the powerfullness of their own eloquence; being altogether unwilling, that that Learning they had gotten by much labour, should lie concealed.

* Or, Panegyrical Orations.

[d] This is the Leontius (if I mistake not,) whom Olympiodorus relates by his own care and industry to have been promoted to the Sophistick Chair at Athens; whenas he himself as yet declined it; as Photius declares in his Bibliotheca. Vales.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning the excellencies, wherewith the Emperour Theodosius Junior was endowed.

But I, who am neither studious about being taken notice of by the Emperour, nor desirous of making a shew of eloquence, have taken a resolution of setting forth those excellencies wherewith the Emperour is endowed, sincerely and without any Rhetoricall flourishes. For, in regard his virtues are so singularly usefull, my Sentiment is, that to pass them over in silence would be a loss to posterity, which would be defrauded of the knowledge thereof. In the first place therefore, although he was born and educated in the * Imperiall Pallace, yet he contracted nothing of an effeminacy or stupidity from that education. But was [always] so prudent, as to be reputed by those who addressed to him, to have attained a knowledge and experience in most affairs. His patience in undergoing hardships was such, that he could endure heat and cold couragiously; and would fast frequently, especially on those days termed Wednesdaies and Fridaies. And this he did, out of an earnest endeavour of observing the Rites of the Christian Religion with an accuracy. He governed his Pallace so, that it differed not much from a monasterie. Wherefore he, [a] together with his sisters, rose early in the morning, and recited alternative Hymns in praise of God. Moreover, he could say the sacred Scriptures by heart. And with the Bishops who conferred with him, he discourst out of the Scriptures, as if he had been an Ecclesiastick of a long standing. He was much more diligent in making a Collection of the sacred Books, and of the Expositions which had been written thereon, than Ptolemæus Philadelphus had been heretofore. For clemency and humanity he excelled all men by far. The Emperour Julianus, although he was a profest philosopher, yet could not moderate his rage and anger towards the Antiochians who had * derided him; but inflicted most acute tortures upon † Theodorus. But Theodosius bad farwell to Aristotle's Syllogismes, and exercised Philosophy in deeds, getting the mastery over Anger, Grief, and Pleasure. He never revenged himself upon any one who had been injurious to him. Yea, no man ever saw him angry. Being on a time asked by one with whom he was pleased to be familiar, why he never put to death any person who had injured him? his answer was, Would to God it were possible for me to restore to life those that are dead! To another questioning him about the same thing, [b] 'Tis no great or difficult thing (said he) for him that is a man, to die: but 'tis Gods property only by repentance to restore to life him that is once dead. Further, his Practise of this Virtue was so constant and earnest, that if any person had happened to commit a crime which deserved a capitall punishment, he was never led so far as the City-gates onwards on his way to the place of execution, before a pardon was granted, whereby he was immediately recalled. When on a time he exhibited a Show of hunting wild beasts in the Amphitheatre at Constantinople, the people cried out, Let one of the boldest [c] Bestiarii encounter the enraged wild beast.

HONORIUS & THEOD. Jun.

[a] Instead of [ἀυτὸς τοιγαρῶν σὺν τοῖς ἑαυτῆ ἀδελφαῖς] it must be [ἀυτὸς τοιγαρῶν σὺν τοῖς ἑαυτὸς ἀδελφαῖς, wherefore he, together with his sisters;] as Nicephorus expresses it book 14. chap. 3. The mistake arose from hence, because these particles ῆν and σὺν are usually confounded one with the other by Transcribers. Vales.

* See Socrat. book 3. chap. 17.

† Book 3. chap. 19.

[b] Epiphanius Scholasticus has rendred this whole place thus: Non est inquit, magnum neque difficile hominem mori, quia neque Deo soli, semel mortuum ex pœnitentiâ suscitare. It is not, saith he, a great nor difficult thing for a man to die, because neither [is it a great or difficult thing] to God alone, by repentance to raise a man once dead. For you must understand [is it a great or difficult thing] to be used in common to both clauses. Nicephorus Callistus has worded this passage thus: ἄλλο, εἶπε, καινὸν ἄνθρωπον ὄντα ἀποθανεῖν. Θεῷ δὲ ἀνεῖη μόνῳ, τὸν ἅπαξ θανόντα τῇ μεταμοίᾳ ἀναπαλέσασθαι. Which words Langus has rendred thus: Nihil est novi, dixit, siquis homo quum sit, è vitâ excedat: unius autem Dei esse, cum qui semel mortuus sit, per pœnitentiam ad uitam revocare. It is no new thing, said he, that he who is a man should depart out of this life: but 'tis God's property only, by Repentance to recall to life him who is once dead. But I like not Nicephorus's using τῇ μεταμοίᾳ instead of ἐν μεταμοίᾳ. For, the discourse here is not concerning the life of the soul, but that of the body. Wherefore, I approve rather of Musculus's Version, who has rendred it thus: ex pœnitentiâ verò revocare eum qui semel mortuus est, non est nisi soli Deo possibile. But by repentance to recall him who is once dead, is a thing possible only to God. Notwithstanding this Version pleased not Christophorson, because it may seem to attribute repentance to God. But this expression may be born with, in regard God in the sacred Scriptures is now and then said to repent himself of some fact. Vales.

[c] Scaliger in his notes on the fourth book of Manilius, and (after him) Salmasius in his notes on Capitolinus, pag. 258, have long since observed, that the Greeks called those θηριόλας (which is the term here used,) who let themselves out to fight with wild beasts. But I approve not of their confounding the Confectores with these θηριόλους. For the Confectores were another sort of persons, as I have remarked on Eusebius, (book 4. chap. 15. note n.) who fought not with the wild beasts, but dispatcht them at a distance. Vales. See Eusebius Pamphilius's book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, chap. 5. note (b.)

To

HONORIUS & THEOD. Jun.

To whom he gave this answer, You know not, that We are wont to be spectatours at Shows with clemency and humanity. With which saying he instructed the people, to be in future delighted with Shows wherein there was less of cruelty. Further, his piety was such, that he honoured all God's Priests; but most especially those whom he knew to be more eminent for sanctity of life. 'Tis reported, that when the Bishop of [d] Chebron had ended his life at Constantinople, he desired to have his * Hair-cloth-Cassock, which (although it was very foul and nasty) he wore instead of a Cloak, believing he should thereby partake something of the dead Bishop's sanctity. There hapning tempestuous weather one year, he was forced to exhibit the usuall and set Shows in the Cirque, in regard the people were extreamly earnest for them. But when the Cirque was filled with Spectatours, the Storm increased, and there was a vast fall of Snow; at which time the Emperour gave an evident demonstration, how he was affected towards God; [for] he made proclamation by the Cryer to the people, in these words: 'Tis much better, that we should omit the Show, and all joyn in prayer to God, that we may be preserved unhurt from the imminent Storm. The Cryer had scarce made an end of proclaiming these words, when all the people began to supplicate God in the Cirque with the greatest joy immaginable, and with a generall consent sang Hymns to him. And the whole City became one congregation. The Emperour himself went in the midst [of the multitude] in a private habit, and began the Hymns: nor was he frustrated of his hope [at that time.] For the air returned to its former serenity; and instead of a scarcity of bread-corn, the divine benevolence bestowed a plentifull crop upon all persons. If at any time a War was raised, in imitation of David, he fled to God, knowing him to be the disposer of Wars; and by his prayers he managed them successfully. I will here relate therefore, how, a little after the Persian War, (when the Emperour Honorius was dead, in the Consulate of Asclepiodotus and Marianus, [e] on the fifteenth of the month August,) by putting his confidence in God, he vanquished the Tyrant Johannes. For, 'tis my Sentiment, that the Actions which hapned at that time, are worthy to be recorded: because, what befell the Hebrews (who were led by Moses) in their passage over the red Sea, the same [almost] hapned to the Emperour's Commanders, at such time as he sent them against that Tyrant. Which Actions I will relate in short, leaving the ampleness of them, which does require a peculiar work, [to be set forth at large] by others.

[d] This City, and the name of this Bishop, are equally unknown to me. Vales.

* Σαγίον; all Translatours (whom I have seen) except Valesius, render it his Sack-cloth; the Greek term comprehends both significations.

[e] Theophanes, in his Chronicon, says the same. But Olympiodorus dissents; who says Honorius died on the twenty seventh of August. Vales.

THEODO. Jun.

HOnorius Augustus therefore being dead, the Emperour Theodosius informed thereof, conceals it, and deceives the populace [by feigning] sometimes one thing, at others another. But he sends his Military Forces secretly to Salona; which is a City of Dalmatia; to the end that if any * Rebellion should happen in the Western parts, a force to resist it might not be far off. Having made provision after this manner before hand, he then published the death of his † Uncle. But in the interim, [a] Johannes the chief of the Emperour's Notaries, unable to bear the || greatness of his own preferment, seizes the Empire, and sends an Embassage to the Emperour Theodosius, requiring to be admitted Colleague in the Empire. Theodosius imprisoned his Embassadours; and dispatches away Ardaburius, Master of the Milice, who had done excellent service in the Persian War. He being arrived at Salona, sailed from thence to Aquileia; and had ill success as he then thought; (but 'twas afterwards demonstrated to be prosperous.) For, an unlucky wind blew, which drove him into the Tyrant's hands. Who having taken Ardaburius, hoped Theodosius would be necessitated to Elect and Proclaim him Emperour, if he were desirous of preserving the life of his Master of the Milice. And the Emperour, when informed hereof, was really in an Agony, as was also the Army which had been sent against the Tyrant, least Ardaburius should suffer any mischief from the Tyrant. Moreover, Aspar, Ardaburius's Son, when he understood that his Father was taken by the Tyrant, and knew that many Myriads of Barbarians were come to the Tyrant's assistance, knew not what course to take. But, the prayer of the Emperour, beloved by God, at that time prevailed again. For an Angel of God in the habit of a Shepherd, became a guide to Aspar and the forces with him, and leads them through the Lake which lies near to Ravenna. For in that City the Tyrant resided, where he detained the * Master of the Milice Prisoner. No person was ever known to have passed through this Lake. But God rendred that passable at that time, which before had been impassable. [b] When therefore they had passed the waters of the Lake [as if it had been] over dry ground, they found the gates of the City open, and seized the Tyrant. At which time the most pious Emperour gave a demonstration of his Religious affection towards God. For whilest he was exhibiting the Cirque-Sports, news was brought him that the Tyrant was destroyed. Whereupon he speaks to the people: Come, said he, if you please, let us rather leave our Recreation, and go into the Church, and put up our thanksgivings to God, in regard his hand hath destroyed the Tyrant. These were his words; and the Shows ceased immediately, and were neglected: and all persons went through the midst of the Cirque, singing praises together with him with one consent of mind and voice, and went into God's Church. And the whole City became one congregation. Being come into the place of prayer, they continued there all day.

CHAP. XXIV.

That, after the ſlaughter of Johannes the Tyrant, Theodoſius the Emperour proclaimed Valentinianus (the Son of Conſtantius, and of his Aunt Placidia,) Emperour of Rome.

MOreover, after the Tyrant's death, the Emperour Theodoſius [a] became very ſolicitous, whom he ſhould proclaim Emperour of the Weſtern parts. He had a Coſin-German very young, by name Valentinianus, the Son of his Aunt Placidia. She was daughter to the Emperour Theodoſius The Great; and Siſter to the two Auguſti, Arcadius and Honorius. Valentinianus had a Father, by name Conſtantius, who having been proclaimed Emperour by Honorius, and reigned with him a ſhort time, died ſoon after. This Coſin-German of his he created Cæſar, and ſent him into the Weſtern parts, committing the chief management of affairs to his mother Placidia. Moreover, Theodoſius himſelf haſtned into Italy, that he might both proclaim his Coſin-German Emperour, and alſo (by being preſent there himſelf) inſtruct the Italians by his own prudent advice, not eaſily to yield ſubjection to Tyrants. Being gone as far as Theſſalonica, he was hindred from proceeding on his journey by a ſickneſs. Having therefore ſent the Imperiall Diadem to his Coſin-German, by Helion a perſon of the Senatorian Order, he himſelf returned to the City Conſtantinople. But, I think this Narrative which I have given concerning theſe tranſactions, to be ſufficient.

[a] The emendation of this place is owing to the Florentine M. S. wherein, inſtead of [ξυμφερων τις ην, was a prudent perſon,] 'tis plainly written thus [ξυμφερηλις ην, became very ſolicitous.] Valeſ.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning Atticus's Government of the Churches; and that he ordered Johannes's name to be written into the Dypticks of the Church; and that he foreknew his own death.

[IN the interim] Atticus the Biſhop in a wonderfull manner enlarged the affairs of the Church; adminiſtring all things with a ſingular prudence, and by his Sermons inciting the people to Virtue. Perceiving that the Church was divided, in regard the * Johannitæ held † ſeparate Aſſemblies, he ordered, that mention ſhould be made of Johannes in the prayers, according as it was uſuall for other Biſhops, who were dead to be mentioned; on which account he hoped many would return to the Church. Moreover, he was ſo liberall, that he made proviſion not only for the poor of his own Churches, but ſent money alſo to the neighbouring Cities towards the relief and comfort of the neceſſitous. For he ſent three hundred Crowns to Calliopius a Presbyter of the Church of Nicæa, to whom he wrote this Letter.

* See book 6. chap. 18.
† Or, aſſemblies without the Church.

Atticus to Calliopius, health in the Lord.

I underſtand, that in your City there are an infinite company of perſons oppreſſed with hunger, who ſtand in need of the compaſſion of pious men. By terming them an infinite company, I mean a multitude, not an accurate and determinate number. In regard therefore I have received a ſum of money from him who with a liberall hand giveth to good Stewards, and [whereas] it happens that ſome are oppreſſed with want, to the end that thoſe who have wherewithall might be tried, but do not give to the indigent; take (dear friend!) theſe three hundred Crowns, and beſtow them as you ſhall think good. But give them to thoſe who are wholly aſhamed to beg, not to them that throughout their whole lives have declared their belly to be their trade. Moreover, when you give, have no reſpect to any Sect or Religion whatever in this particular act; mind this one thing only, to feed the hungry, but not to difference or diſtinguiſh thoſe who embrace not our Religion.

THEOD. Jun. and VALENTINIANUS.

After this manner Atticus took care even of the indigent that were at a diſtance from him [a]. Moreover, he made it his buſineſs to extirpate the ſuperſtitions of ſome men. For having one time received information, that thoſe who ſeparated from the Novatianiſts on account of the Jewiſh paſſover, had tranſlated the body of Sabbatius from Rodes, (for he had been baniſhed into that Iſland, where he ended his life) and buried it, and did uſually pray at his grave: he ſent ſome perſons by night, to whom he gave order to [dig up] Sabbatius's body, and * bury it in ſome other Sepulchre. But the perſons who uſually went thither, when they found the grave dug up, in future left off worſhipping † that place. Beſides, he was very elegant and happy in impoſing names [upon places.] A ‖ Sea-Port ſituate in the mouth of the Euxine-Sea (which had antiently been called * Pharmaceus, he named † Therapeia, leaſt at his holding religious aſſemblies there, he ſhould call that place by an infamous name. Another place near adjacent to Conſtantinople he named ‖ Argyropolis, for this reaſon. * Chryſopolis is an ancient Sea-Port ſituate in the head of the Boſphorus: many of the ancient Writers make mention of it, eſpecially Strabo, Nicolaus Damaſcenus, and the admirably eloquent Xenophon in his ſixth Book concerning the expedition of Cyrus; and the ſame Authour in his firſt Book concerning the Grecian affairs, ſpeaks to this effect concerning this City, [viz.] that Alcibiades, when he had built a wall round it, ſet up a Toll therein which conſiſted of a payment of the tenth peny. For thoſe who ſail out of Pontus were compelled to pay the tenth peny there. Atticus therefore perceiving this place, which was ſituate over againſt Chryſopolis, to be pleaſant and delightfull, ſaid it was fit and agreeable it ſhould be termed Argyropolis. Which ſaying of his † put that name upon the place immediately. When ſome perſons ſpoke to him, that the Novatianiſts ought not to hold their aſſemblies within the Cities; his anſwer was, you know not how much they ſuffered together with us when we were perſecuted in the Reignes of Conſtantius and Valens. And beſides (ſaid he) they have been * Aſſertours of our Faith. For though they made a ſeparation long ſince from the Church, yet no innovation about the Faith hath been introduced by them. Being arrived on a time at Nicæa upon account of an Ordination, and ſeeing Aſclepiades, a very aged perſon,

[a] After theſe words, there was a whole line and ſomething more wanting; which we have made up from the incomparable Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. after this manner: ὁ μὴν ἀλλὰ καὶ πᾶς δεισιδαιμονίας πυθὼν ἐκκόπτειν ἐσπούδαζεν, Moreover, he made it his buſineſs to extirpate the ſuperſtitions of ſome men. Which words were in that copy alſo, which Epiphan. Scholaſticus made uſe of, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For thus he renders it; ſed & ſuperſtitionem quorundam ſtudebat abſcindere, moreover he endeavoured to cut off the ſuperſtition of ſome men. But, that Chriſtophorſon had conſulted no M. S. perſon, perſon, Biſhop of the Novatianiſts there, he asked him, how many years have you been a Biſhop? When he made anſwer [that he had been a Biſhop] fifty years, You are happy, O man, (ſaid he) in regard you have been diligent about ſo good a work for ſuch a long time! He ſpake theſe words to the ſame Aſclepiades, I do indeed commend Novatus; but the Novatianiſts I can in no wiſe approve of. Aſclepiades amazed at this ſtrange expreſſion, replied, how can you ſay this, O Biſhop? To whom Atticus made this anſwer; I commend Novatus, becauſe he refuſed to communicate with thoſe perſons who had ſacrificed. For I my ſelf would have done the ſame. But I do not in any wiſe praiſe the Novatianiſts, in regard they exclude the Laicks from communion on account of very light and triviall offences. To which Aſclepiades made this return; there are, beſides ſacrificing, many other ſins unto death, (as the Scriptures term them,) on account whereof [b] you exclude Eccleſiaſticks, but we Laicks alſo from communion, leaving to God alone a power of pardoning them. Further, Atticus [c] foreknew even the time of his own death. For at his departure from Nicæa, he ſpake theſe words to Calliopius a Presbyter of that place:

[b] Τμεῖς μὲν πως τῶν λαϊκῶν. The preposition πως muſt be expunged; which neither Nicephorus, nor Epiphan. Scholaſticus, nor the other Tranſlatours do acknowledge. Unleſs, inſtead of πως, any one has a mind to ſubſtitute πως, and read thus; You in a certain manner exclude Eccleſiaſticks. But, this place wants not difficulty. For, it may ſeem to be concluded from hence, that Eccleſiaſticks in the Catholick Church, who had been excommunicated for more enormous crimes, were cut off from the Church without all hope of pardon; but Laicks not ſo. Which may be thus explained. Laicks, who had been ſeparated from communion on account of publick crimes, recovered peace and communion again by the remedy of penitency, at leaſt once. But to Eccleſiaſticks who had been excommunicated, the door of penitency was ſhut. For they were not admitted to publick penitency. They continued therefore for ever excommunicated. For which reaſon Eccleſiaſticks were very rarely excommunicated: but were either depoſed, or ſuſpended from their Office for ſome time, or at leaſt reduced to a Laick-communion. But, the firſt Canon of the Neocæſarian Synod does gainſay this; wherein the Eccleſiaſticks who had committed Fornication or Adultery, are driven from communion, and brought to penitency. This paſſage may be explained otherwiſe alſo. For, from ſuch time as Nectarius aboliſhed the Penitentiary, all Laicks had a free power of communicating left them; nor was any one removed from communion on account of a deadly crime, except Eccleſiaſticks only. Valeſ.

[c] Atticus did not only foreknow the day of his own death, but long before his death, he built himſelf a Sepulchre, as I am informed from an old Epigram; which becauſe 'tis not yet extant in Print, I will here annex:

Παύλε σιλεντιαείε εἰς τάφον ἀτλικῦ πνὸς κατασκάσαντος.

Ἀτλικὸς ἐς ξυνὴν μὲ παναχεῖον ἐλπίδα μοίρης
Θυμῷ θαρσαλέῳ ζῶν, ἐλάχνε τάφον.

Atticus, whileſt he was living, (in whoſe mind a Fortitude not to be daunted ſhin'd,) Dug me his Grave, in common hope of Fate untractable and incompaſſionate.

Such were his Virtuous Actions, that Death's fear, and Frightfull Terrours by him ſlighted were.
But, by the Sun, to late poſterity his Sun-like wiſedom ſhall recorded be.

This Epigram is extant in Conſtantinus Cephalas's Anthologia, not yet Printed. 'Tis my ſentiment, that Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople is meant hereby. For I know no other Atticus, to whom this Elogy of Wiſdom and Virtue can be agreeable. Notwithſtanding, this is contradicted by Paulus Silentiarius's being inſcribed the Authour of this Epigram, who (as 'tis manifeſt from Agathias's teſtimony,) flouriſhed long after Atticus, in Juſtinian's times. Wherefore, either the inſcription of the Epigram, or our conjecture, muſt of neceſſity be falſe. Valeſ.

THEOD. Jun. and VALENTINIANUS.

Haſten to Conſtantinople before Autumn, if you are deſirous of ſeeing me again alive. For, if you delay, you will not find me living. Upon his ſaying whereof, he miſtook not. For in the twenty firſt year of his Epiſcopate, on the tenth of October, he died, in Theodoſius's eleventh and Valentinianus Cæſar's firſt Conſulate. Moreover, the Emperour Theodoſius being then in his return from Theſſalonica, was not at his Funerall. For Atticus was interred the day before the Emperour's Entry into Conſtantinople. Not long after Valentinianus Junior was [d] Declared Auguſtus, about the twenty third of that ſame October.

[d] The Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle underſtood this paſſage in Socrates amiſs. For he thought, that Valentinianus Junior Placidiæ's Son, had been ſtiled Auguſtus on the 23d of October: but Socrates ſays not ſo; he relates only, that Valentinianus having been Proclaimed Auguſtus was publiſhed at Conſtantinople on the twenty third of October. Which two things are vaſtly different. Sigonius (Book 11 De Occidentali Imperio) relates that Valentinianus was created Auguſtus at Ravenna on the Ides (that is, the fifteenth) of October, in Theodoſius Auguſtus's eleventh and Valentinianus's own firſt Conſulate. 'Tis certain, on the eighth of October in the ſame Conſulate, Valentinianus was as yet but Cæſar, as we are informed from the 47th Law in the Theodoſian Code de Epiſc. Eccleſ. & Clericis, dated at Aquileia. By which place Sigonius was chiefly induced, to place Valentinianus's being proclaimed Auguſtus on the Ides of October, and to relate it to have been made at Ravenna. For in regard it was publiſhed at Conſtantinople on the twenty fifth of that ſame month, it could not have been done later. Onufrius (in his Faſti) has followed Sigonius's opinion. Further Marcellinus and Fordaines (in his book De Succeſſione Regnorum) do mention this Declaration to have been made at Ravenna: but Olympiodorus and Idatius (in his Chronicon) ſay 'twas done at Rome. Valeſ.

After Atticus's death, a great conteſt happened about the Ordination of a Biſhop, ſome deſiring one perſon, others another. For, one party ('tis ſaid) were earneſt to have Philippus a Presbyter; another, Proclus; who was a Preſbyter alſo. But the whole body of the people with a generall conſent wiſhed Siſinnius might be made [Biſhop;] who was a Presbyter alſo himſelf: he had not been conſtituted * over any of the Churches within the City, but had been promoted to the Presbyterate in a Village belonging to Conſtantinople, the name whereof is Elæa; and 'tis ſituate over againſt the Imperiall † City: in which Village the Feſtivall of our Saviour's Aſcenſion was from [an ancient] uſage celebrated by the whole people in generall. All the Laicks were deſirous to have this man [made Biſhop,] both becauſe he was a perſon ſingularly eminent for his piety, and alſo more eſpecially in regard his diligence in relieving the indigent was earneſt even beyond his power. The deſire therefore of the Laity prevailed: and Siſinnius is ordained on the twenty eighth of February, in the following Conſulate, which was Theodoſius's twelfth and Valentinianus Junior Auguſtus's ſecond. Afterwards, Philippus the Presbyter (becauſe Siſinnius was preferred before him,) was very bitter and large in his [a] invectives againſt that Ordination,

But, I judge it not inopportune to ſay ſomething in ſhort concerning him.

CHAP. XXVII.

Concerning Philippus the Presbyter, who was born at Side.

Philippus was by Country a Sidenſian. Side is a City of Pamphylia, at which Troilus the Sophiſta had his originall extract; of his own relation to whom Philippus boaſted. Whileſt he was a Deacon, he had had frequent converſe with *Biſhop Johannes. He was a very laborious and painfull ſtudent, and had made a Collection of many books, and thoſe of all ſorts. He imitated the Aſian Style, and wrote many Books. [For, he confuted the Emperour Julian's Pieces, and compiled a Chriſtian Hiſtory, which he divided into ſix and thirty Books. Each Book contained many Tomes, in ſo much that in all they were near a thouſand. The †Contents of each Tome equalled the Tome it ſelf in bigneſs. This work he entitled not an Eccleſiaſtick, but a Chriſtian Hiſtory. In it he heaped together variety of Learning, being deſirous to ſhew, that he was not unskilled in Philoſophick Literature. For which reaſon, he makes frequent mention therein of Geometricall, Aſtronomicall, Arithmeticall, and Muſicall Theorems. He alſo deſcribes Iſlands, Mountains, Trees, and ſeverall other things not very momentous. Upon which account he has made it a looſe work: and therefore hath (in my judgment) rendred it uſeleſs both to the ignorant, and to the Learned alſo. For, the ignorant are unable to inſpect the heighth and grandeur of his Stile. And thoſe that are well verſed in Learning nauſeate his inſipid repetition of words. But, let every one paſs a judgment upon thoſe Books according to his own liking. I only ſay this, that the times wherein affairs have been tranſacted are confounded by him. For when he has mentioned the times of the Emperour Theodoſius, he runs back to thoſe of Athanaſius the Biſhop. And this he does very frequently. Thus much concerning Philippus. 'Tis requiſite that we ſhould now declare what hapned in Siſinnius's time.

CHAP. XXVIII.

That Siſinnius ordained Proclus Biſhop of Cyzicum: but the Inhabitants of that City would not admit him [to be their Biſhop.]

THe Biſhop of Cyzicum being dead, Siſinnius ordained Proclus Biſhop of that City. When therefore he was about going thither, the Inhabitants of Cyzicum prevent him, and ordain a perſon that was an Aſcetick, his name Dalmatius. And this they did in contempt to a *Law by which 'twas eſtabliſhed, that the ordination of a Biſhop [there] ſhould not be made contrary to the Conſtantinopolitane Biſhop's mind. But they diſregarded this Law, as being [ſaid they] a perſonall prerogative granted only to Atticus. Proclus therefore continued deſtitute indeed of the preſidency over his own Church, but he flouriſhed and grew famous for his Sermons [Preach't] in the Churches of Conſtantinople. But we ſhall ſpeak concerning this perſon in due place. Siſinnius having ſurvived his being made Biſhop not full out two years, ended his life in the Conſulate of Hierius and Ardaburius, on the twenty fourth of the month December. He was a perſon, for his temperance, good life, and love to the poor, highly eminent. As to his temper, he was a perſon to whom acceſs might eaſily be had, and of a diſpoſition plain and without falſehood; therefore no Lover of buſineſs. For which reaſon buſie men were offended at him; amongſt whom he had the character of a ſlothfull perſon.

* What Law this was and by whom made, 'tis uncertain. My Sentiment is, that 'twas an Imperiall Law, whereby proviſion had been made, that the Inhabitants of Cyzicum ſhould not ordain themſelves a Biſhop contrary to the conſent of Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople. For if this had been a Sanction made in a Councill of Biſhops, Socrates would have uſed the term Canon, rather than have called it a Law. After Atticus's death, the Inhabitants of Cyzicum diſregarded this Law. For they ſaid, that that priviledge had in an eſpeciall manner been granted to Atticus, and belonged not to his Succeſſours. But, they were miſtaken. For long before Atticus, the Conſtantinopolitan Prelates had given Biſhops to the Inhabitants of Cyzicum. For, in Conſtantius's time, Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople ordained Eunomius Biſhop of Cyzicum. See Liberatus's Breviarium chap. 7. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIX.

That after Siſinnius's death, [the Emperours] ſent for Neſtorius from Antioch, and made him Biſhop of Conſtantinople; who quickly diſcovered his own temper and diſpoſition.

After Siſinnius's death, the Emperours were pleaſed not to prefer any perſon of the Conſtantinopolitane Church to that See, becauſe they were men ſtudious of vain-glory: although many were very earneſt to have Philippus, others not fewer in number [ſtrove to get] Proclus, ordained. But they reſolved to ſend for a Forreigner from Antioch. For there was a man there, by name Neſtorius, born at the City Germanicia, who had a good voice, and a readineſs of expreſſion. Wherefore they determined to ſend for him, as being a fit perſon to teach the people. After an intervall of three months therefore, Neſtorius is brought from Antioch. Who was cried up indeed for his temperance amongſt many perſons; but what a tempered man he was as to other things, the more prudent diſcovered from *his firſt Sermon. For, being ordained on the tenth of Aprill, in the Conſulate of Felix and Taurus; addreſſing himſelf to the Emperour he forthwith uttered that famous expreſſion in the preſence of all the people. Give me (ſaid he,) O Emperour! the Earth cleared from Hereticks, and in recompence thereof I will give you Heaven. Aſſiſt me in deſtroying Hereticks; and I will aſſiſt you in vanquiſhing the Perſians. Although theſe words, were extreamly pleaſing to ſome of the Vulgar, who had conceived an hatred againſt Hereticks; yet to thoſe

* Amongſt the Ancients it was wont to be very carefully obſerved, what the Biſhops (eſpecially the Prelates of the greater Churches) ſaid in their firſt Sermon to the people. For from that Sermon a conjecture was made of the Faith, Doctrine, and Temper, of every Biſhop. Wherefore they were wont to take particular notice of, and remember their ſayings. A remark of this nature Socrates has made before, at book 2, chap. 43. concerning the firſt Sermon of Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. And Theodoret and Epiphanius declare the ſame concerning Meletius Antiochenus's firſt Sermon to the people. Valeſ.

(who, as I have ſaid, had skill in giving a conjecture of his Sentiments from his expreſſions,) neither the levity of his mind, nor his inclination to anger and violence joyned with his vain-glorioufneſs, were concealed: in regard he conteined not himſelf during the ſmalleſt ſpace of time, but broke out into ſuch expreſſions as theſe; and (if I may uſe the proverb) before he had taſted the water of the City, ſhewed himſelf an inraged perſecutor. On the fifth day therefore after his ordination, he takes a reſolution to demoliſh the Arians's Oratory, in which they performed their devotions ſecretly; whereby he drove thoſe Hereticks to a deſperation. For when they ſaw their place of Prayer pulling down, they threw fire into it and burnt it. Moreover, the fire ſpread further, and conſumed the adjacent buildings. Whereupon a tumult was raiſed all over the City, and the Arians made preparations to revenge themſelves. But God the keeper of the City, permitted not the miſchief to gather to an head. However, Neſtorius was in future termed an [b] Incendiary, not only by the Hereticks, but by thoſe alſo of his own Faith. For he deſiſted not, but framed intreagues againſt the Hereticks, and did his utmoſt to ſubvert the City. For he attempted to moleſt the Novatianiſts alſo, his envy ſpurring him on, becauſe Paulus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts was famous in all places for his piety. But the Emperours by their admonitions repreſſed his fury. Now what miſchiefs he did to the Quartodecimani throughout Aſia, Lydia, and Caria, and how numerous the multitudes were that came to their deaths by his means at Miletum and Sardis in a tumult there raiſed, I think fit not to mention. But, what manner of puniſhment he underwent, as well for theſe [wickedneſſes,] as for his * unbridled tongue, I will declare hereafter.

[b] Πυρκαϊάν. I choſe to render it an Incendiary (as Epiphan. Scholaſticus does,) rather than Incendium, a fire, though, 'tis confeſt, this is the true import of the word. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXX.

After what manner the Burgundions embraced the Chriſtian Religion, in the Reign of Theodoſius Junior.

I Will now relate a thing worthy to be recorded, which hapned about this very time. There is a barbarous Nation, which has its habitation beyond the River Rhine, they are called the Burgundions. Theſe perſons lead a * quiet life. For they are almoſt all Carpenters; by which [trade] they earn wages, and get a livelyhood. The Nation of the Hunni by making continuall Inroades upon this people, depopulated their Country, and frequently deſtroyed many of them. The Burgundions therefore, reduced to a great ſtreight, fly for refuge to no man; but reſolved to commit themſelves to ſome God. And having ſeriouſly conſidered with themſelves, that the God of the Romans did vigorouſly aſſiſt and defend thoſe that feared him; by a generall conſent they all came over to the faith of Chriſt. Going therefore to one of the Cities of Gallia, they made a requeſt to the Biſhop, that they might receive Chriſtian Baptiſm. The Biſhop ordered them to faſt ſeaven days, in which intervall he inſtructed them in the grounds of Faith, and on the eighth day baptized and diſmiſſed them. Being encouraged therefore [hereby,] they marched out [a] againſt the Hunni, and were not fruſtrated of their expectation. For the King of the Hunni (whoſe name was [b] Optar,) having burſt himſelf in the night by eating too much; the Burgundions fell upon the Hunni then deſtitute of a Commander in chief, and a few engaged very many, and conquered them. For the Burgundions being in number only three thouſand, deſtroyed about ten thouſand of the Hunni. And from that time the Nation of the Burgundions became zealous profeſſours of Chriſtianity. About the ſame time, Barba Biſhop of the Arians died, in Theodoſius's thirteenth and Valentinianus's third Conſulate, on the twenty fourth of June, and Sabbatius is conſtituted Biſhop in his ſtead. But, let thus much be ſaid concerning theſe things.

* Or, unbuſied.

[a] Inſtead of [κατὰ τῶν τυράννων, againſt the Tyrants] it muſt undoubtedly be [κατὰ τῶν Οὔννων, againſt the Hunni:] for the Burgundions were oppreſſed by them, as Socrates atteſts. Valeſ.

[b] This perſon (as I ſuppoſe,) is Oſtar King of the Hunni; whom Jordanes (in his Hiſtory of the Goths, chap. 35,) relates to have been the Roa, and Mundiuchus Attila's Father. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXI.

With what miſeries the Macedoniani were afflicted by Neſtorius.

MOreover, Neſtorius behaved himſelf contrary to the uſage of the Church, [a] and cauſed others to imitate himſelf in ſuch things, as 'tis apparent from what hapned during his being Biſhop. For, one Antonius Biſhop of Germa a City in the Helleſpont, imitated Neſtorius's rage towards the Hereticks, and made it his buſineſs to perſecute the Macedoniani, taking the Patriarch's order as a pretext for his Apology. The Macedoniani for ſome time endured his vexatiouſneſs. But after Antonius began to diſquiet them more vehemently; being unable to undergo his moleſtation any longer, they [grew deſperate, and] brake out into a cruell madneſs; and having privately ſent ſome men who preferred what is pleaſant before that which is good, they murder him. The Macedoniani having perpetrated this villanous fact, Neſtorius took hold of what had been done as an occaſion of his own rage. And he perſwades the Emperours to deprive them of their Churches. As well thoſe Churches therefore which they had before the old walls of Conſtantinople, as them [they were poſſeſt of] in Cyzicum, were taken from them; as were likewiſe many others, which they had in the Villages of the Helleſpont. Some of them came over to the [Catholick] Church, and embraced the Homoöuſian Faith. But, as 'tis proverbially ſpoken, Drunkards never want wine, nor Contentious perſons ſtrife. It hapned therefore, that Neſtorius, who buſied himſelf in expelling other perſons, was himſelf turned out of the Church, for this reaſon [following.]

[a] In my own judgment, I have mended this place very happily. For, whereas there was no ſenſe in the common reading, (which is this, ἀλλ' ὡς ἐν τοῖς τοιούτοις ἑαυτὸν μισεῖσθαι ἐποίει, and otherwiſe cauſed himſelf to be hated in ſuch things;) by a very ſmall change I have mended the place thus, ἀλλὰς ἐν τοῖς τοιούτοις αὐτὸν μισεῖσθαι ἐποίει, and cauſed others to imitate himſelf in ſuch things. Nor do I doubt but Socrates left it thus written. Otherwiſe, what he adds concerning Antonius Biſhop of Germa, would in no wiſe agree with that which goes before. At the very next words, inſtead of [ὡς τὰ ὑπ' αὐτοῦ γενόμενα δείκνυσιν, as 'tis apparent from what hapned from him,] I read [ὡς τὰ ἐπ' αὐτῷ γενόμενα δείκνυσιν, as 'tis apparent from what hapned during his being Biſhop.] Which emendation ſeems to me altogether neceſſary. For, that which follows concerning Antonius the Biſhop, was in no wiſe done by Neſtorius. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning the Presbyter Anastasius, by whom Nestorius was perverted to Impiety.

ANastasius the Presbyter, who had come from Antioch with Nestorius, was his intimate acquaintance. Nestorius had an high esteem for him, and made use of his advice in the management of business. This Anastasius being Preaching one time in the Church, uttered these words, Let no man stile Mary * Theotocos. For Mary was a woman. But 'tis impossible for God to be born of a woman. The hearing hereof disturbed many persons, as well of the Clergy as Laity. For they had been heretofore taught, to confess Christ to be God, and in no wise to separate him as man from the Divinity on account of his Incarnation; whereto they were induced by the Apostle's words, who saith; Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh; yet now henceforth know we him no more. [a] And [again,] wherefore leaving the discourse concerning Christ, let us press forwards to perfection. A disturbance therefore having been raised in the Church (as I have said,) [about this matter;] Nestorius endeavoured to confirm Anastasius's expression; (for he was unwilling, that the man for whom he had so great an esteem, should be reproved as having spoken blasphemy;) and made frequent discourses concerning it in the Church, in which he proposed contentious questions concerning this thing, and every where rejected this term Theotocos. This question therefore being entertained in one manner by some, and in another by others; on this account a dissention arose in the Church. And being Engaged in an Encounter by night as it were, sometimes they asserted these things, at others those, affirming and in like manner denying one and the same thing. But Nestorius was supposed by most men, to entertain such Sentiments, as to assert the Lord [Christ] to be a meer man, and to introduce the opinion of Paul of Samosata and Photinus into the Church. Now, so great a controversie and disturbance was raised about this matter, that 'twas thought necessary a Generall Councill [should be convened.] But I my self, after my reading the Books [b] published by Nestorius, found him to be an ignorant person. And I will declare the truth unfeignedly. For, his vices which I have spoken of already, I have not mentioned out of any hatred to him, nor will I, to gratifie any man, lessen my account of the good which I found in him. Nestorius seems not to me, to be a follower either of Paul of Samosata's opinion, or of Photinus's, nor in the least to assert the Lord [Christ] to be a meer man. But he was put into a fright by this term [Theotocos] only, as if it had been a Bugbear. And this befell him meerly by reason of his great Illiterateness. For being naturally endowed with eloquence, he was supposed to be a man of learning; but in reality was unlearned and ignorant. He likewise scorned to read the Books of Ancient [c] Expositours. For being puft up with pride by reason of his ability to speak well, he minded not reading the Ancients with any thing of accuracy; but thought himself better then any man else. To begin therefore from hence, he was wholly ignorant, that in the Catholick Epistle of St John (to wit, in the ancient Copies thereof,) it was thus written; [d] every spirit which separates Jesus [from God,] is not of God. For, this sentence has been expunged out of the ancient Copies by those, whose desire it is to separate the Divine nature from the * humane Oeconomy. Wherefore, the Ancient Expositours have made this very remark, to wit, that some persons have depraved this Epistle, being desirous † to separate the Manhood of Christ from his Deity. For the Humanity is joyned to the Divinity. [e] Nor are they any more two, but one. The Ancients emboldened by this Testimony, scrupled not to stile Mary Theotocos. For Eusebius Pamphilus (in his third Book concerning the Life of Constantine,) has these express words. For * Emanuel endured to be born for us. And the place of his Nativity is amongst the Hebrews termed Bethlehem. Upon which account the Empress Helena most dear to God, adorned the place, where the † God bearing Virgin was delivered, with admirable Monuments, and illustrated that sacred Cave with all manner of ornaments. And Origen (in the first Tome of his [Comments] upon the Apostle's Epistle to the Romans,) expounding in what manner [Mary] may be termed Theotocos, handles that Question largely. 'Tis apparent therefore, that Nestorius was wholly ignorant in the writings of the Ancients. For which reason, as I have said, he opposes this only term [Theotocos.] For, that he

* That is, The Mother of God, or, the Virgin that bore God: a term that made a great disturbance in the Christian world, as the Reader will see hereafter.

[a] Nicephorus, when he wrote out this passage of Socrates, added the word [again,] shewing thereby, that the following words were taken out of St Paul's Epistle. Indeed, the words immediately preceding occur at 2 Cor. 5. 16; but whence these are quoted, I cannot yet find. Vales.

[b] St Henry Savill, had remarked at the margin of his Copy, that in his judgment, instead of [δοθεῖσαν, proposed,] it should be [ἐκδοθεῖσαν, published.] And a little after, where the reading is [φυσικὸς γὰρ ἐυλαλὸς ὤν, for being a naturall eloquent man] that Learned Knight had written in the margin fortè φυσικῶς, perhaps it should be [φυσικῶς, naturally;] to which emendation we agree, as by our Version appears. For Nicephorus, who has extracted this passage out of Socrates, words it thus. Vales.

[c] Instead of [ἑρμηνεύων] it must undoubtedly be [ἑρμηνέων, or ἑρμηνευτῶν, Expositours,] though the same errour be in Nicephorus also. But Socrates himself does a little after this, shew it should be ἑρμηνέων. For, his words are οἱ παλαιοὶ ἑρμηνεῖς, The Ancient Expositours. Vales.

[d] In the first Epist. of St John, chap. 4. vers. 2, 3; the words in the Greek Copies now extant are these Πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ ὁμολογεῖ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐστι· καὶ πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ μὴ ὁμολογεῖ τὸν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν. Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God. And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. In the Latine Copies 'tis thus worded: Omnis spiritus qui confitetur Jesum Christum in carne venisse, ex Deo est: & omnis spiritus qui solvit Jesum, ex Deo non est, Every spirit which confesses Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God: and every spirit which separates Jesus, is not of God. In that Greek Copy therefore, which the old Latine Translatour made use of, it was written thus: Πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν, every spirit which separates Jesus from God is not; as Socrates attests it to have been written in the ancient Copies. Notwithstanding, Socrates seems to have read, Πᾶν πνεῦμα ὃ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν; which words we have expresst in our Version. For Socrates's following words are, ὡς τινες εἰεν βεβλασφημηκότες τὴν ἐπιστολὴν, &c. that some persons have depraved [or, corrupted] this Epistle, being desirous to separate the Manhood of Christ from his Deity [or, Man from God.] In the Alexandrian Copy (the various readings whereof the English have given us,) this place in John is thus written; Καὶ πᾶν πνεῦμα ὃ μὴ ὁμολογεῖ τὸν Ἰησοῦν, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν, And every spirit which confesses not Jesus, is not of God. Which comes nearer to the vulgar reading. Vales.

* Or, Dispensation of man.

† Or, To separate man from God.

[e] Socrates mistakes here; and whilest he reproves Nestorius, falls into the Errour of Eutyches, who thought, that after the Union, there was not two, but only one nature in Christ. Unless we should say, that Socrates speaks concerning the persons, not the Natures. By this means Socrates might be excused, if his words would admit of this sense. 'Tis certain, ἀνθρωπότης, and θεότης (concerning which terms these words are spoken) do altogether signifie Natures, not persons. Vales.

* That is, God with us.

THEOD. Jun. and VALENTINIANUS.

he asserts not Christ to be a meer man, as Photinus and Paul of Samosata did, we are evidently informed even from his own discourses which he hath published. Wherein he does in no place destroy the Hypostasis of the Word of God; but every where professes him to have a proper, reall and peculiar person and existence: nor does he deprive him of a subsistence, as did Photinus and Paul of Samosata. Which Tenet the Manichæans and Montanus's followers have been so audacious as to assert. That this was Nestorius's opinion, I my self have found, partly by reading his own works, and partly from the discourses of his Admirers. Further, this frigid and empty discourse of Nestorius has raised no small disturbance in the world.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Concerning the horrid wickedness commited upon the Altar of the Great Church by the fugitive servants.

THese things having been transacted [after this manner,] there hapned a most detestable fact, perpetrated in the Church. For, the servants of one of the Great men, fellows that were Barbarians, having by experience found their Master to be cruell, fled to the Church, and with their swords drawn leapt upon the Altar. Being intreated to go out, they could by no means be prevailed upon; but hindred the divine Services. And holding their naked swords in their hands for [the space of] many days, they stood in a posture to make resistance against any one that approached them. Moreover, when they had killed one of the Ecclesiasticks, and wounded another, at last they slew themselves. Whereupon, one of those then present said, that the prophanation of the Church was no good sign, [in proof whereof] he added two Iambicks of a certain old Poet:

[a] Nicephorus quotes these two Verses thus:
Σημεῖα κὴ γὸ ταῦτα γίνεδς φιλεῖ,
Ὅταν τι ναοῖς ἐγκατασκήψῃ μύσος.
But the latter verse would be written better thus:
Ὅταν τι μῦσος ἐγκαθασκήπτῃ ναοῖς. Vales.

[a] For such Prognosticks happen in that while When horrid Crimes the Churches do defile.

Nor was he who spake these words, mistaken in his Sentiment. For (as it was conjectured,) a division amongst the people, and his deposition who had been the Occasioner of this division, was hereby portended.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Concerning the former Synod at Ephesus convened against Nestorius.

FOr within a small intervall of time, the Bishops in all places were by the Emperour's Edict ordered to meet together at Ephesus. Immediately after the Feast of Easter therefore, Nestorius went to Ephesus, accompanied with a great and promiscuous multitude, where he finds many Bishops met together. But Cyrillus [Bishop] of Alexandria made some delaies, and came not till about Pentecost. On the fifth day after Pentecost, Juvenalis Bishop of Jerusalem arrived. Whilest Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch was slow in coming, the [Prelates] that were present began to debate the Question. And Cyrillus of Alexandria made some onsets [of dispute,] being desirous to disturb and terrifie Nestorius; for he had conceived an hatred against him. Moreover, when many asserted the Deity of Christ, Nestorius expresst himself thus, I cannot term him God, who was two months and three months old. And therefore I am clear from your bloud; nor will I in future come to you any more. Having said this, he afterwards held conventions with the other Bishops, who were followers of his opinion. So that the persons present were divided into two factions. Those of Cyrillus's party * staid in the Councill, and cited in Nestorius. But he refused to come in, and deferred his appearance till the arrivall of Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch. Whereupon those of Cyrillus's party, (after they had severall times read over Nestorius's Discourses about this Question, which he had made to the people; and from the reading thereof had given in their judgment, that he had constantly spoken blasphemy against the Son of God) deposed him. When this was done, [a] Nestorius's party made up another Synod apart by themselves, and depose Cyrillus, and together with him Memnon Bishop of Ephesus. Not long after these transactions, Johannes Bishop of Antioch arrived. And being informed of what had been done, was highly displeased with Cyrillus, as being the occasioner of the disturbance which had hapned, in regard he had with so much rashness and precipitancy proceeded to the deposition of Nestorius. But Cyrillus, and together with him Juvenalis, to revenge themselves upon Johannes, depose him also. These affairs being after this manner confused and disturbed, Nestorius perceiving this contention had arrived to such an height as to ruine communion, retracted, and termed Mary Theotocos, saying, Let Mary be styled Theotocos, and let all animosities cease. But though he made this retractation, yet no body admitted of it. For at this present he continues deposed, and lives in exile at Oäsis. And this was the conclusion of the Synod held at that time. These things were done in the Consulate of Bassus and Antiochus, on the twenty eighth of June. But Johannes after his return to Antioch, assembled many Bishops, and deposed Cyrillus, who was then gone home to Alexandria. However, they laid aside their enmity soon after, came to a reconciliation, and restored one another to their Episcopall Chairs. But after Nestorius's deposition, a most violent disturbance seized the Churches of Constantinople. For the people were divided by reason of his frigid and empty babling, as I have said already. But all the Clergy by a generall consent Anathematized him. (For so we Christians do usually term the sentence against a blasphemer, when we propose it to publick view on a Pillar as it were, and render it visible to all persons.)

* Or, Made up the Synod.

[a] Socrates mistakes at this place, in attributing that to Nestorius which was done by John Bishop of Antioch. Therefore Evagrius and (who has followed him) Nicephorus do deservedly reprehend our Socrates. Now, the business, as we are informed from the Acts of the Ephesine Synod, was transacted in this manner. When Nestorius had been condemned and deposed by the holy Synod, and the Letters of Deposition had been sent to him, he sent forthwith a relation to the Emperour Theodosius, wherein he complained of his Adversaries violence, and that they would not expect the coming of the Eastern Bishops, who, 'twas said, would quickly be there. This relation was subscribed by ten Bishops of Nestorius's party. On the fifth day after, comes John Bishop of Antioch, with the Eastern Bishops. Who having understood what had been done, assembled together the Bishops (as well the Eastern Prelates whom he had brought with him, as those ten, which (as we have said) had subscribed Nestorius's Relation,) and deposed the Bishops Cyrillus and Memnon. At this Little Councill of Johannes's, Nestorius himself was not present, because having been condemned by an Episcopall sentence, he had not been restored by the determination of a Synod. But the Bishops of his party, whom the sentence of the Synod had in no wise touched, were present. Wherefore Socrates may be excused, if we say that these words [ὃς δεῖ νεῦσειν] do not denote Nestorius himself, but the Bishops who were of his party, and had subscribed his Relation. But in the other particulars Socrates is not to be excused. Vales.

CHAP. XXXV.

How, after Nestorius's Deposition, when some were desirous of placing Proclus in the Episcopall Chair, other Bishops elected Maximianus Bishop of Constantinople.

[AFter this] there was another debate about the Election of a Bishop. And many were for choosing Philippus, whom we have mentioned a little * before; but more † nominated Proclus. And the opinion of those [who voted] for Proclus had carried it, had not some of the most powerfull persons hindred it, who said 'twas forbidden by the Ecclesiastick Canon, that he who had been nominated Bishop of any City, ‖ should be translated to another ‖ See. This having been said and believed, compelled the people to be quiet. After an intervall therefore of four months from Nestorius's Deposition, a person by name Maximianus, is Elected to the Bishoprick; as to his course of life he was an Ascetick: but had himself also been made one of the Presbyters. He had long before gotten the repute of a pious and holy person, because at his own charge he had built Monuments, wherein Religious persons might be buried after their decease. He was a man of mean accomplishments in speaking, and desirous of leading a life void of business.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Instances, whereby this Writer does (as he supposes) evince, that a Translation from one See to another is not prohibited.

BUt in regard some persons, by alledging the Ecclesiastick Canon, have hindred Proclus, who had then been nominated Bishop of Cyzicum, from being seated [in the Episcopall Chair of Constantinople;] my desire is to say something briefly concerning this matter. Those persons who undertook to speak these things at that time, in my judgment spake not true; but either feigned them out of an Odium [they had conceived] against Proclus, or else were wholly ignorant of the Canons, and of severall other things of great use to, and frequently practised in the Churches. For, Eusebius Pamphilus, in the sixth * Book of his Ecclesiastick History, relates, that Alexander Bishop of one of the Cities in Cappadocia, coming to Jerusalem on account of prayer, was detained by the Inhabitants of that City, and consecrated Bishop in the room of Narcissus, and in future presided over the Churches there as long as he lived. So indifferent a thing it was amongst our Ancestours, for a Bishop to be translated from one City to another, as often as necessity required. And if it be requisite to annex the Canon to this our History, it will be demonstrated in what a manner they have belyed that Canon, [who have quoted it] in order to their hindring Proclus's Ordination. The [a] Canon therefore runs thus. If any person who has been Ordained Bishop of a Church, goes not to that Church over which he has been Ordained [Bishop,] not by reason of his own fault, but either because of the peoples refusall [of him,] or for any other necessary Cause [not proceeding from himself;] this person shall be partaker of the Honour and Ministration, provided he molests not the affairs of that Church wherein he shall celebrate Assemblies. But he ought to embrace whatever the Synod of the Province, [b] having had Cognizance of his Case, shall think good to determine. [Socrates speaks of this Synod at book 2. chap. 8; and this very Canon occurs at pag. 447. Tom. 1. Edit. Beveridge.]

* Chap. 11.

But Socrates is mistaken, in thinking that the Bishops relied upon this Canon, that they might exclude Proclus from the Constantinopolitan See. 'Tis true indeed, that Proclus was one of their number who are meant in the foresaid Canon. For after he had been ordained Bishop of Cyzicum by Sisinnius Patriarch of Constantinople, he was not admitted by the Inhabitants of Cyzicum, as Socrates has related before. But the Bishops who were against Proclus's Election, relied not upon this Canon, but quoted the twenty first Canon [which occurs at pag. 450, Tom. 1. Edit. Bever.] of the same Synod in confirmation of their own opinion; the Contents whereof are these: Ἐπίσκοπον ἀπὸ παροικίας ἐπὶ ἑτέραν, &c. A Bishop ought not in any wise to remove from one See to another, neither rushing into it wholly on his own accord, nor forcibly compelled by the people, nor yet necessarily constrained by the Bishops: but let him continue in that Church, which God has at first allotted to him, nor let him remove from thence, agreeable to the Pristine determination made concerning this matter. Our Socrates is therefore mistaken, who has put the eighteenth Canon of the Antiochian Synod, instead of the one and twentieth. He is out in this also, to wit, in supposing, that these words in the close of the eighteenth Canon [ἐκδίκεῖν δὲ αὐτὸν, ὅπερ ἂν, &c.] do favour his own opinion. Those words we have rendred thus: Suscipere autem debet quicquid Provinciæ Synodus de ejus negotio judicans constituerit, But he ought to embrace whatever a Synod of the Province, having had Cognizance of his Case, shall think good to determine. Socrates thought this to be the consequence of these words, viz. that if a Synod of the Province should think fit to translate the foresaid Bishop to some other See, that Bishop ought to obey that determination. But 'tis plain that he is out, in regard Translations of Bishops are expresly forbidden in the twenty first Canon. Vales.

[b] Κείνασι τὸ παρεστὰμενον δόξαν. Which words Dionysius Exiguus renders thus, Quod visum fuerit judicando Decreverit, shall by judging Decree what shall seem good. The old Translatour also (whose Version was heretofore in Henricus Memmius's Library, and has lately been published at Paris) renders it after this manner: Sed spectare cum oportere, quo usque Provinciæ Synodus de eo quæ eis videntur ordinet, But he ought to expect, till such time as a Synod of the Province shall determine concerning him what they think good. Where you may remark by the by, that the old Translatour in his Copy, read not the word [πλείαι, perfect;] as neither did Socrates. The same phrase occurs above in the Appendix to the sixth book, where Johannes speaks to the Bishops thus. τὸ παρεστὰμενον ὑμῖν καλαζιώσασθε αὐτοὶ διαλαβόντες καὶ κέρναντες δέησαι: which we have thus rendred into Latine, Causam ad vos delatam perpendentes ipsi ac dijudicantes definite. But 'tis better to translate it thus, quodcunque vobis visum fuerit, &c. Vales. Our English rendition of that place is this, do you inquire into the Cause, and make such a definitive determination as you shall think fit.

This is the Canon. Now, to make it evident, that many Bishops have been translated from some Cities to others, by reason of the Churches necessities now and then [intervening;] I will [here] annex the names of such [Bishops] as have been translated.

[c] Perigenes had been ordained Bishop of Patræ.

[c] Perigenes had been born and baptized at Corinth the Metropolis of Achaia: having afterwards been made a Clergy-man, he continued Presbyter of the same Church a long while with great integrity. Afterwards when he had been promoted to the Bishoprick of Patræ by the Bishop of Corinth, and the Inhabitants of Patræ had refused to receive him, he was forced to return to Corinth. The Bishop of which City dying not long after, the Corinthians requested he might be their Bishop; which request of theirs they made known to Bonifatius Bishop of Rome. But Bonifatius would do nothing in that affair, before he had received the Letters of Rufus Bishop of Thessalonica, who was deputed the Vicegerent of the Apostolick See throughout Achaia and Macedonia. He wrote therefore two Letters to him concerning this business, to which was annext the Corinthians Request. These Letters bore date in the Consulate of Monaxius and Plintha. Afterwards, when Bonifatius had received Rufus's Letters, he approved of Perigenes's Election, and wrote a Letter to him and the Corinthians. I have Collected these things from two Letters of Bonifatius to Rufus, which Letters were lately published at Rome by Lucas Holstenius a Learned person, and one that has deserved well of Ecclesiastick Antiquity. Further, this Perigenes was present at the Ephesine Synod convened against Nestorius. For in the First Action thereof occur these words, Περιγένης κορίνθου τῆς ἑλλάδος, of Perigenes [Bishop] of Corinth in Greece. Vales.

But

THEOD. Jun. and VALENTINIANUS.

But in regard the Inhabitants of the foresaid City refused to admit him, the Bishop of Rome ordered he should be constituted Bishop in the Metropolitane See of Corinth, the Bishop of that Church being dead. Over which Church Perigenes presided as long as he lived. Gregorius of Nazianzum was first of all Bishop of Sasimi one of the Cities in Cappadocia: afterwards he was made [Bishop] of Nazianzum. Melitius had formerly presided over the Church in Sebastia, and afterwards he Governed that in Antioch. Alexander Bishop of Antioch translated Dositheus Bishop of Seleucia to Tarsus in Cilicia. [d] Reverentius [was removed] from Arci [a City] of Phanice, and afterwards translated to Tyre. Johannes was translated from [e] Gordum [a City] of Lydia to [f] Proconnesus, and presided over the Church there. Palladius was translated from Helenopolis to Aspuna. Alexander was translated from Helenopolis to Adriani. [g] Theophilus was translated from Apamea [a City] of Asia, to Eudoxiopolis anciently termed [h] Salambria. Polycarpus was translated from Sexantapristi [a City] of * Mœsia, to Nicopolis of Thracia. Hierophilus was translated from Trapezopolis [a City] of Phrygia to Plotinopolis in Thracia. [i] Optimus was removed from Agdamia in Phrygia to Antioch [a City] of Pisidia. Silvanus was translated from Philippopolis in Thracia, to Troas. Let thus many be sufficient to have been named at present, who were removed from their own Cities to other [Sees.] But I judge it usefull to speak something in short concerning Silvanus, who was translated from Philippopolis in Thracia to Troas.

[d] In the Sfortian M.S. this person is called Renverentius. But in Nicephorus 'tis Reverentius, which is truer. Epiphan. Scholasticus terms him Reverentius also. In the fourth book of the Jus Græco-Romanum, chap. De Translationibus Episcoporum, he is corruptly stiled Revenus. Valef.

[e] Nicephorus makes Gordum a City of Lycia, not Lydia: but all other [Writers] assign it to Lydia. Further, this Johannes Bishop of Proconnesus was present at the Ephesine Synod, as 'tis recorded in the first Action of that Council. Valef.

* Or, Mysia.

[f] In the Florentine Manuscript 'tis Proconnesus. In Nicephorus, in the Jus Græco-Romanum, and in the Acts of the Ephesine Councill, 'tis written Proiconnesus. The Author of the Etymologicon (in the word Περικόννησος) defends both readings. And deduces the originall of this name (which has the Letter (i) added) from hence, either because this Island furnishes the other Islands with marmour, περίκα, that is Gratis, freely, or for nothing; or else from the word περξ, which signifies Hinnuleum, a little Hind. But Dionysius Atheniensis (in his book [entitled] κλίσεις, which he wrote concerning the building of Cities,) says 'twas called Proconesus from the multitude of Harts there, which they term περκας. Others will have its name derived from a vessell which the Greeks call περκον, because when the Milesii at first brought a Colony thither, they were met by a Virgin carrying such a Vessell. Valef. In Robert Stephens Edit. 'tis termed Proconesus.

[g] In the fourth book of the Jus Græco-Romanum, pag. 53; he is termed Theosebius. And so he is called in the Tripartite History (which Epiphan. Scholasticus translated;) and in Ivo Carnotensis (in Prologo Decreti.) But Nicephorus terms him Philippus, which I wonder at. Valef.

[h] From the Florentine and Sfortian Manuscripts, and from Nicephorus and Epiphan. Scholasticus, instead of Salabria, we have made it Salambria. 'Tis a City of Thracia, which the Greeks heretofore termed Selymbria, as Strabo and Stephanus do attest: but afterwards 'twas called Salambria. So in the Itinerarium Burdigalense: Mansio Salamembria [in mentioned which was] 44 miles distant from Constantinople. Valef.

[i] This is the Optimus Bishop of Anticch in Pisidia, of whom the Emperour Theodosius makes mention in the third Law of the Theodosian Code, de Fide catholicâ; to whom, (together with Amphilochius of Iconium,) the charge and Administration of the Churches of Asia is committed. Valef.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Concerning Silvanus, who was translated from Philippopolis to Troas.

Silvanus had formerly been a Rhetorician [in the School of] Troilus the Sophista. But in regard he proposed to himself an accuracy in the profession of the Christian Religion as his chief design, and exercised himself in the severities of an Ascetick life, [on account hereof] he refused to [a] wear the Rhetoricians Pallium. But afterwards, Atticus the Bishop [b] laid hold of him, and ordained him Bishop of Philippopolis. After he had lived three years in Thracia, and found himself unable to endure the cold (for he had a very thin, lean, and infirm body;) he entreated Atticus, that he would ordain another in his stead, affirming that he refused to live in Thracia upon no other account, than because of the cold. Another person therefore having for this very reason been ordained in his room, Silvanus continued at Constantinople, and with a most exquisite diligence followed an Ascetick course of life. He was so great a stranger to delicateness and fineness, that he would frequently appear in publick amongst so numerous a concourse of people as were in that populous City, shod only with Sandalls made of [c] Sparsum. After some intervall of time the Bishop of the Church Concerning the Rhetoricians. For he says that Silvanus had before been a Rhetorician, that is, an Advocate out of Troilus the Sophist's School: but afterwards left off his Pallium, and imbraced a Monastick life. Concerning the Rhetoricians Pallium see what we have remarked before at book 7. chap. 12. note (c.) To which may be added this passage out of Theophylactus Simocatta's Menodia, which he spoke in praise of the Emperour Mauricius after Phucas's death: Σπουδαίως δὲ λόγοι ἦν κρέττων, τῷ ἐυφημίαν αὐ μᾶσαι. τὸ λευκὸν εἶναι τεθέσθαι. Which words Theophylactus himself cites in the eighth book of his History, chap. 12. Whence it may be gathered, that the Rhetoricians Pallium was white, not red, or Scarlet coloured, as we have noted before from Cyrillus, and Basilius Grammaticus. Gregorius Nazianzenus speaks also concerning the Rhetoricians Pallium, in his twentieth Oration concerning the praises of Basilius. pag. 328. Edit. Paris. 1609 where Billius (by the same mistake) has rendred it Pallia Philosophica, the Philosophick Palliums. Valef.

[a] Τελέωνα φορεῖν. Christophorson has rendred it ill, thus, Pallium Philosophicum, the Philosophick Pallium, adding a word of his own, to wit, Philosophick. But Socrates speaks not concerning the Philosophick Pallium, but concerning that of the [b] I agree not with Christophorson, who has rendred this place so, as if Atticus had sent for Silvanus to come to him. What need was there of sending for him, who was present at Constantinople, to wit, a Rhetorician in the School of Troilus the Sophist who taught Rhetorick at Constantinople? The word συλλαβεῖν signifies something more, to wit, to lay hold of, and use force towards any person. By this term therefore Socrates shews, that Silvanus was against his own will, and with a reluctancy made Bishop of Philippopolis by Atticus. Philippopolis is the Metropolis of that Country strictly and properly called Thracia. You must know further, that the ordination of the Metropolitanes of Thracia belonged then to the Bishop of Constantinople. For the Patriarchs by a certain singular priviledge ordained Metropolitanes, as I have observed at large in my dissertation on the sixth Canon of the Nicene Councill. [The Learned Reader will meet with this dissertation of Valesius's at pag. 188. of his notes on Socrates and Sozomen; Edit. Paris. 1668.] Hence 'tis, that the same Atticus Patriarch of Constantinople, ordained the said Silvanus Bishop of Troas, upon the request of the Inhabitants of that City. For Alexandria Troas [or, Alexander's Troas,] was the Metropolis of Phrygia. This is in express words established by the twenty eighth Canon of the Chalcedon Councill, [which occurs at Tom. 1. pag. 145, Edit. Beveredg.] which Treats concerning the priviledges of the Constantinopolitane See: to wit, that the Metropolitanes only of the Thracican, Pontick, and Asian-Diœceses, should be ordained by the most holy Constantinopolitane See; the Decrees being, (as usually,) first made, by the common consent of the Clergy and Laity, and directed to the Patriarch of Constantinople. For thus the foresaid Canon does determine, ψηφισμάτων συμφώναν κατὰ τὸ ἔθος γινομένων καὶ ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἀναφερομένων, The Decrees made as usually, being agreed upon and transmitted to him. The Canon means the Decree of Request, such a one as the Corinthians sent to Bonifatius, desiring they might have Perigenes for their Bishop; as we have observed before at chap. 36, note (c.) Valef.

[c] Ἀπὸ χορτίνων σανδαλίων. Christophorson renders it, Sandaliis indutus fœno confectis, shod with Sandalls made of hay. Epiphanius Scholasticus (who is followed by Langus, Nicephorus's Translator, book 14. chap. 39.) translates it solcas de sparto, Sandalls of Sparum.

Spartum is a kind of Shrub like our Broom, of which they made bonds to tie their Vines, ropes for Ships, and (as it ſeems) Sandalls alſo. Such Sandalls as theſe were thoſe termed Carbatinæ; concerning which ſee Julius Pollux Onomaſt. book 7. chap. 22. Heſychius (in the word καρβατίνη,) ſays they were mean ſhooes worn by the Peſants; and expounds that term thus, μονόπελλον ὑπόδημα, a ſhooe with one ſole.

THEOD. Jun. and VALENTINIANUS.

of Troas departed this life. On which account the Inhabitants of Troas came [to Conſtantinople] to deſire a Biſhop. Whileſt Atticus was conſidering whom he ſhould ordain, it hapned that Silvanus came to give him a viſit. As ſoon as Atticus ſaw him, he [d] laid aſide his care [about that affair] immediately, and ſpoke to Silvanus [on this wiſe,] You have no further excuſe for your avoiding the care and government of [this] Church. For Troas is not a cold place. Behold, God has provided you a convenient place for the infirmneſs of your body. Delay not therefore, Brother, but go to Troas. Wherefore Silvanus removed to that City: where he did a Miracle, which I will now relate. A vaſt Ship for carrying of burthens, made for the conveyance of great pillars, (ſuch a veſſell they term Plate;) had been newly built on the Shore of Troas. This Veſſell was to be Launched. But though many ropes [were faſtned to the Ship,] and a great number of perſons [did their utmoſt] to hale it [Seaward,] yet it was not in any wiſe to be moved. After this had been done for many days, then they thought that a devil detained the Veſſell. Wherefore, they went to Biſhop Silvanus, and entreated him to make a prayer in that place. For they believed, that by that means only the Ship was to be drawn into the Sea. But he, entertaining modeſt thoughts of himſelf, ſtiled himſelf a ſinner, and ſaid, that was a work to be done by ſome righteous perſon, not by him. When they continued their Suit with a greater earneſtneſs, he went to the Shore. Where after he had prayed, he * took hold of one of the ropes, and bad them ſet cloſe to the buſineſs. And when they had haled the Ship on a little, ſhe ran ſwiftly into the Sea. This Miracle performed by Silvanus's hands ſtirred up thoſe of that Province to piety. But Silvanus was a good man as to other things alſo. For perceiving that the Eccleſiaſticks made a gain of their contentions who were engaged in Suits at Law, he would never make any one of the Clergy a Judge. But received the Libells of the Litigants himſelf, and called one of the faithfull Laicks to him, whom he knew to be a Lover of juſtice; to whom he committed the hearing of the cauſe, [by which means] he [e] freed the Litigants from contentiouſneſs. For theſe reaſons Silvanus got himſelf a great name amongſt all men. Thus much concerning Silvanus, which although declared by way of digreſſion, yet (in my judgment) the mention hereof * is not unuſefull. But let us return to that place, from whence we have digreſſed. After Maximianus therefore was ordained Biſhop [of Conſtantinople] in the Conſulate of Baſſus and Antiochus, about the twenty fifth of October, the affairs of the Church were in a ſedate and quiet poſture.

Concerning the Jews in * Creet, how, many of them turned Chriſtians at that time.

* This Iſland is now termed Candia.

ABout the ſame time, many of the Jews [who dwelt] in Creet, turned Chriſtians, on account of this calamitous accident. A certain Jew, who was an Impoſtor, feigned himſelf to be Moſes: and affirmed himſelf to have been ſent from heaven, that he might [a] lead out the Jews who inhabited that Iſland, and conduct them through the Sea. For he was (as he ſaid) the ſame perſon, who preſerved the Iſraelites heretofore [by leading them] through the Red-Sea. For the ſpace of one whole year therefore, he travelled about to all the Cities of that Iſland, and perſwaded the Jews who inhabited therein, to believe theſe things. And he exhorted them to leave their money and poſſeſſions: for he promiſed, that he would lead them through a dry Sea into the Land of Promiſe. They, deceived by ſuch hopes as theſe, neglected all employments; and moreover deſpiſed the things they poſſeſſed, permitting any perſons they met with to take them. When the day was come which had been ſet by this Jewiſh Impoſtor, he himſelf went before, and they all followed with their wives and little children. He leads them therefore to a Promontory which * ran out into the Sea, and ordered them to caſt themſelves from thence into the Ocean. They who came firſt to the Precipice, did ſo, and loſt their lives immediately, part of them being daſh't [in pieces] againſt the Rocks, and part drowned in the Waters. And many more of them had periſhed, had not ſome Fiſhermen and Merchants (who were Chriſtians,) by the diſpoſall of divine providence hapned to be preſent. Theſe perſons drew out and ſaved ſome of them who were almoſt choak'd with the waters; who having been in ſo imminent danger, were then ſenſible of their own madneſs. They kept the others alſo from caſting themſelves into the Sea, by telling them that thoſe were deſtroyed who had thrown themſelves in firſt. The Jews therefore, having at length underſtood the Impoſture, blamed their own indiſcretion in believing. But when they endeavoured to [ſeize] the † Pſeudo-Moſes and kill him, they could not apprehend him. For he diſappeared [on a ſudden;] and this made moſt men ſuſpect that he was a deſtructive Devil, who had clothed himſelf with an humane ſhape, that he might deſtroy their Nation in that Country. By reaſon of this calamitous accident, many of the Jews then in Creet, bade adieu to Judaiſm, and * embraced the Faith of the Chriſtian Religion.

[a] In ſome Copies the reading is [ἐκλαβεῖν] at which word Epiphanius Scholaſticus and Nicephorus with good reaſon were diſpleaſed; and therefore both of them omitted it. in my judgment it ſhould be [ἐκβαλεῖν, might lead out] Valeſ.

rious fire [at Constantinople,] such a one as had never † been known before. For a great part of the City was destroyed by this fire: in so much that the [a] greatest Granaries, and that termed the [b] Achillean Bath, were burnt down. At length the fire, consuming [all things in its way,] approacht the Novatianists Church, which stands neer Pelargus.

[a] Τὰ μέγιστα τῶν ὠείων. In Nicephorus 'tis ὠρείων with an aspirate. And Langus translates it Barns, or Granaries. Musculus renders it Maxima ædificia, the greatest Edifices. Christophorson, fortissima munimenta, the strongest Fortresses. I had rather follow Langus. For ὠρεῖον is a barbarous Greek word, which signifies a Barn or Granary; as Meursius has long since observed in his Glossary. In the Kings Copy I found it written ὀρεῖον at this place. Further, there were five publick Barns or Granaries at Constantinople; to wit, four in the fifth Ward. Vales.

[b] In the Alexandrian Chronicle (pag. 728, Edit. Monach. 1615,) the words are these: On Theodosius Augustus's fourteenth Consulate which he bore with Maximus, there arose a great fire from the Neorium, which burnt down the Granaries and the Achillean Bath, in the month Loös, &c. Epiphanius Scholasticus renders it, Thermas quæ vocantur Achillea, that termed the Achillean Bath. Which rendition is confirmed by Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon, (pag. 26. Edit. Paris. 1619;) at the Consulate of Maximus and Paterius, which was the year of Christ 443. His Coss. (says he) Thermarum quæ Achilleæ dicuntur, Encænia facta, in their Consulate, that termed the Achillean Bath was [after it had been rebuilt,] dedicated. And the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicon affirms the same (pag. 730, Edit. ut prius,) in these words; ἐπὶ τούτων τῶν ὑπάτων, &c. In the same persons [that is, Maximus's and Paterius's] Consulate, the publick Bath termed Achilles was dedicated, in the month Audunæus, before the third of the Ides of January. The Achillean Bath therefore (after it had been consumed by fire, in the fourteenth Consulate of Theodosius which he bore with Maximus, on the year of Christ 433,) was rebuilt and dedicated on the tenth year after. Vales.

When therefore Paulus the Bishop saw his Church in danger, he rush't into it [and ran] as far as the Altar, where he * commended the preservation of the Church and the things therein to God, nor did he omit the pouring forth his prayers both for the City, and for the Church. † And God heard his prayer, as 'twas demonstrated by the event. For though the fire brake into the Church through all the doors and windows, yet it did no harm. It wholly consumed many adjacent Edifices on every side of it: but you might have seen the Church it self in the midst of the whole fire, triumphing over its raging Flames. And when this fire had continued two whole days and as many nights, it was wholly extinguished, after it had burnt down a great part of the City. But the Church appeared entire and untoucht. And (which is more to be admired) there was not the least * appearance of smoak to be seen on its timber, or walls. This hapned about the sixteenth of August, in Theodosius's fourteenth Consulate which he bore with Maximus. Since which time the Novatianists do celebrate [the memory of] their Church its having been preserved, every year about the sixteenth of August; on which day they put up their thanksgivings to God. And all persons in a manner, not only Christians but very many Pagans also, since that time honour that place, by reason of the Miracle which hapned therein; and have a veneration for it as being truly holy. But thus far concerning these things.

CHAP. XL.

That Proclus succeeded Maximianus the Bishop.

MAximianus having quietly governed the Churches two years and five months, died in the Consulate of Areobindus and Aspar, on the twelfth of April. That day hapned to fall on the week of Fasts, [to wit] the week which immediately precedes the Feast of Easter: and it was the * fifth day of that week. At which time the Emperour Theodosius made a prudent provision for this affair. For least a debate should arise again about the Election of a Bishop, which might raise a disturbance in the Church; he delayed not, but whilest Maximianus's body lay as yet unburied, ordered the Bishops that were present [in the City] to place Proclus in the Episcopall Chair. For the Letters of Celestinus Bishop of Rome, wherein he approved of [a] this [Election,] were then come; which Letters he had sent to Cyrillus [Bishop] of Alexandria, to Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch, and to [b] Rufus [Bishop] of Thessalonica; informing them, that nothing hindred him (who had been nominated and actually was Bishop of one City,) from being translated to another. Therefore after Proclus was placed in the Episcopall Chair, he made a Funerall for the body of Maximianus. But we have now an opportunity of speaking something in short concerning Proclus.

THEOD. Jun. and VALENTINIANUS.

* That is, Thursday in the Passion week.

[a] Instead of [τοῦτο] I read [τούτῳ,] as did Sr Henry Savill and Christophorson. Moreover, I agree with Baronius, who (at the year of Christ 434,) has truly remarked, that these Letters of Cælestine Bishop of Rome were not written on this year, but two years before; to wit, when (after Nestorius's deposition,) they were busie about Electing a Bishop of Constantinople. 'Tis certain on this year (when Areobindus and Aspar were Consuls) Cælestine was dead, and Xystus had succeeded him in the Bishoprick of Rome. Vales.

[b] Valesius has told us before (at note (c.) on chap. 36,) that Rufus Bishop of Thessalonica was deputed the Vice-gerent of the Apostolick See [that is, Rome] throughout Achaia and Macedonia. He adds here, that he had the same Vice-gerency throughout Illyricum, as the Epistles of Innocentius and Bonifacius Bishops of Rome do declare, which are to be seen in Lucas Holstenius's Roman Collection. For (continues Valesius) the Bishops of Thessalonica had that privileedge from the times of Pope Damasus, as we learn from the same Collection. Balsamo (in his comments on the Synod in Trullo, pag. 359, Edit. Paris. 1620.) affirms, that the Bishops of Thessalonica were heretofore the Legates of the Roman Bishop; and that the Bishop of Rome has a power of constituting Legates in the Constantinopolitane Patriarchate; but denies that he has a power of ordaining Bishops; wherein Balsamo is much mistaken. For those Provinces, which then when Balsamo wrote, were under the Constantinopolitan Prelate, had heretofore been under the Bishop of Rome. Further, the Nicene Synod has determined, that the ancient usages should be observed. Thus far Valesius. But, as you see, he gives no reason to confute what Balsamo has said, to wit, that the Bishop of Rome has no power to ordain Bishops within the Constantinopolitane Patriarchate. And therefore I will (and so may the Reader too, if he pleases) suspend my belief, till some reasons are assigned. This passage in Balsamo (here quoted by Valesius) occurs in Dr Beveredge's Synod. Tom. 1. p. 154. See the Learned Doctors notes, pag. 126.

CHAP. XLI.

Concerning Proclus the Bishop what manner of man he was.

PRoclus was from his younger years a Reader, he frequented the Schools, and imployed his time in [the study of] Rhetorick. Being come to man's estate, he was for the most part conversant with Atticus the Bishop, and had been his Notary. When he had made a great proficiency, Atticus promoted him to the Diaconate. Having been preferred to the Presbyterate, Sisinnius (as I have said * before) ordained him Bishop of Cyzicum. These things had hapned long before this. But, 'twas at this time that he obtained the Chair of the Constantinopolitane Church. He was a person endowed with as good a disposition and moralls, as was any man whatsoever. For having been educated under Atticus, he studiously imitated all that was good in him. [a] But he exerciſed a patience far greater than Atticus. For he, * now and then, ſhewed himſelf terrible to Hereticks. But Proclus was calm and mild to all perſons: [b] in regard he foreſaw, that they might be brought [to embrace the true faith] by this means, rather than by force. For being reſolved to vex and diſquiet no Hereſie whatever, he preſerved the dignity and honour of his mildneſs and manſuetude intire and unviolated, and [as if it had been ſome pledge] reſtored it to the Church. In which particular thing he imitated the Emperour Theodoſius. For 'twas His fixt and unalterable determination, not to make uſe of his Imperiall power and authority againſt Criminalls: and Proclus's reſolution was, not to value any ones entertaining ſuch ſentiments concerning God, as were different from thoſe embraced by himſelf.

* Ἐν καιρῷ, upon occaſion.

[a] In Robert Stephens's Edition, the reading is, πλὼ δὲ ἀνεξικακίαν πλέον ἢν ἐκεῖνος εἶχεν ἐξήσκησεν, But he exerciſed a patience far greater than he [Atticus] had. The word [εἶχεν, had] is wanting in the Sforzian M. S. Wherefore I doubt not but Socrates left it written thus, πλὼ δὲ ἀνεξικακίαν πλέον ἢ ἐκεῖνος ἐξήσκησε. But he exerciſed a patience far greater than Atticus. Which emendation is confirmed by Epiphan. Scholaſticus and Nicephorus, for Nicephorus (book 14. chap. 38,) words it thus; ἀνεξικακίᾳ δὲ καὶ πλέον ἤπερ ἐκεῖνοι, moreover, he was far more patient than they, [that is, than John Chryſoſtome and Atticus.] And Epiphan. Scholaſt. renders it thus: Sed in iſto patientia potior apparebat, but in him a better [or more deſireable] patience appeared. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLII.

That, this Writer ſpends many words in praiſe of the Emperour Theodoſius Junior's probity.

ON account hereof therefore, Proclus was highly commended by the Emperour. For * He himſelf alſo was like to ſuch as were true Prelates; nor did he any wiſe approve of thoſe, who were deſirous of perſecuting others. Yea, I can ſpeak it with confidence, that for meekneſs he excelled all thoſe who were true and genuine Eccleſiaſticks. [a] And what is recorded of Moſes in the Book of Numbers, * Now the man Moſes was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth; the ſame may be now ſaid of the Emperour Theodoſius, to wit, that he is very meek, above all the men which are upon the face of the earth. For by reaſon of this his meekneſs, God has ſubdued his enemies under him, without military engagements, as hath been demonſtrated by his Victory over the Tyrant † Johannes, and [ſhall be made evident] from the deſtruction of the || Barbarians, which ſucceeded that ſoon after. For what manner of aſſiſtances have been given by God to juſt men heretofore, ſuch like have even in our times been beſtowed on the moſt pious Emperour, by the God of the Univerſe. Nor do I write this out of flattery, but I will give a Narrative of affairs (which all men have been throughly acquainted with,) as they truly are.

* That is, Theodoſius.

[a] The diſcourſe will be more gracefull and Emphaticall, if we add a particle thus, καὶ καθάπερ, &c. And what is recorded, &c. and ſo make this the beginning of a period. Thus Nicephorus reads it. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLIII.

How great calamities thoſe Barbarians underwent, who had been the Tyrant Johannes's Auxiliaries.

FOr after the ſlaughter of the Tyrant, thoſe Barbarians whom he had called to his aſſiſtance againſt the Romans, made preparations to overrun [and ruine] the Roman * Provinces. When the Emperour heard of it, according as his uſage was, he committed the care of this affair to God: and having been earneſt in prayers, not long after obtained what he deſired. Further, it will be advantagious, to hear what [calamities] befell the Barbarians. Their Commander in chief, whoſe name was [a] Rougas, is killed by a clap of thunder. Then followed a plague, which deſtroyed moſt of the men under his command. Nor was this only ſufficient; but fire alſo deſcended from heaven, and conſumed many of thoſe who remained. And this put the Barbarians into the greateſt terrour imaginable, not ſo much becauſe they had dared to take up Arms againſt the valiant Nation of the Romans; as in regard they found them aſſiſted by a powerfull God. Moreover, Proclus the Biſhop Preached a Sermon at that time in the Church, wherein he applied a prophecy [taken] out of Ezechiel to the deliverance effected by God at that juncture; [for which diſcourſe] he was greatly admired. The prophecy runs thus: And thou ſon of man, prophecy againſt [b] Prince Gog, Rhos, Miſoch and Thobell. For I will judge him with death, and with bloud, and with an overflowing rain, and with ſtones of hail. And I will rain fire and Brimſtone upon him, and upon all thoſe with him, and upon many Nations [which are] with him. And I will be magnified and glorified, and I will be known in the eyes of many Nations. And they ſhall know that I am the Lord. On account thereof therefore, as I have ſaid, Proclus was much admired. But on the Emperour, becauſe of his meekneſs, many other [Bleſſings] were conferred by divine providence. Amongſt which this was one, [which I will now relate.]

* Πράγματα, affairs.

[a] In Priſcus's Hiſtory of the Goths, the King of the Hunni is termed Rouas, who was ſucceeded by Attalas. In Jordanes he is called Roas, the brother of Octar and Mundiuchus, the uncle of Attalas. Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlator calls him Roilas, for what reaſon I know not: for in Nicephorus 'tis Rougas, as well as here in Socrates. Valeſ.

[b] See Ezech. 38. verſ. 2, 22, & 23. In the Septuagint Verſion, at v. 2. the words are ἄρχοντα ῥὼς Prince Rhos. But the term ῥὼς is wanting in the vulgar Tranſlation, inſtead whereof Hieronymus has rendred it thus, Principem capitis Moſoch, Prince of the chief of Moſoch. Wherefore, what Langus remarks here concerning the Ruſſi, is in my judgment forreign to this place. Valeſ. In the Hebrew, the words at this text are נְשִׂיא רֹאשׁ מֶשֶׁךְ; which in the margin of our Engliſh Verſion is render'd exactly, thus, Prince of the chief of Meſhech. Socrates quotes this whole text out of Ezechiel, in the words of the Septuagint Verſion, and we have tranſlated them accordingly. The difference between the Greek Verſion and Originall Hebrew at this text is great. Our Engliſh Tranſlatours (as they generally do, ſo here) follow the Hebrew.

CHAP. XLIV.

That the Emperour Valentinianus Junior married Eudoxia the daughter of Theodoſius.

Emperour Theodosius had given his consent, and both the Augusti (after they had deliberated about celebrating the marriage at some place on the frontiers of both Empires,) had resolved each to make a journey half way, and do it at Thessalonica: Valentinianus sends Theodosius intimation by Letter, that he should not give himself that trouble: for, that he would come in person to Constantinople. Having therefore secured the Western parts [with a sufficient guard,] he comes to Constantinople on account of the marriage. Which having been celebrated in the Consulate of [a] Isidorus and Senator, he took his Wife, and returned into the Western parts. Such a felicity as this befell the Emperour at that time.

[a] These persons were Consuls on the year of Christ 436.

But Prosper, Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon, and the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle, disagree from Socrates. For those Authours relate, that this marriage was celebrated on the year following, whereon Aëtius bore his second Consulate with Sigisvultus, in the month of November. The same is confirmed by Jordanes in his book de Successione Regnorum; where after he has spoken concerning the whoredom committed by Honoria with her Procurator Eugenius, which was done in the Consulate of Arcobindus and Aspar on the year of Christ 434; He adds these words; Posthæc tertio anno Valentinianus, &c. On the third year after this the Emperour Valentinianus comes from Rome to Constantinople in order to his marrying Eudoxia daughter to the Emperour Theodosius: and having given all Illyria as a gratuity to his Father in Law, after the celebration of the marriage, he returned with his Wife to his own Kingdomes. Cassiodorus Senator attests the same concerning the donation of the Western Illyricum (book 11. Variarum, Epist. 1. pag. 684, Edit. Aurel. Allobrog. 1622.) in these words: Placidiam mundi opinione celebratam, avorum [or, principum, or, aliquorum, as 'tis in some Copies,] Prosapia gloriosam, purpurato filio studuisse percepimus; cujus dum remisse administrat Imperium, indecenter cognoscitur imminutum. Nurum denique sibi amissione Illyrici comparavit, factaque est conjunctio regnantis, divisio dolenda provinciis. Vales.

CHAP. XLV.

That Proclus the Bishop perswaded the Emperour to translate the Body of Johannes from the place of his Exile [where it had been buried,] to Constantinople, and to deposite it in the Church of The Apostles.

NOt long after this time, Proclus the Bishop reduced *those [to the Church] who had made a separation [from it] on account of Bishop Johannes's deposition; having mitigated their disgust by a †prudent expedient. What that was, we must now relate. After he had perswaded the Emperour [to give his consent thereto,] he brought the body of Johannes, which had been buried at Comani, to Constantinople, on the thirty fifth year after his deposition. And when he had carried it through the City, publickly in great pomp and state, he deposited it with much honour and solemnity in that termed the Church of The Apostles. Those persons therefore who had made a separation on Johannes's account, were by this means prevailed upon, and became united to the Church. And this hapned in the sixteenth Consulate of the Emperour Theodosius, about the twenty seventh of January. But I cannot forbear wondring here, how [it came to pass,] that Envy should assail and corrode Origen after he was dead, and yet spare Johannes. For Origen was excommunicated by Theophilus about two hundred years after his death. But Johannes was admitted to communion by Proclus, on the thirty fifth year after he died. So great was the difference between Proclus's disposition, and that of Theophilus. But prudent men are not ignorant, [a] in what manner these things have been, and daily are done.

*He means those termed the Johannitæ. See book 6. chap. 18.

THEOD. Jun. and VALENTINIANUS.

[a] By these words Socrates does plainly discover his opinion. For he would say, that these things are usually done through envy, or out of favour. For because Origen was condemned by Theophilus, so many years after his death; that Socrates ascribes to Theophilus's envy towards Origen himself, or against those termed the Long-Monks. And, whereas John Chrysostome was brought back with honour into his own Country, on the thirty fifth year after his death; that Socrates attributes to the love and benevolence of Proclus and the people of Constantinople. But I am not of Socrates's opinion. For although in affairs of this nature, the affections of men have some effect. Yet divine Justice and providence, whereby the Church is governed, doth always overrule. Origen therefore was condemned for his Heterodox opinions; and John Chrysostome, being consecrated for his integrity of life and doctrine, continues in the Church to this very day. Valesius.

CHAP. XLVI.

Concerning the death of Paulus Bishop of the Novatianists, and concerning Marcianus who was his successour.

SOme little time after the Removall of Johannes's body, died Paulus also Bishop of the Novatianists, in the same Consulate, about the twenty first day of July. Who at his own Funerall reduced all the disagreeing Heresies into one Church in a manner. For they all accompanied his body to the *Grave with singing of Psalmes: because whilest he lived, all [Sects] loved him exceedingly for his †Sanctity of life. But, because the same Paulus performed a memorable action just before his death, I judge it usefull to insert it into this History, for their advantage who shall peruse this Work. For, that during his sickness he observed his usuall Ascetick [discipline as to his] dyet, and transgressed not in the least [the rules] thereof; and, that he never omitted performing the [usuall] prayers with a fervency; [all this] I think fit to leave unmentioned: least by spending time in giving a narrative hereof, I shou'd obscure that memorable and most usefull action (as I have said) which he performed. What that is, must now be declared. Being neer dying, he sent for all the Presbyters belonging to the Churches under him, to whom he expresst himself thus: Take care about electing a Bishop [over your selves] whilest I am alive; least afterwards your Churches be disturbed. When they made answer, that the Election of a Bishop was not to be left to them: for in regard [said they,] some of us have one Sentiment, others another, we shall never nominate the same person: but we wish, that you your self would name that man whom you desire [to be your successour.] To which Paulus made this return: deliver me then this profession of yours in writing, [to wit,] that you will Elect him whom I shall appoint to be chosen. When they had done that, and confirmed it by their subscriptions, [a] he sate on his bed, and (without discovering it to those who were present,) wrote Marcianus's name in the paper. This person had been promoted to the Presbyterate, and likewise had been instructed in an Ascetick course of life under Paulus: but was then gone to travell. After this he Sealed up the the paper himſelf, and cauſed the chief of the Presbyters to Seal it up alſo, and then delivered it to one Marcus, (who was Biſhop of the Novatianiſts in Scythia, but had at that time made a journey to Conſtantinople;) to whom he ſpake theſe words: If God ſhall permit me to continue much longer in this life, reſtore this * depoſitum to me [now] committed to your truſt to be kept ſafely. But, if it ſhall pleaſe him to remove me out of this world, in this paper you will find whom I have Elected to be my ſucceſſour in the Biſhoprick. When he had ſpoken theſe words, he died. On the third day therefore after his death, when they had unſealed the paper in the preſence of a great multitude, and found Marcianus's name therein, they all cried out that he was a worthy and fit perſon. And without delay they diſpatcht away ſome meſſengers who might ſeize him. They took him by a pious fraud at his reſidence in Tiberiopolis [a City] of Phrygia; from whence they brought him along with them, and about the twenty firſt [b] of the ſame month ordained, and placed him in the Epiſcopall Chair. But enough concerning theſe things.

* This pledge, or, Gage.

[b] Although our M. SS. Copies alter not the reading here; yet I agree with Chriſtophorſon and S[r] Henry Savill, who have mended it thus [of the month Auguſt.] Doubtleſs, in regard Paulus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts died on the twenty firſt of July, and the paper wherein he had named Marcianus to be his ſucceſſour, was unſealed three days after his death, as Socrates has told us before; 'tis not to be ſuppoſed, that Marcianus could be ordained Biſhop on the twenty firſt of the ſame month, to wit, July; in regard he abſconded in Tiberiopolis a City of Phrygia: from whence he was to be brought to Conſtantinople, that he might be there conſtituted Biſhop of the Novatianiſts. That the Emperour Theodoſius ſent his Wife Eudocia to Jeruſalem.

MOreover, the Emperour Theodoſius offered up his Thankſgivings to God for the benefits which he had conferred upon him. And this he performed, by honouring Chriſt with ſingular and eminent honours. He likewiſe ſent his wife Eudocia to Jeruſalem. [a] For ſhe had oblieged herſelf alſo to a performance of this vow, if ſhe might ſee her daughter married. But the Empreſs herſelf alſo * beautified the Churches at Jeruſalem, and all thoſe in the Eaſtern Cities, with various ornaments, both when ſhe went thither, and likewiſe at her return.

[a] Inſtead of [ᾧ γὰρ αὐτὴ ταῦτα εὐξήν, &c. For he had oblieged himſelf to a performance, &c.] I doubt not but it ſhould be [ᾧ γὰρ αὐτὴ, for ſhe had obliged herſelf;] that is, Eudocia. Thus Epiphan. Scholaſticus read, as appears from his Verſion; which is thus, Hoc enim & ipſa votum habuerat, ſi filiam videret nuptam, For ſhe herſelf alſo had [made] this vow, if ſhe might ſee her daughter married. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLVIII.

Concerning Thalaſſius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia.

ABout that very time, to wit, in Theodoſius's ſeventeenth Conſulate, Proclus the Biſhop attempted a wonderfull thing, the like to which has not been performed by any of the Ancient Biſhops. For Firmus Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia being dead, the Cæſareans came [to Conſtantinople,] and requeſted they might have a Biſhop. And whileſt Proclus was conſidering whom he ſhould preſer to that See, it hapned that all the Senatours came to the Church on the Sabbath, to give him a viſit, amongſt whom was [a] Thalaſſius alſo, a perſonage who had born a Præfecture over the Provinces and Cities of Illyricum. But [though] (as it was reported) he had been the perſon pitch't upon who was about to have the Government of the Eaſtern parts committed to his care by the Emperour; [yet] Proclus laid his hands on him, and inſtead of his being conſtituted a Præfectus Prætorio, made him Biſhop of Cæſarea. Thus ſucceſsfull and proſperous were the affairs of the Church. But I will here cloſe my Hiſtory, with my prayers [to God,] that the Churches in all places, the Cites, and Provinces may live in peace. For, as long as peace flouriſhes, thoſe that are deſirous to do it, will have no ſubject for their writing an Hiſtory. For we our ſelves (who have performed what you enjoyned us in Seven Books, O Sacred man of God, Theodorus!) ſhould have wanted matter for this our Hiſtory, if the lovers of ſeditions and tumults would have been quiet. This Seventh Book contains [an account of affairs tranſacted during] the ſpace of two and thirty years. The whole Hiſtory, which is comprized in Seven Books, contains the ſpace of an hundred and fourty years. It begins from the firſt year of the two hundredth ſeventy firſt Olympiad, wherein Conſtantine was proclaimed Emperour; and ends at the ſecond year of the three hundredth and fifth Olympiad, whereon the Emperour Theodoſius bore his ſeventeenth Conſulate.

[a] This is the Thalaſſius, or Thalaſſus, Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, to whom The one Law (Tit. 6. Legum Novellarum Theodoſii Junioris) was directed, which is dated at Conſtantinople, on the third of the Ides of Auguſt, in Theodoſius's ſeventeenth Conſulate which he bore with Feſtus. After this day therefore, on this very year, Thalaſſius was made Biſhop of Cæſarea by Proclus. Which action of Proclus's Socrates does not without cauſe wonder at, as new, and not practiſed by former Biſhops. Nectarius indeed, when he was Prætor of Conſtantinople, had been created Biſhop of that City. But, the Emperour's conſent had been firſt obtained, as Socrates has told us before. But here Proclus meerly by his own impulſe, laid his hands on a Præfectus Prætorio, who by the Emperour had been deſigned to the government of the Orientall Præfecture. Notwithſtanding, it is to be underſtood, that the Emperour's conſent was afterwards obtained, who approved of what Proclus had done. But, in promoting inferiour Magiſtrates to Eccleſiaſtick degrees, the Prince's conſent was in no wiſe neceſſary. For the Præfectus Prætorio's approbation was ſufficient, under whoſe diſpoſe the Preſidents of Provinces were. We have an eminent inſtance hereof in the Life of S[t] Germanus Altiſſiodorenſis, which was written by Conſtantius Preſbyter. Which Germanus being Preſident of a Province, and Amator Biſhop of Altiſſiodorum [a City in France, now called Auxerre] having a mind to appoint him his ſucceſſour; Amator procured the conſent of Julius, Præfectus Prætorio of the Gallia's, before he attempted to do that; as 'tis related in book 1, chap. 3, concerning the Life of S[t] Germanus. Further, this Thalaſſius Biſhop of Cæſarea was preſent at the falſe Synod at Epheſus [convened] againſt Flavianus; as we are informed from the Acts of the ſaid Synod, which are recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Councill. VALESIUS'S ACCOUNT OF THE LIFE, AND Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, OF EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS Epiphanienſis.

Evagrius Scholaſticus was by Nation a Syrian, as was alſo † Theodoret: born at Epiphania (which was a City of Syria Secunda;) as he himſelf has declared in the Title of his own work. Therefore I wonder at Gerardus Voſſius, who (in his Book de Hiſtoricis Græcis, pag. 498,) relates that Evagrius was born at Antioch. But Evagrius himſelf, (both in the Title of his Hiſtory, and alſo in his Third Book, Chap. 34,) does expreſsly atteſt that he was born at Epiphania. For, ſpeaking there concerning Coſmas Biſhop of Epiphania, his words are theſe; Κοσμᾶς τὴν ἡμετέραν ὁπισκοπῶν Ἐπιφάνειαν, ἣ τὸν ὀρόντην σωίοικον ἔχει, &c. Coſmas Biſhop of Our Epiphania, in the Vicinage whereof runs the [River] Orontes, &c. Beſides, Photius (in his Bibliotheca, chap. 29,) affirms that Evagrius was born in Epiphania a City of Syria Cœle. But, which is ſtrange, Nicephorus Calliſtus does in two places term our Evagrius (not Epiphanienſis, but) Ἐπιφανῆ, that is, Illuſtrious.

† He was Biſhop of Cyrus; and ſet about writing an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory (which Valeſius has publiſhed with the other Greek Hiſtorians of the Church) towards the latter end of Theodoſius Junior's Reign, at the ſame time that Socrates and Sozomen wrote theirs. He began where they did, (to wit, from thoſe times whereat Euſebius cloſed his Hiſtory;) and ended with them; viz. at the latter end of Theodoſius Junior's Empire. 'Tis more than probable, that he wrote after Socrates and Sozomen. For (1) all the Ancients were of this opinion. (2) He that reads his Hiſtory, will find it nothing elſe but a ſupplement of Socrates and Sozomen their Hiſtories. (3) Theodoret himſelf, in the firſt chapter of the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, ſays theſe words: τῆς Ἐκκλησιαστικῆς Ἱστορίας τὰ λειπόμενα συγγράψαι πειράσομαι, I will attempt to commit to writing the Remaines of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. (4) Laſtly, he publiſhed his Hiſtory after the year of Chriſt 448, (as Valeſius demonſtrates in his Preface before his Hiſtory;) whereas Socrates and Sozomen had finiſhed their Hiſtories on the ſeventeenth Conſulate of Theodoſius Jun. that is, in the year of Chriſt 439. He is moſt particular in his account of the affairs of the Eaſtern Church, in regard he lived there. His Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory are but five in number (as he himſelf intimates at the cloſe of his fifth Book;) wherein he comprehends the affairs tranſacted in the Church, during the ſpace of 105 years.

For, in Nicephorus's Firſt Book, chap. 1, the words are theſe; ὅγε μὴν Εὐάγριος ὁ Ἐπιφανὴς, &c. Moreover, Evagrius the Illuſtrious, &c. And, in Book 16. Chap. 31; Nicephorus quoting a paſſage of Evagrius, out of his Third Book, Chap. 34, (which paſſage I have juſt now mentioned,) expreſſes himſelf thus, οἷα δὲ καὶ Εὐάγριος ὁ Ἐπιφανὴς περὶ σάλπυγος ἱστόρησεν, Moreover, in like manner as Evagrius the Illuſtrious has related concerning Severus. But, my Sentiment is, that Tranſcribers have miſtook at both thoſe places, and have written Ἐπιφανὴς [Illuſtrious,] inſtead of Ἐπιφανέως [Epiphanienſis.] Doubtleſs, Nicephorus might have been evidently informed, from Evagrius's own words which he there produces, (which we have alſo quoted above,) that Evagrius had been born at Epiphania. Further, Evagrius was born in the Reign of Juſtinianus Auguſtus, on the year of Our Lord 536, or 537, as I have demonſtrated from Evagrius's own Teſtimony, in my * Notes on Book 4. Chap. 29. of his Hiſtory. On the year of Chriſt 540, his Parents committed him to the care of a School-Maſter, that he might learn the Letters. At which time (when Thomas Biſhop of Apamia had given notice to the neighbouring Cities, that on a ſet day he would ſhow the enlivening wood of the Croſs, which was kept at Apamia;) Evagrius was lead to that City by his Parents, and with his own eyes ſaw that Miracle, which was then performed in the Church; as himſelf atteſts teſts in his Fourth Book, Chap. 26. Now, this hapned on the year of Chriſt 540; when the Perſians, having made an irruption into Syria, had burnt Antioch: which was done in Juſtinus Junior's Conſulate, as we are informed by Marcellinus Comes, and Marius in his Chronicon. Two years after this, when † The Lues Inguinaria began to rage in the Eaſt, Evagrius was as yet under a School-Maſter, learning the Letters, and was ſeized by that Peſtilence, as he himſelf atteſts, Book 4. chap. 29. Having afterwards left the Schools of the Grammarians, he betook himſelf to the Study of Rhetorick. And when he had made a great proficiency in that Art, he was regiſtred * amongſt the company of Advocates. Whence he got the Appellation of Scholaſticus: which term ſignifies a Lawyer, as Macarius informs us in his fifteenth Homily, in theſe words: † He that deſires to have a knowledge in Forenſian Caſes, goes and learns the Notes [Letters, or, Abbreviatures.] And when he has been the firſt there, he goes to the School of the Romans, where he is the laſt of all. Again, when he comes to be the firſt there, he goes away to the School of the Pragmatici [or, Practicants] where he is again the laſt of all, and Arcarius [or, Novice.] Then, when he is made a Scholaſticus, he is Novice, and the laſt of all the Lawyers. Again, when he comes to be the firſt there, then he is made a Preſident [or Governour of a Province.] And when he is made a Governour, He takes to himſelfe an Aſſiſtant [Councellour] or Aſſeſſour. In Macarius's Greek Text, I have mended it thus, ὁ θέλων μαθεῖν πεάγματα, he that deſires to have a knowledge in Forenſian Caſes; not as 'tis in the common reading, ὁ θέλων μαθεῖν γεάμματα, he that deſires to have a knowledge in Letters. Further, in what City Evagrius practiſed the Law, 'tis uncertain. Notwithſtanding, my conjecture is, that he pleaded Cauſes at Antioch: in which City there were three Fora [that is, Courts of Judicature] or Tribunals; and as many Schools of Advocates, as I have obſerved from Libanius, in my Notes on Evagrius, Book 1. * chap. 18. 'Tis certain, he could not be an Advocate at Epiphania, (which, as we have declared already, was the place of his Nativity;) in regard that City had no Judiciary Forum, but brought its Cauſes to Apamia, in which City the Conſularis of Syria Secunda held a Court of judicature. But, for my believing Evagrius to have been an Advocate at Antioch, rather than at Apamia, this is my chief reaſon; becauſe he was moſtly converſant in that City, where he married a wife alſo, and begat ſons of her. He married a daughter likewiſe in that City, as himſelf atteſts in his Fourth Book, chap. 29. And after ſhe, together with her ſon, had ended her life by the Peſtilentiall diſeaſe, on the tenth year of Mauricius; Evagrius, deprived of his wife and children, remarried, and took to wife a young Virgin in that City, as he relates Book 6. chap. 8. Where he atteſts alſo, that the whole City kept holiday on that account, and celebrated a publick Feſtivity, * both in Pompous Shows, and alſo about his marriage-bed. Whence 'tis by the way apparent, how great his authority was at Antioch. Moreover, he wrote his Hiſtory at Antioch, as may be Collected from the twentieth * chapter of his Firſt Book. Where ſpeaking concerning the Empreſs Eudocia's Jeruſalem-journey, he ſays, ſhe came to Antioch: ἣ χρόνοις ὑστερον δὴ τὴν ἁγίαν ἐπεσημήνη Χριστῷ τῷ Θεῷ ἡμῶν πολιν, ἐνταῦθα τε γίνεται, that is, a long time afterwards, in her journey which ſhe made to the Holy City of Chriſt our God, ſhe [Eudocia] comes hither, (to wit, to Antioch.) Evagrius therefore lived at Antioch when he wrote this Hiſtory. Hence 'tis that Evagrius is ſo diligent in recounting the Works and Publick Edifices of the City Antioch; as may be ſeen in his Firſt Book, chap. 18, and in his Third Book, chap. 28. At which places he does not obſcurely intimate, that he lived at Antioch, whileſt he wrote theſe things. Hence 'tis alſo, that he mentions with ſo much care and diligence, the earth-quakes, wherewith Antioch was now and then ſhaken: and, that in the Notation of the times he always makes uſe of the Antiochian years. Laſtly, this may be Collected from the ſeventh chapter of his Sixth Book, where he relates, that Gregorius Patriarch of Antioch (having been accuſed of Inceſt, before Johannes, Comes of the Eaſt, by a Silver-ſmith,) appealed to the Emperour, and to a Synod. And when he went to Conſtantinople, in order to the proſecution of his Cauſe before the Emperour and Synod, he took Evagrius along with him, as his Aſſeſſour and Counſeller, that he might make uſe of his advice. By which words Evagrius does plainly enough declare himſelf to have been an Advocate and a Lawyer. For Aſſeſſours were wont to be taken out of their body, as well by the Civill as Military Magiſtrates. Nor was Evagrius Councellour to Gregorius in this criminall affair only, but in other cauſes alſo. For in regard Gregorius was Patriarch of the Orientall Church, and * could not but have the examination of many Cauſes every day, he muſt neceſſarily ſtand in need of ſome Aſſeſſour, who might ſuggeſt to him the Forms of Right and of the Laws. Indeed, Evagrius's words do fully declare what I have ſaid. For he ſaith; * Περὶ τούτων μὴν ἐν ἐμοὶ παρεδρεύοντι καὶ παρόντι γε ἀυτῷ, καὶ τὴν βασιλέως γέγονε, τὴν ἀπολογίαν ὑφέξων, Having me therefore his Aſſeſſour and Companion, he went to the Emperour's [City, Conſtantinople,] in order to the making his defence againſt theſe [accuſations.] But let the Studious determine concerning this matter, according to their own arbitrement. 'Tis ſufficient for me, to have propoſed my conjecture to the Readers. Further, the ſame Gregorius made uſe of Evagrius's judgment, not only in Judiciary proceedings, but in writing Letters alſo, and Relations, which he now and then ſent to the Emperour; in his Sermons likewiſe and Orations; as Evagrius atteſts at the † cloſe of his Hiſtory. Which * Volume when Evagrius had publiſhed, not not without the consent of Gregorius the Patriarch, in the Reign of Tiberius Constantinus, he had the dignity of a Quæstorate bestowed upon him by the same Emperour. And not long after, when he had made an Oration concerning the praises of Mauricius Augustus, on account of the Birth of the most noble child Theodosius, he received the Codicills of a Præfecture from the same Mauricius; as he himself attests at the close of his History. Evagrius's words there are thus translated by Christophorson: Pro quibus duos honoris gradus consecuti sumus: Quæsturam à Tiberio Constantino, & munus Tabularum servandarum, in quibus Præfectorum nomina inscribebantur, à Mauricio Tiberio: For which we have obtained two degrees of honour: a Quæsture of Tiberius Constantinus, and the Office of keeping the Tables, wherein the names of the Præfects were inscribed, of Mauricius Tiberius. Which ill rendition deceived Gerardus Vossius and Philippus Labbæus. For Vossius (in his * Book de Historicis Græcis,) treading in Christophorson's steps, says thus: Pro duobus autem hisce Libris ait gemino se honore esse affectum. Nam à Tiberio Constantino Quæsturâ fuisse ornatum: sed a Mauricio consecutum esse, ut Tabulis publicis præesset: now, for these two Books, he says, he had a double honour conferred on himself. For he was honoured [as he saith] with a Quæsture by Tiberius Constantinus: and, that he obtained of Mauricius, the having the charge of the publick Tables. But Philippus Labbæus (in his dissertation de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis,) hath * interpolated Christophorson s Version, after this manner: Seque duos honoris gradus ait consecutum: & primùm à Tiberio Constantino ad Quæsturam evectum; tum à Mauricio munus adeptum servandarum Tabularum, in quibus non tàm nomina, quàm ipsa Præfectorum acta inscribebantur: And he says that he himself obtained two degrees of honour: and in the first place, that he was preferred to a Quæsture by Tiberius Constantinus; and secondly, that he procured of Mauricius the office of keeping the publick Tables, wherein not only the names, but the Acts of the Præfects were inscribed. Musculus has done much better, who hath rendred the passage in Evagrius thus: Quarum etiam Gravià duas dignitates sumus consecuti: à Tiberio Constantino Quæstoratum largiente, Mauricio verò Tiberio Literas Hyparchicas mittente, On account of which [Volume of Relations, Letters, &c.] we have obtained two dignities: [one] from Tiberius Constantinus, who gave us a Quæsterate; and [another] from Mauricius Tiberius who sent us his Hyparchicall Letters. He would have said, The Codicills of a Præfecture, which the Latines term † Letters also, as I have long since observed in my Notes on Ammianus Marcellinus. Hence 'tis, that in the Title of his History, Evagrius terms himself ἀπὸ ἐπαρχῶν, [one] of the Ex-Præfects, because he had been rewarded with the Codicills of an honorary Præfecture by the Emperour. After this, the same Evagrius published Six Books of Ecclesiastick History, beginning from those times wherein Theodoret and Socrates had closed their Histories; that is, from the Ephesine Synod, wherein Nestorius was condemned and deposed: to wit, from the year of Christ 431. And he has continued his History to the twelfth year of the Emperour Mauricius, which was the year of our Lord 594. In his Third Book, at chap. 33, speaking concerning Severus Bishop of Antioch he says that at such time as he wrote these things it was the Six hundredth fourty first year of the Antiochians. In regard therefore the Antiochian-Hera precedes that of our Saviour's Nativity fourty eight years; if from the number 641 we substract 48 years, it will be the year of Christ 594. The same may also be Collected from Book 4, chap. 29. where Evagrius writes, that whilest he penned this History, that Plague in the Groyne which had almost wholly destroyed the whole world, had already raged two and fifty years. Now, this Plague began to rage two years after Antioch had been taken by the Persians, that is, in the year of Christ 542. To which number of years if you add two and fifty, it will be made the year of Christ 594. Further, Evagrius's diligence is chiefly to be commended, because, undertaking to write an Ecclesiastick History, he made a Collection of whatever was pertinent to that Subject, out of the best Writers, to wit, Priscus, Johannes, Zacharias, Eustathius and Procopius [who were all] Rhetoricians. His Style likewise is not to be found fault with. For it has a Beauty and Elegancy; as Photius does also attest. But the chief thing commendable in Evagrius is, that of all the Greek Writers of Ecclesiastick History, he is the only person, who has kept the Doctrine of the true Faith intire and undefiled; as (after Photius) Baronius has observed in his Annalls. Notwithstanding, he deserves reproof for this, viz. because he has not used so much diligence in searching out the Monuments of Ecclesiastick Antiquity, as in reading Profane Writers. Indeed, almost the whole Sixth Book is spent in a Narrative of the Persian War. Besides, his Style in many places is Redundant and Luxuriant, as Photius has truly remarked in his Bibliotheca. An instance of which superfluity of Expression you have in Book 1. Chap. 2; where he speaks concerning Nestorius after this manner: Ἡ θεομάχος γλῶσσα, τὸ καϊάφα δίκτεον συνέδριον, &c. that tongue full of hostility against God, that second Sanhedrim of Caïphas, &c. and, in Book 2. chap. 3; where he describes S^t Euphemias Church, which was at Chalcedon: The same redundancy of Style, the Studious Reader will of himself easily observe, in many other places.

Moreover, Rob. Stephens was the first person that Printed Evagrius's History in Greek, from one only Manuscript Copy belonging to the Kings Library, which Manuscript is very new, and not extraordinary good. For in many places 'tis defective and imperfect. But we have mended and perfected Evagrius's History in so many places, from two Manuscript Copies of the best note, that it may seem now to have been first published. The first of these Copies was the Florent. Manuscript, [taken] out of S^t Laurence's Library, which the most famous Michael Erminius compared with the Geneva Edition, and sent me the Various Readings written out with his own hand. On which account I profess my self very much oblieged to him. This Manuſcript is the beſt and ancienteſt of all the Copies of Evagrius. For 'tis written in parchment, [and was tranſcribed] about five hundred years ſince more or leſs, as I have been informed by one that ſaw it, viz. Emericus Bigotius, an excellent Schollar, and a perſon who has deſerved well of Learning; by whoſe favour and Intervention I received the fore mentioned Various Readings, ſent by the moſt famons Michael Erminius. In the ſame Florentine Manuſcript, ſome not unlearned Scholia were written in the margin, which we have put into our Annotations, in their due places. But, the Reader is to take notice, that in this Florentine Manuſcript is contained Socrates Scholaſticus's Hiſtory alſo, the various Readings whereof the ſame Erminius ſent me long ſince, written out with his own hand; as I have atteſted above four years ſince, in that Preface I prefixt before my Edition of Socrates and Sozomen. The ſecond Manuſcript Copy was taken out of the Library of that moſt Illuſtrious Prelate Dionyſius Tellerius, Arch-Biſhop of Rheims: this is no very ancient Copy; but 'tis a good one, and tranſcribed by the hand of a Learned man. This Copy was of great uſe to us in many places, as we have now and then ſhown in our Annotations.

THE

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE Ecclesiastical History OF EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS Epiphaniensis, And [one] of the EX-PRÆFECTS.

The Writers Preface [wherein he declares] on what account he betook himself to the Writing of this present History.

EUSEBIUS Surnamed PAMPHILUS, a Person both eminently Eloquent as to other things, and so powerfull in his Writings also, that by his perswasives he might be able (if not to render them [a] perfectly Orthodox, yet) to prevail upon his Readers so far as to embrace our [Sentiments:] Eusebius surnamed Pamphilus [I say,] Sozomen, Theodoret, and Socrates, in the best and most accurate manner have set forth in Writing, both the Advent of [our] Compassionate God amongst us, and his Ascent into the heavens; and also those things which the divine Apostles, and other Martyrs have couragiously performed in their Combats [in defence of the Faith;] Moreover, whatever else hath been transacted by those of our Religion, whether praise-worthy, or otherwise, till some [b] part of the Emperour Theodosius's Reign. But, in regard no person has hitherto given an orderly Narrative of the transactions that hapned afterwards, which [notwithstanding] are not much inferiour to them; I have resolved (though I am but little versed in such things,) to undertake this Work, and to compile an History of those affairs; being very confident, that by his assistance, who infused wisdome into Fishermen, and made the tongue of a Brute utter an articulate voice; I shall raise affairs already buried in Oblivion, give life to them by my Discourse, and render them immortall by an [eternall] commemoration: to the end that every one of my Readers may know, what [has been done,] when, where, how, against whom, and by whom affairs have been transacted, untill our own times: and [to the end that] nothing worthy to be remembred, may lie concealed by a remiss and dissolute Sloth, and (which is its next neighbour,) Oblivion. Divine assistance therefore being my guide, I will begin, where the Authours I have already mentioned, closed their History.

[a] I like not Christophorson's Version, who has rendred Λίαν ἀκριβεῖς, Perfectè Christianos, perfectly Christians. I would rather render it perfectly Orthodox. For the followers of true opinions are properly termed ἀκριβεῖς. Photius (in his Bibliotheca) speaks thus concerning Socrates Scholasticus, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν τοῖς δόγμασιν οὐ λίαν ὀρθὸν ἀκριβῆς. Moreover, in his Sentiments he is not very Orthodox. The meaning of this place therefore, is this: Eusebius (although he be very fit to perswade his Readers to embrace the Christian Religion, yet) is not able to make them very accurate in the doctrine of the Christian Faith, in regard he himself seems to have inclined towards the opinion of the Arians. For, this was the sentiment of many persons concerning Eusebius Pamphilus; whom I have sufficiently answered, in the Preface I have written to the same Eusebius's Ecclesiastick History. Vales.

[b] The word [μέρους, part] is wanting in the Kings, in the Florentine, and in the Tellerian M. SS. nor is it in Robert Stephens's Edition. The Geneva-Prinsers were the first that put in this word, from Christophorson's Copy, the Various Readings whereof are extant at the end of the Cologne-Edition. Christophorson has expressed this word in his Version. For thus he renders it: ad aliquam partem Regni Theodosii, to some part of Theodosius's Reign. But, it seems more elegant to me, to suppress, rather than add this word. If a word must be added, I had rather add χρόνου, time. Vales.

CHAP. I.

That, after the destruction of the impious Julian, when the Heresies had been a little quieted, * the Devil afterwards disturbed the Faith again.

* Or, The wicked Devil.

WHen the impiety of Julian had now been drowned in the bloud of the Martyrs, and Arius's madness bound in the Fetters made at Nicæa; and when Eunomius and Macedonius, [a] driven away by the Holy Spirit [as it were [a] Ἐκβαδέντων, Christophorson and Sr Henry Savil have mended it thus, ἐκβιαδέντων, compelled, or rejected by force. But, that reading is much better, which the Florentine and Tellerian, M. SS. give us, to wit, ἐκβεβαδέντων, driven away — as it were by an impetuous wind. 'Tis a Metaphor taken from Shipwrack't persons who are driven away by the violence of a Storm. Evagrius compares the Holy Spirit to a wind, by the force whereof Eunomius and Macedonius being driven away, were at length Shipwrack't at Constantinople, to wit, condemned in the Constantinopolitan Synod. Vales.

by an impetuous wind,] had been Shipwrack't about the Bosphorus, and at the sacred City Constantinople: when the Holy Church, having laid aside her late filth, and * recovering her Pristine beauty and gracefullness, was clothed † in a Vesture of Gold wrought about with divers colours, and made fit for her Lover and [Celestiall] Bridegroom: the Devil, Virtue's enemie, unable to bear this, raises a new and || unusuall kind of War against us; contemning the worship of Idols which now lay trampled under foot, and abandoning Arius's Servile madness. He was indeed afraid of making an attack against [our] Faith, [openly] as an enemy, in regard it was fortified by so many and such eminent Holy Fathers; and [because] he had lost many of his Forces in the Siege thereof. But he attempts this business in such a method [rather] as theeves make use of, by inventing certain Questions and Answers, whereby he in a new manner * perverted the erroneous to Judaism; the Wretch being insensible, that he should be foiled † even this way. For, that one [b] Term, which before he had made the sharpest resistance against, he now admires and embraces: rejoycing mightily (though he could not wholly * vanquish us, yet) that he was able to adulterate even but one word. Having therefore many times [c] wound up himself within his own malice, he [d] invented the change of one Letter, which might indeed † lead to one and the same sense, but notwithstanding would separate the understanding from the tongue; least with both they should confess and glorifie God in a concordant and agreeable manner. Further, in what manner each of these things was performed, and what conclusion they had, I will declare in their due places and times. Whereto I will likewise add whatever else I could finde worthy to be related, although it may seem forreign to my subject; [resolving] [c] to close my History where it shall seem good to the compassionate and propitious Deity.

† Or, even from hence.

[b] He means the Term Homoiousios [that is, Coessentiall.] For the malignant Devill made his chiefest resistance against this word, in regard it was the Beesome as it were of all Heresies, and the firmest fortress of the true Faith. Vales.

* Or, remove.

† Or, draw.

[c] Ἱλυσπωμένῳ; a term used to denote the manner how a Serpent moves; which is incomparably well expresst by Virgill, in these words,

——— Sinuatque immensa volumine terga,
And he windes up his vast back in a Roll, or, Volume.

[d] Instead of [ἐτέχνωσε] I had rather make it [ἐτέχνασε;] as it is in the Tellerian M.S. Further, 'tis very intricate, what word Evagrius should mean here. The Term Homoiousios, [that is, of like substance, or, essence] might indeed be meant. But, because in this word there is an addition (rather than a change,) of one Letter, [to wit, of the Letter I;] therefore the præpositions [ἐξ, and ἐν,] that is, [of, and in] are rather to be meant: which præpositions raised great stirs and commotions in the Church, on account of the Eutychian Heresie; some affirming that Christ was to be adored, [as subsisting] of two natures, others, [as subsisting] in two natures. Vales.

[c] This place wants not difficulty. Musculus renders it thus: Ubi absolutam hanc historiam benigno Deo commendavero, Where I shall have commended this complicated History to the benign God. But this rendition is not to be born with. Therefore Christophorson has translated it otherwise, to wit, after this manner: Ibique finem scribendi faciam, ubi Deo clementi ac propitio visum fuerit, and there I will make an end of writing, where it shall seem good to the mild and propitious God. But, neither does this translation fully satisfie me. For, first, Evagrius says not, ἀποδησόμενος, in the future tense, but ἀποδήμενος, in the present tense. Secondly, I do not remember that I ever read this phrase [ἀποτίθεσθαι τὴν ἱστορίαν] in such a sense as to import, to finish an History. Ἀποτίθεσθαι signifies properly recondere, to lay up: whence ἀποθήκη imports a repository, or, store-cellar for wines. It signifies also to lay on the ground, or, depositе in a monument. Hesychius in his Lexicon renders ἀποθέμενος by ὁ κείμενος, he who lieth. The same Hesychius says ἀποτίθεσθαι does signifie ἐκτίθεσθαι, to expose, or, set forth. Which signification is contrary to the former. For, to hide, and to set forth or promulge, are contrary the one to the other. I had rather therefore render this passage of Evagrius thus, Historiam editurus, quando clementi placuerit Deo, [and] shall put forth my History, when it shall please the Gracious God. Notwithstanding, if any one shall prefer Christophorson's Version, I will not much resist it. 'Tis certain, Evagrius (in the seventh chapter of his first book) uses these words τὸν βίον ἀπέθετο, so as to signifie, he ended his life. Nevertheless, in the thirteenth chapter of this book, Evagrius uses this word, in this sense, viz. to relate, or, set forth. For thus he says: γέγραφε δὲ αὐτὸν λογίως ἀπέθετο καὶ Θεοδώρητος, &c. Moreover, Theodoret also wrote, and elegantly set forth, [or, related.] &c. And in the 11th chapter of this book, ἀπετέθη is used in the same sense, instead of ἐξετέθη, he set forth. Also in the beginning of his second book, Evagrius uses ἀποθώμεθα, instead of ἐκθώμεθα, we will set forth. Vales.

CHAP. II.

How Nestorius was detected by his disciple Anastasius, who in his Sermon, termed the Holy Mother of God, not * Theotocos, but † Christotocos: for which reason [Nestorius] was pronounced an Heretick.

* That is, the Woman who bore God.

† That is, the Woman who bore Christ.

FOr as much as Nestorius (that tongue full of Hostility against God, that second Sanhedrim of Caiphas; that shop of Blasphemy, wherein Christ is again [a] bargained for, and sold; his Natures being divided and torn in sunder, of Whom not one bone had been broken on the very Cross it self, according as it is written; nor had his woven coat in any wise been rent by the Murderers of God;) has rejected and abandoned the term Theotocos, ([a word] long since framed by many of the [most] approved Fathers by [the inspiration of] the Holy Spirit:) and, instead thereof, has coyned and formed [the term] Christotocos, an adulterate coyn [as it were,] stamped by himself: and has refilled the Church with innumerable wars, making an inundation of Civill bloud therein: I shall not, I suppose, want matter agreeable and fit for the composure of an History, nor [shall I despair] of bringing it to a conclusion, if (by the cooperation of Christ, who is God above all,) I shall begin from the blasphemy of the impious Nestorius. Now, the War of the Churches had its originall from hence. [There was] one [b] Anastasius a Presbyter, (a person of a very unsound opinion, an ardent Lover of Nestorius and his Jewish Sentiments,) who had accompanied Nestorius in the journey he made in order to [his entring upon] the Bishoprick [of Constantinople.] In which journey (having had a conference with Theodorus at Mopsuestia, and heard his opinions,)

[a] Συμφωνεῖται. 'Tis strange that both Translators have erred in their Versions of this place. For, Musculus renders it thus: officina blasphemiæ, in quâ rursus ad judicium vocatur & venditur Christus, that shop of blasphemy, wherein Christ is again called to judgment, and sold. Christophorson translates it after this manner: Qui Blasphemiæ officinam, in quâ Christus denuò trucidatur & divenditur, instruxit; who furnished up a shop of Blasphemy, wherein Christ is again killed and sold. Neither of them have rendred it well. For, neither is this expression [to be called to judgment] agreeable to a shop; nor is there any such Greek word as συμφονεῖται. I wonder at Sr Henry Savill, who set this most ridiculous emendation of Christophorson's, at the margin of his Copy. It should have been rendred thus, that shop of Blasphemy, wherein Christ is again bargained for, and sold at a price. For σύμφωνω signifies properly I make a bargain, and σύμφωνον is a bargain, or, agreement; as it is in the old Glosses. Which term occurs frequently in the books of the Greek Lawyers. Vales.

[b] This Anastasius was Syncellus to Nestorius Bishop of Constantinople. Which is attested by Theophanes in his Chronicon, and by Anastasius Bibliothecarius. For the Patriarchs had their Syncelli (that is, those that kept in the same Cell with them, or those that dwelt with them.) whom they chose out of the order of Presbyters. So, in the Epistle of the Constantinopolitan Synod to Hormisda Bishop of Rome, about the Election of Epiphanius Patriarch of Constantinople, which Epistle Baronius Records at the year of Christ 520; amongst the Legates sent from the Synod, is named Heraclianus Presbyter of The Greater Church, and Cohabitator, [that is, the person who dwelt with him] to Epiphanius the Patriarch. Epiphanius himself also had formerly been Presbyter and Syncellus to John, Patriarch of Constantinople, as Dioscorus attests in his Epistle to Pope Hormisda. Lastly, John had also been Presbyter and Syncellus to Timothy, Patriarch of Constantinople; as Victor Tunonensis informs us in his Chronicon, in these words: Agapeto V. C. Cos. Timotheus C. P. Episcopus, Obtrectator Synodi Chalcedonensis, quinto die Aprilis occubuit, & Johannes Cappadox in cellâ propriâ atque Presbytero Episcopatum tradidit; [on my perill, mend it thus, & Johanni Cappadoci Syncello proprio atque Presbytero Presbytero Episcopatum tradidit; there is nothing more certain than this emendation:] that is, in the Consulate of the most famous Agapetus, Timothy Bishop of Constantinople, the Reviler of the Chalcedon Synod, died on the first of April, and delivered the Bishoprick to John the Cappadocian, his own Syncellus and Presbyter. The Syncelli were chosen also out of the order of Deacons. So, in the third Action of the Chalcedon Synod, one Agorastius a Deacon is termed Syncellus to Dioscorus Bishop of Alexandria. Lastly, in Eunodius there is a Precept extant, whereby all Bishops are ordered to have their cellulani, [that is, Chamber-fellows, or persons that were to keep in the same Cell with them.] Which Precept runs thus: Nullum ergo sacerdotem antiquis & modernis legibus obsequentem, &c. Our will is, that no Priest who is obedient to the ancient and modern Laws, and none of the Levites shall reside in any place without a person well approved of. And if the slenderness of any person's estate shall not permit him to have a companion, he himself shall become Cell-fellow to another. The Patriarchs therefore were not the only persons who had their Syncelli. 'Tis certain, Stephanus is recorded to have been Syncellus to Syncleticus Bishop of Tarsus, by Ephremius, in Photius. Vales. See Meursius's Glossary, in the word Σύγκελλος.

was perverted from piety, as [c] Theodulus has related, treating hereof in one of his Epistles. [This Anastasius,] in a Sermon he Preacht ● the people that loved Christ, in the Church of Constantinople, was so audacious as openly and plainly to speak [these words;] Let no person term Mary Theotocos: For Mary was a woman: but, 'tis impossible for God to be born of a woman. The people that loved Christ being highly offended at the hearing hereof, and [supposing,] not without reason, that this expression opened a way to Blasphemy; Nestorius, the Authour of this Blasphemy, did not only not curb [Anastasius,] nor undertake the patronage of such Sentiments as were Orthodox and true: But also, openly and manifestly added strength to what Anastasius had said, and pertinaciously maintained disputes about these [points.] And sometimes he would insert and intermix his own opinions; and by belching forth the poyson of his own mind, attempted to teach such [doctrines] as were far more blasphemous. In so much that, to his own destruction, he uttered these words, I cannot term him God, who was two months and three months old; as 'tis plainly related by Socrates in his account hereof, and [in the Acts] of the Former Ephesine Synod.

[c] I have found no mention of this Theodulus any where else. For, whereas Nicephorus names him at book 14. chap. 32, that mention of him is borrowed from our Evagrius. Notwithstanding, this person seems to have been that Theodulus a Presbyter in Cœle-Syria, who in the reign of Zeno Augustus wrote many things; as 'tis attested by Gennadius Massilienſis, and by Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon. Vales.

CHAP. III.

What Cyrillus the Great wrote to Nestorius, and how the third Synod at Ephesus was convened, to which Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch and Theodoret came late.

WHich [assertions] when Cyrillus Bishop of Alexandria, [a Prelate] of famous memory, had reproved by his own Letters; and Nestorius had defended them in his answers thereto; [a] nor could be prevailed upon, either by those [Letters] written [to him] by Cyrillus, or them [sent him] by Celestinus Bishop of the Senior Rome; but fearlessly vomited forth his own poyson against the whole Church: [Cyrillus,] (for which he had just cause,) made his requeſt to Theodosius Junior who at that time swayed the Sceptre of the Eastern Empire, that by his Order the first Synod at Ephesus might be convened. The [b] Imperiall Letters [therefore] were dispatcht away, both to Cyrillus, and also to the [Bishops that] presided over the holy Churches in all places. [Theodosius] appointed the day of the Synod's convention to be on the * day of the Holy Pentecost; whereon the life-giving spirit [of God] descended [c] upon us. Nestorius, in regard Ephesus is not far distant from Constantinople, came thither first. Also Cyrillus and the [Bishops] about him arrived before the day appointed. But Johannes Bishop of Antioch, together with the [Bishops] about him, was absent at the set day; not willingly, ([d] as it seems to many persons, from the Apology he made [in excuse for his not coming at the time appointed;]) but because he could not gather together the Bishops of his Province sooner. For the Cities [belonging to] the Bishops [under him,] are twelve days journey distant from that City (heretofore called Antioch, but now) termed Theopolis, to a man that is an expedite and nimble Traveller; but, to others [who are not so good at travelling] they are more [than twelve days journey distant.] And Ephesus is at least thirty days journey distant from Antioch. Wherefore [Johannes] affirmed, that he could in no wise meet at the appointed day, [if he should set out] when the Bishops, whom he had about him, had celebrated that termed the [e] New Sunday within their own Sees.

* In the year of Christ 431. See Dr Beveredge's Annot. in Can. Concil. Ephes. pag. 103.

[b] There is extant an Epistle of Theodosius Junior's, which they commonly called Sacra. For so Theodosius himself terms it, in his Epistle to the Ephesine Synod. In the Latine Version of this Epistle, the title is worded thus: Sacra Imperatoria, missa Alexandriam ad Cyrillum Episcopum & Episcopos Metropolitanos ejus Regionis. But the Greek words have a different import; they run thus: Θεῖον γράμμα ἀποσταλὲν ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ κυρίλλῳ ὁπισκόπῳ, καὶ τοῖς κατὰ χώραν τῶν μητροπόλεων ὁπισκόποις, that is, the Sacred Letters sent to Alexandria to Cyrillus, and to the Metropolitane Bishops every where: for κατὰ χώραν has the same import with καθ' ἑκάστην χώραν, in every Region. And this is confirmed by Theodosius himself in the same Epistle, where he says, that by the same Copy he wrote πρὸς τοὺς ἁπανταχοῦ τῶν μητροπόλεων ὁπισκόπους, to the Bishops of Metropolis's every where. But, instead hereof, our Evagrius words it thus: γράμματον Βασιλικῶν, &c. The Imperiall Letters [therefore] were dispatcht away, both to Cyrillus, and also to the [Bishops that] presided over the Holy Churches in all places. Vales.

[c] The term [ἡμῖν, upon us] displeased Nicephorus. Therefore, instead thereof he substituted these words [τοῖς ἱεροῖς ἀποστόλοις, on the holy Apostles.] But, this emendation was needless. For the term [ἡμῖν, upon us] is at this place put for the Church of God, which at that time resided in the Apostles. Indeed, the Holy Spirit had descended on Mary before, at such time as she conceived the Son of God: and afterwards upon Christ, when he had been baptized in Jordan, Which hapned to them by a speciall priviledge. But the Holy Spirit descended first on the day of Pentecost upon the Church of God by the Apostles; for the Apostles delivered the same Spirit (which they then received,) afterwards to their successours, by imposition of Hands. Vales.

[d] Ὡς πολλοῖς δοκεῖ. Nicephorus, instead of the word [δοκεῖ, as it seems] uses [ἔλεγον, be said.] But Christophorson read thus, ὡς πολλοῖς ἀπολογουμένοις δοκεῖ. For he renders this place after this manner: Johannes Præsul Antiochiæ, &c. John Bishop of Antioch, together with his [Bishops,] was absent at the day appointed; not willingly indeed, as it seems to many persons, who have a mind to defend this fault of his. Notwithstanding, I cannot approve of this emendation; although Sr Henry Savill hath set it at the margin of his Copy. Musculus renders this place thus: Verùm præter animi sui sententiam, sicut & multis moram illam excusans, ostendit, But contrary to his own mind, as he has also demonstrated to many persons, in his excusing that delay. But I am of opinion, that no alteration is to be made here, and do render the place thus: But Johannes Bishop of Antioch, together with the [Bishops] about him, was absent at the set day; not willingly, (as it seems to many persons from the Apology he made, &c. doubtless, there can be no other sense of these words. Vales.

[e] The Greeks heretofore termed the first Sunday after Easter, νέαν, or, καινὴν κυριακὴν, The New Sunday. So Gregorius Nazianzenus calls it in his nineteenth Oration which he spake at the Funerall of his own Father Gregorius. There is extant an Oration of the same Gregorius's (to wit, his 43 Oration) upon this New Sunday: in which Oration he gives a reason, why this day should be called New Sunday. Further, the Synod in Trullo Can. 66, terms this Sunday (which we now commonly call Dominicam in Albis, the Sunday in the Albs,) καινὴν κυριακὴν, New Sunday. Vales. Mr Smith (in his Accounts of the Greek Church,

[a] We have perfected this place from the incomparable Florentine M.S. by adding some words, which had been unhappily omitted by Transcribers. For, whereas in Robert Stephens's Edition, this clause is worded thus; καὶ οὔτε τοῖς Κυρίλλῳ, οὔτε τοῖς Καλεστίνῳ τῆς πρεσβυτέρας ῥώμης ἐπισκόποις ἐπείθετο: we have altered it after this manner: καὶ οὔτε τοῖς Κυρίλλῳ, οὔτε τοῖς Καλεστίνῳ τῷ τῆς πρεσβυτέρας ῥώμης ἐπισκόπῳ γραφεῖσιν ἐπείθετο: nor could be prevailed upon, either by those [Letters] written [to him] by Cyrillus, or them [sent him] by Celestinus Bishop of the Senior Rome. Which I therefore thought good to give an Advertisement of, that the Readers might know, that we have neither added nor diminished any thing, except by the authority of that most incomparable Manuscript. Besides, the Tellerian Manuscripts agrees with the Florentine Copy. Vales.

Church, pag. 32, Edit. Lond. 1680,) tells us, that the Grecks do ſtill term this Sunday, καινὴν Ϲ νέαν, the New Sunday; and that 'tis alſo called κυριακὴ διακαινήσιμοϹ, that is, regenerating, or, renewing Sunday. See Meurſius's Gloſſary, in the word διακαινήσιμοϹ.

CHAP. IV.

How Neſtorius was depoſed by the Synod, before the arrivall of [the Biſhop of] Antioch.

WHen therefore fifteen days were paſt beyond the day prefixt, the Biſhops who had been called together for that reaſon (ſuppoſing that the Eaſtern [Biſhops] would not come at all, or if they did, that much time would be ſpent before they could be got together) [meet together in one place] [a] the divine Cyrillus adminiſtring, and the place of Cæleſtinus, who (as it has been ſaid) governed the Biſhoprick of the Elder Rome: they ſummon in Neſtorius therefore, entreating him that he would give in his anſwer to [the accuſations] brought againſt him. Who on the day before promiſed to come, if there ſhould be an occaſion for it, but [afterwards] neglected to fullfill his promiſe; and having been thrice called, after that he appeared not; [whereupon] the Biſhops convened undertook the examination [of the matter.] And when Memnon Biſhop of Epheſus had reckoned up the days which had paſſed after the ſet day, (they were in number ſixteen days;) and when the Letters of the divine Cyrillus, which had been written by him to Neſtorius, and alſo Neſtorius's [Letters] to Cyrillus, had been read; moreover, when that ſacred Letter of the famous Cæleſtinus, which he ſent to the ſame Neſtorius, had been annexed: further, when Theodotus Biſhop of Ancyra, and Acacius who preſided over the * See of Melitina, had declared thoſe blaſphemous Expreſſions, which Neſtorius had manifeſtly and openly belched forth at Epheſus: [laſtly,] when many ſayings of the holy and moſt approved Fathers, who have expounded the right and ſincere Faith, had been joyned together; and alſo, when the various blaſphemies fooliſhly and madly uttered by the impious Neſtorius, had been reduced into an Order: [I ſay, after all theſe things had been done] the Holy Synod pronounced ſentence [againſt Neſtorius] in theſe expreſs words: Moreover, in regard the moſt Reverend Neſtorius would neither obey our Summons, nor admit the moſt Holy and moſt Religious Biſhops ſent by Us, We have been forced to proceed to an examination of his impious expreſſions. And having found, both from his Letters and Writings which have been recited, and alſo from his own words which he hath lately ſpoken in this Metropolis, [which expreſſions of his] have been confirmed [by the teſtimony of many perſons,] that his Sentiments and Doctrines are impious; being neceſſarily induced thereto, both by the [authority of the] Canons, and alſo by the Letter of our moſt Holy Father and Fellow-Miniſter Cæleſtinus Biſhop of the Roman Church, after many tears we have proceeded to [the pronunciation of] this ſad ſentence. Therefore, Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who has been blaſphemed by him, hath determined by this preſent Holy Synod, that the ſame Neſtorius is * diveſted of the Epiſcopall dignity, and [excluded from] all manner of ſacerdotall convention.

[a] Here, and in Robert Stephens's Edit. this paſſage is worded thus: Κυρίλλου τοῦ θεσπεσίου διέποντοϹ, καὶ τὸν κλεσίνου τόπον, πλὴν ἐπισκοπὴν, ὡς εἴρηται, τῆς πρεσβυτέρας ῥώμης πρωτεύοντοϹ; The divine Cyrillus adminiſtring, &c. In which clauſe (as the Learned Dr Barrow remarks, in his Treat. of the Pope's ſuprem. pag. 289) a word ſeemeth to have fallen out. Zonaras (on the 1 Can. Synod. Epheſ. Tom. 1. Edit. Bever. pag. 100.) expreſſes this paſſage more plainly, in theſe words: περιεστώτος τοῦ Ορθοδόξων πατέρων τὸν ἐν ἁγίοις κυρίλλου Πάπα ἀλεξανδρείας, ἐπέχοντοϹ δὲ καὶ τὸν τόπον κελεσίνου, The Holy Cyrill Pope of Alexandria preſiding over the Orthodox Fathers, and alſo holding the place of Celeſtine. And Photius thus: τῆ ῥώμης κελεσίνου ἐπλήρου τὸν καθέδραν καὶ πρόσωπον, [Cyril] ſupplyed the ſeat and the perſon of Celeſtine [Biſhop] of Rome. From which Authours 'tis plain, that Cyrillus had the diſpoſall of Celeſtine's ſingle ſuffrage, and that Pope's legall concurrence with him in his Actings in that Synod: But Cyrillus had no Authoritative preſidency from Celeſtine, becauſe the Pope could by no delegation impart that, himſelf having no title thereto, warranted by any Law, or by any Precedent; that depended on the will of the Emperours, who diſpoſed of it according as they ſaw reaſon. A notable inſtance whereof we meet with in the next Epheſine Synod (which in deſign was a Generall Synod, legally convened, though by ſome miſcarriages it proved abortive;) mentioned by our Evagrius in the tenth chapter of this Book: where though Julius (or rather Julianus,) Pope Leo's Legate was preſent; yet by the Emperours Order (ſee the words of his Letter, Syn. Chalced. Act. 1. p. 59.) Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria preſided. Nicephorus (book 14. chap. 34,) tells us, that in regard Celeſtine Biſhop of Rome could not be preſent at this Synod, by reaſon of the dangers of ſuch a voyage, he made Cyrillus his Deputy: and that from this time Cyrillus and the ſucceeding Biſhops of Alexandria challenged the name of Pope, &c. Doubtleſs Nicephorus is miſtaken herein. For, Dionyſius Alexandrinus (in his third Epiſt. to Philemon, part of which is quoted by Euſebius, Eccleſ. Hiſt. book 7. c. 7.) mentioning Heraclas, his predeceſſour in the Alexandrian See, ſays theſe words concerning him: τοῦτον ἐγὼ τὸν κανόνα καὶ τὸν τύπον ἔσχον τῆ μακαρίᾳ πάπα ἡμῶν ἡρακλᾶ παρέλαβον, I received this Rule and Canon from Heraclas our Bleſſed Pope. And Athanaſius (in his ſecond Apologetick Tom. 1. pag. 786, Edit. Paris. 1627;) has recorded an Epiſtle written to him from Iſchyras, which has this title, Ἀθανασίῳ μακαρίῳ πάπα, To Athanaſius the Bleſſed Pope. Therefore, theſe words of Nicephorus's are (as Valeſius ſays truly in his note here) inepta & falſiſſima, fooliſh and moſt untrue. And, that other remark of Valeſius's here, which he makes from the former part of the now cited paſſage in Nicephorus (to wit, that as well Nicephorus, as thoſe from whom he borrowed this, doubted not but the Biſhop of Rome was the Sovereign judge of all the Churches;) is queſtionleſs no leſs fooliſh and falſe. 'Tis indeed true, that the Biſhops of Rome have ſome Genturies ſince claimed an Authority not only of preſiding in, but alſo of indicting and convening Generall Councills. But, how unjuſt this claim is, as well in reſpect of Right, as Practiſe, will be evident to him, who with attention and conſideration ſhall peruſe theſe Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorians. Look back to what Socrates ſays in the Proeme to his fifth Book: σωιχῶς καὶ τοὺς Βασιλεὶς (ſays he) τῆ ἱστορίᾳ ϑεολαμβάνομεν, &c. We do continually include the Emperours in this our Hiſtory, becauſe from ſuch time as they began to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, the affairs of the Church have depended on them; and the greateſt Synods have been, and at this preſent are convened by their determination and appointment. But, for a moſt full and compleat ſatisfaction in theſe points, viz. concerning the Biſhop of Rome's Sovereign power to indict and preſide in Generall Councills; I referr the Reader to the Learned Dr Barrow's Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, pag. 274. &c.

CHAP. V.

That Johannes [Biſhop] of Antioch, coming [to Epheſus] after five days, depoſes Cyrillus [Biſhop] of Alexandria, and Memnon [Biſhop] of Epheſus; whom the Synod pronounced innocent ſoon after, and depoſed Johannes and his party. And how, by [the interpoſition of] the Emperour Theodoſius, Cyrillus and Johannes were reconciled, and confirmed Neſtorius's depoſition.

AFter this moſt legall and juſt Sentence, Johannes [Biſhop] of Antioch comes to Epheſus, together with the Prelates about him, arriving [there] five days after [Neſtorius's] depoſition. And having convened * thoſe [Biſhops] of his party, depoſes Cyrillus and Memnon. But when Cyrillus and Memnon had preſented Libells to that Synod which had been convened with them, (although † Socrates, through ignorance, has related [this matter] otherwiſe,) Johannes is ſummoned to give an account of that depoſition depoſition which he had made. Who not appearing after he had been thrice called, Cyrillus and Memnon are abſolved from their depoſition: but Johannes and the [Biſhops] of his party are ſeparated from holy communion, and from all ſacerdotall authority. [Further,] Theodoſius at firſt approved not of Neſtorius's depoſition; but having afterwards been informed of his Blaſphemy, when he had written very pious Letters to the Biſhops, Cyrillus and Johannes, they come to a mutuall agreement, and confirmed Neſtorius's depoſition:

CHAP. VI.

Concerning Paulus [Biſhop] of Emiſa's journey to Alexandria, and Cyrillus's commendation [of Johannes] on account of [his] Letter.

WHen Paulus Biſhop of Emiſa was arrived at Alexandria, and had made a diſcourſe, which is ſtill extant, in the Church concerning this matter. At which time alſo Cyrillus, having highly commended Johannes's Letter, wrote word for word thus: † Let the heavens rejoyce, and the earth be glad. For the partition wall is demoliſhed, that which cauſed grief and ſadneſs is ceaſed, and the occaſion of all manner of diſſention is taken away; in regard Chriſt the Saviour of us all, has *reſtored peace to his own Churches; and the moſt Religious Emperours and moſt dear to God, have invited us thereto. Who having been the moſt incomparable Emulators of their Anceſtours piety, do preſerve the true Faith firm and unſhaken in their own minds: and they take an exquiſite care of the Holy Churches, to the end they may obtain both a far-ſpread and immortall Glory, and alſo render their Empire moſt highly renowned. To whom even the Lord of Hoſts himſelf diſtributes good things with a plentifull hand, gives them [power] to vanquiſh their adverſaries, and freely beſtows Victory [on them.] [a] For he cannot lie who has ſaid, As I live, ſaith the Lord, I will glorifie them who Glorifie me. When therefore My Lord and moſt Religious Brother and Fellow-Miniſter Paulus was come to Alexandria, we were filled with joy, and that moſt deſervedly, in regard ſo great a perſon [was come to be] an Interceſſour, and was willing [b] to undergo Labours above [humane] ſtrength: that he might vanquiſh the Envy of the Devil, unite diviſions, and by removing offences on both ſides, crown both Our and Your Churches with Concord and Peace.

† This Letter of Cyrillus to Johannes occurs entire in Binius, Tom. 2. pag. 594. Edit. Paris. 1636.

* Or, miniſtred.

* Or, rich.

[a] In the incomparable Florent. M. S. I found it written [διαψεύσασθαι, cannot lie] which is the truer reading. In the Acts of the Epheſine Synod, where this Epiſtle is recorded (See Binius, as before, p. 595,) it is [διαψεύσονται will not lie.] But the reading of the Florent. M.S. is confirmed by Nicephorus and the Tellerian M.S. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens, the reading here is, διαψεύσεται, hath not lied.

[b] Τοῖς ὑπὲρ δύναμιν πόνοις περισπουδεῖν. Chriſtophorſon has rendred this place very ill, thus, Et graviores quàm vires ferebant, ſuſcepit in concionando Labores, And in Preaching has undertaken far greater pains, than his ſtrength would bear. Muſculus tranſlates it thus: Et laboribus vires excedentibus colloquutionem ſuſcepiſſet, And with labours exceeding his ſtrength had undertaken a conference. Neither of them has rendred it well. Περισπουδεῖν πόνοις, imports, to endure or undergo labours. So, ὁμιλεῖν τύχαις, ſignifies, to bear the Viciſſitudes of fortune. Plutarch (in Marius,) ſpeaking concerning Jugurtha, ſays theſe words, ὅπου τις ἦν ποικίλος ἀνὴρ τύχαις ὁμιλῆσαι, that is, ſo various was that perſon as to his diſpoſition, [which was fitted] to bear the changes of Fortune. Moreover, theſe words [ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, above ſtrength] may be underſtood two ways. For, we may either underſtand ἀνθρωπίνην, humane, (which we have done:) or elſe ἰδίαν, his own. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have embraced the latter ſenſe; as did he alſo, who rendred the Acts of the Epheſine Council into Latine. Valeſ.

And, after the interpoſition of ſome words, [he Adds:] Moreover, that this diſſention of the Church was altogether frivolous and [c] inexcuſable, we have been now fully ſatisfied, ſince my Lord the moſt Religious Biſhop Paulus has brought a paper which containes an irreprehenſible confeſſion of Faith; and has affirmed, that it was written by Your Sanctity, and by the moſt Religious Biſhops there. Now, the confeſſion runs thus, and 'tis inſerted in the very ſame words into this our Epiſtle. But concerning Theotocos, and ſo forth. When We had read theſe [d] Your ſacred words, and perceived, that We Our Selves embraced the ſame Sentiments; (For, there is one Lord, one Faith, one Baptiſm;) We glorified the Saviour of all men, rejoycing mutually, becauſe as well your, as our Churches, do profeſs a Faith which is agreeable, both to the divinely inſpired Scriptures, and alſo to the Tradition of our Holy Fathers. Theſe things may be known by him who is deſirous of having an accurate account of thoſe affairs tranſacted at that time.

[c] Here, and in the Acts of the Epheſine Councill, the reading is ἀκ ἐυάφορον, inexcuſable, or, inopportune. But, in the Tellerian M.S. I found it written, ἀχ' ἐυάρμοσον, and incongruous. Valeſ.

[d] In the Acts of the Epheſine Councill, and in Nicephorus; inſtead of [ἡμῶν, our] it is [ὑμῶν, your;] which doubtleſs is the truer reading. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

What the impious Neſtorius writes concerning his own ſufferings; and how, his tongue having at laſt been eaten out with worms, he ended his life at Oaſis.

BUt, after what manner Neſtorius was baniſhed, or what befell him after that, or in what manner he departed out of this life, and what rewards he received on account of his Blaſphemy; [theſe particulars] have not been related by the Writers of Hiſtory. All which had been forgotten, and had been wholly loſt and ſwallowed by [length of] time, nor had been ſo much as heard of; had not I accidentally met with a book of Neſtorius's, which contains a Narrative of theſe things. This Father of Blaſphemy therefore, Neſtorius, (who has not raiſed his building on that foundation which was laid, but hath built [his houſe] on the ſand, and [therefore] it has ſoon faln down, according to our Lord's parable;) making an Apology (which was his deſire,) in defence of his own Blaſphemy, [a] againſt thoſe who had accuſed him, (becauſe he had introduced ſome innovation contrary to what was fitting, and had not rightly requeſted that a Synod ſhould be convened at Epheſus;) amongſt other things writes [to this effect:] that he, wholly compelled thereto by neceſſity, had betaken himſelf * to [the defence of] this part, in regard the holy Church was divided, ſome affirming that Mary was to be termed † Anthropotocos, others, ‖ Theotocos. That therefore (as he ſays) he might not offend in one of theſe two, [viz.] [b] leaſt he ſhould either joyn things mortall with thoſe that are immortall, or elſe leaſt (by betaking himſelf to the other ſide) he might be deprived of that other party [who defended the term Theotocos:] he invented the word Chriſtotocos. in my judgment, thus to be explained. After that Sermon of Anaſtaſius the Presbyter, who was Neſtorius's Syncellus, (See chap. 2. note b.) there aroſe a great diſſention in the Conſtantinopolitan Church:

[a] Πρὸς τοὺ ἐγκαλέσαντας. In the incomparable Florent. M. S. I found it written [πρὸς τοὺ ἐγκαλέσαντας ὅτι, againſt thoſe who had accuſed him;] which is doubtleſs the truer reading: ὅτι has the ſame import with αὐτῷ, him. Valeſ.

* Ἐς τοῦτο τάξεως.

† That is, [the Virgin] who bore man.

‖ She who bore God.

[b] The meaning of this place is very obſcure; it is,

Church: in regard ſome affirmed, that Mary was to be termed Theotocos; others Anthropotocos. And when the Sedition increaſed daily, Neſtorius, deſirous to appeaſe it, invented a certain middle term; viz. that Mary ſhould in future be termed Chriſtotocos, the Virgin who bore Chriſt: leaſt, if he ſhould term her Theotocos, he might ſeem to joyn things mortal with thoſe that are immortal; (which thing he [that is, Neſtorius] look't upon to be impious:) or leaſt, if he had embraced the term Anthropotocos; the other party (to wit, thoſe who defended the term Theotocos,) ſhould have revolted from him, and held their Aſſemblies apart. This is the meaning of this place; which neither Muſculus, nor Chriſtophorſon underſtood. Therefore, inſtead of [ἢ ἀδιάλα συμπλεκομένων,] it muſt be [ἢ τὰ θνητὰ, ἢ ἀδιάλα συμπλέκων. In the Tellerian M. S. I found this reading, ἢ ἀθανάτῳ συμπλεκομένῳ. Valeſ.

He intimates further, that at firſt the Emperour Theodoſius, out of that affection he bore towards him, confirmed not the [ſentence of] * depoſition pronounc't againſt him: but afterwards, that when ſome Biſhops [c] of both parties had been ſent from the City Epheſus to Theodoſius; [d] and when he alſo himſelf requeſted it, he was permitted to return to his own Monaſtery; which is ſcituate before the Gates of that City now called * Theopolis, and is not expreſsly named [there] by Neſtorius. But, they ſay, [e] it is now termed Euprepius's [Monaſtery,] which, as we aſſuredly know, ſtands before the [City] Theopolis, diſtant from thence not more than two furlongs. Moreover, the ſame Neſtorius ſays, that having reſided there during the ſpace of four years, he had all imaginable honour conferred upon him, and enjoyed all manner of reverence and reſpect: but that afterwards, by the Edict of [the Emperour] Theodoſius, he was baniſhed into that place called Oäſis. But he has concealed that which is the principall thing. For, during his Reſidence [f] there, he in no wiſe deſiſted from his own Blaſphemy. In ſo much that Johannes Biſhop of Antioch gave [the Emperour] an account thereof, and Neſtorius was condemned to perpetuall Baniſhment. [g] He wrote alſo another Book, compoſed in the manner of a Dialogue, to a certain Egyptian as it were, concerning his baniſhment into Oäſis; wherein he ſpeaks more at large concerning theſe things. The latter of whom renders it thus: Scripſit autem & alium librum more dialectico, velut ad Egyptium quendam de exilio ſuo compoſitum, But he wrote another book alſo in a Logical manner, to a certain Egyptian as it were, compoſed concerning his own Exile. And Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it thus: Scripſit præterea Neſtorius alium Libellum acutè & ſubtiliter, &c. Moreover, Neſtorius wrote another little book, acutely and ſubtilly, &c. What need was there of acuteneſs and Logicall ſubtilty in a little book, wherein Neſtorius treated concerning his own baniſhment into Oäſis? Therefore, I judge it better to render theſe words, [διαλεκτικῶς συγκείμενον] thus [compoſed in the manner of a Dialogue.] And thus Nicephorus expounded theſe words of Evagrius. For, inſtead thereof, he makes uſe of the word διαλογικώτερον, more by way of Dialogue. Which term Langus renders, diſertius, more eloquently: as if Nicephorus had ſaid, λογικώτερον. Valeſ.

But, what puniſhments he underwent on account of the Blaſphemies * coyned by him (not being able to lie concealed from [God's] all-ſeeing eye,) may be known from other Letters, ſent by him to the Governour of Thebäis. For, in thoſe [Letters] you may find, after what manner (in regard he had not yet undergone condign [h] puniſhment,) the judgment of God ſeized him, and involved him in [i] Captivity, a calamity of all [afflictions] the moſt miſerable. But, in as much as he was to endure greater puniſhments, he was let go by the Blemmyæ, amongſt whom he had been a Captive. And removing from place to place about the utmoſt borders of Thebäis, by the Edicts of Theodoſius who had determined that he ſhould return; and being daſh't againſt the earth, he ended his days agreeable to his own forepaſt life: [like] a ſecond Arius, declaring and * foreſhewing by his calamitous death, what rewards are appointed for [thoſe who utter] Blaſphemy againſt Chriſt. For both thoſe † perſons blaſphemed Chriſt in a like manner; Arius, by terming him a Creature; and Neſtorius, by thinking him to be a man. To * whom (becauſe he complains, that The Acts at Epheſus were not rightly compoſed [and made up,] but were framed by fraud and an illegall Artifice of Cyrillus's;) I would willingly ſay [thus much:] Why (ſince Theodoſius was his favourer,) was he baniſhed, and, without obtaining the leaſt commiſeration, condemned to ſo many Exiles, and concluded his life after ſuch a manner as this? Or why (if the ſentence [pronounced] againſt him by Cyrillus, and the other Prelates about him, were not divine,) both of them being now numbred amongſt thoſe departed [and dead,] (at which time, as it has been ſaid by one of the Heathen Sages, [k] that which appears not any more in ſight [or, that which ſurvives not any longer] is honoured with a Benevolence that hath no enemy;) has he himſelf been condemned as a Blaſphemer, and an enemy of God; but Cyrillus is praiſed and extolled [by all perſons,] as having been a loud [and eminent] Preacher, and a great defender of Orthodox Sentiments? But leaſt we ſhould be accuſed for writing what is falſe, Come on, let us bring forth Neſtorius himſelf into the midſt, giving a relation concerning theſe very things.

[c] Ἔυδεν τε καὶ εἰδεν; that is, of both parties, as well Catholicks, as Neſtorians. Muſculus has rendred it ill, thus, ultero citroque, to and fro. Valeſ.

[d] Inſtead of [ἀυτῆ τε ἀυτῆ δηδεν] the reading in the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. is [ἀυτῆ τε αὖ δηδεν, and when he alſo himſelf requeſted it.] Valeſ.

* That is, Antioch. See chap. 3.

[e] From the Florent. and Tellerian M. S. I have mended this place thus: νῦν τὸ εὐπρεπὶς προσαγορεύεται, it is now termed Euprepius's [Monaſtery:] the reading before was very fooliſh, thus, νύν ἐστι. Valeſ.

[f] To wit, in the foreſaid Monaſtery, which was called Euprepius's Monaſtery. Valeſ.

[g] I like neither Chriſtophorſon's, nor Muſculus's Verſion of this place.

[h] In Nicephorus, (book 14. chap. 36.) inſtead of καταξελεύσεως, torture; the reading is truer, thus, ἐπεξελεύσεως, puniſhment. And ſo I found it written in the Tellerian M. S. Valeſ.

[i] I have mended this place from the incomparable Florentine Manuſcript; wherein the reading is thus [αἰχμαλοσίᾳ τῇ πάντων ἐλεεινοτάτῃ συμφορᾷ, Captivity, a calamity of all [afflictions] the moſt miſerable; than which emendation, there is nothing more certain. The reading in Nicephorus is the ſame alſo. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens's Edition, 'tis thus worded: αἰχμαλώσα τῇ πάντων ἐλεεινοτάτῃ συμφορᾷ. Valeſ.

* Or, ratifying, or, confirming.

* That is, to Neſtorius.

[k] Tranſlatours, in regard they had perſwaded themſelves, that the word ἐμποδὼν does always ſignifie an hindrance; have fallen into various errours. For Langus renders it thus: Et ambo vos jam ex vitâ hâc exceſſiſtis, &c. And both of you have now made your departure out of this life: at which time, as one of the Heathen ſages has ſaid, nothing binders, but that every perſon may be honoured by a free benevolence of men, no adverſary intervening. And Chriſtophorſon has tranſlated it after this manner: Quando, ut ſapienti inter Gentiles ſcriptori placet, &c. At which time, as it pleaſes a prudent Writer amongſt the Heathens, every one is uſually honoured with a firm and concordant benevolence of all men, provided there be nothing which may lawfully be an impediment. But, the term ἐμποδὼν does not always ſignifie an Impediment, or Hindrance. For the Ancients, as well Rhetoricians as Philoſophers, uſed ἐμποδὼν in ſuch a ſenſe as to ſignifie the ſame with ἐν ποσὶ to be in ſight, or, appear openly; as Suidas, Harpocration, and the Authour of the Ethymologicon do inform us. But, the Latter Writers, and eſpecially Hierocles the Philoſopher, have uſed that word to ſignifie an impediment or hindrance. Therefore, Muſculus has rendred this paſſage in Evagrius beſt of all, thus: Quando, ſicut quidam exterorum Philoſophorum dixit, quod non eſt amplius ſuperſtes, ſine ullius invidiâ & contradictione cum benevolentiâ honoratur; When, as one of the forreign Philoſophers has ſaid, that which ſurvives not any longer, is honoured with benevolence, without the envy and contradiction of any one. Further, in the margin of the Tellerian Manuſcript, there is ſet at this place, τυκυδίδης, that is, this ſentence is taken out of Thucidides. 'Tis extant in Thucidides's ſecond book, pag. 128, Edit. Francofurt. 1594; in the Funeral Oration which Pericles made. Valeſ.

* Or, brought forth.

Recite

Recite to me therefore [O Neſtorius!] ſome paſſages in the expreſs words of your own Letter, which you wrote to the Governour of Thebais. Becauſe of ſome [controverſies] lately agitated at Epheſus concerning the moſt Holy Religion; by an Imperiall Order we inhabit Oäſis otherwiſe [called] Ibis. And after the interpoſition of ſome words, he adds: But after the foreſaid [Oäſis] was totally deſtroyed by [1] a Barbarick Captivity, and by fire, and ſword; and we were diſmiſſed by the Barbarians, who on a ſuddain, how I know not, * were moved with a compaſſion towards us, and after they had terrified us with menacing declarations, that we ſhould immediately go out of that Country, in regard the Mazices would ſuddenly take poſſeſſion of it after them; we are come to Thebais together with the remainder of the Captives, whom the Barbarians (out of commiſeration) brought to us, for what intent I know not. Moreover, they have been every one permitted to go whither they deſired: but we by coming publickly to Panopolis, * do exhibite our ſelves. For we were afraid, leaſt any one, † by taking an occaſion from our Captivity, ſhould either frame an accuſation of flight againſt us, or elſe [form] a forged invention of ſome other fault. For malice is productive of all manner of calumnies. Wherefore, We beſeech Your * Magnificence, to take care (according to that proviſion the Laws have made,) of our Captivity, and not to deliver a Captive, who is ſubject to miſchief, to the evil arts of men; leaſt all Generations ſhould from hence forth cry out, that 'tis better to be the Barbarians Captive, than to fly for refuge to the Roman Empire. Then, having added an Oath, he made his requeſt [to the Governour] thus: [that You would pleaſe] to give the Emperour an account of our Remove from Oäſis * hither, which hapned from our being diſmiſſed by the Barbarians: that ſo, whatever determination ſhall be well pleaſing to God, may now at length be made concerning us. [Alſo, out of] the ſame Neſtorius's ſecond Letter to the ſaid Governour: Whether You will account this preſent Letter from Us to Your Magnificence, as [written] from a friend, or as an admonition from a Father to a Son, hear, I beſeech you, with patience the Narration [contained] therein concerning many [matters,] written from us, wherein We have been as brief as poſſibly could be. Oäſis otherwiſe [termed] Ibis, having been ſeverall ways ruin'd of late, by an incurſion made into it by a multitude of the [m] Nomades.

[1] Inſtead of [χ᾽ βαρβαεικῆς ἀιχμαλόσεως] the reading, as it ſeems, ſhould be [διὰ βαρβαεικῆς ἀιχμαλοσίας, by a Barbarick Captivity.] In the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. and in Nicephorus, 'tis ἀιχμαλοσίᾳ, by Captivity. Valeſ.

* Or, recovered a compaſſion, &c.

* Or, do appear perſonally.

† Or, by making our captivity [his] matter of enquiry.

* Or, Greatneſs.

* That is, To Panopolis.

[m] In that Letter of Neſtorius's mentioned before, the people who ruined Oäſis are termed Blemmyæ. Wherefore, Nomades ought here to be taken for an Adjective. Notwithſtanding, it may be the proper name of a Nation of Barbarians. 'Tis certain, the Nubæ, neighbours to the Blemmyæ, (who made frequent incurſions into the Country of Oäſis, as Procopius informs us, in book 1. Perſic.) were termed Nomades alſo, or Numides; which is atteſted by Stephanus.——But ſome one will object, if Neſtorius ſpeaks here concerning one and the ſame Captivity of Oäſis, how can that ſtand, which he ſays in the beginning of this Epiſtle, in theſe words: Ὀάπεως τῆς ἴδεως ἐν πολλῶν πρόσην ἀφανισθείσης. For, the incurſion of the Blemmyæ into Oäſis (in which Neſtorius had been taken Captive by the Barbarians, and was preſently diſmiſſed,) had hapned but a little while before, as he himſelf atteſts. But, the incurſion of the Nomades had hapned long before; as 'tis apparent from Neſtorius's words in this laſt Epiſtle, which were juſt now cited. To all this I anſwer, that theſe words ἐν πολλῶν πρόσην, do not ſignifie long ſince, as Langus, Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon thought. For, the Adverb πρόσην, ſignifies lately, as every body knows. Doubtleſs, this incurſion had hapned a little before Neſtorius wrote theſe things. Therefore, ἐκ πολλῶν ought to be referred to the word ἀφανισθείσης. So that, 'tis the ſame as if he ſhould have ſaid, Oäſis having been ſeverall ways ruined of late: to wit, by fire, ſlaughters, and a Barbarick Captivity; as Neſtorius has ſaid above. Valeſ.

And after ſome words. Theſe things having happned thus, (by what impulſe, or on what occaſion Your Magnificence was moved thereto, I know not;) we have been ſent by Barbarian Souldiers from Panopolis, to Elephantina, [a Town] ſituate in the Borders of the Province Thebais; towards which we have been drag'd by the forementioned military aſſiſtance. And when we had been tired by our travelling more than half that journey, we again met with an Order of Your Magnanimity by word of mouth, [whereby we were commanded] to return to Panopolis. Having therefore been wearied with the miſeries [n] of this ſo long a journey, our Body being infirm and aged, and our hand and ſide tired, we came again to Panopolis, in a manner breathing forth our Soul. And whileſt we were as yet cruciated with the calamities and miſchiefs of [our] pains, another Order written by Your Magnanimity * came in great haſt, whereby we were conveyed again from Panopolis to a place adjoyning thereto. [o] When we ſuppoſed, that we ſhould ſtop here, and were in expectation of the moſt Victorious Emperours determination concerning us; on a ſudden another [Decree] was again drawn up againſt us, without any commiſeration, in order to another [to wit,] a fourth Baniſhment. And after ſome few words, [he continues] But, I beſeech you, let what has been done be ſufficient, and [may it be enough] [p] to have Decreed ſo many baniſhments againſt one Body: and, [q] after the relations [which have been ſent to their Imperial Majeſties] by Your Magnificence, permit, I humbly beſeech you, that an accurate account [of our condition] may be made known to our moſt Victorious Emperours, even by us alſo, by whom that ought [to be done.] Theſe are our Advices, as to a Son from a Father.

[n] The reading here, is, τῆς σῆς ὁδοιπορίας, of this your journey: and 'tis the ſame in Nicephorus. Notwithſtanding, I doubt not but it ſhould be, τῆς τόσης ὁδοιπορίας, of this ſo long a journey. And ſo Chriſtophorſon and Sr Henry Savil read it. Valeſ.

* Or, came flying.

[o] Inſtead of [πωῦ τα σήσεσθαι καθ᾽ ἡμᾶς λογιζομένων, when we ſuppoſed theſe things againſt us would ſtop] I think it ſhould be thus: ἐνταῦθα σήσεσθαι ἡμᾶς λογιζομένων, when we ſuppoſed we ſhould ſtop here. Thus Muſculus ſeems to have read, who renders it in this manner: Et cùm illic hæſuros nos arbitraremur, And when we thought we ſhould ſtop there. Valeſ.

[p] Inſtead of [χ᾽ τὸ τοσαῦτα,] it muſt be χ᾽ τοῦ τοσαῦτας.] For, the word [ἀφικέσθαι] which preceded immediately, is underſtood. In the Tellerian M. S. the particle [τὸ] is wanting. Valeſ.

[q] Tranſlatours ſaw nothing at this place; who by a ſmall fault were induced into a great errour. Inſtead of [ἀνεχθεῖσι] it muſt undoubtedly be [ἀνενεχθεῖσι.] Preſidents of Provinces were heretofore wont to give the Emperour an account of all things which hapned with them. The doing whereof was termed ἀναφέρειν, and the Relation it ſelf ἀναφορᾷ, as I have noted on Amm. Marcellinus. Concerning theſe Relations of Preſidents, Severianus ſpeaks, in his firſt Oration in Hexaëmeron; the paſſage whereof I will annex here, becauſe the Tranſlatour underſtood it not: ὥσπερ γὰρ, ἀδελφοὶ, οἱ ὑπὸ τῆς ἀναφορῶν ἄρχοντες τῷ βασιλεῖ πάντα μηνύουσιν. ὅτω χ᾽ οἱ ἄγγελοι τῷ θεῷ, &c. For, Brethren, as the preſidents by [ſending] Relations, make known all things [that are tranſacted with them] to the Emperour: ſo alſo the Angels, &c. The Tranſlatour renders it The Maſters of the Libells and ſuggeſtions; which rendition is ill. For ἄρχοντες, in Chryſoſtome and the other writers of that age, are nothing elſe but Preſidents or Governours of Provinces. And ἀναφορὰ imports nothing elſe but Relation or Narrative. Wherefore in Severianus, it muſt be written thus: ὥσπερ γὰρ διὰ τῆς ἀναφορῶν οἱ ἄρχοντες, &c. Valeſ.

But if you be angry now, as you have been heretofore, do what you think good; ſince * no reaſon is powerfull enough to ſway your mind. After this manner [Neſtorius] in his Letters ſtrikes and leaps, with his fiſts and feet, and

and reviles * the Emperours and Magiſtracy; having not been made prudent by the miſeries he ſuffered. But I have † read a certain writer declaring his Latter end [after this manner, to wit,] That his tongue having been eaten out with worms, he departed to greater and immortall puniſhments [which are to be inflicted on him.]

* Or, the Empire.

AFter that deſtructive Peſt Neſtorius, Maximianus ſucceeded in the Epiſcopate of the famous [City] Conſtantinople; under whom the Church of God enjoyed all imaginable peace and tranquillity. CHAP. IX.

Concerning the unfortunate Eutyches, and how he was depoſed by Flavianus [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople; and concerning the ſecond (to wit, that theeviſh) Synod at Epheſus.

IN † his times, the controverſie about the impious Eutyches was ſtarted; a particular Synod having been convened [a] at Conſtantinople: [to which Synod] Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum (who was the firſt perſon that had [heretofore] refuted Neſtorius's Blaſphemy, being untill then but a Rhetorician,) preſented Libells. Therefore, when Eutyches, after he had been ſummoned [to the Synod,] came not: and at his appearing [afterwards] had been convicted of having ſaid theſe words: I confeſs, that our Lord * had two natures before the union: but, after the union I confeſs, but one nature: (he aſſerted alſo, that the Body of our Lord was not of the ſame ſubſtance with our bodies.) [After this, I ſay,] he is depoſed.

† That is, Flavianus's.

[a] Inſtead of [ἐπὶ τοῦ κωνσταντίνου] it muſt undoubtedly be [ἐπὶ τῶν κωνσταντίνου, at Conſtantinople; which is the reading in the Tellerian Manuſcript, and in Nicephorus, book 14. chap. 47. where Langus renders it thus: Flavianus Synodo Provinciali apud Conſtantinopolim coactâ, &c. Flavianus, a Provincial Synod having been convened at Conſtantinople, &c. Whom Chriſtophorſon has followed. Notwithſtanding, I had rather render it a particular Synod, as Muſculus does. Indeed, that Synod conſiſted only of thoſe Biſhops, who at that time hapned to make their abode at Conſtantinople, on account of ſome Eccleſiaſtick affairs: which Prelates they commonly termed ἐνδημοῦντας ἐπισκόπους, Biſhops that made their reſidence for ſome time only in the City. The Acts of this Conſtantinopolitane Synod under Flavianus, are related in the Firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council; where theſe words occur [ſee Binius Tom. 3. pag. 80.] σωαχθείσης τῆς ἁγίας καὶ μεγάλης συνόδου τῆς ἐνδημούσης ἐν τῇ προειρημένῃ μεγαλοπόλει, &c. The Holy and Great Synod having been convened [conſiſting of ſuch Prelates as] reſided for ſome time in the forenamed Great City, &c. If any one be deſirous of knowing the names of thoſe Biſhops then convened; they occur in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Synod. Valeſ.. See Binius, Tom. 3. pag. 125. Edit. Paris. 1636.

* Or, as if the Acts, &c.

But when he had preſented a ſupplicatory Libell to Theodoſius, * pretending that the Acts of thoſe convened [in that Synod] had been falſified by Flavianus; in the firſt place a Synod of [the Biſhops] that were neer neighbours to Conſtantinople was aſſembled. In which ([b] ſome of the Magiſtrates alſo being preſent therein,) Flavianus is judged. And when this Synod had confirmed the Acts, as being true; a ſecond Synod is convened at Epheſus.

[b] Καὶ τινὰς τῶν ἀρχόντων: which words Chriſtophorſon hath rendred ill, thus, Some Prelates of Churches; whereas he ſhould have tranſlated it, ſome of the Magiſtrates. Nicephorus therefore (book 14. chap. 47.) has rightly explained theſe words of Evagrius, after this manner: ἐν ᾗ καὶ ἄλλοι τε τῶν ἱερέων παρῆσαν, καὶ τῶν τῆς συγκλήτου τινὲς, in which [Synod] there were preſent both others of the Prelates, and alſo ſome of the Senate. The Actions of this ſecond Conſtantinopolitan Synod under Flavianus are extant, recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council. See Binius Tom. 3. pag. 129. Edit. ut prius. Where Florentius the moſt magnificent Patricius, Mamas the Comes and Proximus, [that is, Clerk] of the Deſk of Libells and Sacred Cognitions, and Macedonius the Tribune and Notary, are ſaid to have been preſent at this Synod. Valeſ.

CHAP. X.

What was tranſacted by Dioſcorus and Chryſaphius [at] the * abſurd Synod at Epheſus.

* Παράλογον συνέδριον, unexpected, or abſurd Synod: Valeſius renders it, the illegitimate Synod; Curterius terms it the mad Synod.

AT this Synod Dioſcorus, ſucceſſour to Cyrillus in the See of Alexandria, was appointed to preſide: [a] which thing was effected by the Artifice of [b] Chryſaphius (a perſon of great intereſt in the Imperiall Pallace at that time,) out of [his] hatred to Flavianus. There met [at this Synod] at Epheſus, Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, [c] who had been at the former Epheſine Synod, together with many other Prieſts [whom he had] about him. Together with theſe met Domnus, Johannes's ſucceſſour in the Antiochian See: alſo Biſhop [d] Julius, who filled the place of Leo Biſhop of the Seniour Rome. Flavianus likewiſe was preſent with them, together with the Biſhops about him: deed it thus, τεχνάζητο τῷ χρυσαφίῳ. I doubt not but Evagrius wrote thus: ἔστο τεχνάζητο χρυσαφίῳ. Which thing [that is, Dioſcorus's Preſidency in that Synod] was effected by the artifice of Chryſaphius. Further, Chriſtophorſon tranſlates and points this whole paſſage, in this manner: Hujus concilii Dioſcorus, qui in Alexandriæ Epiſcopatum poſt Cyrillum ſucceſſit, quò odium in Flavianum incenderetur, præſes deſignatus fuit. Chryſaphius enim hanc rem callidè molitus fuerat. Of this Councill Dioſcorus, who ſucceeded Cyrillus in the Epiſcopate of Alexandria, to the end that the hatred againſt Flavianus might be inflamed, was appointed preſident. For Chryſaphius had craftily attempted this thing. But Muſculus's opinion ſeems far better to me, who before theſe words πρὸς ἕχθρας φλαυιανοῦ, places a ſubdiſtinction. For he renders it thus: Præſidebat autem ei Synodo Dioſcorus poſt Cyrillum Alexandrinus Epiſcopus; id quod ita odio Flaviani inſtituerat Chryſaphius, &c. At that Synod preſided Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria after Cyrillus; which thing Chryſaphius had ſo ordered out of [his] hatred to Flavianus, &c. Inſtead of theſe words [πρὸς ἕχθρας (or ἕχθραν, as Sr Henry Savill mends it) out of [his] hatred;] Nicephorus has theſe, δι' ἔχθρας ἰὼν φλαυιανῷ, by reaſon of his hatred reſiſting [or, breaking out againſt] Flavianus. Valeſ.

[a] In Robert Stephens's Edition, the reading was [τῷ τεχνάσαντι τῷ χρυσαφίῳ] but Chriſtophorſon and Sr Henry Savill, by tranſpoſing the words, have mended it thus, τεχνάζητο τῷ χρυσαφίῳ.

[b] At the margin of the Florentine Manuſcript, this Scholion is ſet: περὶ τοῦ δυσεβοῦς χρυσαφίου σημείωσαι ὡς ἀεὶ οἱ κοίλωνικοὶ εὐνοῦχοι τοῦ ὀρθοδόξους ἀρχιερεῖς ἐκακούργων, That is, Note concerning the Impious Chryſaphius, that the Eunuchs of the Bed-chamber have always done miſchief to the Orthodox Arch-Biſhops. Of which thing we have an eminent inſtance in Euſebius, chief [Eunuch] of the Bed-chamber, who in Conſtantius's Reign perſecuted Athanaſius, and the other Catholick Prelates. Valeſ.

[c] Τὸ δὲ πρότερον ἐν ἐφέσῳ γραφὲν. Chriſtophorſon underſtood theſe words amiſs; as if Evagrius had ſaid, that Juvenalis had formerly been Biſhop of Epheſus. But Evagrius does not ſay ſo; but only, that Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, had been heretofore at Epheſus, to wit, in the former Epheſine Synod, wherein Neſtorius had been condemned. Valeſ.

[d] The reading in Nicephorus is the ſame; but 'tis corrupt, inſtead of Julianus. For ſo it is truly written in the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod, which are recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Councill; poſt conſulatum Zenonis & Poſthumiani V. C. C. Die ſexto Idus Auguſti, &c. After the Conſulate of the moſt famous Perſonages Zeno and Poſthumianus, on the ſixth of the Ides of Auguſt, in the third Indiction, a Synod is convened in the Metropolis Epheſus, by the command of the moſt Religious and moſt Chriſtian Emperours; and the moſt Reverend rend and moſt Holy Biſhops, Dioſcorus of Alexandria, and Biſhop Julianus (who was the Deputy of the moſt Holy and moſt Bleſſed Leo Biſhop of the Roman Church,) ſate in the Holy Church, which is called [Saint] Mary's. Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 449, relates from Marianus's Chronicon, that this Julianus was Biſhop of Puteoli. Notwithſtanding, as it is now extant in Marianus Scotus's Chronicon, the Biſhop of Puteoli is not called Julianus but Fulius, who was ſent with Hilarus the Deacon by Pope Leo, to the ſecond Epheſine Synod. But, in the Subſcriptions of the Biſhops who Subſcribed to this ſecond Epheſine Synod, (which Subſcriptions are Recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 141;) he is termed Julianus the Biſhop. For theſe are the words there: Fulianus Epiſcopus, tenens locum ſanctiſſimi Epiſcopi Romanæ Eccleſiæ, interpretante ſe Florentio Epiſcopo Lydiæ, dixit, &c. From which words it ſeems to be concluded, that this Fulianus, who was preſent at the ſecond Epheſine Synod, was Fulianus Biſhop of Coe, who two years after was preſent at the Chalcedon Councill, and held there alſo the place of Leo Biſhop of Rome, as it frequently occurs recorded in the Acts of the Chalcedon-Synod.——Obſerve here Baronius's inconſtancy; who, when he had written at the year of Chriſt 449, that that Fulianus (who was Legate of the Apoſtolick See at the ſecond Epheſine Synod,) was Biſhop of Puteoli; afterwards (at the year of Chriſt 451, chap. 78,) makes him Biſhop of Coe. Valeſ.

[c] The Sacred Commonitory (or, Letters Mandatory,) of the Emperour Theodoſius to Elpidius, Comes of the Sacred Conſiſtory, and to Eulogius the Tribune and Prætorian Notary, is extant in the Acts of the Epheſine Conventicle [or, little Councill,] which are Recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 46, where theſe words here related by Evagrius, do occur. Valeſ.

[c] Theodoſius having given an Order to Elpidius in theſe expreſs words: Let thoſe [Prelates] who before have been the Judges of Eutyches the moſt Religious * Archimandrite, be preſent and ſilent: but let them in no wiſe take the place of Judges, but expect the common † Sentence of all the moſt Holy Fathers; in regard thoſe things which have been judged by them, are now under ſcrutiny. In this Synod Eutyches is reſtored (his Sentence of Depoſition being revok't,) by Dioſcorus and thoſe about him; * as the Contents of the Acts thereof do ſhew. And Flavianus, and Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum, are condemned and depoſed. At the ſame Synod, Ibas Biſhop of the Edeſſeni is excommunicated: and [f] Daniel Biſhop of Carræ is depoſed: as is alſo [g] Irenæus of Tyre, and Aquilinus of Byblus. Moreover, ſome things were tranſacted [there] on the account of [h] Sophronius Biſhop of Conſtantina.

* Or, Abbot.

* Or, as 'tis contained in the Acts.

[f] A little before the ſecond Epheſine Synod, Ibas [Biſhop] of Edeſſa, and Daniel Biſhop of Carræ had been accuſed before the Emperour Theodoſius by their own Clergy. The Emperour gave order, that cognizance of their Cauſe ſhould be taken in a Synod at Berytus, in the preſence of Damaſcius Tribune and Prætorian Notary. The Acts of this Councill [at Berytus] are extant, recorded in the tenth Action of the Chalcedon Synod, (See Binius. Tom. 3. pag. 377.) which begin thus: Poſt Conſulatum Flavii Zenonis & Poſthumiani, &c. After the Conſulate of the moſt famous perſonages Flavius Zeno and Poſthumianus, on the Calends of September, in the ſecond Indiction, &c. I doubt not but it ſhould be written, Conſulatu Zenonis & Poſthumiani, In the Conſulate of Zeno and Poſthumianus. Otherwiſe, this Synod would have hapned after the Epheſine little Councill, which was convened after the Conſulate of Zeno and Poſthumianus, in the month of Auguſt. Now, the Berytian Synod connot be placed after that Epheſine Synod, in regard mention is made therein of Flavianus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and of Domnus of Antioch: both which, 'tis manifeſt, were depoſed in the ſecond Epheſine Synod. Add hereto the teſtimony of Liberatus the Deacon, who relates in his Breviarium, that this Berytian Synod was convened before Eutyches had framed his Hereſie. Valeſ.

[g] Long before the ſecond Epheſine Synod, Irenæus had been driven from his Biſhoprick, by an Edict of the Emperour Theodoſius; and Photius had been put into his See. 'Tis certain, Photius preſided at the Berytian Synod, which had been convened on the year before the ſecond Epheſine Synod. But, becauſe Irenæus had been ejected by the Emperours Order, not by the determination of a Synod, therefore he was depoſed in the ſecond Epheſine Synod. Valeſ.

[h] 'Tis ſtrange, how much Tranſlatours have erred in the Verſion of this place. For, Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlatour, renders it thus: Decrevit hæc Synodus quoque de Sophronio quædam, &c. This Synod alſo Decreed ſome things concerning Sophronius, who had come at that time to Conſtantinople, on account of ſeeing that City. Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it in this manner: Nonnulla ibidem acta fuere contra Sophronium Epiſcopum Conſtantinopolitanum, ſome things were acted there againſt Sophronius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. But he ought to have ſaid Biſhop of Conſtantina. For Sophronius was Biſhop of Conſtantina, as 'tis apparent from the ſecond Antiochian Synod under Domnus, which is inſerted in the 14th Action of the Chalcedon Synod. The ſame Sophronius was afterwards preſent at the Chalcedon Synod, as 'tis recorded in the Acts of that Synod. Now, Conſtantina is a City of Phœnice. Valeſ.

* Theodoret Biſhop of Cyrus was depoſed alſo by them, as was likewiſe Domnus [Biſhop] of Antioch. [i] What became of which Prelate afterwards, I cannot find. When theſe things had been tranſacted in this manner, the ſecond Synod at Epheſus was diſſolved.

* This was he, who wrote the five books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory.

[i] In the place of Domnus Biſhop of Antioch Maximus was ſubrogated, as Liberatus informs us in his Breviarium. Who was afterwards confirmed in his Biſhoprick by Pope Leo, as we read in the Tenth Action of the Chalcedon Council. Notwithſtanding, the ſame Maximus appointed Domnus, as long as he lived, a certain allowance out of the Revenue of his Church, that being content with his maintenance, he might in future be quiet: which thing was approved of by the other Patriarchs in the Chalcedon Council, as may be ſeen in the forecited Action. Valeſ.

CHAP. XI.

This Writers Apology in defence of the variety [of opinions] amongſt us [Chriſtians,] and his Deriſion of the Pagan Triſles.

BUt, let * none of the Heathens deride us, becauſe the latter [Biſhops] depoſe the former, and always find out ſome new thing [which they add] to the faith. For we making reſearches after the ineffable Love of God [towards men,] which is paſt finding out, and being deſirous to honour and extoll it in the higheſt manner, doe betake our ſelves to this, or that [opinion.] Nor was any one of thoſe, who invented Hereſies amongſt the Chriſtians, ſo weak, that he would † deſignedly blaſpheme; nor has [any ſuch perſon] fallen into an errour, with a deſire to diſhonour the Deity: but 'twas rather his ſuppoſition, that if he ſhould aſſert this opinion, he ſhould ſpeak better than * thoſe who went before him. Beſides, thoſe [points] which are eſſentiall [a] and fundamentall, with a generall conſent we all confeſs and acknowledge. For 'tis the Trinity which we adore, and the Unity which we Glorifie: and God the Word, begotten before [all] ages, who was incarnate by a ſecond Generation, out of his compaſſion * to man. But if innovations have been introduced about ſome other [points,] they have proceeded from God our Saviour's giving [us] a free liberty of judging concerning theſe things; to the end that the Holy Catholick and Apoſtolick Church may † reduce the things that are ſaid on the one ſide and on the other, to what is decent and pious, and || may [make them] fall into one exact and right way. And for this reaſon the Apoſtle [Saint Paul] has moſt perſpicuouſly and truly ſaid: * There muſt be alſo Hereſies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifeſt [among you.] And in this alſo the unſpeakable wiſdome of God is to be admired, who has ſaid to the divine [Saint] Paul: † For my ſtrength is made perfect in weakneſs. For, for what reaſons the members of the Church have been rent in ſunder, for the very ſame [cauſes] the true and irreprehenſible || Dogmata have been more accurately poliſhed and ſet forth; and the Catholick and Apoſtolick Church has increaſed, and been advanced even to the Heavens. But the nouriſhers of Heathenish errour, who are not deſirous of finding out either [the nature of] God, or his providentiall care about men, do mutually overthrow both their own, and and their Anceſtours opinions. For they invent Gods upon Gods, and chooſe and name them from their own perturbations of mind; to the end that by taking to themſelves ſuch Gods, they may procure pardon for their own luſts and debaucheries. So forſooth, he who amongſt them [is accounted] the ſupream Father of men and Gods, having Metamorphoz'd himſelf into a bird, laſciviouſly ſnach't up the Phrygian Boy; and, as the reward of his uncleanneſs, gave him his Cup, [b] permitting him to begin to drink an inviting Cup to himſelf, that ſo both of them might in common ſwallow down their ſhame together with the Nectar. The ſame [Jupiter defiled himſelf] with infinite other impieties, which have been interdicted even amongſt the vileſt of men. And having changed himſelf into all the ſhapes of irrationall creatures, (he himſelf being of all the moſt brutiſh,) is made an * Androgynus, and [c] bears a child not in his belly, but on his thigh, to the end that theſe things contrary to nature might be done by him. At which Birth Bacchus [is brought forth,] who was himſelf an Androgynus alſo, and brought a reproach upon both Sexes: he was the Prince of drunkenneſs, of ſottiſhneſs cauſed by fulneſs of wine, of ſurfeits and debauches proceeding from ſo profuſe drinking, and of all the diſtempers riſing therefrom. To this [d] Ægiochus, this Loud Thunderer, they aſcribe this [e] as ſome brave and great [Action,] they term him parricide (a Villany judged by all men to be of the greateſt magnitude,) becauſe he drove Saturn, who had unfortunately begat him, out of his Kingdome.

[b] Τῶ φιλοσηοίαν ωεφηνεν ὁπτρέλας. He means (I ſuppoſe) that Story, which we are told concerning Ganymed Son of Tros King of Troas (which was one part of Phrygia.) This Boy, Jupiter having turned himſelf into an Eagle, ſnatch't up, and admitted him his Cup-bearer, in the room of Hebe, whom he had diſplaced; and makes him his Catamite.

* A perſon that is both male and female.

[c] The ſtory is this. Semele ('tis ſaid) being great with child by Jupiter, (to whom that god had ſworn to give whatever ſhe ſhould ask of him,) was by Juno's craft put upon making this requeſt to him; viz. that he would lie one night with her in the ſame manner he uſed to lie with Juno. The God-Lover granted her deſire; and Semele is burnt up with Thunder: but the Boy was taken out of her womb, and put upon Jove's thigh; of whom he was delivered (in ſuch manner as women are) at the due time. On which account Bacchus (who was the child thus brought forth,) had the name of Bimater, one that had two mothers.

[d] 'Tis an Epithete given to Jupiter, either (1) becauſe he wore the ſacred Ægis, [that is, Breſt-plate,] or (2) becauſe he was the raiſer of Storms, or rather (3) in regard he wore the skin of the Goat Amalthæa, which had been his Nurſe. See Servius upon Virgil's 8th Æneid. Col. 1320, Edit. Baſil. 1586.

[e] In ſtead of [ᾧ τὸ σεμνὸν, and ſome brave, &c. I doubt not but it ſhould be [ὡς τὸ σεμνὸν, as ſome brave, &c.] For, in theſe books of Evagrius, ᾧ is frequently uſed inſtead of ὡς. Valeſ.

What ſhould I ſay of Whoredome, which * has been conſecrated amongſt them, over which they have made the Cyprian Venus, begotten of a Shell, to preſide; which [Goddeſs] abominates continency as a moſt execrable thing and altogether intolerable: but ſhe is delighted with whoredomes and all manner of filthy actions, wherewith 'tis her deſire to be appeaſed. With whom Mars commits an unclean Act, and by the craft of Vulcanus is [taken and] expoſed to the view and deriſion of the other Gods. Any one may alſo deſervedly laugh at their Phalli, their Ithyphalli, Phallagogia, their vaſt Priapus, and Pan who is worſhipped with an obſcene member; and at their myſteries [celebrated] at Eleuſine, commendable for this thing only, [to wit,] that the Sun ſees them not, but they are condemned to dwell in darkneſs. But, leaving theſe things as well to the obſcene worſhippers as to the worſhipped, let us ſpur on our horſe * to the end of the Race, and render the remaining [tranſactions] of Theodoſius's Reign, manifeſt and evident to the eyes of all men.

In what manner the Emperour Theodoſius [proſecuted and] expelled the Hereſie of Neſtorius.

THe ſame Emperour wrote a moſt pious Conſtitution, extant in the Firſt Book of that termed Juſtinian's Code, which is in number The Third of the Firſt Title. In which [conſtitution, Theodoſius] incited thereto by God, has with all ſuffrages (as 'tis proverbially ſaid) condemned * him, for whom he had heretofore had a ſingular affection (as Neſtorius himſelf has related;) † and has denounced an Anathema againſt him, recorded in theſe expreſs words: Moreover, We Decree, that thoſe who ‖ emulate the impious faith of Neſtorius, or follow his deteſtable doctrine, (if they be Biſhops, or Eccleſiaſticks,) ſhall be ejected out of the Holy Churches: but, if they be Läicks, they ſhall be Anathematized. The ſame Emperour made other Laws on account of our Religion, which do ſufficiently demonſtrate the ardency of his zeal.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Saint Symeon the * Stylite.

IN theſe times, Symeones, [a perſon] of an holy [a] and moſt celebrated memory, flouriſhed and was * eminent: he was the firſt perſon that inſtituted the Station upon a pillar, the circumference of whoſe Manſion was ſcarce two Cubits; at which time Domnus preſided over the Church of Antioch. Who when he was come to Symeones, and had admired his ſtation and manner of life, was deſirous of ſome more ſecret [converſe with him.] Both of them therefore met together, [b] and having conſecrated the immaculate Body [of Chriſt,] they gave one another the Viviſick Communion. This perſon in the fleſh emulated the converſe of the Celeſtiall powers, withdrew himſelf from affairs upon earth, and putting a force upon Nature which tends downward, purſued things ſublime. And having placed himſelf in the midſt, [as it were] between heaven and things upon earth, he converſed with moſt Holy, and the like. Our Evagrius ſpeaking hereafter concerning Gregorius Biſhop of Antioch, gives him this Elogy, γενηρεὺς τῶ παγαοιδύμε, the moſt celebrated Gregorius. Valeſ.

* Or, who dwelt in [or, upon] a pillar.

[a] Καὶ πάνυ ἀοιδίμε μνήμης. Sr Henry Savil in his Copy makes it one word, thus, παναοιδίμε. But I had rather write it παγαοιδίμε. For ſo Grecians do uſually ſpeak; as when they ſay παγοῦφημον moſt eminently laudable, παγάγιον

* Or, conſpicuous.

[b] Heretofore the Presbyters celebrated the Church-Service together with the Biſhop, and received the Euchariſt from his hand. So in the tenth Action of the Chalcedon Councill, Baſſianus Biſhop of Epheſus, in his Supplicatory Libell to Marſianus the Emperour, amongſt other things ſays theſe words: τῆ δὲ ἄγεγον ἡμέρᾳ λειτεργήσαντες πάντες ὁμῦ, &c. Having on the day after all of us performed the Publick-Service together, &c. And, at a great diſtance from that place, the ſame Baſſianus ſays, pag. 303, σέφανῳ πρεσβύτερῳ μῦ, &c. Stephanus my Presbyter was with me four years, he performed the Publick-Service with me, communicated with me, and received the Communion from me, as from his Biſhop. The ſame uſage alſo was heretofore practiſed in the Roman Church, to wit, that the Presbyters ſhould every day celebrate the Publick-Service together with the Biſhop of Rome, and receive the Communion from his hand. But on Sundays, when the Presbyters were neceſſitated to perform the Publick-Service apart in their own Titles, [Pariſhes, or, Cures,] on account of the people committed to their charge; they received the Lords Body ſent by the Acolythi from the Biſhop of Rome: that they might not ſeem to be ſeparated from the communion of their own Biſhop, eſpecially on that day; as Pope Innocent informs us in his Epiſtle to Decentius. Valeſ.

God,

God, and together with the Angels glorified him: offering to God from the earth his ſupplications for men, and procuring from heaven the ſupernall benevolence upon men. This perſons * Miracles have been written by one that was an eye-witneſs of what he did. Theodoret alſo Biſhop of Cyrus has † recorded them very eloquently. [c But] we have found, that they have been moſt eſpecially defective in this [following paſſage,] which to this day is preſerved amongſt thoſe of the Holy Solitude, and from which very perſons, we have received it. When therefore Symeones, that Angel upon earth, that Citizen in the fleſh of the Jeruſalem which is above, had inſtituted this new, and [hitherto] unknown way of living to men; the Inhabitants of the Holy Deſert ſend a meſſenger to him, whom they ordered to enquire [of Symeones,] what this new and ſtrange courſe of life was, and why he left that way which had been trodden and worn by the Saints, and proceeded in another new one, [hitherto] wholly unknown to men? And [they bade the meſſenger tell him] that they commanded him to come down, and go on in the way of the Elect Fathers. Now, if he ſhould ſhew himſelf [d] ready [and willing] to come down, their order was, that he ſhould be permitted to follow his own [way.] For by his obedience [they ſaid] it would be manifeſt, that by the direction of God he had undertaken this troubleſome and afflictive way of living. But if he refuſed, and would be the ſervant of his own will, nor would with a readineſs forthwith obey their admonition, ['twas their order] that he ſhould be pulled down by force. When therefore the meſſenger was come to him, and had acquainted him with the command of the Fathers, and Symeon's had forthwith put down one of his feet, reſolving to fulfill the Order of the Fathers; [the meſſenger who had been ſent to him] permitted him to proceed on in his own way; and ſpake theſe words [to him:] Be ſtrong, and behave thy ſelf like a man: thy ſtation is of God. This truly memorable action [of Symeon's] which I have related here, is omitted by thoſe who have written concerning him. [Further,] this perſon was in ſo high a manner influenced by the power of divine grace, that when the Emperour Theodoſius had iſſued out an Order, that the Synagogues of the Jews inhabiting Antioch (which had been taken from them by the Chriſtians,) ſhould be reſtored to them again; he wrote to the Emperour with ſo much freedome and confidence, and reproved him ſo ſmartly, (revering [God] only his own King,) that the Emperour Theodoſius revoak't his own Orders, fulfilled all things in favour of the Chriſtians, removed the Præfectus Prætorio, who had ſuggeſted theſe things to him, from his Government, and entreated the moſt Holy and [e] Aërial Martyr in [theſe] expreſs words, that he would put up his ſupplications and prayers for him, and impart to him his own bleſſing. Moreover, Symeon ſpent ſix and fifty years in this afflictive and auſtere courſe of life. In the firſt Monaſtery, wherein he had been imbued with the precepts of a divine life, [he ſpent] nine years. And ſeven and fourty in that place called * The Mandra: during ten years [of which time] he performed his combat in a certain narrow place; [he dwelt] ſeaven years in the ſhorter pillars, and thirty years upon a pillar of fourty cubits long. His moſt ſacred body, after his departure out of this life, in the ſucceeding times was brought to Antioch, [to wit,] when Leo ſwayed the Imperiall Scepter, and Martyrius preſided over the Church of Antioch; at which time alſo Ardaburius Maſter of the Orientall Milice, came to Symeon's Mandra, accompanied with thoſe Military Forces he had about him, and with other multitudes; and guarded the moſt pretious dead body of the bleſſed Symeones, to the end that the neighbouring Cities might not meet together and ſteal it. His moſt holy body therefore is conveyed to Antioch, very great miracles having been performed even by the way. The Emperour Leo deſired it might be given to him by the Antiochians. But the Inhabitants of Antioch preſented a ſupplicatory Libell to him, wherein were contained theſe words: In regard we have no wall to our City, ([f] For 'tis faln by reaſon of the wrath [of God:]) we have brought [hither] the moſt Holy Body that it may be to us inſtead of a wall and a fortification. By which words the Emperour Leo was prevailed upon, granted their requeſt, and permitted them [to enjoy] the Holy Body. Many of this perſons [Reliques] have been preſerved untill our times. Even I my ſelf have ſeen his holy head, (ſeverall Eccleſiaſticks being then preſent,) at ſuch time as the moſt celebrated Gregorius was Biſhop of Antioch; when Philippicus requeſted, that the pretious Reliques of the Saints might be ſent to him, in order to the guarding and defending the Orientall Milice. And, which is to be wondred at, the hair of his head was not faln off; but is preſerved perfect and entire, as if he were yet alive, and converſant amongſt men. The skin alſo of his forehead was wrinkled indeed, and become hard: but 'tis as yet preſerved whole, as are alſo moſt of his teeth, [g] excepting ſo many of them as have by force been taken away by the hands of faithfull perſons. [Which teeth of his] do by their * form declare, what, how great, and eminent a man of God this Symeones was. There lies likewiſe at his head, a chain made of Iron which he wore about his neck; with which his much-renowned body, worn out by auſterities, hath ſhared the honours [given] by God.

* Or, Predictions.

† See Theodoret's works, Tom. 3. pag. 876, &c. Edit. Pariſ. 1642.

[c] This place has been ſeverall ways corrected by Learned men, to wit, by Chriſtophorſon and Curterius, or rather by thoſe from whoſe Copies they tranſcribed theſe emendations. For ſome, after the word ἀφαλοιπότες, add the verb εἰσίν. Others read ἀφαλοίπην, and underſtand that concerning Theodoret only. But I ſuppoſe this place is to be reſtored thus: ἐν ᾧ τὰ μάλιστα ἀφαλοιποτας καλεληφαμὼ, ὃ μέχρι νῦν σωζόμωον παρὰ τοῖς τῆς ἁγίας ἐρήμε, παρ' αὐτῷ περιελήφαμὼ. And ſo I have rendred it: nor do I doubt but Evagrius wrote it thus. Valeſ.

[d] In the incomparable Florentine M.S. I found theſe words, written at the margin: πνδματικῆ ὡς ἀληθὼς ἐν τῷ κειτῷ ἢ ἠβὶ πατέρων τῶν τὸ μεγάλε συμεών & κείτης; that is, The judgment of the Fathers concerning the Great Symeon [was] truly ſpirituall in Chriſt. Valeſ.

[e] Theſe ſeem to be the words of the Emperour Theodoſius, taken out of the Letter he wrote to the bleſſed Symeones. The Emperour therefore had prefixt this title before his Letter; τῷ παναγίῳ καὶ ἀειῴ μάρτυρι, To the moſt Holy and Aërial Martyr. Where he terms him Martyr; on account of thoſe great ſeverities wherewith he afflicted his own body: and he ſtiles him Aërial, becauſe he ſtood on high in the air, in a pillar. The words ἐπὶ ὕψωι & do undoubtedly declare what I have ſaid; to wit, that thoſe now mentioned, or them immediately following, are the words of the Emperour Theodoſius. Notwithſtanding, Chriſtophorſon has pointed this place otherwiſe, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For he renders it thus: Et ſanctiſſimum ac Aërium oraret Martyrem, uti nominatim pro ipſo Deum obſecraret, And he beſought the moſt Holy and Aërial Martyr, that he would beſeech God expreſsly for himſelf. Which punctation of this paſſage I can in no wiſe approve of. Valeſ.

* See the following chapter, note (a.)

[f] After this clauſe, Nicephorus adds theſe words; σεισμὸς μεγάλε γενομένε, a great earthquake having happned. Valeſ.

[g] Ὅτι μὲν δὲ ὅσοι. Chriſtophorſon and Sr Henry Savil have mended this place thus [ὅσοι μὴ χερσὶν, as many as have not by force, &c.] But, the place may be mended by a ſmaller change, thus: εἰ μὴ ὅσοι, &c. excepting ſo many of them as, &c. Inſtead of theſe words, Nicephorus uſes, πλὴν ὅσοι; which is more elegant. Valeſ.

* Διὰ τὲ χύμα & by [their] figure, form, or ſhape: Valeſius renders it by their greatneſs.

For that dear and friendly iron deſerted not Symeones, even when dead. I would have given [h] a particular account of this perſons performances, (which would yield no ſmall advantage, both to my ſelf relating them, and alſo to thoſe who ſhould read them;) were it not, that Theodoret ([i] as I have ſaid before,) hath declared them more at large.

[h] Inſtead of [ὅπου τὸ καθέκαστον] I had rather it ſhould be [ἕ τὸ καθέκαστον, a particular account of this perſons, &c.] Which emendation ſeems to me to be altogether neceſſary; although Nicephorus defends the common reading. Chriſtophorſon ſeems to have read according as I have ſaid. Valeſ.

[i] Ὡς ἔφην εἰπών. I am of the ſame mind with S[r] Henry Savil, who in the margin of his Copy has mended it thus, ὡς ἔφθην εἰπὼν, as I have ſaid before. The ſame fault is corrected before in this chapter, where the Synagogues are ſpoken of, which the Antiochians had heretofore taken away from the Jews. And ſo it is plainly written in the Tellerian. M. S. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the Star which appears frequently in the Piazza about the Pillar of Saint Symeon, which this Writer and others have ſeen: and concerning the ſame Saint's Head.

But come on, I will inſert another thing alſo into this Hiſtory, which I my ſelf ſaw. I had a great deſire to ſee the Church of this holy perſon. It is about three hundred furlongs diſtant from * Theopolis, ſcituate on the very top of an hill. Thoſe who live there abouts call it [a] The Mandra; the moſt Holy [Symeones,] I ſuppoſe, left this name to the place of his Aſcetick exerciſes. The riſing of the hill extends to the length of twenty furlongs. The fabrick of the Temple repreſents the form of a Croſs, beautified with Portico's of four ſides. [b] Oppoſite to thoſe Portico's are placed Pillars, curiouſly framed of poliſh't ſtone, whereon the Roof is gracefully raiſed to an heighth.

* That is, Antioch.

[a] Inſtead of [μανδείαν, The Mandria,] in the Tellerian M.S. and Niccephorus, it is μάνδεαν, The Mandra. For ſo Evagrius himſelf terms it twice, in the foregoing chapter. But what Evagrius adds, to wit, that Saint Symeones gave that name to that place wherein he had exerciſed himſelf in the ſtudies of a more auſtere Philoſophy, is to be further inquired into. Evagrius's words are theſe: τῆς ἀσκήσεως ὅτι μάλιστα τὸ παναγὲς συμεῶνος τῷ περιηρεφεῖ τοῦ χώρου καλαιπόνῳ. Chriſtophorſon and S[r] Henry Savil mend it thus, καταλιπῶσης; wherein they are greatly miſtaken. They perceived not that Evagrius is wont ſometimes to tranſpoſe words. This place therefore in Evagrius is thus to be conſtrued: τὸ παναγὲς τῷ περιηρεφεῖ καλαιπόνῳ τοῦ χώρου τῆς ἀσκήσεως, The moſt holy [Symeones,] I ſuppoſe, left, &c. So Nicephorus underſtood this place in Evagrius. For thus he words it: μάνδεαν δὲ ὡς εἴρηται, &c. The Inhabitants call the place of his Aſcetick exerciſes The Mandra, as has been ſaid; the Holy [Symeon] having given it that name. Yet, any one may conjecture, that that name was given to that place after Symeon's death, when many Monks flock't thither, and had built a Monaſterie there. For Mandra ſignifies a Monaſterie, being a Metaphor taken from Hovells wherein Sheep or Goats are foddered; which are called Mandræ. Hence the Abbots of Monaſteries are termed Archimandritæ, as may be ſeen in the Chalcedon Councill, and in the Novells of the Emperours. Theodorus Lector ſpeaks concerning this Monaſterie of Symeon's, in book 1. Collectan; where he ſays, Δανιὴλ ὁ θαυμάσιος, &c. The Admirable Daniel, who came out of Symeon's Mandra, went up upon the Pillar at Anaplum. Symeon Metaphraſtes does likewiſe mention this Monaſterie, in his Life of Daniel the Stylite, chap. 7. at which place Metaphraſtes ſhews that this Monaſterie was built whileſt Symeon was living. Concerning which, neither Theodoret, nor Evagrius, ſpeak one word. But, I will not hide this, viz. that in the Tellerian M. S. the reading at this place is καλαιπώσης. Valeſ.

[b] Παρεστάκασι δὲ τοῖς τοίχοις. Chriſtophorſon renders this place thus: Porticibus vero columnæ adjunctæ ſunt, To the Portico's are adjoyned Pillars. Nor is Muſculus's Verſion much different; who tranſlates it thus: Inſunt autem porticibus columnæ, There are in the portico's pillars. But the Greek term παρεστάκασι ſeems to import ſomething more. Evagrius makes uſe of the ſame word in book 4. chap. 31. where he deſcribes the Church of Saint Sophia. The place there is thus worded: ἐν δεξιῷ δὲ καὶ ἀριστερᾷ τὸ ἐυώνυμον κίονες αὐλοῖς παρεστήκασι. Which paſſage I have rendred after this manner: In dextro autem ac ſiniſtro latere, ex adverſo fornicum poſitæ ſunt columnæ, On the right hand and on the left, oppoſite to the Arches are placed Pillars. Doubtleſs, this word παρεστάκασι does either ſignifie that which I have ſaid [to wit, to place over againſt, or, oppoſite,] or elſe juxta ponere, to place near. Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlatour, renders theſe words of Evagrius which we have placed at the beginning of this note, after this manner: Juxta porticus has ex ſaxo polito columnæ decentiſſime conſtructæ ſunt, near theſe portico's there are pillars of poliſh't ſtone moſt gracefully built. Valeſ.

[c] In the midſt, there is an open Court, wrought with a great deal of art: in which [Court] ſtands the Pillar forty cubits long, wherein that incarnate Angel upon earth led a celeſtiall life. In the Roof of the ſaid Portico's, there are [d] Clatri, (ſome term them windows;) [e] verging both towards the forementioned open Court, and alſo towards the Portico's. At the left ſide therefore of the Pillar, I my ſelf [f] together with the whole multitude there gathered together, (the Country-men being dauncing about the Pillar,) have ſeen in the window a Star of a vaſt magnitude, running all over the window and gliſtering, not once, nor twice, nor thrice, but often: which [Star] vaniſhed frequently, and appeared again on a ſudden.

[c] Chriſtophorſon underſtood this place much amiſs. For thus he has rendred it: verſus medium Templum, atrium eſt ſub dio, towards the middle of the Church, there is an open Court. Evagrius does not ſay ſo; but, that in the midſt of theſe Portico's there was a Court or Area. For Courts were uſually encompaſſed with four Portico's, as I have remarked at Euſebius's books concerning the life of Conſtantine. Chriſtophorſon was deceived by what Evagrius has ſaid a little before, to wit, that the Church was ſurrounded with Portico's of four ſides. Therefore he thought, that the Church was in the midſt between the four Portico's. Wherein he is much miſtaken. For the Atrium [or, Court] was in the midſt of thoſe four Portico's. And that was the firſt thing which thoſe who went in met with, after they had paſſed the Porch, or Entry. After the Atrium was the Church, contiguous to one of the Portico's. That this was the figure of this Church, the following words do ſufficiently declare. For Evagrius ſays, that women were forbidden to go into that Church: notwithſtanding, that they ſaw the miracle of that Star, from the gate which was in the Porch. The Atrium therefore occurred immediately after the Porch, nor was the Church in the midſt. Otherwiſe, the walls of the Church it ſelf would have hindred them from ſeeing the Star. Valeſ.

[d] Κλειθείδια. Langus and Chriſtophorſon have tranſlated it Cancelli, Lattiſes; which I can by no means approve of. For κλιθίδες ſignifie Cancelli. I would therefore rather render it Clatri. In the Old Gloſſes, Clatri are thus deſcribed: κανόνες, οἱ ἐν ταῖς θυείσιν ὀβελίσκοι, Squares, [that is, croſs-bars, or, lattiſed-bars,] or bars that are in windows. But in the other Gloſſes, Clatrare is expounded κλειδοῦν, claudere, to ſhut. The originall therefore of the Greek and Latine word is the ſame. Valeſ.

[e] I am of the ſame opinion with Chriſtophorſon and S[r] Henry Savil, who inſtead of ἀποκεινόμωσα, anſwering, mended it thus, ἀποκλινόμωσα, verging, or, declining. Notwithſtanding, Nicephorus defends the common reading, to wit, ἀποκεινόμωσα anſwering. Moreover, Nicephorus adds ſome words, which are not at this day extant in our Evagrius. The paſſage is thus worded in Nicephorus: ἅπερ πρὸς αὐλαῖς δὴ ταῖς ἑαυτῶν καὶ τὸ ῥηθὲν περιαύλιον ὑπαιθρον ἀποκείνεται, καὶ χώραν δίδωσι τοῖς ἠρεμοῦσιν ἐκτὸς ὁρᾶν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἔσω, καὶ ἔσω πάλιν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἔξω. Which place in Nicephorus Langus renders thus: ——Porticibus ipſis & ſubdiali quæ dicta eſt aulæ reſpondentes, locumque volentibus dantes, ut ex ipſo templo extra, & rurſum ab exteriori templi parte in templum proſpicere poſſint; which [clatri] are anſwerable both to the Portico's themſelves and alſo to the ſaid open-Court, and afford a place to thoſe that are deſirous of looking out, from within the Church, and again, of looking into the Church, from its outward part. Whence Nicephorus had this, I know not; unleſs it were from Symeon Metaphraſtes, who had written the Life of Symeones the Stylite. Nicephorus does indeed atteſt, that he himſelf had read Metaphraſtes's Life of Symeones. And 'tis not likely, that Nicephorus ſhould have added this of his own head. Now, for what reaſon theſe words were added, I have as to me it ſeemeth apprehended. To wit, Metaphraſtes (or, if you will, Nicephorus himſelf,) thought, that the women, who were in no wiſe ſuffered to go into that ſacred Edifice, beheld that Star, here mentioned, from theſe windows. But, he is much miſtaken, as we ſhall declare by and by. Valeſ.

[f] Muſculus renders this paſſage thus: Cum univerſo collecto illic agreſtium circa columnam ſaltantium populo, Together with the whole multitude [or, people] of the Country-men there gathered together dauncing round the Pillar. Whom Chriſtophorſon has followed; having expunged the Comma, which is placed after the word [together.] But this rendition is not to be born with. For the Country-men were not the only perſons then in the Church of Saint Symeon, when this Star was ſeen by Evagrius. But many Citizens were there alſo at that time, of which number Evagrius was one. Beſides, the people which Evagrius ſays were there gathered together at that time, were in the Portico at the left hand of the Pillar. But, the Ruſticks were in the Atrium, [or, Open Court,] dauncing about the Pillar. Valeſ.

But

But this happens only on those days, observed in memory of that most holy person [Symeon.] There are those who say, (nor are we to disbelieve the miracle, both because of their credibility who affirm it, and by reason of other things which we our selves have beheld :) that they have seen even [g] his very person flying up and down this way and that way, with his long beard, and his head covered with a * Tiara, as 'twas wont to be. The men who come to this place, have free liberty to enter in, and go round the Pillar many times together with their beasts that carry burdens. But a most exquisite care is taken, (for what reason I cannot say,) that no woman should go into the Church. Therefore, they stand without [the Church,] at the Porch, and behold the Miracle. For, [h] one of the [Church] Gates is placed exactly opposite to the glistering Star.

[g] Αὐτὸ δὴ τὸ πρόσωπειον. In Nicephorus the reading is πρόσωπον : which I think to be righteſt. In the Tellerian M.S. I found it written προσώπειον, the accent being changed. Valeſ.

* A round ornament, worn by Princes and Prieſts on their heads ; it was heretofore the dreſs of the Perſian women.

[h] Ἡ μία τῆ θυρῶν. Inſtead of the word [θυρῶν, Gates,] Nicephorus made it [θυείδων, Windows,] which was ill done, as I have remarked above, at note (e.) For, the women could not ſee through the window, in regard they [the women] were in the Porch, but the windows were placed in the very top of the Portico's, into which the women were forbid to come. Johannes Langus therefore, having followed our Evagrius, has upon a good account corrected Nicephorus. For, thus he renders it : Mulieres quoque, ſed extra templum ad poſtes ſtantes, miraculum hoc ſpectant. Janua enim una ex adverſo ſtellæ fulgentis locata eſt. Women alſo, but they ſtand without the Church at the gate, do behold this Miracle. For one of the gates is placed over againſt the ſhining Star. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning Saint Iſidorus Peluſiota, and Syneſius Biſhop of Cyrenæ.

* Οὗ κλέος εὐρύ.

During the ſame [Theodoſius's] Reign flouriſhed Iſidorus alſo, * whoſe glory (to uſe a poetick expreſſion,] is far ſpread, a perſon celebrated amongſt all men, both for his Actions and Eloquence. This man † macerated his Body with Labours in ſuch a manner, and fatned his ſoul with ſublime and divine doctrines to ſo high a degree, that he lived an Angelick life upon earth, and was always the living ‖ Monument both of a Monaſtick Life, [a] and alſo of a contemplation upon God.

[a] Nicephorus (book 14. chap. 53, where he tranſcribes this paſſage of Evagrius,) words it thus ; τῆς ἐς θεὸν θεωρίας, of a contemplation upon God. The ſame Reading I found in the Tellerian M. S. It may alſo be mended thus, τῆς ἐνθέου θεωρίας, of a divine contemplation. [In Robert Stephens's Edition, the reading here is, τῆς ἐς ἐνθεωρίας.] Further, there is an illuſtrious Elogy of this Iſidorus Peluſiota, extant in Ephremius Biſhop of Antioch, in his Epiſtle to Zenobius Scholaſticus, which Photius records in his Bibliotheca. Where he ſays, that he was by birth an Alexandrian, and venerable amongſt the Arch-Biſhops themſelves, Ἀλεξανδρεὺς δὲ ἦν τὸ γένος καὶ τοῖς ἀρχιερεῦσιν αἰδέσιμος. Valeſ.

He wrote many other [pieces,] filled [with paſſages] of manifold utility ; he wrote alſo to the celebrated Cyrillus, from which [Letters] 'tis evidently demonſtrated, that he flouriſhed in the ſame times with the divine [Cyrillus.] But becauſe 'tis my endeavour to adorn * this Hiſtory, as much as 'tis poſſible, come on, let Syneſius [Biſhop] of Cyrenæ come forth, that he may beautifie our Hiſtory † with the eminency of his own name. This Syneſius was accompliſhed with all other [Arts and Sciences ;] but * excelled in Philoſophy to ſo high a degree, that he was the Admiration of thoſe Chriſtians, who in paſſing their judgments upon what they ſee, are not [byaſſed] either by affection or hatred. They perſwade him therefore, [b] to be a partaker of the Salutary Regeneration, and to take the Sacerdotall yoak upon him, [c] although he had not as yet embraced the doctrine of the Reſurrection, * nor would be induced to believe that Article : they having moſt truly conjectured, that theſe [Sentiments] would follow this perſons other virtues, [in regard] the divine grace would permit [him] to have nothing imperfect. Nor was their expectation fruſtrated. For, what and how great a perſon he proved, is ſufficiently atteſted by the Epiſtles which he wrote with much Elegancy and Learning after [his undertaking] the Sacerdotall Function, by the [d] Oration he ſpoke to [the Emperour] Theodoſius himſelf, and by thoſe other uſefull Works of his that are extant.

* Or, exerciſed Philoſophy.

[b] Or, to count himſelf worthy of the Salutary Regeneration ; that is, Baptiſme. As far as may be collected from theſe and the following words, Evagrius ſeems to have thought, that Syneſius was baptized and promoted to the Epiſcopall dignity at one and the ſame time. And yet, that this is falſe, Petavius proves by many arguments, in his notes upon Syneſius, pag. 2, and 3. Notwithſtanding, Evagrius is followed by Photius in his Bibliotheca, and by Nicephorus book 14. chap. 55. Although Nicephorus ſays not that Syneſius had been baptized and ordained at one and the ſame time : but, that when Theophilus had prevailed with him to receive Chriſtian-baptiſme, afterwards he endeavoured to perſwade him to enter upon the Epiſcopall Function. See Nicephorus's words, at the book and chapter now cited. Valeſ.

* Or, nor would think ſo.

[c] Many perſons, I perceive, have perſwaded themſelves, that when Syneſius was elected Biſhop by the Inhabitants of Ptolemais, he wholly diſbelieved the Reſurrection of Bodies. Notwithſtanding, that this is not true, Syneſius himſelf atteſts in his 105th Epiſtle, which he wrote to his brother Euoptius, who was then at Alexandria. In that Letter, he gives reaſons why he could not undertake the Biſhoprick offered to him. ——— One of which is, The Reſurrection of Bodies. His Sentiment concerning which point, he declares in theſe words : πρὸς καθωμιλημένην ἀνάστασιν ἱερὸν τι καὶ ἀπόρρητον ἡγημαι, καὶ πολλοῦ δέω ταῖς τῶ πλήθους ὑπολήψεσιν ὁμολογήσαι, That much-ſpoken-of Reſurrection I account a Sacred and Myſticall thing, and am far from aſſenting to the opinions of the Vulgar. Syneſius therefore did not wholly deny the Reſurrection of the dead ; but expounded it agreeable to the Platonicks, and to Origen. Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 410,) thinks, that whatever is ſaid by Syneſius in this Epiſtle, is not ſpoken ſeriouſly, but feignedly and diſſemblingly, that he might decline the burthen of a Biſhoprick. But, Petavius has deſervedly found fault with this opinion of Baronius. For he ſays, that 'tis much more likely, that Syneſius wrote theſe things to his brother, in a manner agreeable to what he then thought. But, that having been afterwards inſtructed by Theophilus and other Prelates, before he was made a Biſhop, he embraced a true opinion concerning the Reſurrection. Lucas Holſtenius has at large examined this Queſtion, in a peculiar diſſertation, which in favour to the Studious, we have ſet forth at the cloſe of our Annotations. [The Learned Reader will meet with this diſſertation, de Syneſio & de fugâ Epiſcopatûs, at the cloſe of the third Vol. of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorians ſet forth by Valeſius, at pag. 202 of Valeſius's notes.] In the interim, the Reader is to be advertiſed that there is a miſtake in the Contents of this chapter, and in Photius's Bibliotheca, where Syneſius is termed Biſhop of Cyrene. Syneſius was indeed by Country a Cyrenæan. But he was Biſhop of Ptolemais, which is a City in Cyrenaica. Valeſ

[d] He means the Oration de Regno. Which, notwithſtanding was not ſpoken to Theodoſius Junior, but to Arcadius, in the year of Chriſt 400, that is, ten years before Syneſius had undertaken the Biſhoprick ; as Dionyſius Petavius has rightly obſerved in his notes at that Oration of Syneſius. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVI.

How the Divine Ignatius, having been removed from Rome, was depoſited at Antioch.

[a] Evagrius does frequently quote the Hiſtory of this Johannes the Rhetorician in his following books. For inſtance, in chap. 12, of his ſecond book, in chap. 10, and 28, of his third book, and in the 5th chapter of his fourth book. But he is a far different perſon from

AT the ſame time alſo, as 'tis recorded by [a] * Johannes the Rhetorician and others, the Divine Ignatius (after he had obtained, agreeable to his deſire, the bellies of wild-beaſts for his Tomb, in the Amphitheatre at Rome ; that Johannes, of whom Evagrius makes mention at the cloſe of the laſt chapter of his fifth book. For, this Johannes, laſt mentioned, had written an Hiſtory of affairs from the latter end of Juſtinianus's Reign, unto the Reign of Mauritius, as Evagrius does there atteſt: (See Evagrius book 5. chap. 24.) But the former Johannes had recorded the affairs tranſacted in the Reigns of Theodoſius Junior, Leo, and Zeno, as may be concluded from thoſe paſſages which Evagrius has taken out of that Johannes. And he had cloſed his Hiſtory at the deſtruction of Antioch, which hapned on the ninth year of Juſtinus Senior, as Evagrius relates. Further, that Johannes which I have mentioned in the ſecond place at the beginning of this note, was born at Epiphania. For Evagrius (in the forecited place, viz. book 5. chap. 24,) terms him his fellow-Citizen and Kinſman. Now, Evagrius was by originall extract an Epiphanienſian, as I have ſhown in My account of his Life and Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. But, the Johannes Rhetor, whom, Evagrius mentions in this chapter, (if I may have leave to conjecture,) ſeems to me to have been an Antiochian. For, whatever paſſages our Evagrius cites out of him, belong to the City of Antioch. I have been more large in my Annotation on theſe things, for this reaſon, that I might correct the miſtake of Johannes Voſſius, who in his Comment de Hiſtoricis Græcis, has confounded theſe two Johannes's, one with the other. Valeſ.

and after his ſtronger bones which were left [undevoured,] had been conveyed to Antioch, [and depoſited] in that place termed the [b] Cœmitery; many years after [all this, I ſay,]) is removed: the All-good God having inſtilled it into the mind of Theodoſius, to beſtow greater honours upon that [c] Theophorus, and to dedicate a Temple (which the Inhabitants termed The [d] Tychæum,) heretofore conſecrated to Dæmons, to that Valiant Conquerour and Martyr.

[b] The obſcurity and ill-punctation of this place, led Nicephorus in the firſt place, and after him Chriſtophorſon, into a miſtake. The obſcurity of this paſſage aroſe from hence, becauſe our Evagrius, according to his uſage, includes too many words in one and the ſame period, which were to have been divided into more periods. Therefore, after the word [Cœmitery] a diſtinction is to be placed, which neither Nicephorus nor Chriſtophorſon ſaw. Nicephorus thought, that the reliques of Ignatius were brought from Rome to Conſtantinople in the times of Theodoſius Junior, and having been carried to Antioch by the ſame Emperours order, had been depoſited there in the Cœmitery. Which is moſt notoriouſly falſe. For, long before Theodoſius Junior's Reign, the reliques of the Martyr Ignatius had been depoſited in the Cœmitery of the City Antioch, as Saint Jerome does expreſsly atteſt in his Book de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. where theſe are his words concerning Ignatius. Reliquiæ corporis ejus Antiochiæ jacent extra portam Daphniticam in Cœmiterio, The Remaines of his body lie at Antioch, without the Daphnitick-gate in the Cœmitery. Theodoſius Junior therefore tranſlated not the reliques of Ignatius from Rome to Conſtantinople, and after that to Antioch; but he ordered them to be removed out of the Cœmitery which was without the City Antioch, and carried into the City. Thus, 'tis certain, Muſculus underſtood this paſſage in Evagrius, as appears from his Verſion. For he has rendred it thus: Tunc & divinus Ignatius, poſteaquàm ſicuti voluerat, &c. Then alſo the divine Ignatius (after (according as he had deſired) he had obtained the bellies of wild-beaſts inſtead of a Sepulchre, in the Roman Amphitheatre, and his bones as being the ſtronger [parts of him] had been left by the beaſts, were carried to Antioch, and buried in the Cœmitery, a long time after) is removed by Theodoſius, &c. Muſculus ſeems to have expunged the Article ἄ, that the whole place might be conſtrued after this manner: ἐπειδὴ τύραν ἐθικὼς ἀπεκομίσθη, &c. Which I very much approve of. Valeſ.

[c] Τὸν Θεοφόρον. This ſeems to have been the Sur-name of the Bleſſed Ignatius. Which is concluded from hence, becauſe we read this Title prefixt before all his Epiſtles, Ἰγνατίῳ ὁ καὶ Θεοφόρῳ, Ignatius who alſo [is termed] Theophorus. In the Martyrdome of the Bleſſed Ignatius, which Arch-Biſhop Uſher has ſet forth, Ignatius ſtiles himſelf Theophorus in the preſence of the Emperour Trajan. And, being asked, who Theophorus was, he anſwers; He who bears Chriſt in his breaſt. Valeſ. See Socrat. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. book 6. chap. 8. note (a.)

[d] The Heathens attributed to all Cities their Genii, to whom they built Temples, which in Greek were termed τυχαῖα or τυχεῖα; as I have remarked at Euſebius Pamphilus's book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, chap. 11. note (q.) The Temple of the publick Genius of the City of Antioch is mentioned by Amm. Marcellinus book 23. pag. 238; which Julian in his Miſopog. terms τὸ τῆς τύχης ἱερόν. Valeſ.

That therefore which had heretofore been the Temple of the publick Genius, is made a pure Church, and holy Temple [dedicated] to Ignatius; his ſacred Reliques having with great pomp been conveyed into the City on a Chariot, and depoſited in that Temple. On which account, a ſolemn Feſtivall and a [day of] publick joy is celebrated [yearly] even till our times; which [Feſtivall] has been rendred more magnificent by Gregorius Biſhop [of that place.] Theſe things were done there, [becauſe] from that time God would honour the pious memories of [his] Saints. For, the impious and deſtructive Julian, that Tyrant hatefull to God, (in regard Apollo Daphnæus, * who made uſe of [c] Caſtalia for a voice and † an Oracle, could not give any anſwer to the Emperour conſulting his Oracle, becauſe the holy * Babylas, his near-neighbour, had quite ſtopped up his mouth:) againſt his will, and forc't thereto by ſtripes [as it were,] honoured the Saint with a removall: (at which time a ſpacious Church was erected to him before the City, which [ſtructure] continues ſtanding at this day:) to the intent that the Dæmons might in future freely perform their own [buſineſs] according as ('tis reported) they had before-hand promiſed Julian. This affair therefore was by the diſpenſation of God our Saviour ordered in this manner, to the end that the power of thoſe who had ſuffered Martyrdome might be made manifeſt, and that the ſacred reliques of the holy Martyr, removed into an undefiled place, might be honoured with a moſt beautifull Church.

* Or, who had Caſtalia, &c.

[c] He means the Caſtalian Fountaine. Concerning which Amm. Marcellinus, Gregorius Nazianzenus, and others have related many things. Gregorius's words in his ſecond Inveſtive againſt Julian (Tom. 1. pag. 127. Edit. paris. 1609.) are theſe: πάλιν ἡ κασταλία σεσίγηκεν ἡ μαντὶς ὕδωρ ἐστὶν ἡ μαντὶς καὶ οὐκ ἀναθυμιᾶται, ἀλλὰ γελᾷ μόνον· πάλιν ἀνθεῖ ἡ δάφνη φυτὸν, &c. Caſtalia has been ſilenced again, and is ſilent, and is water, not uttering oracles, but exciting laughter. Apollo [is become] a dumb Statue again. Daphne [is] a tree again, &c. At which words of Gregorius, ſee (if you pleaſe) what the Scholiaſt Nonnus has remarked, chap. 21. I ſhould not have taken notice of this, had I not perceived that neither of the Tranſlatours had ſeen it. Valeſ. Nonnus's Scholion (which Valeſius here referres his Reader to,) is this: Caſtalia fons erat in Antiochia, &c. Caſtalia was a fountaine in Antioch, at which Apollo is by the antients reported to ſit, and to give forth oracles at the water. And when any perſons came thither on account of conſulting the Oracle, that water (as 'tis reported) ſent forth gentle blaſts and puffs of wind; and then the Prieſts, who were about the fountain, declared thoſe things which the will of the Dæmon had brought forth.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning Attila King of the * Scythæ; and how he deſtroyed the Provinces of the East and West. And concerning the ſtrange † Earthquake and other dreadfull prodigies which hapned in the world.

* Τῶν σκυθῶν. Valeſius renders it The Hunni.

† Or, wonder.

IN theſe very times, that much-talk't-of War was raiſed, by Attila King of the Scythæ. Which war Priſcus the Rhetorician has written with much accuracy and eloquence, relating [to us] in a ſingular neatneſs and elegancy of ſtile, how * he undertook an Expedition againſt the Eaſtern and Weſtern parts [of the Empire,] how many and how great Cities he took and reduced to a ſubjection to himſelf, and [laſtly] after the performance of what [great Actions] he departed out of this life. Whileſt the ſame Theodoſius ſwayed the [Imperial] Scepter, a moſt terrible and horrid [a] Earthquake, which exceeded all others that had been before, hapned almoſt throughout the whole world. In ſo much that many Towers belonging to the Imperial City [Conſtantinople] fell down flat, and that called the Long-wall of Cherroneſus fell likewiſe; the earth alſo was rent in ſunder, and many Villages ſank down into it: Moreover, many and almoſt innumerable calamitous Accidents

* Attila.

[a] This Earthquake hapned on the year of Chriſt 447, in the Conſulate of Ardabures and Callepius; as Marcellinus in his Chronicon, and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle doe relate. Marcellinus's words are these: Ingenti terræ motu per loca varia imminente, plurimi urbis Augustæ muri recenti adhuc reædificatione constructi, cum quinquaginta septem turribus corruerunt: An exceeding great Earthquake being imminent through severall places, a vast part of the walls [or, most of the walls] of the Imperial City which had been but very lately rebuilt, fell down, together with fifty seven Towers. Which words I have annexed for this reason, that I might shew that Evagrius's words here have been misunderstood by Translatours; who rendred these words [ἀνὰ τὰ βασιλίδα] thus [in Palatio, in the Palace;] when as they ought to have rendred them, in the Imperial City. By which name Evagrius usually calls Constantinople. Vales.

dents hapned both at Land and Sea. For, some Fountains were wholly dryed up; and in other places abundance of water gushed forth, where there had been none before. Trees, of themselves vastly rooted, were thrown up into the air [b] together with their roots. And many heaps of earth were on a sudden made up into mountains. The Sea threw forth dead fishes [upon its shore,] and many Islands therein were swallowed up. Ships making their Voyages at Sea, were seen upon dry ground, the waters having receded [and left them.] Many places in Bithynia, in the Hellespont, and in both The Phrygias, were sorely damnified. This calamity raged over the whole earth for some time; notwithstanding, it continued not with that vehemency wherewith it began: but abated by small degrees, till such time as it wholly ceased.

[b] Σὺν τοῖς σφισι ῥίζαις. The Rules of Grammar do require, that we should write σὺν ταῖς σφῶν ῥίζαις, together with their roots. In the Tellerian M. S. the reading is σὺν ταῖς. A little before, where the reading is διαχύναι τὴν γῆν, the earth was dissipated: the same Manuscript has it written thus: διασχίναι τὴν γῆν, the earth was separated, or, rent in sunder. Vales.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning the [publick] Buildings in Antioch, and who they were that erected them.

IN these very times [of Theodosius's Reign,] Memnonius, Zoilus, and Callistus, [a] Personages eminent for [their profession of] our Religion, were sent by Theodosius to be [b] Governours of Antioch. Memnonius with much of beauty and accuracy raises from the very ground that [Edifice] which by us also is termed the Psephium, leaving an open Atrium [or, Court] in the middle.

[a] Instead of [τῶν ἡμετέραν θρησκείαν διαπρέποντες;] it must, I think, be [τὴν ἡμετέραν θρησκείαν διαπρέποντες, Personages eminent for, &c. For, this reading is required by the Rules of Grammar. Vales.

[b] That is, to be Consulares of Syria. For, the Consularis of Syria governed the City Antioch, and the other Cities of Syria-Cœle. Further, take heed of supposing, that these three men (to wit, Memnonius, Zoilus, and Callistus) were sent at one and the same time by Theodosius, to preside over the Antiochian Jurisdiction. For this was not the usage of the Romans. We ought therefore to understand, that each of them had been sent at severall times, one after the other, by Theodosius. You must know further, that 'twas usuall for the Consulares of Syria, that they might ingratiate themselves with the Antiochians, to erect some publick structure. Libanius informs us hereof (in his Antiochic. pag. 370, Tom. 2. Edit. Paris, 1627.) in these words: ὃ δὴ θαυμαστὸν, εἰ τοῖς μὲν ἄλλοις κεφάλαια ἦν ἄλλων, &c. 'Tis no wonder therefore, if that [City] which excells the rest in other things, which, after she has vanquished other [Cities] in the study and exercise of wisdome, has [out done] even herself, should render those who come to be her Governours, her Lovers. The beginning, middle, and close of each of which persons Government, is this, to make some addition to the City. The same Libanius, a little before in the same page, says there were three Tribunals in the City Antioch, and as many Scholes of Advocates, to wit, equall to the number of the Tribunals, [or Judicatories.] The first Tribunal seems to have belonged to the Præfectus Prætorio of the East, whose residence was at Antioch. The second was the Tribunal of the Comes of the East. The third was the Jurisdiction of the Consularis of Syria-Cœle. Libanius's words are these: ἀνὰ γὰ τῆς ἐν τοῖς πολίδομῴοις παιδείας, τρεῖς χορὶ ἦντόφων, ἰσάριθμοι τοῖς δικαστηρίοις ἀγείρον): which passage is to be rendred thus: For, besides the Erudition which is in the Decurions, three Scholes [or, Quires] of Advocates are [there] assembled, equall in number to the Judicatories. Vales.

Zoilus [built] the Royall Porticus, which [is placed] [c] at the South-side of Rufinus [his Porticus;] and retaines his name even to our age, although the buildings have [frequently] been altered on account of various calamitous accidents. Moreover, Callistus has raised a most magnificent and splendid structure (which as well the Ancients as those of our Age, have termed Callistus's Porticus,) before * that Pallace which is made the Court of Judicature, directly opposite to the Forum, in which there is a most beautifull house, the [d] Prætorium of the Masters of the Milice. After these persons, Anatolius being sent Master of the Milice into the East, built that termed Anatolius's Porticus, and beautified it with matter of all sorts. These [Remarks] (though they are forreign to our design in hand, yet) [will not seem] unhandsome and contemptible to lovers of Learning.

* Or, those buildings which are made, &c.

[c] The reading in Robert Stephens's Edition, and here is this [ᾗ πρὸς τὸ νότον τῆς ῥοφίνου πλευρᾶς, at the Southern part of Rophinus's side.] The Geneva-Printers, from Christophorson's Copy, have set it forth thus: τῆς πρὸς τὸ παλατῖνὸ ῥοφίνου πλευρᾶς, [at the Southern] side of Ruphinus's Pallace. Sr Henry Savil also, in his Copy which I have by me, has expunged the word Rufinus, and in stead thereof has substituted these [τὸ παλατῖνὸ ὄροφον, the Roof of the Pallace.] And thus Christophorson read, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For he has rendred it thus: Qui ad Australe latus tecti palatii, quod Rufini nomen obtinet, spectat; which looks towards the southern side of the Roof of the Pallace which bears the name of Rufinus. But, in regard these words [τὸ παλατῖνὸ] or [τὸ παλατῖνὸ ὄροφον] occur not, either in the Kings, or in the Florentine, or Tellerian M.SS. in my judgment, they ought deservedly to be expunged. Vales. Valesius has rendred this passage thus: quæ ad meridianum latus porticus Rufini sita; which we have expresst in our English Version. The import of the Greek, if rendred word for word, is this, at the Southern part of Rophinus's side.

[d] Τῶν σπαθησίων τὰ καπετώλια. Musculus renders it, Mansionem ducum; the Mansion of the Dukes, or, chief Military Commanders. Christophorson's Version is not much different; for he renders it thus: è regione fori in quo pulcherrima domus est quam præfecti præsidiorum incolere solent; Over against the Forum wherein there is a most beautifull house, in which the Præfects of the Milice [or, of the Military Forces,] do usually dwell. But, by σπαθησίους in this place, in my judgment, must be understood, (not the Military Commanders in chief, or, Masters of the Milice, but) the Magistrates or Duumviri, who in Greek were termed σπαθηγοὶ, as I have already remarked in my notes on Am. Marcellinus, and Eusebius; [See Eusch. Eccles. Hist. book 7. chap. 11. note (p.) and book 8. chap. 11. note (c)] Now, why I suppose this word is rather thus to be taken here, this is the reason, because that house is said to have been in the Forum, over against the Pallace wherein was the Court of Judicature. Moreover, such a house as this seems to be more agreeable to a Municipall Magistrate, than to a Resident of the Milice. Besides, these houses were in Greek termed σπαθήγια. Such a one was the Strategium at Constantinople, as I have noted at the first book of Socrates, [chap. 16. note (d.)] Although the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, in The transactions of the Emperour Severus, brings another reason of this word. But now, having examined the business more attentively; by σπαθησίους I understand here the Masters of the Milice throughout the East, who had a splendid Prætorium in the Forum of the City Antioch. Theophanes mentions this Prætorium, in his Chronicon, pag. 147. ἀνήφθη γὰ τὸ πῦρ ἀπὸ τῆς μαρτυρίας τῆ ἁγίᾳ στεφάνῳ, καὶ ἕως τὸ πραιτωρίου τὸ σπαθησίατε ἔφθασεν; For the fire was kindled from the Church of Saint Stephen, and burnt [or, went] as far as the Prætorium of the Master of the Milice. Vales.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning the severall Wars, which hapned both in Italy, and Persia, during the Reign of Theodosius.

* DUring the times of the same Theodosius, frequent Rebellions hapned in Europe, whilest Valentinianus was Emperour of Rome. Which Theodosius repressed, by sending great Forces both by Land and Sea, [which made up] [a] as well a Foot Army, as a Navall strength. Moreover, he vanquished the Persians (* who were grown insolent, Isdigerdes, Father to Vararanes, being then their King, or, as † Socrates's Sentiment is, during the Reign of Vararanes himſelf:) in ſuch a manner, that on their requeſt to him by their Embaſſadours, he gratified them with a Peace, which [b] laſted untill the twelfth year of Anaſtaſius's Reign. Theſe tranſactions have been related by other Writers; and are alſo very handſomely reduced into an Epitome, by Euſtathius the Syrian of Epiphania, who has likewiſe written The Siege of Amida. At the ſame time, as 'tis ſaid, the Poets [c] Claudianus and [d] Cyrus flouriſhed. Further, this Cyrus arrived at the higheſt Chair of the Præfects, which [grand Officer] our Anceſtours termed The Præfectus Prætorio [or Præfect of the Court.] He was alſo Maſter of the Weſtern Milice, at which time Carthage was taken by the Vandalls, thoſe Barbarians being [then] governed by Genſerichus.

[b] Here it muſt be ἐλήκεσε; not ἐλήκησε, as it is in Robert Stephens's Edit. Valeſ.

[c] This is the Claudian, whoſe excellent Verſes are at this day extant. But, a twofold difficulty occurs at this place: (1) How a Latine Poet ſhould come to be mentioned here by Evagrius? (2) Why he is placed by the ſame Evagrius on the times of Theodoſius Junior, when as That Claudian, whoſe verſes we now have, flouriſhed in the Reigns of Arcadius and Honorius, as His writings inform us? The anſwer to the firſt Queſtion is eaſie. For Claudian wrote not only Latine, but Greek Poems alſo. On which account, in the Old Epigram which was inſcribed on the Baſis of his Statue, he is ſaid to have had the ſoul of Virgil and Homer alſo, transfuſed into him. He began to write a Latine Poem firſt in the year of Chriſt 395, whereon Olybrius and Probinus were Conſuls. He wrote an Elegant Poem on their Conſulate, which is ſtill extant. When this attempt had ſucceeded happily to Claudian, it encouraged him to the writing of Latine verſes afterwards; whereas he had publiſhed only Greek Poems before, as himſelf atteſts in his Elegy to Probinus, in theſe words:

Romanos bibimus primùm Te Conſule fontes,
Et Latiæ ceſſit Graja Thalia togæ.

Incipienſque tuis a facibus omina cepi,
Fataque debebo poſteriora Tibi.

'Tis certain, Claudian was by Nation a Grecian, born at the City Alexandria, as Suidas informs us at the word κλαυδιανὸς. Claudian himſelf alſo atteſts the ſame, in his Poem to Hadrianus Præfectus Prætorio, (who was himſelf alſo an Alexandrian.) For he writes thus concerning Alexander the Macedonian;

Conditor hic patriæ. Sic hoſtibus ille pepercit.

And in the cloſe of the ſame Poem, he has theſe words:

Sæviet in miſeros cognata potentia cives.
Audiat hæc commune ſolum, longéque carinis
Nota Pharos, &c. Valeſ.

[d] The Poet Cyrus was by Nation an Ægyptian, born at the Town Panopolis. Who having on account of his poetick faculty been highly acceptable to Eudocia Auguſta, wife to Theodoſius Junior, (for this woman was φιλοεπὴς, a Great lover of verſes:) is promoted by the Emperour Theodoſius to the Præfecture of the Prætorium, and to That of the City. He was alſo Ex-Conſul, and Patricius, as Suidas relates. But afterwards, when the Empreſs Eudocia, on account of ſome unknown reaſons, had left the Pallace, and was gone to the City Jeruſalem; Cyrus, deprived of his power, is made Biſhop of Cotyæum a City of Phrygia, or rather of Smyrna, as the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle and Theophanes doe inform us. He lived till the times of Leo Auguſtus, as Suidas atteſts. Theophilact (in the 8th book of his Hiſtory, chap. 8,) makes mention of this Cyrus the Conſul and Poet; where he ſays, that the Church of the God-bearing Virgin at Conſtantinople, was built by him, in the times of Theodoſius Auguſtus. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning the Empreſs Eudocia, and her daughter Eudoxia; and how [Eudocia] came to Antioch, and [went] to Jeruſalem.

[M]Oreover, [] this Theodoſius married Eudocia, (after ſhe had received ſalutary Baptiſm; by originall extract an Athenian, [a woman] eloquent and beautifull;) by the mediation of Pulcheria Auguſta his ſiſter. By her Theodoſius had a daughter, [by name] Eudoxia, whom, when ſhe afterwards came to be marriageable, the Emperour Valentinianus married, having [on that account] gone from the Elder Rome and arrived at Conſtantinople. [a] But, [] a long time after this, [Eudocia] in her journey which ſhe made to the Holy City of Chriſt our God, [b] comes hither:

[a] A particle is to be added here, after this manner: ἡ δὲ χρόνοις ὕστερον, But, a long time after this, ſhe; that is, Eudocia. For, unleſs you add this particle; what follows will be meant concerning Eudoxia, Eudocia's daughter; of whom Evagrius has ſpoken juſt before. But, the adding of this particle [δὲ, But] ſhews that the diſcourſe is not now concerning Eudoxia, but her Mother Eudocia. Valeſ.

[b] Ἐνταῦθα γίνεται. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon underſtood this place very erroneouſly. For, they ſuppoſed that by the word ἐνταῦθα the City Jeruſalem was meant; when as the City Antioch is to be underſtood. For Evagrius wrote his Hiſtory at Antioch, in which City he had fixt the Manſion of his own fortunes, as we have ſhown in our account of his Life and Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. Moreover, Nicephorus fell into the ſame miſtake with Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon. For in his 14th book, chap. 50, where he writes out this paſſage of Evagrius, he underſtands the word [ἐνταῦθα] of the City Jeruſalem. But, 'twas eaſie to have perceived from Evagrius's following words, that theſe words could not have been meant of the City Jeruſalem. For Jeruſalem was not a Colony of Greeks, but rather of Jews, and after that, of Romans. Nor, did Ulpianus, Libanius, and the other writers here mentioned by Evagrius, write concerning the City Jeruſalem. Nor, laſtly, could the Empreſs Eudocia, who by originall extract was an Athenian, ſpeak to the Citizens of Jeruſalem in this verſe, Ὑμετέρης γλωσσῆς καὶ αἵματ' ἔυχομαι εἶ.

I boaſt that I am of Your Stock and Blood.

'Tis certain, the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle does ſay, that Eudocia made an Oration to the Antiochians out of a Golden Chariot. Valeſ.

And having made an Oration in publick to the people here, ſhe cloſed her Speech with this Verſe:

I boaſt that I am of Your Stock and Bloud.

(Intimating thereby the Colonies which had been ſent hither out of Greece. If any one be deſirous of having an exact account of theſe [Colonies,] [c] Strabo the Geographer, Phlegon, Diodorus Siculus, Arrianus, and [d] Piſander the Poet, have written concerning them with great accuracy:

[c] That place in Strabo, which Evagrius points to here, is extant in his 16th book; pag. 750. Edit. Paris. Valeſ.

[d] There were two Piſanders, Poets. The one a Rhodian, who wrote the Poem Heraclea in two books, which treats concerning Hercules's Actions. Some make this Piſander ancienter than Heſiod. Others place him on the thirty third Olympiad, as Suidas relates. The other Piſander was a Lycaonian, born at Larindi a Town of Lycaonia, ſon of the Poet Neſtor. Suidas ſays he flouriſh't in the Reign of Alexander ſon of Mammea. He wrote ſix books in Heroick Verſe, ἡρωϊκῶν θεογαμιῶν, concerning the marriages of the Heroes and Goddeſſes, which were ſtuft with all manner of Hiſtory, as Suidas atteſts. Zoſimus mentions this work in his fifth book: where he ſpeaks concerning the building of the City Hemona: ὡς ὁ ποιητὴς ἱστορεῖ πεισανδρίθη, ὁ τῇ περὶ ἡρωϊκῶν θεογαμιῶν ὑπογραφῇ πᾶσαν, ὡς εἰπεῖν, ἱστορίαν περιλαβών: which words of Zoſimus, Leunclavius tranſlates in this manner; Sicuti Piſander Poeta memoriæ prodidit, qui heroicarum divinarumque nuptiarum titulo totam hanc propemodùm hiſtoriam complexus eſt, As Piſander the Poet has recorded, who under the Title of Heroick and Divine marriages, has in a manner compriſed this whole Hiſtory. This is not the meaning of Zoſimus's words. For Zoſimus ſays, that Piſander the Poet, in this Poem of his concerning the marriages of the Heroes and Goddeſſes, has in a manner comprehended all Hiſtory. Suidas does likewiſe atteſt the ſame; whoſe words concerning Piſander are theſe: ἔγραψεν ἱστορίαν ποικίλην δι' ἐπῶν. ἣν ἐπιγράφει ἡρωϊκῶν θεογαμιῶν ἐν βιβλίοις ἓξ, he wrote a various Hiſtory in verſe; which he intitled, concerning the marriages of the Heroes and Goddeſſes, in ſix books. In this work therefore, Piſander had written concerning Triptolemus the Argive, and concerning Io, who were the firſt that built Antioch a City of Syria. Further, this work ſeems to have been comprehended in ſixteen books, and not in ſix, as 'tis erroneouſly extant in Suidas. For Stephanus in his book de Urbibus, cites the tenth, and fourteenth book of Piſander. Valeſ.

racy: as have also [c] Ulpianus, [f] Libanius, and [g] Julianus, [all] most incomparable Sophistæ.) On which account, the Antiochians at that time honoured her with a Statue artificially made of Brass, which Statue continues standing at this day. By her perswasion, Theodosius made a very great addition to [this] City, extending its wall as far as that Gate which leads to the Suburbs of Daphne; as may be seen by those who are desirous of it. For even in this our age [the foundation of] the old wall is visible, its remains leading them by the hand as 'twere, who have a mind to view it. Notwithstanding, there are those who affirm, that the Elder Theodosius enlarged the wall; and bestowed two hundred pound weight of Gold upon [h] Valens's Bath, part whereof had been consumed by fire.

[c] This is Ulpianus the Antiochian Sophist, who taught Rhetorick first at Emesa, and afterwards at Antioch, in the Reign of Constantine, as Suidas attests. Eunapius mentions him, in the Life of Proæresius the Sophist.

This person therefore, amongst the other Orations which (as Suidas relates,) he wrote, had composed a peculiar Oration in praise of his own Country, wherein he spake concerning the Colonies at severall times brought into it. Valesius.

[f] Libanius the Antiochian Sophist wrote an Oration, with this Title, Antiochicus, which is still extant, published in the Second Tome of his Works. Nor is it to be doubted, but Evagrius means this Oration at this place. Further, in the said Oration, Libanius with great accuracy recounts all the Greek Colonies, which at severall times had been brought to Antioch. Amongst these he reckons also those Athenians, whom Seleucus, after the destruction of the City Antigonia, had brought to Antioch. Valesius.

[g] Who this Julianus the Sophista should be, I have not yet found. There was one Julianus a Cappadocian, the most eminent of all the Sophists of his own time, who taught Rhetorick at Athens. Concerning whom Eunapius relates many passages, in his book de Vitis Sophistarum. Suidas says he flourisht in the times of Constantine the Great. But whereas he says, that he was Contemporary with Callinicus the Sophist, therein he contradicts himself; in regard Callinicus the Sophist lived in the Reign of Philippus and Gallienus. I am apt to think therefore, that there were two Julianus's Sophists at Athens. The former of whom lived in the same times with Callinicus the Sophist. But the other flourisht in the Reign of Constantine the Great.

[h] Amm. Marcellinus mentions this Bath in his 31 book, near the beginning: his words are these; Vocesque Præconum audiebantur assiduè, mandantium congeri ligna ad Valentini Lavacri succensionem, studio ipsius principis conditi. And the voices of the Cryers were heard continually, ordering wood to be heaped together in order to the burning of Valens's Bath, built by the endeavour of that Prince. Valesius.

CHAP. XXI.

That Eudocia did [many] good actions about Jerusalem; and concerning the different Life and Conversation of the Monks in Palestine.

FRom this City therefore, Eudocia [a] went twice to Jerusalem. On what account [she did this,] || or what her primary design (as they say) was, must be left to Historians; who notwithstanding, in my judgement, seem not to declare the truth.

[a] The reading in Robert Stephens is [διαφοιτεῖται, went.] Nicephorus read [δὶς ἀφικνεῖται, went twice.]

|| Ἢ τί ποτε τοῦτο πως ὡς φασι βεβουλημένη.

For (book 14. chap. 50.) he words it thus: καὶ δὶς δὲ λόγος ἔχει ταύτῃ ἐπὶ τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων ἀφικέσθαι, And 'tis reported that she went twice to Jerusalem. Which reading Christophorson has followed, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For he renders this place thus: Eudocia vero Constantinopoli Hierosolymam bis profecta est, But Eudocia went twice from Constantinople to Jerusalem. And thus I found it expressly written in the Tellerian Manuscript. Eudocia's former journey to Jerusalem hapned on the sixteenth Consulate of Theodosius which he bore with Faustus, on the year of Christ 438, as Baronius has rightly observed from Socrates and Marcellinus's Chronicon. On the year following, she returned from Jerusalem to Constantinople, carrying along with her the Reliques of Saint Stephen, as Marcellinus relates in his Chronicon. But, Writers are not agreed, on what year her second Jerusalem-journey hapned. Baronius places it in the Reign of Marcianus Augustus. But I do maintain, that this second journey was undertaken by Eudocia Augusta long before Marcianus's Empire, whilest Theodosius survived. For Marcellinus in his Chronicon (at the XVIII. Consulate of Theodosius Augustus which he bore with Albinus, which was the year of Christ 444.) writes thus: Severum Presbyterum & Johannem diaconum Eudociæ Reginæ, &c. Saturninus the Comes of the Domesticks, being sent by the Emperour Theodosius kills Severus the Presbyter and Johannes the Deacon of Eudocia Augusta, who were ministring at the City Ælia. Eudocia, by what grudge [or, grief] incited thereto I know not, killed Saturninus forthwith and being immediately deprived of her Royall servants, by the command of the Emperour her Husband, she staid to die at the City Ælia. The same is confirmed by the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle. For he relates, that in the same Consulate Paulinus the Master of the Offices was slain by the Emperour Theodosius's order: and therefore, that Eudocia being aggrieved (for she knew that Paulinus had been slain on her account;) requested of the Emperour Theodosius, that a liberty might be allowed her of going to Jerusalem. Notwithstanding Marcellinus in his Chronicon places Paulinus's slaughter on the year of Christ 440, Valentinianus being then the fifth time Consul with Anatolius. Therefore, if Eudocia went the second time to Jerusalem on account of Paulinus's slaughter; according to Marcellinus's opinion, that hapned on the year of Christ 440. Further, concerning Saturninus the Comes (whom Eudocia Augusta ordered to be slain at Jerusalem,) there is a passage extant in the History of Priscus Rhetor, pag 54; which I will annex here: Καὶ περὶ τοῦτο ἐπένδυσε βασιλεὺς, καὶ σατορνίλε τῶ ἐκκισία καὶ ἀγιᾷ κοσμικῆς, συγγατέρα εἰρήνῃ σώσειν. Τὸν δὲ σατορνίλον ἀνεῖλεν ἀδυναῖς ἢ καὶ εὐδοκία. ἀμφοτέρες γὰρ ἐκωλεῖτο τοῖς ὀνόμασιν.

But, after her arrivall at Christ's holy City, she performed many things in honour of God [our] Saviour. For she built * religious Monasteries, and those they term the [b] Lauræ.

* Or, pure.

[b] A Laura differs from a Monastery, because a Laura consists of many Cells far disjoyned one from another. But a Monastery is inclosed within one wall. And in a Laura the Hermites [or, Anachorites] lived: but in a Monastery the Monks lived together. Cyrillus Scythopolitanus informs us hereof, in his Life of Euthymius, in these words; Te autem oportet venire ad meam Lauram, &c. But it behoves you to come to my Laura, and to pull down the Cells of the Brethren to the very foundations. But [you must] build a Monastery there, where you have built my Cœmitery. For it pleases God, that the place should not be a Laura, but a Monastery rather. The same Cyrillus, in the Life of Saint Saba, does frequently declare the same difference between a Laura and a Monastery. Our Evagrius also at this place observes the same difference between the Phrontisteria [Monasteries] and the Lauræ. For in the Phrontisteria (says he,) the Monks lived in flocks, [or, companies,] made use of a common table, and performed the diurnall and nocturnall prayers together. But, in the Lauræ, the Anachorites lived separately, shut up in small Cells. Valesius.

In which, the way of living is different: but [their] conversation * is directed to one and the same scope of piety. For some live in companies, and are desirous of none of those things which depress [the soul of man] to the earth. For they have no Gold. But why do I mention Gold, when as not one of them has either a † garment of his own, or any thing of food [properly belonging to himself?] For, that * garment or short coat, wherewith one is cloathed now, is by and by put on by another: so that, one's garment seems to belong to all of them, and all of them to have a right in and the use of one's garment. A common table is spread for them, not covered with dainty provisions, nor with any other meats; but furnished only with herbs and pulse, of which they are supplied with such a quantity only, as is sufficient to keep them alive. They pour forth their common prayers to God all day and all night long, afflicting and † wearying themselves with labours in such a manner, that they seem to look like some dead persons without graves [c] above the earth. They frequently perform those termed the [d] Fasts of Superposition, continuing their fasts during the space of two, and three whole days. There are some of them who fast five days, and more, and [after that] with much adoe take necessary food.

* Or, terminates in one and the same pious design.

† Ἰσχνὴ ἐσθής.

* short cloak.

† Or, pressing.

[c] I am of the same mind with Christophorson, who (instead of [ὑπὸ γὴν, under the earth]) read [ὑπὲρ γὴν, above the earth;] which latter reading Nicephorus (book 14. chap. 50.) has followed. Besides, the word [δοκεῖ, seem] was wanting here; which we have put in from the Florentine M. S. In the Tellerian M. S. I found it written, ὑπὲρ γὴν, above the earth. Valesius.

[d] Τὰς καλουμένας νηστείας. Musculus and Christophorson have rendred this place very ill. Nicephorus has explained it well, in this manner:

manner: ὅτι δὲ πολλάκις καὶ δύο καὶ τρεῖς ὑπερθέμενοι τὴν ἡμέραν. εἰσὶ δὲ οἳ καὶ πεμπταῖοι καὶ πρὸς, διαλελύσθαι ἀΐουσι: that is, theſe perſons frequently extend their faſts to the length of two and three days. There are thoſe [of them] who for five days and more, continue without taſting of meat. Dionyſius Petavius alſo, in the fifth chapter of his Miſcellaneous Exercitations againſt Salmaſius, has rightly expounded this place of our Evagrius; to wit, concerning Superpoſition, which was the moſt exquiſite ſort of faſt amongſt the Chriſtians. But, whereas Petavius conjectures, that inſtead of ὑπερθέσεις, it ſhould be written here ὑπερθέσεις; in this I cannot aſſent to him, in regard this emendation recedes too far from the footſteps of the vulgar reading. Indeed, at this place I would rather make it ὑπερθεσίμους. But, you muſt underſtand [ἡμέρας, days,] or [νηστείας, faſts.] The Latines have termed it Superpoſitionem, Superpoſition; inſtead of Jejunium, faſt: as may be ſeen in the Eliberitane Council, and in the Pœnitentiall Canons. See what we have remarked at the fifth book of Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. chap. 24. note (m.) In the incomparable Tellerian M.S. I found it written ὑπερθεσίμους, as I had conjectured. Valeſ.

Again, others enter upon a contrary Courſe of life, ſhutting themſelves up alone in very ſmall houſes which have ſuch a breadth, and ſuch an heighth, as that they cannot ſtand upright in them, nor yet with conveniency lie down; [thus] they † Heb. 11. 38. continue with patience † in Dens and Caves of the earth, according to the Apoſtle's expreſſion. Otherſome live together with the Beaſts, and make their prayers to God in ſome Coverts of the Earth which are paſt finding out. Moreover, another way of living has been found out * Or, all manner of &c. by them, which tranſcends * all the degrees of fortitude and ſufferance. For, penetrating into a Deſert ſcorched [with the Sun,] as well men as women, and covering thoſe parts only which modeſty forbids to be named, they expoſe the reſt of their bodies naked to the ſharpeſt and moſt intenſe colds and heats of the air, equally deſpiſing heats and colds. They wholly reject that food which men uſually eat; and feed upon the ground (on which account they are termed [c] Boſci,) whence they take no more than ſufficeth to keep them alive. So that, in time they become like unto beaſts, and the ſhape of their [bodies] is depraved and altered, and the Sentiments of their mindes in future becomes diſagreeable to thoſe of other men: whom when they ſee, they run from; and being purſued, they either [make their eſcape] by the ſwiftneſs of their feet, or [f] get into ſome impaſſable places in the ground to hide themſelves. Moreover, I will relate another thing, which I had almoſt forgot, although it is the principall thing of all. There are ſome perſons amongſt them, though but very few, [g] who, after they are arrived at a freedome from perturbations of mind by [a continued exerciſe of] virtue, return to the world, and ſhewing themſelves to be mad in the midſt of crowds of men, they thus trample upon vain glory, which Coat (according to wiſe Plato,) the ſoul does uſually put off laſt.

[c] Βοσκὲς; that is, Pabulatores, Feeders upon the ground. Sozomen (book 6. chap. 33.) relates, that ſome Monks in Meſopotamia were called by this name, becauſe they were the firſt who found out this ſtricter ſort of abſtinence. Valeſ.

[f] Inſtead of [πειζονλες] the reading in the Florent. M. S. is truer; which is this, πειζονται get into. Beſides, inſtead of ἑαυτοὺς, it muſt be made ἑαυτοῖς. Valeſ.

[g] I have reſtored this place partly from the Florent. and partly from the Tellerian M.SS. after this manner: οἳ ἐπὰν διὰ τῆς ἀρετῆς τὸ ἀπαθεὶς ἔϊ) τύχωσιν, who, after they are arrived at a freedome from Perturbations of mind by [a continued exerciſe of] Virtue. In the Florent. M. S. the reading is [ἐυπαθεὶς, obnoxious to injuries:] but in the Tellerian M. S. and in Nicephorus 'tis [ἀπαθεὶς, free from perturbations of mind.] A little after this, inſtead of [πεφορῆς, turning themſelves about,] it muſt undoubtedly be mended thus [θεοφόρες, mad;] which is the reading in Nicephorus. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens's Edition, this whole paſſage is thus worded and pointed: ὅι ἐπὰν δὲ τῆς ἀρετῆς τὸ ἐυπαθεὶς ἔϊ) τύχωσιν, ἐς κόσμον ἐπανιασι ἐν μέσοις τοῖς ὄχλοις. Καὶ πεφορῆς, &c. Which I cannot make ſenſe of.

* Or, ſtudied, or, deviſed. [h] Chriſtophorſon has Further, they have * learned to eat with ſuch undiſturbedneſs as to their paſſions and affections, that, [h] if need ſo requires, [they eat] with Victuallers and Retailers of Proviſion, without bluſhing either at the place, or the perſon, or at any thing elſe. They often frequent the publick Baths alſo, and for the moſt part converſe with and bath themſelves in the company of women; having vanquiſhed their paſſions to ſuch a degree, that they * put a force upon nature her ſelf, and are not to be [i] inclined to [what is proper to] their own nature, either by the ſight, or touch, or even the very embracing of a woman. But with men, they are men, and with women they are women; it being their deſire to partake of both Sexes, and not to be of one, that if neceſſity compells them to go into a Victualling-houſe, or a Brothel-houſe, they neither avoid the place, &c. Chriſtophorſon, no doubt, followed Nicephorus's expoſition, who (book 14. chap. 50.) has rendred Evagrius's words thus: ἀπαθῶς δὲ ὅτῳ ἐσθίουσες, κἂν ἐν καπηλείῳ ἢ μαϛωτείῳ εἰ τοῦτο δεήσοι γένοιτο, &c. They eat without affection and commotion of minde, although [it be] in a Victualling-houſe, or bauly-houſe, if there be a neceſſity of doing this. But I have reſtored this place from the incomparable Florent. M. S. in this manner: κἂν ἀνάγκη καπήλοις ἢ παλιϛκαπήλοις δεήσει, if need ſo requires [they eat] with Victuallers or Retailers of Proviſion. What a παλιϛκαπηλος was, and how he differed from a καπηλος, I think every body knows. How much a καπηλος differed from a Merchant; ſo much a παλιϛκαπηλος differed from a καπηλος. The old Gloſſes render παλιϛκάπηλον in Latine dardanarium, one that buys proviſions to ſell them againe. Valeſ.

rendred this place thus: Adeo etiam ſine deleſtatione cibum capiunt, &c. They alſo take their meat ſo much without delight, and exerciſe ſo auſtere a diſcipline in that thing,

[i] The conjecture of Learned men diſpleaſes me not; who inſtead of [μηδὲ ἀποκρίνεσθαι, &c. and will not anſwer to, &c.] have mended it thus, μηδὲ ἀποκλίνεσθαι, and are not to be inclined to, &c. Which latter reading Chriſtophorſon has followed, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. Notwithſtanding, Nicephorus has retained the vulgar reading, to wit, that firſt mentioned. Valeſ.

To ſpeak briefly therefore, in this incomparable and divine way of living, virtue enacts laws contrary to nature, having eſtabliſhed Sanctions of her own, to wit, not to impart to any of them a ſatiety of thoſe things [which are] neceſſary [for life.] But * their Law commands them to be hungry, and thirſty, and to cover the body ſo far only, as neceſſity † requireth. And, their way of living is ſo equally and exactly poyzed and ballanced, that when they tend diametrically oppoſite, they are not in the leaſt ſenſible of any alteration [of things,] although the diſtance between them be vaſt. For, things contrary are in ſuch a manner mixed in them, (the divine grace joyning things not to be mixt, and again ſeparating them;) that life and death, (which two are contraries, both in nature, and in the things themſelves,) dwell together in them. For where [there occurs] paſſion or perturbation, it behoves them to be dead and buried. But when 'tis [the time of] prayer to God, then [they muſt be] Robuſt in body, Vivid and Vigorous, although they are grown decrepid with age. Moreover, [k] both Sorts of life are ſo complicated and conjoyned in them, that although they have indeed wholly put off the fleſh, [yet] they live ſtill, and converſe with the living, adminiſtring medicines to bodies, offering up the deſires of ſuppliants to God, and [laſtly] performing all other things agreeably to their former life; [l] excepting only that they do not want neceſſaries, nor are limited to any place; but they hear all, and converſe with all.

* That is, the Monaſtick Law.

[k] Johannes Langus expounds theſe words concerning the preſent and future life. For he has rendred the place of his Nicephorus in this manner: Vitam utramque illi, &c. They do ſo complicate and conjoyn both lives, to wit, the future, &c. But, in my judgment, by theſe words [both ſorts of life] the Secular, and Monaſtick life are to be underſtood: which is, plainly confirmed by Evagrius's following words. For he ſays, πάντα ἄλλα ὁμοίως τῇ προτέρᾳ βιοτῇ διεξιλαύνες, and performing all other things agreeable to their former life. Valeſ.

[l] The reading of this place is truer in Nicephorus, thus πλὴν ὅτῳ μὴ ἧϛ ἀναγκαίων ἐνδεεῖς ἔϊ) καὶ τόπῳ πειζεζωϛ, excepting only that they do not want neceſſaries, nor are limited to any place. Valeſ.

There

There are amongſt them frequent and unwearied bendings of the knees, and [after them] [m] Laborious ſtations; deſire being the only recreation of their age, and of their voluntary infirmity. They are a kind of Champions without fleſh, Wreſtlers without bloud; who inſtead of a ſplendid banquet and delicious dainties, have a faſt, and, in place of a full furniſhed table, nothing (as near as 'tis poſſible) that they may taſt of. Whenſoever a ſtranger comes to them, though it be in the morning, yet they receive him with a ſingular hoſpitality, and friendly invitation to eat and drink; having found out another ſort of faſting, to wit, to eat even againſt their will. So that this thing ſtrikes [all men] with an aſtoniſhment, that (whereas they want [n] ſo many [neceſſaries] for ſufficient food, yet) they are contented with ſo very few: being enemies to their own wills and nature, but ſlaves [o] to the deſires of their neighbours; that in all things the ſweets of the fleſh might be expelled, and the ſoul might have the Government, prudently chooſing and conſerving what is beſt and moſt acceptable to God. Bleſſed perſons, in reſpect of the life they lead here; but much more bleſſed on account of their tranſlation to that other, after which they pant continually, haſtning to ſee [p] him whom they love.

[m] Inſtead of σύμπονοι, Laborious, I think it ſhould be σύνλογοι, intent, or continued. For I have found, that theſe two words are frequently confounded in Manuſcript copies. Valeſ.

[n] Inſtead of [πόσον ἐς τέρψιν, &c.] I doubt not but it ſhould be πόσων. Valeſ.

[o] We owe the amendment of this place to the Florent. M. S. in which Copy, inſtead of [τοῖς ἧσ πάλαι θελήμασιν] it is plainly written thus, τοῖς ἧσ πάλας θελήμασι, to the deſires of their neighbours. Sr Henry Savil had drawn a line under this place, ſignifying thereby, that there was a fault here. But he ſaw not how it was to be mended. Nicephorus alſo retains the vulgar reading. Valeſ.

[p] Τὸν ποθούμενον αὐτοῖς. The reading in the Tellerian M. S. pleaſes me better; which is [τὸ ποθούμενον αὐτοῖς, the thing deſired by them;] this to me ſeems more elegant. Valeſ.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the Emperour Marcianus, and what ſignes preceded, * declaring he ſhould be Emperour.

* Or, declaring his Empire.

WHat was tranſacted during the times of Theodoſius [Junior,] we have comprehended in our firſt † Book. Come on, we will now bring Marcianus forth, that famous Emperour of the Romans; and in the firſt place we will relate, who and whence he was, and in what manner * he arrived at the Roman Empire: and then we will declare the affairs tranſacted by him, in their proper places [and times.] Marcianus therefore, as 'tis related by many others, and alſo by [a] Priſcus the Rhetorician, by originall extract was a Thracian, the ſon of a Military man. * Deſiring to follow his father's courſe of life, he went to Philippopolis, [hoping] he might there be enrolled in the Companies of the Milice. As he was going thither, he ſees the body of a man newly ſlain, which lay thrown upon the ground. Near to which he made a ſtand, (for he was eminent in reſpect of his other [endowments,] but moſt eſpecially, on account of his humanity and compaſſion:) lamented what had hapned, and for a ſufficient while deſiſted from proceeding on his journey, being deſirous to perform what was fitting [to be done to the dead body.] When ſome perſons had ſeen this, they gave the Magiſtrates of Philippopolis an account of it. Who having apprehended Marcianus, interrogated him concerning the murder of the man. When therefore conjectures and probabilities prevailed more than truth it ſelf, and than the tongue of the perſon accuſed denying the Murder; and when [Marcianus] was about to undergo the puniſhment of a Murderer; divine aſſiſtance on a ſudden diſcovered the perſon that had committed the murder. Who having been puniſh't for that fact with the loſs of his head, [thereby] * preſerved the head of Marcianus. Being thus unexpectedly ſaved, he goes to one of the companies of the Milice in that place, [b] it being his deſire to enter himſelf a Souldier therein. They admired the man, and conjecturing upon good grounds that he would in future become a great perſon and one of extraordinary worth, they received him moſt willingly, and enrolled him amongſt themſelves, not laſt of all, as the Military Law directs; but, in the place of a Souldier newly dead, whoſe name was Auguſtus, they regiſtred Marcianus (who was likewiſe called Auguſtus,) in the Muſter-Roll. Thus [Marcianus by] his own name was beforehand in poſſeſſion of the denomination of our Emperours, who at ſuch time as they put on their purple [aſſume] the Appellation of Auguſti. As if the name had refuſed to abide with him without the dignity; and again, as if the dignity could have required no other name for its being majeſtically adorned. So that, his Proper, and his Appellative name was the ſame; both his Dignity, and likewiſe his Appellation, being declared by one and the ſame denomination. Moreover, another accident hapned, from which it might be conjectured, that Marcianus would come to be Emperour. For, having had a Mili-

[b] Ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ στρατιώτῃ βιβλόμενος. Muſculus has rendred it well, thus, ut in eo militiæ nomen daret, that he might liſt, [or, enter] himſelf a Souldier therein. Not that the term στρατιώτης does exactly import the ſame with nomen dare, to liſt, or, enter, or, enroll. For, στρατιώτης does properly ſignifie, to deſire and to ſue for. So Dionyſ. Halicarnaſſeus, about the cloſe of his 11th book, uſes this phraſe, παρεγγέλλειν τῷ ἀξιοῦν, to ſue for an office. But, Appian uſually words it thus, στρατηγέλλειν εἰς τὴν ἀρχήν. And ſo does the Old Author in Suidas, in the word στρατηγέλλονται. Now, Candidates, when they ſued for an office, were wont nomen ſuum profiteri, to tell their name and be inrolled. Johannes Langus renders it, Militare Sacramentum dicere, to ſay the Military Oath. Which Verſion I diſprove of. For στρατηγία is the album militare, the Muſter-Roll, wherein the names of all the Souldiers were regiſtred. Vegetius, book 2. chap. 5. terms it Matriculam, the Liſt of Souldiers. Evagrius uſes παρεγγελία in this ſenſe, hereafter in this chapter; μαρκιανὸν τὸν καὶ αὔγουστον ἐς τὴν παρεγγελίαν ἐγγράψαντες, they regiſtred Marcianus (who was likewiſe called Auguſtus) in the Muſter-Roll. Further, the names of the Souldiers were inſerted into the Muſter-Roll, before they had ſaid the Oath; as Vegetius atteſts in the forequoted place. Candidus Iſaurus makes uſe of the ſame term, in his firſt book Hiſtor. where his words concerning Leo are theſe: ὃς ἦν ἐκ Δακίας μὲν τῆς ἐν Ἰλλυρικοῖς στρατιωτικῷ παρεγγείλας τάγματι, who was of that Dacia in Illyricum, having been regiſtred in a Military Company. tary Command under Aſpar [in the War] againſt the Vandalls, it hapned that Marcianus, together with many others, was taken priſoner, (Aſpar having been very much worſted by the Vandalls;) and brought into a field with the other Captives; it being Geiſerichus's deſire to ſee the Priſoners. After they were gathered together, Geiſerichus being ſeated in an high room, pleaſed himſelf with viewing the multitude of thoſe taken Priſoners. And in regard much time was ſpent [there, the Priſoners] did what each of them had a mind to: (For Geiſerichus had given order, that thoſe who guarded the Captives, ſhould looſe them from their bonds.) Some of them therefore did one thing, others another. But Marcianus laid himſelf down on the ground, and ſlept in the Sun, which was hot and more ſcorching than uſuall at that ſeaſon of the year. [In which very interim] an Eagle came down from on high in the air, and raiſing herſelf by a flight with her face perpendicularly oppoſite to the Sun, made a ſhadow like a cloud over Marcianus, whereby ſhe refreſhed and cooled him. Geiſerichus wondring hereat, with great foreſight conjectured at what would happen; and when he had ſent for Marcianus, he cauſed him to be diſmiſſed from his Captivity, having firſt bound him in great Oaths, that after his coming to the Empire, he ſhould inviolably keep his faith to the Vandalls, and not move his Arms againſt them. Which ingagement, as [c] Procopius relates, Marcianus did in reality keep and perform. But leaving this digreſſion, let us return to our Subject. Marcianus was pious towards God, juſt as to what related to his Subjects: accounting thoſe true riches (not which were hoarded up, or brought together from the Collections of Tribute; but them only) which might ſupply the wants of the indigent, and render their eſtates who poſſeſt much, ſecure and ſafe. He was formidable, not for his puniſhing, but becauſe ['twas feared] he was about to puniſh. On theſe accounts therefore he obtained the Empire, [which fell to him] not by an hereditary Right, but [was] the reward of his vertue; as well the Senate, as all other perſons of what degrees and orders ſoever, conferring the Imperiall dignity upon him by a generall ſuffrage, to which they were perſwaded by Pulcheria. Whom, in regard ſhe was Auguſta, Marcianus married; but knew her not as a wife, ſhe continuing a Virgin till her death. And theſe things were done, before Valentinianus Emperour of Rome had confirmed this Election by his own conſent. Notwithſtanding, by reaſon of [Marcianus's] virtue, he afterwards made it authentick. Further, it was Marcianus's deſire, that [one] worſhip might in common be exhibited to God by all perſons, (thoſe tongues, which had been confuſed through impiety, being again piouſly united;) and that the Deity might be praiſed with one and the ſame * Doxologie.

[c] The words of Procopius, which Evagrius points to here, were heretofore extant in the firſt book of his Vandalicks. But now they are wanting in the Auguſtane Edition, at pag. 96. For there is a defect in the Greek Text there, after theſe words ὥσπερ Ζεὺς ἀχ- Ὀλύμπιος. Valeſ.

Concerning the Synod at Chalcedon, and what was the Occaſion of its being convened.

WHileſt therefore the Emperours mind was taken up with theſe deſires, there came to him, both the * Reſponſales of Leo Biſhop of the Elder Rome, affirming that Dioſcorus in the ſecond Epheſine Synod, had not admitted of Leo's Letter, wherein was contained † the doctrine of the true Faith: and alſo thoſe perſons who had been injured by the ſame Dioſcorus, intreating that their Cauſe might be judged in a Synod of Biſhops. But above all Euſebius, who had been Biſhop of Dorylæum, was moſt importunately urgent, ſaying, that by the treacherous contrivances of Chryſaphius Theodoſius's [a] Protector, he and Flavianus had been depoſed, becauſe, to Chryſaphius demanding Gold for Flavianus's own ordination, Flavianus (to ſhame him) [b] had ſent the ſacred Veſſells; and becauſe Chryſaphius agreed with Eutyches in his erroneous and falſe opinions. Euſebius ſaid moreover, that Flavianus had been beaten, and kick't, and in a miſerable manner murdered by Dioſcorus. Chryſaphius is thus termed by Priſcus Rhetor, in his Excerpt. Legationum. The Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle calls him Spatharius, which we may render Eſquire of the Emperours body. He is termed Spatharius alſo in Geſtis de nomine Acacii, which Jacobus Sirmondus hath ſet forth. Valeſ.

In anſwer to which Flavianus wrote back, that he had no money which he could ſend, unleſs inſtead of money he ſhould preſent him with the ſacred Veſſells of the Church. And this thing, as Theophanes ſays, raiſed a deadly grudge between Chryſaphius and Flavianus. Valeſ.

For theſe reaſons, a Synod is convened at Chalcedon, Couriers and Expreſſes being ſent, and the Biſhops in all places called together * by the moſt pious Emperours Letters, firſt at Nicæa: (in ſo much that, Leo Biſhop of Rome, writing to them concerning thoſe perſons he had ſent to ſupply his own place, to wit, Paſchaſinus, Lucentius, and the reſt, inſcribed [his Letters thus,] To thoſe convened at Nicæa:) but afterwards at Chalcedon in the Country of the Bithynians. [c] Zacharias Rhetor, in favour to Neſtorius, does indeed [d] affirm that he was ſent for out of Exile [to this Councill.] But, that this was not ſo, may be conjectured from hence, that the Synod does every where Anathematize Neſtorius. The ſame is alſo expreſsly atteſted by Euſtathius Biſhop of Berytus (in his Letter to Johannes a Biſhop, and to another Johannes a Presbyter, concerning the matters agitated in the Synod,) in theſe very words: Thoſe perſons meeting again, who demanded Neſtorius's Reliques, cryed out againſt the Synod, [in this ſort:] for what reaſon are Holy men Anathematized? In ſo much that the Emperour, being highly incenſed, commanded his Guards by force to drive them a far off. How therefore Neſtorius could have been called [to this Council,] who was dead long before, I cannot tell.

[c] Zacharias Rhetor wrote an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory from the beginning of the Emperour Marcianus's Reign (as it may be conjectured from this place,) untill the Reign of Anaſtaſius. But, he wrote not with ſincerity and moderation (as an Hiſtory ought to be written,) but was corrupted with favour and hatred, that is, ἐμπαθῶς with affection and partiality, as Evagrius ſays. Evagrius atteſts the ſame concerning him, in book 3. chap. 7. And in chap. 18. of his third book, he accuſes the ſame Zacharias of negligence. Valeſ.

[d] In the Florentine M. S. the reading of this place is more entire, thus, ὃν τῆς ὑποροείας μετάπεμπτον γνώδε φησί. And we have rendred it accordingly. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens Edition, the words [ὃν τῆς ὑποροείας, out of Exile] are wanting.

CHAP. III.

A deſcription of the Great Martyr Euphemia's Church, which is in [the City] Chalcedon: and a Narrative of the Miracles performed therein.

[THe Fathers] therefore are aſſembled in the ſacred Church of the Martyr Euphemia. This Church ſtands in Chalcedon, a City belonging to the Province of the Bithynians. It is diſtant from the Boſphorus not more than two furlongs, [ſcituate] in a moſt pleaſant place, on an * eminence which riſes eaſily and by degrees: in ſo much that, thoſe who go up into the Church of the Martyr, are inſenſible of Labour in their walk, but being got within the Temple, on a ſudden they appear at a vaſt height. Whence caſting down their eyes as 'twere from a Watch Tower, they have a proſpect of all the fields beneath, extended into a levell and even plain, clothed in green with graſs, waving with ſtanding corn, and beautified with the ſight of all ſorts of trees: [they ſee] woody mountains alſo, [the trees whereon] bend and then raiſe [their tops] finely to an heighth. Moreover, [they have a proſpect of] ſeverall Seas, ſome of which [ſeem] * purple coloured by reaſon of their ſerenity, and do ſweetly and mildly play with the Shoares; to wit, where the places are calm: but others are rough and boyſterous with ſurges, by the very reciprocall motion of their waves forcing a ſhoar † ſand mixt with little ſtones, Sea-weed, and the lighteſt ſort of ſhell-fiſh, and then drawing them back again. Moreover, the Church it ſelf ſtands right over againſt Conſtantinople. So that, the Temple is [not a little] adorned with the proſpect of ſo great a City. The Church conſiſts of three moſt ſpacious ſtructures. The firſt is an Open Court, beautified with a large || Atrium, and with Pillars on every ſide. After this there is another Structure, for breadth, and length, and pillars, [a] almoſt alike; differing only in this, that it has a Roof laid over it. In the Northen ſide whereof at the riſing Sun, there is a round Edifice built in form of a [b] Tholus, ſet round within with pillars moſt artificially framed, which are alike as to their matter, and equall in bigneſs. [c] Over theſe [pillars,] there is an * Hyperoon raiſed to a vaſt heighth, under the ſame Roof: ſo that, even in this Room alſo, they that deſire it, may both ſupplicate the Martyr, and alſo be preſent at the ſacred Myſteries.

* Or, hill.

* Τῇ γαλήνῃ πορφυρίζουσι; which words Valeſius renders thus: ſerenitate renidentia, ſhining, or, glitſering by reaſon of their calmneſs.

† Καχλαμώδεσι; it ſignifies ſmall, or, ſand full of little ſtones.

|| Court, or, Courtyard.

[a] I have mended this place from the Florentine M. S. after this manner; ἀμικρὸν ἀλλήλοις παραπλήσιον, almoſt alike. Nevertheleſs, Nicephorus has followed the vulgar reading, which is μικρὸς παραπλησίως. In the Tellerian M. S. I found it written μικρὸν παραπλήσιον. Valeſ.

[b] Ἐς θόλον, that is, in form of a Cupolo, or Cuppolo; as the Italians now term it. Harpocration (in the word θόλος) tells us, that the place where the Prytanes (who were a ſort of Magiſtrates amongſt the Athenians) eat, was termed Tholus; ὑπὸ ἐνίων δὲ (continues he) σκιὰς, διὰ τὸ ὅπως ἀκοδομῆσθαι αὐτὸν στρογγύλον παρέμοιον θολίᾳ, but by ſome 'tis termed σκιὰς, (that is, an Arbour) becauſe 'tis built round, in that form, like an hat with an high round crown.

[c] 'Tis ſtrange that Tranſlatours ſhould not have perceived the fault of this place: for what can the ſenſe be of theſe words; Sub his columnis tabulatum eſt ſublime, &c. Under theſe pillars there is an high chamber, &c, according as Chriſtophorſon has rendred it? Inſtead of [ὑπὸ τούτοις, under theſe] it muſt undoubtedly be ἐπὶ τούτοις, over theſe; which is the reading in Nicephorus; his words are theſe: ἐφ' οἷς ὑπερῶον τι, &c. which Langus renders thus: Super quibus porticus ſublimis eâdem ſub Teſtudine conſtructa eſt, over which [pillars] there is an high Gallery built under the ſame Roof. Valeſ. * Or, Upper-Room.

But, within the Tholus, towards the Eaſt, [d] there is a magnificent Tomb, where lie the moſt holy Reliques of the Martyr, depoſited in an oblong Cheſt (ſome term it [e] The Macra,) moſt curiouſly made of ſilver. The Miracles which are at certain times performed by the holy Martyr, are manifeſtly known to all Chriſtians. For, frequently in their ſleep ſhe appears, either to the Biſhops during their ſeverall times of preſidency over that City, or elſe to ſome perſons (otherwiſe eminent for [piety of] life,) who come to her [Church,] and orders them [f] to make their Vintage in the Temple. After this hath been made known, both to the Emperours, to the Patriarch, and alſo to the City; as well thoſe who ſway the Imperiall Scepter, as the Pontif's, Magiſtrates, and the reſt of the whole multitude of the people, go immediately to the Church, with a deſire to partake of the Myſteries. In the ſight of all theſe perſons therefore, the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, together with the Prieſts about him, goes into the ſacred Edifice, where the holy Body I have mentioned is depoſited. [g] There is a little hole in the Cheſt, on its left ſide, which is ſhut up and made faſt by ſmall doors. Through this hole they let down a long iron rod, after they have faſtned a ſponge to it, as far as the moſt holy Reliques; and when they have turned the ſponge about, they draw the iron-rod up to them, [the ſponge at the end whereof is] full of bloud, and bloudy clotters. Which when the people behold, immediately they adore and glorifie God.

[d] Ἔνθα σκιὰς. Langus and Chriſtophorſon render it Sacrarium, a Veſtry, or little Chappell. Muſculus tranſlates it adytum, a ſecret place in a Church to which few have acceſs. Which I approve not of. I have rather rendred it tumulum, a Tomb, or Monument. For that is the import of the term σκιὰς, as Heſychius and Suidas do atteſt. But, by a Tomb, or Monument, I mean a place fenced in with Barrs made lattiſe-wiſe, in the midſt whereof was that ſilver-cheſt wherein the Reliques of the holy Martyr Euphemia were depoſited. For, that it was ſo, is apparent from Evagrius's following words. Valeſ.

[e] Inſtead of μακρὸν Macra, I think it ſhould be ἀρκὸν The Arke. Truly, I do not ſee what ſenſe there can be in the vulgar reading; in regard μακρὸς and ἐπιμήκης ſignifie the ſame; nor is it a proper name, but an adjective. 'Tis better therefore to read ἀρκὸν The Arke. Some perſons, ſays Evagrius, term the Martyrs Cheſt, Arcam, the Arke. For ſo the Latines term it. The Old Gloſſes render σορὸς, arca funebris, an arke, or cheſt, for the dead. Valeſ.

[f] Κατὰ τὸ τέμενος τρυγᾶν. Tranſlatours underſtood not this place. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon made it τρυφᾶν. For Muſculus renders it thus: Ut circa templum ad honorem ejus jucundentur præcipit, and orders them that in honour of her they ſhould be merry about the Temple. And Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it thus: Jubet ut in ipſo templo feſtum deliciis, & opiparis epulis celebrent, ſhe orders that in the very Church they ſhould celebrate a feaſt with dainties and ſumptuous banquets. But, Evagrius's following words do altogether refute this emendation. For, he adds not one word at this place, which may in any wiſe belong to luxury or delicious food. Nicephorus has indeed retained the vulgar reading: but has explained it ill, thus: ἀρθόνως ἥδ' θαυμάτων τρυγᾶν ἐνεκελεύσατο: that is, as Langus has rendred it, ut miraculorum talium fructum perciperent, eſt cohortata, ſhe exhorteth them, that they ſhould freely partake of the fruit of ſuch miracles. But Nicephorus added theſe words of his own head; nor has he comprehended Evagrius's meaning; in regard Evagrius ſpeaks not here of more miracles, but of one only miracle, to wit, the bloud flowing out of the Tomb of the holy Martyr. I have followed the ordinary reading, and have explained this place in the ſimple and obvious ſenſe concerning the making of a Vintage. Which agrees exactly with Evagrius's following words. For the bloud, which in a moſt plentifull manner was preſs't out of the bleſſed Martyrs reliques, was not unlike wine, which is ſqueezed out of preſt grapes. Beſides, the Feſtivall day of the holy Euphemia fell on the time of Vintage, to wit, on the ſixteenth of September, as we are informed from the Greek Menologie. Valeſ.

[g] I am of the ſame opinion with Learned men, who inſtead of [Ἔτι δὲ, But moreover] have long ſince altered the reading, and made it Ἔστι δὲ There is, &c. Which emendation is confirmed by the Tellerian Manuſcript, and by Nicephorus. Further, Langus renders χλειθρίδιον (which is the term here uſed,) feneſtellam, a little window: Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it tranſennam, a Loup, or, Caſement. I (as Muſculus has done,) had rather render it foramen, an hole. For Sozomen terms it thus, book. 9. chap. 2. where I have made more remarkes concerning ſuch little windows as theſe, which were made in the Capſæ [cheſts wherein were laid the Reliques] of the Martyrs. Valeſ.

[Further,]

[Further,] ſo great a plenty [of bloud] is extracted out thence, that both the pious Emperours, and alſo all the Prieſts [there] convened, moreover the whole multitude which flock together at that place, in a moſt plentifull manner do partake of it, and likewiſe ſend it over the whole world, to the Faithfull that are deſirous of it. And the congealed bloud laſts [ſo as it is] for ever, nor is the moſt holy bloud in any wiſe changed into any other colour. * Theſe miracles are performed, not at any determinate period of time, but according as the Life of the Biſhop, and the gravity of his Moralls ſhall † deſerve. For, 'tis reported, that when ever a perſon of probity, and one eminent for his virtues, does govern [that Church,] this miracle is performed, and that moſt frequently: but when there is no ſuch Prelate, ſuch divine ſignes as theſe do rarely happen. But I will relate another [miracle,] which no time or ſeaſon ‖ interrupts: nor does it make any difference between the Faithfull and the Infidells; but 'tis alike * ſhown to all perſons. When any perſon comes into that place, wherein the pretious Cheſt is, which contains the moſt holy Reliques, † he ſmells a fragrant ſcent, which tranſcends all the uſuall ſavours [ſmelt] by men. For, this ſcent is neither like that ‖ which ariſes from Meadows, nor like that ſent forth by any the moſt fragrant things, nor is it ſuch a one as is made by Perfumers: but 'tis a certain ſtrange and moſt excellent ſcent, [h] which of it ſelf demonſtrates the [virtue and] power of thoſe things that produce it.

* Or, which things are magnificently celebrated.
† Or, require.
‖ Or, cuts in ſunder.
* Or, expoſed, or, obvious.
† Or, he is filled with.
‖ Or, which is gathered.

[h] The term [λειψάνων, Reliques] is wanting in the Kings, the Florentine, and Tellerian Manuſcripts, and likewiſe in Robert Stephens's Edition. Nor have the Geneva-Printers done well, who from Chriſtophorſon's books put this word in here, whereas it is in no wiſe neceſſary at this place, nor is it confirmed by the teſtimony of any written copy. For, thoſe various readings which are produced from Chriſtophorſon's books, are for the moſt part nothing elſe but the conjectures of learned men. This whole paſſage therefore ought to be written as 'tis read in the Tellerian and Florentine Manuſcripts; to wit, thus: ἐξ αὐτῆς παρασῖσα ἁγίᾳ ἀναδιδόντων τὸν δύναμιν, which of it ſelf demonſtrates the [virtue and] power of thoſe things that produce it. And ſo Nicephorus read: for he has expreſt this place of Evagrius thus: τεκμηριῶσα τὸ ἀναδιδόντος τὸν δύναμιν, which gives an indication of the power of that thing which produceth it.

CHAP. IV.

Concerning thoſe things which were agitated and eſtabliſhed in the Synod; and how Dioſcorus [Biſhop] of Alexandria was depoſed; but, Theodoret, Ibas, and ſome others were reſtored.

IN this place, the Synod I have mentioned is convened, the Biſhops Paſchatius and Lucentius, and Bonifacius the Presbyter, adminiſtring (as I have ſaid,) the place of Leo Pontif of the Elder Rome: Anatolius preſiding over the Conſtantinopolitane [Church;] and Dioſcorus being Biſhop of [the Church of] the Alexandrians. Maximus [Biſhop] of Antioch, and Juvenalis of Jeruſalem [were there alſo.] Together with whom were preſent thoſe Prelates whom they had about them; and alſo thoſe perſonages who held the principall places in the eminent Senate [of Conſtantinople.] To whom they, who filled Leo's place, ſaid, that Dioſcorus ought not to ſit together with them in the Councill. For this [they affirmed] was given them in charge by their Biſhop Leo, and unleſs it were obſerved, they would remove out of the Church. And when [thoſe] of the Senate asked, what were the matters objected againſt Dioſcorus; they returned anſwer, that he ought to render an account of his own judgment, who, contrary to what was fitting and juſt, had accepted the perſon of the Judge. After which words, when Dioſcorus by the Senates Decree had come forth into a place in the midſt; Euſebius made his requeſt, that the Supplicatory Libell, which he had preſented to the Emperour, might be recited; which requeſt he worded thus: I have been injured by Dioſcorus; the Faith hath been injured; Flavianus the Biſhop has been murdered, and together with me unjuſtly depoſed by him: do you give order, that my ſupplicatory Libell may be read. Which thing when [the Judges] had diſcourſed of, the Libell was permitted to be read, the contents whereof were theſe.

ſmall and triviall, which he hath audaciouſly attempted, both againſt the Faith of Chriſt, and againſt Us, We fall at the feet of Your [Imperial] Majeſty, and humbly beſeech You, to order the ſaid moſt Religious Biſhop Dioſcorus, to give in his anſwer to what is objected againſt him by us: to wit, by having the Monuments of the Acts, which he has made againſt us, read before an Holy Synod. From which [Acts] we are able to demonſtrate, that he is eſtranged from the Orthodox Faith, hath confirmed an Hereſie full of impiety, has unjuſtly depoſed us, and in a moſt grievous and injurious manner oppreſſed us: You ſending your divine and adorable Mandates to the Holy and Oecumenicall Synod of Biſhops moſt dear to God, to the end that it may hear the cauſe between us and the forementioned Dioſcorus, and bring to the knowledge of Your Piety all that is tranſacted, * according to that which ſhall pleaſe Your Immortall height. And if we ſhall obtain this, we will pour forth inceſſant prayers for your eternall Empire, moſt divine Emperours! After this, by the joynt deſire of Dioſcorus and Euſebius, the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod were publickly recited. The particular declaration whereof, (it being † comprehended in many words, and contained || within the Acts of the Chalcedon Councill;) leaſt I ſhould ſeem verboſe to thoſe who haſten towards [a knowledge of] the concluſion of Tranſactions, I have ſubjoyned to this Second Book of my Hiſtory; giving thoſe perſons who are deſirous of an exact and particular knowledge of all matters, a liberty of reading theſe things, and of having an accurate account of all tranſactions imprinted on their mindes. [In the interim] I will curſorily mention the more principall and momentous matters: to wit, that Dioſcorus was * convicted, becauſe he had not admitted of the Letter of Leo Biſhop of the Elder Rome; and becauſe he had effected the depoſition of Flavianus Biſhop of New Rome, within the ſpace of one day; and becauſe he had gotten the Biſhops who were convened, to ſubſcribe [their names] in a paper not written on, as if therein had been contained Flavianus's depoſition. Whereupon, thoſe perſons who were of the Senate, made this Decree. [d] We perceive, that a more exact ſcrutiny concerning the Orthodox and Catholick Faith ought to be made to morrow, when [e] the Synod will be more compleat and full. But, in regard Flavianus of Pious Memory, and the moſt Religious Biſhop Euſebius (from a ſearch made into the Acts and Decrees, and alſo from their teſtimony by word of mouth who preſided in the Synod then convened; who have confeſſed that they have erred, and depoſed them without cauſe, when they had in no wiſe erred in the Faith:) have, as 'tis evidently known, been unjuſtly depoſed: it appears to us (agreeable to that which is acceptable to God,) to be juſt, (provided it ſhall pleaſe our moſt Divine and moſt Pious Lord,) that Dioſcorus the moſt Religious Biſhop of Alexandria, Juvenalis the moſt Religious Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Thalaſſius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, Euſebius the moſt Religious Biſhop of [f] Ancyra, Euſtathius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Berytus, and Baſilius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Seleucia in Iſauria, which [Prelates] had power, and preſided over the then Synod, ſhould lye under the very ſame puniſhment, being by [the ſentence of] the ſacred Synod according to the Canons * removed from the Epiſcopall dignity: all things which have been conſequently done being made known † to his moſt ſacred Imperial Majeſty. After this, Libells having been given in on the ſecond day againſt Dioſcorus, on account of [various] crimes, and concerning money [forcibly by him taken,] when Dioſcorus, being twice and thrice called, appeared not, by reaſon of [ſeverall] excuſes which he alledged; they who filled the place of Leo Biſhop of the Elder Rome, || made this declaration in theſe expreſs words.

[g] What Dioſcorus who hath been Biſhop of the Great City Alexandria has audaciouſly attempted againſt the Order of the Canons, and the Eccleſiaſtick Conſtitution; hath been made manifeſt, both by thoſe things which have already been inquired into at the Firſt Seſſion, and alſo from what hath been done this day. For this perſon, (to omit many other things,) making uſe of his own authority, uncanonically admitted to communion Eutyches, (a man that embraces the ſame Sentiments with himſelf, who had been canonically depoſed by his own Biſhop of Holy Memory, we mean our Father and Biſhop Flavianus;) before * his ſitting [in the Synod] at Epheſus together with the Biſhops beloved by God. Now, the Apoſtolick See has granted a pardon to thoſe [Prelates,] for what hath been involuntarily done there by them. Who alſo to this preſent continue of the ſame opinion with the moſt Holy Arch-Biſhop Leo, and with all the Holy and Oecumenicall Synod. On which account, he hath received them to his own communion, as being aſſerters of the ſame faith with himſelf. But † this man till this very time hath not deſiſted from boaſting of theſe things, on account whereof he ought rather to mourn, and lay himſelf proſtrate on the earth. Beſides, he permitted not the Letter of the Bleſſed Pope Leo, to be read, (which had been written by him to Flavianus of Holy Memory;) and this [he did,] notwithſtanding he was ſeverall times entreated by thoſe perſons who had brought the Letter, to ſuffer it to be read; and notwithſtanding he had promiſed with an Oath that it ſhould be read.

[d] This is the ſentence, which the moſt magnificent Judges who were preſent at the Chalcedon Councill, pronounc't after an hearing of the Cauſe: which ſentence is recorded in the very ſame words, in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Councill, pag. 152. Edit. Bin. Notwithſtanding, 'tis a wonder to me, that Chriſtophorſon had not ſeen this, who has confuſed and diſturbed all things at this place in ſuch a manner, that you can extract nothing of ſound ſenſe from his verſion. That which diſturbed him, was his ſeeing the Secular Magiſtrates in a Councill of Biſhops and their pronouncing ſentence as Judges. But Chriſtophorſon ought to have conſidered, that thoſe Magiſtrates concerned not themſelves in the Cauſe of the Faith, but leſt the Biſhops a free right and power of determining concerning that matter. Indeed, at ſuch time as the Rule of Faith was drawn up by the Biſhops convened at Chalcedon, theſe very Magiſtrates, who before had often moved the Councill that that might be done, would not be preſent at the Seſſion of Biſhops. But in the buſineſs between Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum and Dioſcorus of Alexandria, in which affair nothing was treated of concerning the Faith, but concerning violence, fraud, and other crimes: in this buſineſs, I ſay, the Secular Magiſtrates had a right to pronounce ſentence. The not reading of which Letter [h] *has filled the most Holy Churches over the whole world with ſcandalls and detriment. [l] In the Acts of the Chalcedon-Council, the reading is ὑφίστηται, will Decree. Which in my judgment is right. For the future tenſe is in this place put for the Imperative mood. For, whereas the Legates of the Apoſtolick See do here ſpeak to the Synod, they would not uſe the Imperative; becauſe it ſeems more arrogant. They made uſe therefore of the future tenſe, as being the ſofter and more modeſt mode of expreſſion. Notwithſtanding, The old Tranſlatour of the Chalcedon Council has rendred it in the Imperative mood. In Nicephorus, book 15. chap. 30. the reading is ὑφίστηται, Valeſ. In Robert Stephens's Edition, and in the Greek Text here, the reading is ὑφίζεται, doth Decree; which perhaps is the truer reading.

CHAP. V.

Concerning the Sedition which hapned at Alexandria, on account of Proterius's Ordination; likewiſe, [concerning what hapned] at Jeruſalem.

AFter theſe things, Dioſcorus * was baniſhed to Gangra [a City] in Paphlagonia; and by the common Vote of the Synod, Proterius obtaines the Biſhoprick of Alexandria. After he had taken poſſeſſion of his own See, a great and moſt inſufferable Tumult aroſe, the populace fluctuating [and being divided] into different opinions. For ſome demanded Dioſcorus, as it uſually happens in ſuch caſes; Others adhered pertinaciouſly to Proterius. So that, thence aroſe many and thoſe deplorable calamities. 'Tis certain, Priſcus the Rhetorician does relate [in his Hiſtory,] that at that time he came [a] out of the Province of Thebaïs to Alexandria, and ſaw the people making an Attack againſt the Magiſtrates. And, that when the Souldiers would have put a ſtop to the Tumult, the people threw ſtones at them, and made them run; that after this the Souldiers took refuge in that which heretofore had been [b] Serapis's Temple, where the people beſieged them, and burnt them alive. That, the Emperour having notice hereof, ſent two thouſand new raiſed Souldiers thither: who having the opportunity of a fair wind, made ſo proſperous a Voyage, that they arrived at the great City Alexandria on the ſixth day [after they had been ſhip't.] That after this, when the Souldiers moſt filthily abuſed the wives and daughters of the Alexandrians, facts far more horrid and nefarious than the former, were perpetrated. And at laſt, that the people meeting together in the Circus, entreated [c] Florus, who was then Commander of the Milice [throughout Egypt,] came at that time to Alexandria. But, the Province of Thebaïs was not governed by a Præfect; but by a Preſident, as we are informed from the Notitia Imperii Romani. Beſides, Priſcus Rhetor ſays not, that the Governour of the Province of Thebaïs, but that he himſelf came then to Alexandria. Priſcus had indeed been long converſant in the Province Thebaïs, with Maximinus the Commander, whoſe Councellour and Aſſeſſour he was, when he waged war againſt the Nubæ and Blemmyæ, as himſelf informs us in his Excerpt. Legationum. In the Tellerian Manuſcript, I found this place written thus: φθάνει δ' ἀλεξανδρεῦσι τῆς θηβαίων ἐπαρχίας, came by Alexandria from the Province of Thebais. But I ſhould rather write it thus, φθάνει ἐς τὸν ἀλεξάνδρειαν ἐκ τῆς, &c. came to Alexandria out of the Province of Thebais. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens the reading here is, φθάνει τὸν αὐτικαῦτα τὸν ἀλεξάνδρειαν τῆς θηβαίων ἐπαρχίαν.

* Or, was condemned to dwell at, &c.

[a] I have reſtored this place from the Florentine Manuſcript; to which agrees Nicephorus, book 15. chap. 8. Chriſtophorſon had mended it very ill, thus; φθάνει τὴν νικαῶτα τῶν ἀλεξανδρέων τὴν τῆς θηβαίων ἐπαρχίαν, that the Præfect of Thebais

[b] Nicephorus has added ſome paſſages here concerning Serapis's Temple, which are ſufficiently profound, and which I remember not to have read any where elſe. Therefore I conjecture, that Nicephorus wrote theſe paſſages out of Priſcus Rhetor's Hiſtory, which then was extant entire. Valeſ. See Nicephorus's Eccleſ. Hiſtor. book 15. chap. 8.

[c] Of this Florus (who was Præfectus Auguſtalis and alſo Dux of Egypt,) Jordanes has made mention in his book De Succeſſione Regnorum, where he writes thus concerning the Emperour Marcianus: Nobades Blemmyeſque Æthiopia prolapſos, &c. He appeaſed the Nobades and the Blemmyes, (who had fallen down from Æthiopia,) by Florus Procurator of the City Alexandria, and drove them from the Territories of the Romans. This Florus had ſucceeded Theodorus the Auguſtalis, as we are informed from Liberatus's Breviarium, chap. 14. Under whom Proterius is ordained Biſhop, and that Sedition (which Evagrius deſcribes here,) was raiſed at Alexandria, in the year of Chriſt 452. On account of which Sedition, whenas the publick [allowance of] bread-corn, (which was wont to be delivered out to the Alexandrians,) the Baths alſo, and Shows, by the Emperour's order had been taken from the Inhabitants of Alexandria; the multitude met together in the Circle, and entreated Florus the Præfectus Auguſtalis, who was come to Alexandria a little before this, that theſe things might be reſtored to them. Therefore, this hapned on the year of Chriſt 453. Valeſ.

and also Præfect of Alexandria, that he would restore to them the [d] allowance of Bread-corn (which he had taken from them,) and the Baths and the Shows, and whatever else they were deprived of on account of the Sedition which had been raised amongst them. And that Florus, by [e] his perswasion, went into the Assembly of the people, and promised to perform all this, and so the Sedition was appeased and vanished by little and little. Nor, were affairs at the Solitude near Jerusalem, in a sedate posture. For some of the Monks, who had been present at the Synod, and had imbibed Sentiments contrary to those Constitutions there established, came into Palestine: and complaining that the Faith was betrayed, made it their business to inflame and disturb * all the Monks. And in regard Juvenalis had recovered his own See, and, being by the Seditious compelled to retract and Anathematize his own opinion, had made a journey to the Imperial City; those who embraced Sentiments contrary to the Chalcedon Synod, (as I have said above,) met together, [f] and in the [Church of the] Holy Resurrection ordained Theodosius Bishop, the same person who had raised great disturbances in the Synod at Chalcedon, and who had given them the first account of that Synod. Concerning which Theodosius, the Monks in Palestine, when they afterwads wrote to [g] Alcison, gave this account: viz. that having [h] by his own Bishop been detected of [the commission of] impious Facts, he had been expelled out of his own Monastery; that going afterwards to Alexandria, [i] he had made an attempt upon Dioscorus, and that, after he had been lacerated with many stripes as a Seditious person, he was set upon a Camell, in such manner as Malefactours [are usually served,] and carried all over the City. [k] To this person came [the Inhabitants of] many Cities in the Palestines, and procured Bishops to be ordained over themselves by him. Amongst which number was one Petrus, by birth an Hiberian, who was entrusted with the government of the Bishoprick of that Town called Majuma, which is hard by the City of the Gazites. When Marcianus had received information of these things, in the first place he commands Theodosius to be brought to Court to him. Then he sends Juvenalis, to rectifie what had been done; whom he ordered to turn out all those who had been ordained by Theodosius. After the arrival of Juvenalis therefore, many wicked and horrid Facts were perpetrated; as well the one Faction as the other proceeding to the commission of whatever their fury suggested to them. For the envious Devil, hated by God, had so mischievously contrived and misinterpreted the [l] change of one Letter, that notwithstanding the [m] pronouncing of the one of these [Letters] doth therewithall wholly infer the other, yet 'tis thought by most persons, that there is a vast difference between them, that the meanings of both are diametrically opposite each to the other, and that they do mutually destroy one another. For, he that confesses Christ IN TWO Natures, does plainly affirm him [to subsist] OF TWO Natures; because, whilest he confesses Christ both in the Deity and in the Humanity, he asserts him to consist [n] of the Deity and of the Humanity.

[a] Τῷ τῆς σιτηρεσίου χορηγίαν. To the Citizens of Alexandria, as well as to those of Rome and Constantinople, Loaves of bread were every day delivered out; as we are informed from the fourteenth book of the Theodosian Code, Tit. De Frumento Alexandrino. But who had been the Beginner of this thing, 'tis uncertain. Diocletian was the first [Emperour] who bestowed the Panis Castrensis [the Camp-bread] upon the Alexandrians, as the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle relates at Constantius Cæsar's and Maximianus Jovius Cæsar's fourth Consulate; τῷ τῷ πῷ ἔτει (says he) ὁ χαρείσιος ἀρίθ ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ ὑπὸ διοκλητιανοῦ ἐδωρήθη, on this year the Panis Castrensis was given at Alexandria by Diocletian. Which passage occurs in the very same words in the Chronologicall Excerptions set forth by Scaliger at the end of Eusebius's Chronicon. Procopius (in his Anecdot. pag. 119.) says this Bread-corn was allowed by Diocletian to the poor only of the City Alexandria. Which when the Citizens of that City had in after times divided amongst themselves, they then transmitted it to their posterity. Procopius's words are these: Διοκλητιανὸς ῥωμαίων γενόμενος αὐτοκράτωρ οἵτε μέγα πρᾶγμα διέδοξε παρὰ τῷ δήμῳ τῷ ἀλεξανδρέων τοῖς σκευμένοις ἀνὰ πᾶν ἔτος διώσειν. ταῦτα ὁ δῆμος τυνικάδε διαδικασάμενοι ἐν σφίσιν αὐτοῖς, ἐς ἀπογόνους τοὺ μέχρι δεῦρο παρέπεμψαν; Diocletian having been made Emperour of the Romans, Decreed, that a vast quantity of Bread-corn should every year be given by the people to the indigent Alexandrians. The people having at that time quarrelled amongst their own selves about this [Bread-corn,] transmitted it to their descendants even to this day. In which words of Procopius's there is a very great fault, which Nicolaus Alemannus (a person otherwise of incomparable Learning) perceived not. For instead of these words [παρὰ τῷ δήμῳ, by the people,] it must undoubtedly be [παρὰ τῆς δημοσίας, out of the publick stock of Corn laid up for the Emperours use.] And, a little after, instead of these words, ταῦτα ὁ δῆμος τυνικάδε διαδικασάμενοι ἐν σφίσιν αὐτοῖς, the people having at that time quarrelled amongst themselves about this Bread-corn;] it must be thus [ταῦτα ὁ δῆμος τυνικάδε ἰδίᾳ δωσάμενοι ἐν σφίσιν αὐτοῖς, the people having at that time privately given this [Bread-corn] amongst their own selves.] Than which emendation there is nothing more certain. Further, long before Diocletian, to wit, in the times of Dionysius Alexandrinus, the Omogerontes of the City Alexandria received Bread-corn out of the publick stock, as Dionysius Alexandrinus informs us in his Epistle to Hierax the Bishop; which Letter Eusebius records, Eccles. Hist. book 7. chap. 21; where see note (e.) Therefore Diocletianus augmented, rather than began, this distribution of Bread-corn at Alexandria. Vales.

[e] Translatours understood not this place, as 'tis apparent from their Versions. For they thought that the word [αὐτῷ, his] was to be referred to Florus; when as it ought to be referred to Priscus Rhetor, out of whose History Evagrius has transcribed all these passages. For, Priscus Rhetor, in regard he was then conversant at Alexandria, gave Florus this advice, that he should go to the Cirque; in which place the Alexandrian populace were gathered together, and with great out-cries required Florus to come thither. Vales.

[f] Christophorson has rendred this place ill, after this manner: in sancto die festo Resurrectionis, Theodosium designant Episcopum, on the Holy Festival day of the Resurrection, they choose Theodosius Bishop. Musculus renders it righter, thus, ordinarunt in Ecclesiâ Sanctæ Resurrectionis, Theodosium illum, &c. in the Church of the Holy Resurrection, they ordained that Theodosius, &c. Concerning this Church of the Holy Resurrection I have made several remarks in my Notes on Eusebius's Life of Constantine. [See Valesius's Letter to a friend, De Anastasi & Martyrio Hierosolymitano, which Letter he has published at pag. 304. of his notes on Eusebius.] But, concerning this Theodosius, who invaded the See of Jerusalem, consult Baronius at the year of Christ 452. Vales.

* Τὸ μοναδικόν, the whole society of Monks.

[g] Instead of Acliſon, it must without doubt be Alcison; as the reading is in Nicephorus. These Letters of the Monks of Palestine to Alcison, are recorded by Evagrius, book 3. chap. 31. At which place we will say more concerning Alcison. Vales.

[h] Ὡς κατὰ τὸν ἴδιον ὅσιον κέκρικε. Sr Henry Savil had made this remark at the side of his Copy, forte παρὰ, perhaps it should be παρὰ, that is, by. So, 'tis certain, Christophorson and Musculus read; and so we have rendred it. I am very confident also, that Evagrius wrote it thus. But, Transcribers of books are wont frequently to mistake in these two præpositions, as 'tis known to those persons who have read over Manuscript copies. Vales.

[i] Ἀπελάβετο τῷ διοσκόρῳ, he had received Dioscorus. Sr Henry Savil had made a remark at the margin of his Copy, that perhaps the reading should be [ἐπελάβετο, he had laid hands upon,] which reading displeases me not. Nevertheless, I had rather write it thus, ἐπεβάλετο τῷ διοσκόρῳ. Which reading I have followed in my Version. Nor does Nicephorus (book 15. chap. 9.) seem to have read otherwise, who has expresst this passage in Evagrius thus, καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς ἀλεξάνδρου διάφορον διοσκόρῳ κατέστη, and had been an enemy to Dioscorus at Alexandria. But Musculus and Christophorson saw nothing in the rendition of this place. Vales.

[k] Πρὸς ὃν πολλὰς ἦλθ ἐν παλαιστίνῃ πόλεων ἀφικνούμενον. I have corrected this place by the Florentine Manuscript, in which Copy 'tis read thus: πρὸς ὃν πολλαὶ ἦλθ ἐν παλαισίναις πόλεων ἀφικνούμεναι, To this person came [the Inhabitants of] many Cities in the Palestines. It had been so agreed between the Bishops of Antioch and Jerusalem in the Synod of Chalcedon, that the Three Palestines should be under the disposition of the Bishop of Jerusalem. Vales.

[l] Evagrius means the Præpositions ἐν and ἐκ, [that is, in and of.] which differ one from the other in one Letter. The Catholicks confest Christ in two Natures. The Hereticks asserted, that he consisted of two Natures, but, which had grown together and were become one Nature. For, after the Union of the Word, they affirmed, that the Nature of Christ was one. Vales.

[m] I am of the same opinion with the Learned, who instead of [ἐκφωνήσεως,] have mended it thus, ἐκφωνήσεως, the pronouncing; which is the same with the reading in Nicephorus. And so Christophorson read; who notwithstanding, in the rendition of this place, has in no wise expresst Evagrius's meaning. In the Tellerian Manuscript, I found it written, ἐκφωνήσεως, the pronouncing. Vales.

[n] Ὁμολοῦντα ἐκ θεότητος. The term ὁμολοῦντα, [confessing] is to be expunged, in regard 'tis superfluous. It occurs nor in Nicephorus, and Sr Henry Savil, in his Copy, had drawn a line under it. Vales.

Again, he that affirms [Chriſt to ſubſiſt] of two Natures, the ſame perſon by a neceſſary conſequence does confeſs [him] in two Natures; becauſe, by his affirming Chriſt [to ſubſiſt] of the Deity and of the Humanity, he acknowledges him to conſiſt in the Deity and in the Humanity: the fleſh being neither converted into the Deity, nor the Deity *changed into the fleſh, of which [two Natures there is] an ineffable Union. So that, by this expreſſion OF TWO, may at the ſame time commodiouſly be underſtood this alſo IN TWO, and by this expreſſion IN TWO [may alſo be meant] OF TWO, the one [expreſſion] being †not different from the other. For as much as, ‖according to a copious uſe of ſpeaking, the Whole is known not only [to conſiſt] of, but in its parts. Yet nevertheleſs, men think theſe [expreſſions] to be in ſuch a manner ſeparated and disjoyned the one from the other, ([which Sentiments they are induced to give entertainment too] either from a certain uſage *about their thinking concerning God, or elſe from their being prepoſſeſſed [with a perſwaſion of mind] to have it ſo;) that they contemn [the undergoing of] all ſorts of death, rather than they will give their aſſent to the truth. And from hence aroſe thoſe [miſchiefs] which I have mentioned. In this poſture were theſe matters.

† Or, not relinquiſh't by the other.

‖ Κατὰ τὸ πρέπον; which may alſo be rendred, according to a peculiar mode of expreſſion: but 'tis an uncouth phraſe, not often to be met with, eſpecially in ſuch a ſenſe as 'tis here uſed.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Drought which hapned, and the Famine and the Peſtilence: and how in ſome places the Earth in a wonderfull manner brought forth fruits of its own accord.

ABout the ſame times, there hapned *a great Drought in both the Phrygia's, in both the Galatia's, in Cappadocia, and in Cilicia; in ſo much that a ſcarcity of neceſſaries [followed,] and men made uſe of unwholeſome and deſtructive food. Whence hapned a Peſtilence alſo. For, becauſe of their change of dyet, they fell ſick, and their bodies ſwelling by reaſon of the exceſſive inflammation, they loſt their eyes: they were troubled with a Cough at the ſame time alſo, and [uſually] dyed on the third day. For the Peſtilence, no cure could then be found out. But divine providence, the preſerver of all things, beſtowed on them that were left alive, a remedy againſt the Famine. For in that barren year, food was ſhowered down out of the air, which they termed Manna, in the ſame manner as ['twas heretofore ſhowered down] on the Iſraelites. But, on the year following, the good-natured [Earth] brought forth ripe fruits on its own accord. Moreover, [this calamity] deſtroyed the Country of the Paleſtinians, and innumerable other Provinces; [theſe *two] miſchiefs ſpreading themſelves over the whole earth.

* Or, a ſcarcity of ſhowers of rain.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the Murder of Valentinianus, and the taking of Rome; and concerning thoſe other Emperours who governed Rome [after Valentinianus's death.]

WHileſt theſe things *were tranſacted in the Eaſtern parts, Aëtius †is in a miſerable manner murdered at the Elder Rome. Valentinianus alſo Emperour of the Weſtern parts, and together with him Heraclius, [is ſlain] by ſome of Aëtius's Guards; the Plot againſt them being framed by Maximus (who afterwards poſſeſt himſelf of the Empire,) becauſe Valentinianus had abuſed Maximus's wife, having by force debauch't her. Further, this Maximus, by making uſe of all manner of violence, compelled Eudoxia (who had been Valentinianus's wife,) to be married to himſelf. She, deſervedly accounting this fact to be contumelious, and the higheſt indignity, took a reſolution to caſt every Dye (as the ſaying is,) [to the end ſhe might be revenged] both for what had been done in relation to [the aſſaſſination of] her husband, and alſo for the reproach which had been brought upon her own Liberty. For, a woman is fierce, and of an anger *implacable, if (when ſhe uſes her utmoſt endeavour to preſerve it inviolate,) her chaſtity be forcibly taken from her, and eſpecially by him who hath been her husband's Aſſaſſine. She ſends therefore into †Africa, to Gizerichus, and having forthwith preſented him with many Gifts, and by her Declaration put him into a good hope of what was behind, ſhe prevails with him to make a ſudden and unexpected Invaſion upon the Roman Empire, promiſing ſhe would betray all to him. Which having in this manner been performed, Rome is taken. But Gizerichus, in regard he was a Barbarian and of a diſpoſition inconſtant and mutable, kept not *his promiſe even with her: but having burnt the City, and made plunder of all [its riches,] he took Eudoxia together with her two daughters, marched back, went away, and returned into Africa. The elder of Eudoxia's daughters, by name Eudocia, he married to his own ſon †Hunericus. But the younger, (her name was Placidia,) together with her mother Eudoxia, he ſent ſome time after to Byzantium, attended with an Imperial Train and a Guard, to the end he might pacifie Marcianus. For he had highly incenſed him, both becauſe Rome had been burnt, and alſo in regard the Imperial Princeſſes had been ſo contumeliouſly uſed. Moreover, Placidia is match't by Marcianus's order, Olybrius having married her; who was look't upon to be the eminenteſt perſonage amongſt the [Roman] Senatours, and after the taking of Rome had betaken himſelf to Conſtantinople. Further, after Maximus, [a] Avitus reigned over the Romans eight months.

* Conſtantinople.

[a] After Valentinianus Placidus's death, and after the murder of Maximus, Avitus was proclaimed Emperour, firſt at Tolouſe, and then at Orleance, in Valentinianus's eighth Conſulate [which he bore] with Anthemius, in the year of Chriſt 455, on the ſixth of the Ides of July; as 'tis recorded in the Old Chronicon, which Cuſpinianus firſt publiſhed in his Faſti. On the year following, the ſame Avitus was Conſul, as 'tis related in the Faſti which Jacobus Sirmondus has publiſh't under the name of Idatius: and on the ſame year he was depoſed at Placentia, as Marius and Caſſiodorus inform us in their Faſti, as likewiſe that Old Chronographer put forth by Cuſpinianus. But, on what day, and in what month Avitus reſigned the Empire, I do not find declared by the Ancients. Indeed, Sigonius (in his fourteenth book de Occidentali Imperio,) writes, that Avitus resigned the Empire on the sixteenth of the Calends of June. But Sigonius quotes no Author of this thing. The words of Cuspinianus's Old Chronographer are these: Joanne & Varane Coss. captus est Imp. Avitus, &c. In the Consulate of Joannes and Varanes, the Emperour Avitus is taken at Placentia by Ricimeres master of the Milice. And his Patritius Messianus is slain, on the sixteenth of the Calends of June. From this place therefore Sigonius, induced thereto by conjectures, thought that Avitus had put off his purple, and that Messianus had been slain, on one and the same day; although the Old Chronographer affirms not that. For, that sixteenth of the Calends of June is referred to the murder of Messianus, not to Avitus's deposition. 'Tis certain, if what Evagrius relates here be true, (viz. that Avitus reigned eight months,) his deposition must necessarily fall on the month of March in the year 456. Idatius, in his Chronicon, seems to attribute three years Reign to Avitus. For, his words are these: Avitus tertio anno posteaquam à Gallis & à Gothis factus fuerat Imperator, caret Imperio, Gothorum promisso destitutus auxilio, caret & vitâ, Avitus on the third year after he had been made Emperour by the Galli and the Gotthi, wants his Empire, being disappointed of the promised assistance of the Gotthi, is deprived of his life also. But, in the Manuscript Copy, which Jacobus Sirmondus made use of, this place is read thus: Tertio anno, Avitus septimo mense posteaquam à Gallis & à Gothis factus fuerat Imperator, &c. On the third year, Avitus on the seventh month after he had been made Emperour by the Galli and Gotthi, &c. Jacobus Sirmondus, perceiving that these two were inconsistent, omitted these two words [septimo mense, on the seventh month] in his Edition; but he had done better, if he had expunged these two [tertio anno, on the third year.] For Avitus did not reign three years, but seven or eight months only, which months were part of two Consulates. For which reason 'tis affirmed by some Writers, that he reigned two years. Cedrenus, 'tis certain, writes thus in his Chronicon. Vales.

by

[b] Musculus and Christophorson read λιμῷ, by the Pestilence.

He having ended his life by the [b] Pestilence, [c] Majorianus held the Empire two years. After Majorianus had been traecherously slain by Ricimeres, Master of the Milice, Severus possest the Empire three years.

Which reading is in my judgment truer than the other, to wit, λιμῷ, by Famine. For, 'tis not probable, that Avitus (who after he had resigned the Empire, was made Bishop of Placentia, as Victor Turonensis, and Marius in his Chronicon, do relate;) should have dyed by Famine. Notwithstanding, Nicephorus has retained the Vulgar reading. Vales. In Robert Stephens the reading is [λιμῷ, Famine,]

[c] Majorianus [or Majourinus] governed the Roman Empire four years and as many months, as the Old Chronographer publisht by Cuspinianus informs us; to whom agree Idatius and Marcellinus in his Chronicon. Severus, who succeeded him, reigned almost the same space of years, as the same writers relate. But these things hapned after the death of the Emperour Marcianus, during Leo Augustus's government of the Eastern Empire. Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the death of Marcianus, and the Empire of Leo. And how, the Hereticks of Alexandria slew Proterius, and gave that Arch-Bishoprick to Timotheus Ælurus.

[a] Evagrius is out. Marcianus Augustus dyed in the Consulate

MOreover, [a] during Severus's Governing the Romans, Marcianus changed his Kingdom, and departed to a better Inheritance, when he had Governed the Empire [b] seven years only, of Constantinus and Rufus, on the year of Christ 457, in the month February. Majorianus was proclaimed Emperour at Ravenna in the same year, on the Calends of April, that is, almost two months after Marcianus's death. To whom succeeded Severus, on the year of Christ 461, in the Consulate of Severinus and Dagalaïfus, almost five years after the Emperour Marcianus's death. Further, this Severus was by another name termed Serpentius, as Theophanes informs us in his Chronicon, pag. 97, in these words, καὶ ἐπίρρη σεβῆρος ὁ καὶ σερπέντιος. And Severus, called also Serpentius, was Proclaimed. For so it must be read, as the most Learned Franciscus Combefisius has rightly conjectured. 'Tis certain, in the Alexandrian Chronicle he is so termed. For, on the fifteenth Indiction, Leo Augustus is put Consul the second time with Serpentinus. Now, 'tis manifestly known, that on this year Severus Augustus was Consul with Leo. For so Cassiodorus relates in his Fasti, and also the Old Author publish't by Cuspinianus. Vales.

[b] Marcianus reigned six years and as many months, as Marcellinus relates, and Victor Tunonensis in his Chronicon. He began his Reign in the year of Christ 450, on the eighth of the Calends of September, on the fifth Feria, as 'tis recorded in the Alexandrian Chronicle. And he dyed on the year of Christ 457. about the close of the month January, as Theodorus Lector informs us, with whom agrees the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle. For this Authour says, that Leo, who succeeded Marcianus, was proclaimed in the month Peritius, on the seventh of the Ides of February. So Marcianus reigned six years five months and some few days. Vales.

having left amongst all men a [c] truely royall Monument. The Alexandrians, informed of his death, with much more animosity and a greater heat of mind, renewed their rage against Proterius. For, the multitude is a thing with the greatest ease imaginable blown up into a rage, and which snatches hold of the most triviall occasions as fuell for Tumults. But above all others, the [populace] of Alexandria [are of this humour, which City] abounds with a numerous multitude made up mostly of an obscure and [d] promiscuous company of Foreigners, which by an unexpected and unaccountable boldness and precipitancy, [e] breaks out into violence and rage. 'Tis therefore for certain reported, that any one there who [makes complaint] [f] of the breaking any thing of small value [which he carries,] may incite the City to a popular Tumult, and may lead and carry [the multitude] whither, and against whom he pleases. For the most part also they are delighted with jests and sports, as § Herodotus relates concerning Amasis. And this is the humour of the Alexandrians. Nevertheless, as to other things, they are not such a sort of persons, as that any one may despise them.

[c] Nicephorus has interlined this place after this manner: καὶ μνημεῖον πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις τῷ βασιλείαν καταλελοιπῶς, and having left his Empire a monument to all men. Christophorson followed the same sense, as 'tis apparent from his rendition. For he translates it thus: Exemplari verè Regio omnibus ad intuendum relicto, A truly Royall Exemplar being left [by him] to the view of all persons. Musculus has rendred it in this manner; Et memoriam sui verè Imperia'em apud cunctos mortales reliquisset, And had left a truly Imperial memory of his own self amongst all mortalls. But Evagrius does not say this, but, that a monument manifestly Royall was left by Marcianus amongst all men. Now, that monument can be nothing else, than either his own life religiously spent, or rather the Chalcedon Synod, which he had ordered to be convened, to take away the dissentions of the Church, and whereat he himself, agreeable to the Example of Constantine the Great, would be present. In regard therefore, that Synod had been convened and perfected by his labour and diligence, it may deservedly be stiled the Work and Monument of the Emperour Marcianus. Vales.

[d] Συσκιάσας. In the Florentine M. S. the reading is, συσκιάσω. Notwithstanding, the Rules of Grammar require that we should write σύσκιασι, as Sr Henry Savil had remarked at the margin of his Copy. Suidas in his Lexicon explains συσκιάσων ἀνθρώπων by these terms, συμμίκλων, ἐπιλύδων, παρεισάκλων, promiscuous, extraneous persons, such as are brought in unawares.——Nicephorus has explained this word elegantly thus: μυείῳ πλήθει καὶ ὅθεν δήποτε ἥκουσι, a numerous multitude, and which comes from any place whatever. Vales.

[e] Τὰς ὁρμὰς γαυρώμενον. Something seems to be wanting here, which may perhaps be supplyed, by adding a Præposition, thus, κατὰ τὰς ὁρμὰς γαυρώμενον, breaks out into violence and rage. Vales.

[f] In the incomparable Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. this place is written thus: τὸ φορτικὸν καταῤῥήξαντι. Nicephorus has explained this place excellently well, in this manner: καὶ φασὶν ἔξον τῷ βουλομένῳ παντὶ τὸ φορτικὸν αἰτίαν πομπαμένῳ ῥᾴδιον εἰς πᾶσαν ἀναθαλεύειν τὸν δῆμον, And they say, that every one who will make use of an obvious [light, or triviall] occasion, may quickly enrage the people [and incite them] to a Sedition. Christophorson read καταῤῥήξαντι. For he renders it thus: Aiunt plebeium quemque modò ipse voluerit principium dare, &c. They say that every ordinary fellow, provided he be willing to give the Onset, may inflame that City [and excite it] to a popular and civil Sedition. But I approve not of this emendation. For, what shall become of these words, τὸ φορτικόν? I embrace therefore the reading in the Florent. and Tellerian M. SS. viz. τὸ φορτικὸν καταῤῥήξαντι; and render the whole passage thus: 'Tis therefore for certain reported, that any one there who [makes complaint] of the breaking any thing of small value [to wit, a glass vessel, pot, or any such like thing, which he carries,] may incite the City to a popular Tumult. Pollio (in Emilianus) confirms the same, where he speaks thus concerning the Egyptians in general: Et hoc familiare est populo Ægyptiorum, &c. And this is usual with the Egyptians, that, like furious and madmen, upon any triviall occasions they may be induced [to involve] the Publick in the greatest dangers. On account of their being past by unsaluted, by reason of their not having a place allowed them in the Baths, because their flesh and pot-herbs may have been taken from them, on account of their servile shooes, and other such like occasions as these, they have by Sedition often arrived at the highest peril of the Republick. Vales. § The passage in Herodotus, which Evagrius points at here, occurs in B. 2. of his History, pag. 157, Edit. Paul. Stephens, 1618. Vales.

The Alexandrians therefore obſerving the time, when Dionyſius Commander of the Milice made his Reſidence in the Upper Egypt, make choice of one Timotheus, ſurnamed Ælurus, to aſcend the Archi-Epiſcopal-Chair; a perſon who heretofore had followed a Monaſtick Life, but afterwards was enrolled amongſt the number of the Presbyters of the Alexandrian Church. When they had led this perſon to the Great Church, called [h] Cæſar's, they ordain him their Biſhop, whileſt Proterius was as yet living, and perſonally officiating in his Epiſcopal Function. Euſebius Biſhop of Peluſium, and Peter of Iberia [Biſhop] of the little Town Majuma, were preſent at the Ordination; as he who wrote Peter's Life, has told us, in his account of theſe tranſactions. Which writer affirms that Proterius was not murdered by the people, but by one of the Souldiers. Further, after Dionyſius had made his return to the City [Alexandria] with the greateſt celerity imaginable, (to which he had been urged by the nefarious facts there perpetrated,) and was uſing his endeavours to extinguiſh the kindled fire of the Sedition; ſome of the Alexandrians, incited thereto by Timotheus, (as the Contents of the Letter written to Leo [the Emperour] do declare,) murder Proterius by running their ſwords through his bowells, when he attempted to get away, and had fled as far as the moſt Holy Baptiſtery. And after they had tied a rope about him, [they hung him up] at that place termed The Tetrapylum, and ſhewed him to all perſons, jeering and crying out aloud, that that was Proterius who had been killed. After this, they drag'd the body all over the City, and then burnt it. Nor did they abhor taſting of his very bowells, according to the uſage of Savage-beaſts; as the Supplicatory Libell (wherein all theſe paſſages are contained,) ſent by all the Biſhops of Egypt, and by the whole Clergy of Alexandria, to Leo, who after Marcianus's death, as hath been ſaid, was inveſted with the Empire of the Romans, [doth evidence;] the Contents whereof are conceived in theſe expreſs words.

[h] The Great Church of the City Alexandria, was termed Cæſaria, as Epiphanius informs us, in Hæreſ. Arian, and Liberatus, in his Breviarium, cap. 18. But Socrates (Book 7. chap. 15.) ſays the name of that Church was Cæſarium. Athanaſius declares the reaſon of this Appellation (in his Epiſt. ad Solitar.) to wit. becauſe that Church had been built in a place which heretofore was called the Cæſarium, that is, the Temple of the Cæſars. There had been a School in the ſame place alſo, and a pallace of the Emperour Adrian's, which in ſucceeding times was termed Licinius's Pallace, as Epiphanius atteſts. Valeſ.

To the Pious, Chriſt-Lover, and by-God-deſigned Leo, Victor, Triumphator, and Auguſtus; The humble Addreſs preſented by all the Biſhops of Your Ægyptick Dioceſis, and by the Eccleſiaſticks in Your Greateſt and Moſt Holy Church of the Alexandrians.

Whereas by Celeſtiall Grace You have been beſtowed as a moſt Eximious Gift upon the World, 'tis no wonder if You ceaſe not (Moſt Sacred Emperour!) daily, after God, from making Proviſion for the Publick. And after ſome other words. And whileſt there was an uninterrupted peace amongſt the Orthodox Laity, both with us, and alſo at the City Alexandria, [diſturbances were raiſed] again by Timotheus, who made a ſeparation of himſelf from the Catholick Church and Faith, and cut himſelf off [therefrom,] ſoon after the holy Synod at Chalcedon, (at which time he was but a Presbyter,) together with four or five perſons only, heretofore Biſhops, and ſome few Monks, who together with him, were diſtempered with the Hereticall errour of Apollinaris and * that perſon. On which account having then been canonically depoſed by Proterius of divine memory, and by a Synod of [the Biſhops of] all Egypt, they deſervedly experienced the Imperial diſpleaſure † by Exile. And after ſome words interpoſed. And || having taken his advantage of that opportunity, when the Emperour Marcianus of Sacred * Memory made his departure hence to God; with impious Expreſſions (as if he had been ſubject to no Laws,) he in a moſt ſhameleſs manner raged againſt [and reproach't] the ſaid Emperour: and impudently Anathematizing the Holy and Oecumenicall Synod at Chalcedon, he draws after him a multitude of || Mercenary and diſorderly fellows, with whom he has made war, contrary to the Divine Canons, and to the Eccleſiaſtick Conſtitution, [in oppoſition] to the Republick, and to the Laws; and † has violently thruſt himſelf into the Holy Church of God, which at that time had its Paſtour and Teacher, Our moſt Holy Father and Arch-Biſhop Proterius, who then Celebrated the uſuall Religious and ſolemn Aſſemblies, and poured forth his prayers to Chriſt the Saviour of us all, for Your Religious Empire, and for Your Chriſt-loving Palace. And, after the interpoſition of a few words. Then, after the ſpace of one day, when (as 'twas cuſtomary) the moſt pious Proterius continued in the Biſhops Pallace, Timotheus taking with him two Biſhops who had been legally depoſed, and [ſome] Eccleſiaſticks, who, as we have ſaid, had in like manner been condemned to dwell in Exile; ([i] as if he could have received Ordination from two [Biſhops;] not ſo much as one of the Orthodox Biſhops throughout the Egyptick-Dioceſis being there, who are always wont to be preſent at ſuch Ordinations of the Biſhop of the Alexandrians:) takes poſſeſſion; as he ſuppoſed, of the Archi-epiſcopal Chair; audaciouſly attempting manifeſtly to commit adultery upon that Church, which had its own Bridegroome, who performed the divine [offices] therein, and canonically adminiſtred his own See. And after ſome other words. That Bleſſed perſon [Proterius] could do nothing elſe, than (as 'tis written,) * Give place unto wrath, and make his eſcape to the adorable Baptiſtery, that he might avoid their incurſion, who ran in upon him to murder him: in which † place moſt eſpecially, a dread and terrour is uſually infuſed into the minds even of Barbarians, and all other Savage and cruell perſons, who are ignorant of the adorableneſs of that place, and of the Grace flowing therefrom. Nevertheleſs, theſe [Ruffians,] who uſed their utmoſt endeavour to bring that deſigne to effect, which from the beginning [they had laid with] Timotheus; [theſe Butchers] who would not ſuffer Proterius to be preſerved even within thoſe immaculate * Rails; who revered neither the † ſanctity of the place, nor the time it ſelf; (for [k] it was the Feſtival-day of the Salutary Eaſter;) who dreaded not [the dignity of] the Sacerdotall Function, to which

* Τῶν καθ' ἑαυτὸν· they mean Eutyches; and ſo Valeſius renders it.

[i] I have mended this place from the Florentine M.S. in which Copy (inſtead of καὶ δὴ χειροτονίαν παρὰ μὴ δυὸ δεξάμενος, and moreover, receiving ordination from two;) the reading is, ὡς δὴ χειροτονίαν, &c. as if he could have received ordination from two [Biſhops.] In the fourth Canon of the Nicene Councill, 'tis in expreſs words eſtabliſhed, that a Biſhop is to be ordained by at leaſt three Biſhops of his own Province. The old Tranſlatour of this Letter read as we do; whoſe verſion is extant in the third part of the Chalcedon Synod. Where his Rendition is this, tanquam manus impoſitionem ſuſcepturus a duobus, as if about to receive impoſition of hands from two. Valeſ.

† Or, reverence.

[k] Liberatus (in his Breviarium, chap. 15.) relates, that Pro-

terius was not murdered on the Festival of Easter, but three days before. For these are his words: Et ante triduum Paschæ, &c. And on the third day before Easter, whereon the Lords Supper is celebrated, Proterius of holy memory is by the multitudes themselves shut up in the Church, whither out of fear he had betaken himself. And there on the same day in the Baptistery, he is slain, torn in pieces, cast out, and his Corps is burnt, and his ashes are strewed into the winds. All which Liberatus has almost word for word written out of the Gesta de nomine Acacii, which we owe to Jacobus Sirmondus. Valef.

[1] Instead of [διαλομών τε καταμέλει] it must undoubtedly be written thus: διατεμόντες κατὰ μέλη, cutting it in pieces, or, limb from limb. Instead of μέλη, the reading in the Florent. M. S. is μέλθ; which is a very small difference. Nicephorus confirms our Emendation, at book 15. chap. 17; who has it expressly written as I had conjectured. Further, this Supplicatory-Libell of the Bishops of the Egyptick Diœcesis to the Emperour Leo, if any one has a mind to read it entire, occurs in Latine, in the third part of the Chalcedon Synod, chap. 11. Valef.

Moreover, Zacharias giving a Narrative of these matters [in his History,] is of opinion, that most of these things were done [in such a manner as I have related them;] but says they were occasioned by Proterius's fault, who had raised most grievous Seditions at Alexandria: [he affirms likewise,] that these Facts were audaciously perpetrated (not by the people, but) by some of the Souldiers; which affirmation he grounds on the Letter written by Timotheus to [the Emperour] Leo. Further, in order to the punishing these enormities, Stilas is sent by the Emperour Leo.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the Emperour Leo's Circular Letters.

ALso, Leo wrote Circular Letters to the Bishops throughout the whole Roman Empire, and to those persons eminent for their leading a Monastick life; asking their opinion, both concerning the Synod at Chalcedon, and also about Timotheus surnamed Ælurus's Ordination: he sent to them likewise Copies of the Supplicatory-Libells presented to him, as well by Proterius's Party, as by that of Timotheus Ælurus. The Contents of the Circular Letters [of Leo] are these.

A Copy of the most Pious Emperour Leo's Sacred Letter, sent to Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople, and to the Metropolitanes, and other Bishops over the whole world.

Emperour Cæsar, Leo, Pius, Victor, Triumphator, Maximus, always Augustus; to Anatolius the Bishop. It was the desire and Prayer of Our Piety, that the most Holy Orthodox Churches, and also [all] the Cities * of the Roman Empire, should enjoy the greatest Peace imaginable, nor that any thing should happen, which might disturb their Constitution and Tranquillity. But, what [disturbances] have lately hapned at Alexandria, are (we are fully perswaded,) already made known to Your Sanctity. Nevertheless, that you may have a more perfect account concerning all things, what the Causes were of so great a Tumult and Confusion; We have transmitted to Your Piety the Copies of the Supplicatory-Libells, which the most Pious Bishops and Ecclesiasticks, coming from the foresaid City [Alexandria] and from the Ægyptick Diœceses, to the Imperial City Constantinople, have brought to Our Piety against Timotheus: and moreover, the Copies of the Supplicatory-Libells, which [some persons,] coming from Alexandria to Our Divine Court on Timotheus's account, have presented to Our Serenity: so that, Your Sanctity may apparently know what hath been done by the foresaid Timotheus, whom the populacy of Alexandria, the [a] Honorati, the Decuriones, and the Navicularii, desire to have for their Bishop; [and that you may have an account] concerning other matters [b] contained in The Text of the Supplicatory-Libells; and moreover, concerning the Chalcedon Synod, to which [the forementioned persons] do in no wise agree, as their Supplicatory-Libells, here underplaced, do demonstrate. Let therefore Your Piety cause all the Orthodox and Holy Bishops, who at present are resident in this Imperial City, as likewise the most Pious Ecclesiasticks, forthwith to come together unto You. And having with great care * treated of, and enquired into all things; (for as much as the City Alexandria hath already been disturbed, the State and repose whereof is our greatest care;) acquaint us with Your Sentiment concerning the foresaid Timotheus, and concerning the Chalcedon Synod, without any humane fear, and without affection or hatred, placing before your eyes the only fear of the Omnipotent God, in regard you well know, that you shall give an account concerning this affair to the incorrupt Deity. That so, We having been perfectly informed of all things by Your Letters, may be enabled to * promulge an accommodate Edict.

* Or, under the Government of the Romans.

[a] Ἀξιωματικοὶ καὶ πολιτευόμενοι, καὶ ναυκληροι. Who these ἀξιωματικοὶ, and who were termed πολιτευόμενοι, I have already shown in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 14. and pag. 225. [the ἀξιωματικοὶ, whom we render the Honorati, were those persons who bore the Civill dignities as well in the Cities, as in the Provinces; the πολιτευόμενοι were the Decuriones.] Gregorius Nazianzenus joyns them both together, in his 49th Epistle to Olympius, where his words are these: πάντας πολίτας τε καὶ πολιτευτὰς καὶ ἀξιωματικούς. That is, all the Citizens, the Decuriones, and the Honorati. The same Gregorius, in his 22d Epistle to the Casarienses, joyns the same persons both together, in these words; τοῖς ἐν τῷ ἀξιωματικῷ καὶ βουλευτικῷ πλήθει; that is, all those who are of the Order of the Honorati, and of the Decuriones. The old Translator therefore of this Letter, renders this passage truly, thus, Honorati & Curiales & Naucleri, the Honorati, the Curiales, and the Naucleri. The Naucleri were the Masters of the Vessells in the River Nyle, who conveyed the Corn and publick Provisions from Egypt to Constantinople. Aurelianus seems to have instituted their Body, as he himself shews in his Epistle to Arabianus, which is cited by Vopiscus. These Naucleri, or Navicularii were a Society of Sea-faring men, ordained for Transportation of Corn and publick Provisions in severall quarters of the Empire; (for there was a Body of them in the East, another in Africk, and a third at Alexandria;) they were a set number, and transported the said provisions at their own expence, succeeding by turns in the charge and burthen; to which their sons and heirs were lyable, as were also those who possest their estates after them, according to that proportion which they possessed. To this Function they were always obnoxious, so that scarcely could they be excused by any great honour obtained. They were forced to build Ships and Vessells of certain burthens; but the materialls for them were supplied by the Country. Their charge was great, and so were their priviledges, as may be seen by Various laws extant concerning them in the Theodosian Code. Valef.

[b] I am of the same opinion with Sr Henry Savill, who at the margin of his Copy had remarkt, that in his judgment the reading should be περιεχομένων, contained: so Christophorson read; and 'tis so in Nicephorus, phorus, book 15. chap. 18. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens the reading is παρεχομένων, given, or, exhibited.

This was the Letter ſent to Anatolius. [The Emperour] wrote Letters like this, to other Biſhops alſo, and to thoſe eminent perſons, who (as I have ſaid, at that time * lead a life void of the furniture [of living] and remote from matter. Of which number was Symeones, the firſt Inventer of the Station † in a pillar, whom we have mentioned in the Firſt [Book of our] Hiſtory: amongſt whom alſo were Baradatus and [c] Jacobus the Syrians.

* Or, lead an unfurniſh't and immaterial life: he means the Monks.

† Or, upon.

[c] Nicephorus Calliſtus terms this Jacobus, Niſibenus, and adds, that mention is made, as well of him, as of Varadatus [or, Baradatus,] by Theodoret in his Hiſtoria Religioſa. Notwithſtanding, Theodoret, in chap. 21. of his Hiſtoria Religioſa does not ſay, that Jacobus was a Niſibene; which thing Theodoret would not in any wiſe have omitted, if Jacobus had indeed been a Niſibene. For, whereas he notes, that this Latter Jacobus was like the former Jacobus Niſibenus, not only in name, but in manners, and dignity, (for both of them were Prieſts;) if he had been a Niſibene alſo, Theodoret would in no wiſe have omitted that at that place. Neither, does Theodorus Lector (Collectan. book 1.) make this Latter Jacobus, who anſwered Leo Auguſtus's Circular Letters, a Niſibene; nor yet Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag. 96. There is alſo extant an Epiſtle of Theodoret's, written to this Jacobus, in which he terms him a Presbyter and a Monk. Inſtead of Baradatus, Theophanes ſtiles him Bardas, corruptly as I think. In the Third part of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 375. amongſt the Monks, to whom the Emperour Leo wrote Letters, the firſt named is the Monk Jacobus Niſibenus, then Symeones and Baradatus. Ephremius Biſhop of Antioch makes mention of them alſo, in his Epiſtle ad Monachos Σπουδαίους, that is, Severianos; and in his third Oration, which he wrote to the Monks Domnus and Johannes, as it occurs in Photius. Valeſ.

CHAP. X.

Concerning thoſe things which the Biſhops and Symeones the Stylite wrote in anſwer [to the Emperour Leo's Circular Letters.]

IN the firſt place therefore, Leo Biſhop of the Elder Rome wrote in defence of the Chalcedon Synod, and diſallowed of Timotheus's Ordination, [a] as having been illegally performed. Which Letter of Leo's, the Emperour Leo ſent to Timotheus Prelate of the Alexandrian Church, and by [b] Diomedes the [c] Silentiarius, who was imployed in carrying the Imperiall Mandates. Sr Henry Savil; who inſtead of [ᾧ ἀθέσμως, and having been illegally] have mended it thus [ὡς ἀθέσμως γενομένην, as having been illegally performed.] 'Tis certain, in theſe books of Evagrius, ᾧ was moſt frequently put inſtead of ὡς; which we, following the authority of the M. S. Copies, have mended. But at this place, in regard the Manuſcript Copies differed not from the printed ones, we ſcrupled the altering of any thing. Valeſ.

[a] I am of the ſame mind with Chriſtophorſon and Sr Henry Savil

[b] The name of this Silentiarius was wanting in the ordinary Editions, and in Nicephorus. We have put it in, from the incomparable Florentine Manuſcript; wherein 'tis plainly and expreſsly written thus; διομήδους σιλεντιαείου, by Diomedes the Silentiarius. Concerning the Silentiarii I have heretofore obſerved ſomething in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus. Valeſ.

[c] Nicolaus Alemannus (in his Hiſtoricall Notes on Procopius's Hiſtoria Arcana, pag. 103, Edit. Lugd. 1623,) tells us, that the Silentiarii, whom Procopius (as he remarks,) ſometimes terms Domeſtici and Protectores, were Officers of the greateſt honour about the Emperour, in regard they were of the Emperour's inmoſt Chamber; on which account they were alſo termed Cubicularii. He ſays further, that the outward Chamber (out of which there was an immediate paſſage into the very Chamber of the Emperour, by reaſon of the ſilence there kept in Reverence to the Emperour,) was termed Silentium, the Silence; which the Greeks by a corrupt name called σιλεντιείκιον: whence theſe Cubicularii had the name of Silentiarii. Meurſius (in the word σιλεντιάριος) makes two Orders of theſe Officers: the firſt was a meaner ſort of Office, their buſineſs was to command the people to be ſilent and quiet. The other Order of the Silentiarii was far more honourable; they were, ſays Meurſius, over the Secrets of the Emperour, and are reckoned amongſt the Clariſſimi. See Dr Howell's account of theſe Officers, Part II. of his Hiſt. chap. 1. pag. 51.

To whom Timotheus returned anſwer, wherein he blamed the Chalcedon Synod, and [found fault with] Leo's Letter. The Copies of theſe Epiſtles are extant [d] in that Collection of Letters termed the Encyclicæ. But I have deſignedly omitted the inſerting them, becauſe I * would not have this preſent Work ſwell to a Greatneſs of bulk. The Biſhops of other Cities likewiſe ſtedfaſtly adhered to the Sanctions [of the Synod] at Chalcedon, and † unanimouſly condemned Timotheus's Ordination. Excepting only [e] Amphilochius [Biſhop] of Side; who wrote a Letter to the Emperour, wherein he cryed out indeed againſt Timotheus's Ordination; but admitted not of the Synod at Chalcedon. Zacharias the Rhetorician has written concerning theſe very affairs, and has inſerted this very Letter of Amphilochius's into his Hiſtory. Moreover, Symeones of Holy Memory, wrote two Letters concerning theſe matters, one to the Emperour Leo, another to Baſilius Biſhop of Antioch. Of which two Letters, I will inſert into this my Hiſtory that which he wrote to Baſilius, in regard 'tis very ſhort; the Contents whereof are theſe.

* Or, I would not bring a greatneſs upon this preſent work.

[d] Ἐν τοῖς καλουμένοις ἐγκυκλίοις. Chriſtophorſon underſtood this place very ill, as it appears from his Verſion: for he renders it thus: iſtarum Epiſtolarum Exemplaria extant in litteris Leonis Imperatoris generatim ad omnes ſcriptis, &c. The Copies of theſe Epiſtles are extant in the Emperour Leo's Letters, which he wrote in general to all perſons, &c. But Liberatus Diaconus, in his Breviarium, chap. 15. does incomparably well declare, what theſe Encyclicæ [that is, Circular Letters] were, in theſe words. Imperator ſcripſit ſingularum civitatum Epiſcopis de utroque negotio, &c. The Emperour wrote to the Biſhops of every City, concerning each affair, conſulting what ought to be done, &c. Who return anſwer, that the Chalcedon Synod is to be vindicated even unto bloud: but, that Timotheus was not only not to be reckoned amongſt the Biſhops, but to be deprived even of the Chriſtian Appellation. And theſe Epiſtles or Relations of all the Biſhops, in one body of a book, are termed Encyclicæ. Further, theſe Encyclicæ, tranſlated almoſt all into Latine, are extant in the third part of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 372, &c. of the Cologne Edition; an eximious piece of Eccleſiaſtick Antiquity, which I heartily wiſh were extant in Greek. There is mention made of theſe Encyclicæ in Victor Tunonenſis's Chronicon. Valeſ.

[e] There is mention of this Amphilochius Biſhop of Side, in Photius's Bibliotheca, chap. 52. Where the Letters of Atticus and Siſinnius Biſhops of Conſtantinople, written to him, are recorded. The ſame Amphilochius was preſent at the Epheſine and Chalcedon Synods, as 'tis apparent from the Synodick Acts. Further, Eulogius Biſhop of Alexandria, book 9, does atteſt, that this Amphilochius Biſhop of Side, although at the beginning he had affirmed in his Letters to the Emperour Leo, that he could in no wiſe give his aſſent to the Chalcedon Synod, yet ſome little time after conſented and ſubſcribed to that ſame Synod. Eulogius's words are related by Photius in his Bibliotheca, pag. 879; Edit. David. Hoeſchel. 1611. Valeſ.

To my moſt Pious and moſt Holy Lord, the Religious Baſilius Arch-Biſhop; the Sinner and mean Symeones [wiſheth] health in the Lord.

It is now, My Lord, opportune to ſay, Bleſſed be God, who hath not turned away our Prayer, nor [removed] his mercy from us ſinners. For, on receipt of the Letters of Your Dignity, I admired the Zeal and Piety of our Emperour moſt dear to God, which he hath ſhown, and [now] does demonſtrate towards the Holy Fathers, and their moſt firm Faith. Nor is this Gift from us, according as the Holy Apoſtle ſaith; but from God, who through our Prayers hath given * Him this propenſity and ſingular earneſtneſs of mind. And, after ſome few words. Wherefore, I my ſelf, a mean perſon and of ſlender account, † the untimely birth of the Monks, † Ἔκτρωμα μοναχῶν; See 1 Cor. 15. 8. have made known my Sentiment to his Imperial Majeſty concerning the Faith of the ſix hundred and thirty Holy Fathers convened at Chalcedon; who do perſiſt in, and am grounded upon upon that Faith which has been revealed by the Holy Spirit. For, if our Saviour is present amongst two or three who are gathered together in his Name, * how could it possibly be amongst so many, so great, and such Holy Fathers, that the Holy Spirit should not have been with them from the beginning? And, after the interposition of some words. Wherefore be strong, and behave your self valiantly in the defence of true piety; in such manner as Jesus the Son of Nave, the Servant of the Lord, [behaved himself] in defence of the Israelitish people. Give, I beseech you, my Salutes to all the Pious Clergy under Your Sanctity, and to the blessed and most faithfull † Laity.

* Or, how could he [our Saviour] have had a place amongst so many, so great, and such Holy Fathers, unless the Holy Spirit had been with them from the beginning?

† Or, people.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the Banishment of Timotheus Ælurus, and the Ordination of Timotheus Salophaciolus; and concerning Gennadius and Acacius [Bishops] of Constantinople.

After these things, Timotheus is condemned to be banished, he also [as well as * Dioscorus] being ordered to dwell at Gangra. The Alexandrians therefore † elect another Timotheus to succeed Proterius in that Bishoprick: this [Timotheus] some persons termed [a] Basilicus, others [called him] Salophaciolus. Anatolius dying [in this interim,] Gennadius succeeds in the Chair of the Imperial [City Constantinople.] And after him Acacius, who had presided over The Orphans Hospital at the Imperial City.

* See chap. 5.

† Or, elect Timotheus another Bishop successour to Proterius.

[a] Οἱ μὲν βασιλικὸν. So also Nicephorus writes it. But in Liberatus's Breviarium, chap. 16, this surname of Timotheus is written far otherwise. For Liberatus's words are these: Et exilio relegatur Timotheus Ælurus Chersonam arctâ custodiâ, & sit pro Proterio Timotheus cognomento Salophaciolus sive Asbus, And Timotheus Ælurus is conveyed into banishment to Chersona under a close guard, and in Proterius's stead Timotheus, surnamed Salophaciolus, or Asbus, is made [Bishop.] But in Liberatus it must be written Albus; as Theophanes informs us in these words (See his Chronicon, pag. 56,) πμδ'Θ· δὲ ἄλλος δόκλαν λδκδς, ὁ καὶ σαλοφακιόλιος ἐχειροτονήθη, But another Timothy surnamed Albus, called also Salophaciolus, was ordained. Cedrenus relates the same. What must we say therefore? Shall we affirm that in Evagrius it must be written Albus, instead of Basilius? Or, does Salophaciolus import something that is royall? Indeed, φασιολὸν in Greek signifies fascia, which may be taken for a royall Diadem. But, nothing of certainty can be gotten out of this Surname, in regard 'tis variously written in ancient writers. Vales.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Earthquake which hapned at Antioch, Three hundred fourty and seven years after that [which had hapned] in the times of Trajane.

[F]Urther, on the second year of Leo's Empire, there hapned a great and vehement motion and shaking of the earth at Antioch; some [Facts] perpetrated with the utmost rage and fury imaginable, and which far exceeded the most superlative Ferity of Beasts, having before-hand been committed by the populacy of that City; which [facts] were the prelude as 'twere to such mischiefs as these. Now, this most calamitous accident hapned on the five hundredth and sixth year [a] of Antioch's being entitled to all the priviledges and immunities of a free City, about the fourth hour of the night that * preceded the fourteenth day of the month Gorpiæus, (which month the Romans term September,) the Lords day approaching, [b] on the eleventh ‖ partition of the Cycle; this is related to have been the sixth [Earthquake which shaked Antioch,] three hundred [c] fourty and seven years having passed, from the time that that [Earthquake] had hapned [which came to pass] in Trajan's Empire. For that [Earthquake in Trajan's time] hapned on the hundredth [d] fifty ninth year of Antioch's being entitled to the priviledges and Immunities of a free City.

* Or, led to.

‖ Or, indiction.

[a] Χρηματίζοντος τῆς πόλεως. When Provinces submitted themselves to the Roman Empire, 'twas usual for the Emperour to cause an Edict to be drawn up, and proclaimed openly upon the place. The Tenour whereof was, first to entitle the Emperour himself to all respects of dominion and supremacy over that people, and then secondly to abate from this by a popular insinuation of all possible sacredness and Liberty of the Provincialls. A particular instance hereof, as it relates to this very City Antioch, is produced by M[r] Jo. Gregory of Oxford (see his works pag. 156, Edit. London, 1665,) from Johannes Antiochenus's M. S. Geograph. book 9; in these words: καὶ προεξέθη ἐν ἀντιοχείᾳ ἡ ἐλευθερία αὐτῆς, ὅτε ἐχρίσθη ὑπὸ ῥωμαίων, &c. And when the City Antioch had yielded it self up to the subjection of the Roman Empire, an Edict of the Liberties thereof was sent by Julius Cæsar, and publickly proclaimed at Antioch upon the twentieth of May: the Contents whereof were these, AT ANTIOCH THE HOLY, SACRED AND FREE CITY, THE METROPOLITAN QUEEN, AND PRESIDENT OF THE EAST, CAIUS JULIUS CÆSAR, &c. The Provinces usually returned the honour of these priviledges back upon the Emperour, by this way of acknowledgement. That they might keep the Emperour's Grace in perpetuall memory, they reckoned all their publick affairs ever after from that time; χρηματίζη ἔν (continues the same Johannes Antiochenus) ἡ μεγάλη ἀντιόχεια, &c. Therefore Antioch the Great, in honour of the Emperour, fixed its Æra in Caius Julius Cæsar, and made this year of Grace the first. On which account, this Æra of theirs, which precedes that of our Lords Nativity fourty eight years, was peculiarly called χρηματισμὸς τῆς ἀντιοχέων, because at the fixing hereof, the Emperour did χρηματίσαι ἑαυτὸν, publickly name himself to all the title of dominion; and also χρηματίσαι αὐτοὺς, publickly entitle them to all priviledges and immunities.

[b] Ἀνὰ τὸν ἐνδεκάτον ὀπηνέμησιν τῶ κύκλω ἑκτὸς πυχάνειν ἱστορέμενον, &c. Musculus has rendred this place very ill. But Christophorson, in regard he could not understand the meaning of these words, omitted them in his version. Indeed, this place tortured me a long while and very much. Notwithstanding, at length I found the meaning of it to be this. After Evagrius has set forth the time wherein the Earthquake hapned at Antioch, in the Reign of Leo Augustus, by certain Notes, to wit, of the year, month, week, day, and Indiction: in the last place he adds these words, τῶ κύκλω ἕκτ]Θ·. That is, that that Earthquake had hapned without any turning of the Cycles, three hundred fourty seven years compleat after that Earthquake which had hapned in Trajan's times. For this note of time hath no Cycle. But the former notes of time assigned by Evagrius, are [notes] of the Cycles or Periods. For, an Indiction is a Cycle of fifteen years, and a week, a month, and a year, are Circles and Periods always recurring. This therefore is my Sentiment concerning the explication of this place: Nevertheless, if any one shall produce a more certain account of this passage, I will not refuse to alter my opinion. See Evagrius, book 3. chap. 33; and note (b) there. This place may also be taken otherwise, by changing only the accent, in this manner, ἕκτ]Θ· πυχάνειν ἱστορέμενον. That so the sense may be this. This is said to be the sixth Earthquake which shaked Antioch. Nor, do I now doubt, but this is the true interpretation of this place. In the Tellerian Manuscript, I found it plainly written [ἕκτ]Θ·, the sixth] with an asperate, and the accent in the first syllable. Vales. The reading in Robert Stephens is the same with that set at the beginning of this note. In the Greek Text of Valesius's Edition, this place is pointed and accented thus: ἀνὰ τὸν ἐνδεκάτον ὀπηνέμησιν τῶ κύκλω, ἕκτ]Θ· πυχάνειν ἱστορέμενον, &c. which reading and punctation we have followed in our version.

[c] I have restored this place from the incomparable Florentine M.S. wherein 'tis plainly written thus: ζ' καὶ μ'; that is, fourty and seaven. The reading in Nicephorus, at book 15. chap. 20. is altogether the same, Vales. And so 'tis in Robert Stephens's Edition also; notwithstanding Valesius's saying that he restored this place.

[d] Baronius in his Ecclesiastick Annals, at the year of Christ 111, says that Evagrius is mistaken, in affirming, that that Earthquake which came to pass at Antioch in Trajan's Reign, hapned on the year (according to the Antiochians account) 159. For, that Earthquake hapned in the Consulate of Messala and Pedo, as 'tis manifest from Dion, Dion, who aſſerts that the Conſul Pedo periſhed in that Earthquake. Further, the Conſulate of Meſſala and Pedo fell on the year of Chriſt 115, as 'tis agreed amongſt all Chronologers. It was then, according to the Antiochians account, the hundredth ſixty third year, not the hundredth fifty ninth year, as Evagrius ſays. For, the years of the Antiochians precede Chriſt's Nativity fourty eight years. Moreover, concerning theſe years of the Antiochians, amongſt the Ancients the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle has ſpoken beſt of all, in the affairs of Julius Cæſar: but, amongſt the Moderns, Dionyſius Petavius [gives us the beſt account hereof] in his books de Doctrina Temporum, and in the ſecond part of his Rationarium, chap. 14. To which Author nevertheleſs I can't give my aſſent in this which he affirms, viz. that the beginning of theſe years is deduced from the month October, which was the popular [or, ordinary] beginning of the year amongſt the Antiochians. In my Annotations on Euſebius [See Euſeb. book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, chap. 1. note (e.)] I have, in my judgment, ſufficiently demonſtrated, that the Antiochians began their year from the month Dius, or November. Nor, is that true which Petavius writes at the ſame place, viz. that the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle ſeems to deduce the beginning of theſe years from the month May. For the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle does not ſay that; he affirms only, that the Decree of the Senate, whereby Antioch was pronounced a free City, was received by the Antiochians on the month May, and then alſo publickly propoſed. Valeſ.

But this [Earthquake] in the times of Leo [hapned] on the five hundredth and ſixth year, as 'tis declared by the moſt accurate and diligent Writers. Further, this Earthquake ruined almoſt all the houſes of the New City, the Inhabitants whereof were very numerous, nor was there any part of it empty, or wholly neglected; but 'twas extraordinary beautified and adorned by the [preceding] Emperours magnificence, who ſtrove to out-doe one another [in that thing.] Likewiſe, the firſt and ſecond fabrick of the Pallace fell down; but the other buildings continued ſtanding, together with the adjoyning Bath; which having been uſeleſs before, at ſuch time as this calamitous accident hapned, was of neceſſity [made uſe of] for the bathing of * the Citizens, the other Baths having been ruined. Moreover, the Porticus's before the Pallace fell down, and the Tetrapylum [which ſtood] behind them. Beſides, the Towers of the Hippodrome which [were] near the Gates, and [c] ſome of the Porticus's which led to theſe [Towers fell.] In the old City the Porticus's and houſes were wholly untouch't by the Ruine: but ſome ſmall part of Trajan's, Severus's, and Adrianus's Baths, was ſhaken, and overturned. This Earthquake alſo ruined ſome [parts] of the Geitonia of [that Region] termed the [f] Oſtracine, together with the Porticus's, as likewiſe that termed the [g] Nymphæum. Every of which particulars Johannes the Rhetorician has related with a ſingular accuracy.

* Or, the City.

[c] In the incomparable Florentine Manuſcript this whole place is written thus: καὶ τὸ ἱππο-δρόμιον δὲ καὶ τοὺς πρὸς τὰς δύσεις πυρσὲς, καὶ πύλας τῆς ἐπ' αὐτοῦ στοᾶν, Beſides, the Towers of the Hippodrome [or Cirque] which [were] near the gates, and ſome of the Porticus's which lead to thoſe [Towers, fell.] Which doubtleſs is the better reading. The Gates of the Cirque were fortified with two Towers on each ſide. There were alſo ſome Porticus's, which led to thoſe Towers, from the gates of the Cirque, as I ſuppoſe. In the Tellerian M. S. I found it written, πυλὰς τῆς ἐπ' αὐτὰς στοῶν, ſome of the Porticus's [which led] to thoſe [Gates.] Valeſ. In Robert Stephens, this whole clauſe is worded thus: καὶ τὸ ἱπποδρόμιον δὲ καὶ παρὰ τὰς δύσεις πύρσες, καί τινας τῆς ἐπ' αὐτῷ στοᾶν, and the Towers of the Hippodrome from the Gate, and ſome of the Porticus's [leading] from them.

[f] Inſtead of [Oſtracinia,] the reading in the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. and in Nicephorus, is truer; which is thus, Oſtracine. Our Evagrius mentions this place again, at chap. 8. book 6. But what the Oſtracine was, 'tis hard to ſay.—Geitonia is a continuation of houſes which received [or ſtood behind] the publick Porticus's. Which Libanius alſo confirms in his Antiochicus, pag. 372. Edit. Paris 1627. It was termed Oſtracine, becauſe the Potters-workhouſes were there. The Old Gloſſes render ὀστρακινον, fictile, a thing made of Potters-earth. Valeſ.

[g] So the Greeks termed the Temple of the Nymphs; which Libanius deſcribes in his Antiochicus, pag. 372. Edit. ut prius. Valeſ.

This Writer therefore affirms, that a thouſand Talents of Gold were by the Emperour remitted to the City out of the Tributary Function; and that, to the Citizens [were abated] the [h] yearly Tolls paid to the publick Treaſury for thoſe houſes which had been deſtroyed by that calamity: and moreover, that the [i] ſame [Emperour] took care of the publick [works and] buildings.

[h] In the verſion of this place, both Tranſlatours have erred. For Muſculus renders it thus: Dicit etiam mille auri Talenta Civitati illi ab Imperatore de tributis eſſe remiſſa; & ex Tributis quoque conſtitutum eſſe, ut civibus illis qui eâ calamitate adfecti erant, ædes ipſorum ſimulque publica ædificia reſtaurarentur; He ſays alſo, that a thouſand Talents of Gold were by the Emperour remitted to that City of the Tributes; and that 'twas conſtituted out of the Tributes alſo, that to thoſe Citizens who had been affected with that calamity, their houſes together with the publick Edifices ſhould be repaired. But Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it in this manner: Ait porro, tum Civitati de Tributis mille auri Talenta ab Imperatore eſſe condonata, tum Civibus etiam Vectigalia qui eâ clade afflicti erant; he ſays further, that both to the City a thouſand Talents of Gold of the Tributes were remitted by the Emperour, and alſo the Taxes [or, Cuſtoms] to thoſe Citizens, who had been afflicted with that calamity. Where you ſee, that both Tranſlatours referred theſe words [τῆς ἠφανισμένων] to the Citizens; which is in no wiſe to be born with. For Evagrius would not have ſaid τοῖς πολίταις τῆς ἠφανισμένων, but rather τοῖς ἠφανισμένοις. Nicephorus therefore underſtood theſe words righter, to wit, concerning the houſes of private men, the Taxes whereof the Emperour remitted to the Citizens of Antioch. Nevertheleſs, Nicephorus has not fully apprehended Evagrius's meaning. For thus he expreſſes this place of Evagrius: καί γε διὰ τὸν σεισμὸν τοῦτον χίλια χρυσᾶ τάλαντα βασιλέα φασὶν ἀφεῖναι τῇ πόλει τῆς ἐπισίων φόρων τὰ τέλη, τῆς ἠφανισμένων οἰκιῶν κτισμάτων. That is, as Langus renders it; Terræ motus iſtius gratiâ, &c. And becauſe of this Earthquake, and on account of the houſes ruined, the Emperour, 'tis reported, forgave the City a thouſand Talents of Gold, the Tributes of the Annuall payments. But Evagrius, or rather Johannes the Rhetorician, ſays more. For he affirms, that the Emperour remitted to the Antiochians a thouſand Talents of Gold of the Tributary Function; but forgave to each Citizen the Tributes of thoſe houſes which had been ruined by the Earthquake. Now theſe Tributes may be underſtood in a twofold ſence; Either (1.) concerning the annuall Penſion which by Hirers was paid to the Owners [or Lords,] of the houſes; Or (2.) concerning the money which was paid to the Fiſcus [Exchequer,] becauſe thoſe houſes had been built upon the publick Soyle. In ſuch manner as amongſt us, an annuall rent is wont to be paid by poſſeſſours of houſes, as well in the City as Country, to the Lords of the Soyle. And in this latter ſenſe I had rather take τὰ τέλη [the Tributes] here. For this word is more frequently uſed to ſignifie Tributes, Tolls, or Cuſtomes, which are paid to the publick. But if this term ſhould be ſo taken here, as to ſignifie the price of houſes which is uſually paid by the Hirer, there would have been no liberality of the Emperour's in that. For he would have given nothing of his own to the Citizens, but that which was another's. Valeſ.

[i] Inſtead of [ὁπωσοῦν δὲ τούτων] the reading undoubtedly muſt be τοῦτον, the ſame; adde the words ὁ βασιλεὺς, Emperour. And thus Chriſtophorſon ſeems to have read. Further, concerning this Earthquake, Iſaac Syrus had written an Elegie, as Marcellinus attells in his Chronicon, in theſe words: Patricio & Ricimere Coſſ. &c. In the Conſulate of Patricius and Ricimeres, Iſaac a Presbyter of the Antiochian Church wrote many things in the Syrian Language, and eſpecially againſt the Neſtorians and Eutychians. He likewiſe bewailed the ruine of Antioch in an Elegie, in ſuch manner as Ephren Diaconus did the fall of Nicomedia. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the Fire which [hapned] at Conſtantinople.

[a] THere hapned together with theſe [miſchiefs] a like, or rather a far more grievous [calamity] at Conſtantinople; this miſchievous accident

[a] 'Tis not amongſt Authours agreed concerning the year whereon this fire hapned at Conſtantinople. For Theophanes and Cedrenus place it on the fifth year of Leo, in the fifteenth Indiction, Leo Auguſtus being the ſecond time Conſul with Severus, which was the year of Chriſt 462. But Marcellinus Comes and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle place this fire of Conſtantinople in the Conſulate of Baſiliſcus and Hermenericus, that is on the year of Chriſt 465. Our Evagrius ſeems to have followed the former opinion. For the verb [συνηνέχθη, hapned together,] which he uſes at this place, gives an indication of what I have ſaid; to wit, that that Conflagration of Conſtantinople hapned no long time after the Antiochian Earthquake. Further, concerning that fire wherewith the City Conſtantinople was conſumed in the times of Leo Auguſtus, Candidus Iſaurus does alſo write, in the firſt book of his Hiſtory, and relates that many things were uſefully ordered therein by Aſpar the Patritius. Valeſ.

cident began in that part of the City that lay towards the Sea, which they term the [b] Ox-Street. 'Tis reported, that about such time as Candles are usually lighted, a certain mischievous and execrable Devill having clothed himself in the shape of a woman, or rather in reality a poor woman instigated by the Devill, (for 'tis reported both ways;) carried a Candle into the Market, being about to buy some * Salt-fish; and that the woman set down the Candle there, and went away. And, that the fire having taken hold of some Flax, raised a vast flame, and in a moment burnt † the Market-house. After which, that it easily consumed the adjoyning buildings, the fire preying all about, not only upon such [houses] as might with ease be fired, but upon Stone-buildings also; and that it continued till the fourth day; and that, having exceeded all possibility of being extinguished, all the middle of the City, from the Northern to the Southern Quarter, five furlongs in length, and fourteen in breadth, was in such a manner consumed; that nothing, either of the publick or private buildings, was left [standing] within this compass, not the Pillars, nor Arches of Stone: but, that all the most hardned matter was burnt, as if it [had been straw, or] any such combustible stuff. Further, this calamitous mischief raged in the Northern part,* wherein is the Haven of the City, from that termed the † Bosporos, unto the Old Temple of Apollo. In the Southern part, from Julianus's Haven to those houses which stand not far off from that Oratory termed the Church of [c] Concordia. And in the middle part of the City, from that termed Constantine's Forum, to that called Taurus's Forum, [it left] a miserable and most deformed spectacle to [the view of] all men. For, whatever Edifices] had stood stately to behold in the City, or had been brought to a Magnificence and incomparableness of Beauty, or * accommodated to publick or private uses, were every one on a sudden transformed into mountains and hills, inaccessible and impassible, made up with all manner of Rubbish, which deformed the Pristine Beauty and sight [of the City.] In so much that even the possessours themselves of the places could not discern, what any one of those former [Edifices] had been, and in what place [it had stood.]

[b] He means the Portus Phosphorianus, which was in the fifth Region of the City, as the old description of Constantinople informs us. The Greeks termed it φωσφόριον and βοσπόριον; as Constantinus Porphyrogennetus tells us in his second book de Thematibus about the end, and Georgius Codinus in his book de Originibus Constantinopolitan. 57. Vales.

* Or, Salt-meat.

* Or, wherein are the Havens of the City.

† Or, Ox-street.

[c] The Church of Homonœa [or Concord, [was in the ninth Region of the City Constantinople, as the Old description of that City informs us. Why this Church had this name, we are told by Theodorus Lector in book 4. of his Eccles. History; whose words are cited by Johannes Damascenus in his 3[d] book de Imaginibus. For, it was called ὁμόνοια [Concord,] because the hundred and fifty Fathers of the Constantinopolitane Synod in the Reign of Theodosius the Great [See Socrates's Eccles. Hist. book 5. chap. 8.] meeting therein, agreed in one opinion concerning the Consubstantiall Trinity. Vales.

* Or, called.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the universall Calamities.

[a] About the same times, when the [b] Scythian War was raised against the Eastern-Romans, the Country of Thracia, and the Helespont

[a] Instead of [ὑπὸ τοῖς αὐτοῖς χρόνοις,] it would be better written thus, ὑπὸ τὸν αὐτὸν χρόνον, about the same times. Vales.

[b] Evagrius means the War which the Hunni waged against the Eastern Romans, under the command of Dengizich Son of Attilas, in the Consulate of Zeno and Marcianus, on the year of Christ 469; as Marcellinus Comes relates in his Chronicon. Nevertheless the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle places that War on the foregoing year, whereon Anthemius Augustus was Consul. ἐπὶ τότε τοῦ ὑπατείας γιζίεριχος ὁ ἀτίλα ἐτράφη ὑπὸ ἀναστάσε τὸ σπαθαλάτε θράκης, &c. under the same Consul Ginzirichus Son to Attilas was slain by Anagastus Magister Militum [Master of the Milice] of Thracia: I reade Dengizichus, from Priscus Rhetor, who describes this War, pag. 44, 45, of the King's Edition. Further, this Anagastius Magister Militum throughout the Thracia's, who slew Dengizichus King of the Hunni in Battle, had succeeded Arnegiscl us Magister Militum. Vales.

were shaken with an Earthquake; as was Ionia, and likewise those Islands called the Cyclades: in so much that in the Islands Cnidus and Coos very many [buildings] were overturned. Further, Priscus relates, that at Constantinople and in the Country of the Bithynians, there hapned most violent storms of rain, the waters descending from heaven in the manner of Rivers, for the space of three or four days. And, that mountains were levelled into Plains, and Villages, overwhelmed with waters, perished. Moreover, that Islands arose in the Lake Boäne, (which is not far distant from Nicomedia,) from the vast quantity of dirt and filth conveyed into it. But these things came to pass sometime afterwards.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the Marriage of Zeno and Ariadne.

[Moreover,] Leo takes Zeno to be his Son in Law, by [giving him] his daughter Ariadne in Marriage. This person having from his Cradle been called [a] Aricmesius, after his Marriage assumed the name of Zeno from a certain [b] person so named, who had arrived at great glory amongst the Isauri. But, by what means this Zeno arrived at this heighth of Honour, and on what account he was by Leo preferred before all persons, Eustathius the Syrian has declared.

[a] In the most excellent Florentine Manuscripts, and in Nicephorus, instead of [ἀεικμῆσον, Aricmesius,] 'tis ἀεικμήσιον, Aricmesius. Further, Ariadne married Zeno on the third year of Leo Augustus's Reign, as Theophanes relates in his Chronicon. Vales.

[b] He means Flavius Zeno, who was Consul in the Reign of Theodosius Augustus, on the year of Christ 448, and Magister Militum throughout the East. Concerning whose singular power, see what I have written in my Annotations at Priscus Rhetor's Excerpta Legationum, pag. 207, of the Kings Edition. Vales.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning Anthemius Emperour of Rome, and those Emperours who succeeded him.

BY reason of an Embassie of the Western Romans [to Leo,] Anthemius [by him] is sent [and created] Emperour of Rome, to whom Marcianus the preceding Emperour had married his own daughter. [Not long after,] Basiliscus brother of Verina the wife of Leo [Augustus,] is sent Master of the Milice against [a] Gizerichus, with a choice Army of Souldiers.

[a] Concerning that vast Army, which the Emperour Leo sent against the Vandals into Africk, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and Idatius in his Chronicon, are to be consulted. Concerning the preparations of the same war Candidus Isaurus writes also, in the first book of his History; the passage whereof, because 'tis not yet extant, I will annex here: Κανδίδος ἱστοριογράφος φησὶν ὅτι ὁ λέων ὁ μακέλλης, ὁ μὴ μαρκιανὸν βασιλεύσας, ἀλλὰ τῷ ἐπιτροπείαν τῷ τῆ Ζανδίλων ἀπειρία χρήματα δεδαπάνηκε. ἡδὲ γε ὡς οἱ πάντα ἐφανέρωσε κεχειροτόνητες, διὰ μὴν τὴν ὑπάρχων χρυσίου λίτρας πεντεκαιμυρίας ἐπτακαιχιλίας. διὰ δὲ τὸ πομπ[illegible] τῆς θεσώμιχῶν, ἐπακισχίλιαι φερὲς μυείαις, καὶ ἀργυρίᾳ λίτρᾳ ἑπτακόσιαι χιλιάδες. ὅτε τῆς ἀνηλωμένων ἀρχόντων ἐν τῇ δημοσίμων καὶ ἐν τῷ βασιλέως ἀνδρείᾳ; that is, Candidus the Hiſtoriographer ſays, that Leo, termed alſo Macelles, who reigned after Marcianus, ſpent an innumerable ſum of money in an Expedition againſt the Vandalls. For, as thoſe have atteſted who furniſhed that money, fourty ſeven thouſand pounds of Gold were diſburſed by the Præfecti Prætorio: by the Comes Largitionum were ſpent ſeventeen thouſand pounds of Gold, and of Silver ſeven hundred thouſand pounds: in regard this charge was abundantly ſupplyed, partly by the Goods of perſons proſcribed, and partly by the Emperour Anthemius. This eminent paſſage is extant in Suidas, in the word χειρίζω; but the Authours name is corrupted. In the ſame place of Suidas, inſtead of [τῆς ἀνηλωμένων ἀρχόντων,] it muſt be made [τῆς ἀνηλωμένων ἀρχιατίων, &c.] Further, this Vandalick Expedition hapned on the year of Chriſt 468, as Baronius has rightly obſerved; which is confirmed by Cedrenus, Idatius and Marcellinus. Two years after this, another Expedition againſt the Vandalls was undertaken by the Commander (dux) Heraclius, and Marſus, as Theophanes relates in his Chronicon, who is the only perſon that I know of, who has made mention of this Expedition. For Procopius, in his Vandalicks, has confounded this ſecond Expedition with the former. Further, this ſecond Expedition had an event fortunate enough. For Gizerichus being put into a fear, was compelled to make a Peace with the Oriental Romans. Valeſ.

All which have with great accuracy been recorded by [b] Priſcus the Rhetorician: as likewiſe in what manner the ſame [Emperour] Leo killed Aſpar (who had inveſted him with the Empire, whom he circumvented by Treachery, rendring him this reward, as 'twere, of his own promotion;) and his Sons Ardaburius and Patricius, whom ſome time before he had created Cæſar, that he might poſſeſs himſelf of Aſpar's [c] favour and benevolence. But, after the murder of Anthemius, who had Reigned five years at Rome, Olybrius is proclaimed Emperour by Recimeres; and after him Glycerius is made Emperour. Whom [d] Nepos having expelled, during the ſpace of five years holds the Empire, and ordains Glycerius [e] Biſhop of the Romans at Salonæ a City of Dalmatia. Afterwards Nepos is driven from the Empire by Oreſtes, and after him his Son Romulus, ſurnamed Auguſtulus, is made the laſt Emperour of Rome, [f] one thouſand three hundred and three years after the Reign of Romulus. After this [Auguſtulus,] Odoacer, rejecting the name of Emperour, and ſtyling himſelf King, [g] adminiſtred the affairs of the Romans.

[b] Priſcus had at large deſcribed this Vandalick War in the laſt book of his Hiſtories, as (beſides Evagrius) Theophanes informs us in his Chronicon pag. 100. But the place is corrupted, which I will annex here: ὕστερον δὲ δώρεαις τισὶ μιζείχε καὶ πλείσοις χρήμασι δελεασθείς, ἐνέδωκεν, καὶ ἡττήθη ἑκών, ὡς περσικὸς ἱστόρησεν ὁ θρᾷξ, But having at laſt been wheadled and allured by gifts and many riches, by Gizerichus, he yielded, and was voluntarily vanquiſhed, as Perſicus the Thracian has related. It muſt undoubtedly be written thus, ὡς πείσθη ἱστόρησεν ὁ θρᾷξ, as Priſcus the Thracian has related. For Priſcus the Hiſtorian has deſcribed that war, as Evagrius atteſts. Now, Priſcus was a Thracian, born at Panium a Town of Thrace, which Town is mentioned by Hicrocles. Provincia Europa ſub Conſulari urbes quatuordecim. Eudoxia, Heraclia, Arcadiopolis, Biſue, Panion, Orni, &c. The Province Europa under a Conſularis [contains] fourteen Cities. Eudoxia, Heraclia, Arcadiopolis, Biſue, Panium, Orni, &c. Beſides, Suidas does alſo affirm, that Priſcus the Writer of the Hiſtories was a Panite. Valeſ.

[c] As to my ſelf it ſeemeth, I have reſtored this place not unhappily, after this manner: ἵνα πρὸ ἄσπαρ ἔυνοιαν κλήσηται, that he might poſſeſs himſelf of Aſpars favour and benevolence. Cedrenus confirms our emendation, at the twelfth year of Leo Auguſtus, in theſe words: τῷ δ' αὐτῷ ἔτει καὶ ὁ ἄσπαρ υἱὸς παλαικὸ καίσαρ ὑπὸ τὸ λέοντος γίνεται, καὶ ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ πέμπεται διὰ τὸ ἐλκύσαι τ' ἄσπαρ ἐκ τῆς αἱρεσιακῆς δόξης, καὶ ἔυνοεῖν ποῖησαι τῷ βασιλεῖ; on the ſame year alſo Patricius, Aſpars ſon, is created Cæſar by Leo, and is ſent to Alexandria to draw off Aſpar from the Arian opinion, and to make him faithfull and kind to the Emperour. And Theophanes expreſſes it thus: τῷ δ' αὐτῷ ἔτει, &c. On the ſame year Patricius the ſon of Aſpar, whom the Emperour Leo had made Cæſar, went to Alexandria, with a deſign to draw off Aſpar from Arianiſme, and to render him faithfull and friendly to the Emperour. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens the reading is, ἵνα πρὸ ἄσπαρ ἄνοιαν κτήσηται, that he might poſſeſs himſelf of Aſpars madneſs.

[d] The prepoſition μὴ is to be expunged, which led Tranſlatours into a miſtake. For Nepos was not made Emperour on the fifth year after Glycerius's depoſition, but on the ſame year whereon Glycerius had been rejected. (as 'tis related in the Old Faſti which Cuſpinianus ſet forth;) that is, on the year of Chriſt 474. After this, Nepos held the Empire five years. For he was ſlain when Baſilius was Conſul alone, on the year of Chriſt 480; as Marcellinus atteſts in his Chronicon, and as 'tis affirmed by the Old Authour of the Faſti, whom Cuſpinianus publiſhed. From which Authour we are informed, that Julius Nepos retained the name of Emperour untill his death. Valeſ.

[e] 'Tis falſe, that Glycerius from being Emperour was made Biſhop of Rome. Nor is it true, that he was conſtituted Biſhop of Portue, which ſome have affirmed, following Marcellinus as their Authour. Notwithſtanding, Marcellinus does not ſay ſo. For his words are theſe: Leone ſolo Coſ. Glycerius Cæſar Romæ Imperium tenens, &c. Leo being Conſul alone, Glycerius Cæſar holding the Empire of Rome, is driven from the Empire by Nepos, ſon of the ſiſter of Marcellinus heretofore Patricius; and of a Cæſar is ordained a Biſhop in the Port of the City Rome. But in Marcellinus the punctation is to be altered thus: Imperio expulſus Portu Urbis Romæ, ex Cæſare Epiſcopus ordinatus eſt, being driven from the Empire in the Port of the City Rome, of a Cæſar is ordained a Biſhop. Our emendation is confirmed by the Old Authour of the Faſti, whom I have quoted above; [whoſe words are theſe;] Domino Leone Juniore Auguſt Coſ. dejectus de Imperio Glycerius in Portu Urbis Romæ, dominus Leo Junior Auguſtus being Conſul, Glycerius is caſt from his Empire in the Port of the City Rome. 'Tis certain, Jordanes, in his book de Succeſſione Regnorum, affirms that Glycerius was made Biſhop at Salona. Jordanes's words are theſe: Occiſoque Romæ Anthemio Nepotem filium Nepotiani, &c. And having killed Anthemius at Rome, he created Nepos ſon of Nepotianus (to whom he married his Neece,) Cæſar at Ravenna, by Domitianus his Client. Which Nepos having legally obtained the Empire, expelled Glycerius, (who had given the Kingdom to himſelf in a Tyrannick manner,) from the Empire, and made him Biſhop in Salona of Dalmatia. At this place therefore in the Greek Text, the word [ῥωμαίων, of the Romans] muſt be expunged, or rather tranſpoſed after this manner; τῆς ἀρχῆς ῥωμαίων κρατεῖ, ἐπίσκοπόν τε τ' γλυκέλεον, &c. holds the Empire of the Romanes, and ordains Glycerius, Biſhop, &c. Valeſ.

[f] Marcellinus Comes's computation is truer, who in his Chronicon writes thus concerning this Romulus: Baſiliſco & Armato Coſſ. &c. In the Conſulate of Baſiliſcus and Armatus, the Weſtern Empire of the Roman Nation (which Octavianus Auguſtus the firſt of the Auguſti began to hold on the ſeven hundreth and ninth year from the building of the City,) periſhed with this Auguſtulus, on the year of the Reign of the Emperours his predeceſſours DXXII. Jordanes has the ſame words in his book de Succeſſione Regnorum. Now, this ſum makes one thouſand two hundred thirty and one years. Therefore Cedrenus muſt be corrected, who from Romulus the Builder of the City, to this Romulus Auguſtulus, reckons but one thouſand and eighty years. Valeſ.

[g] The reading in Robert Stephens is [ὀπιχειρίζεται, attempts;] without doubt it ſhould be [ἐγχειρίζεται, takes in hand,] as Nicephorus words it, book 15. chap. 11. In the Tellerian M. S. I found it written [μεταχειρήζεται, adminiſtred,] which reading pleaſes me beſt. Valeſ.

Concerning the Death of Leo, and the Empire of Leo Junior, and alſo concerning Zeno his Father.

AT the ſame time the Emperour Leo ended his Reign at Byzantium, after he had Governed the Empire ſeventeen years, having declared Leo (the ſon of his own daughter Ariadne and Zeno) a very young child, Emperour. After * his death, his Father Zeno † aſſumes the Purple, Verina the wife of Leo giving him her aſſiſtance, as being her ſon in Law. The child [Leo Junior] dying not long after, Zeno continued ſole poſſeſſour of the Empire. But, what was tranſacted by him or againſt him, and whatever elſe hapned [in his times,] the following Book, by God's aſſiſtance, ſhall declare.

[a] The End of the Second Book,

[a] Before the following (to wit, the eighteenth) chapter, in the incomparable Florentine Manuſcript theſe words were written, τέλος τῆς ς' λόγε, The end of the Second Book. Then, after the [ſeventeenth] chapter, theſe words occur: εἰσὶν ὡς ἐν ὀπτομῇ τὰ ἐν τῇ συνόδῳ τῇ ἐν χαλκηδόνι συλλεγείσῃ κεκινημένα ἐν τούτοις, The matters agitated at the Synod convened at Chalcedon, being reduced into an Epitome, are theſe. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVIII.

An Epitome of the Acts at the Synod of Chalcedon, set at the end of the Second Book.

PAschasinus and Lucentius, Bishops, and Boniphatius, a Presbyter, filled the place of Leo Pontif of the Elder Rome. Anatolius being Prelate of Constantinople, and Dioscorus Bishop of the Alexandrians; Maximus also of Antioch, and Juvenalis of Jerusalem, and those Bishops about them [were there.] Together with whom were present those personages who held the principall places in the eximious Senate [of Constantinople.] To whom they who filled the place of Leo said, that Dioscorus ought not to sit together with them in the Councill. For this [they said] was given them in charge by Leo. And, unless it were done, that they would go [forthwith] out of the Church. And when [those] of the Senate asked, what were the matters objected against Dioscorus; they made answer, that Dioscorus ought to give an account of his own judgment, who, contrary to what was fitting and just, had accepted the person of the Judge, [a] without the permission of him who governeth the Bishoprick of Rome. After which words, when Dioscorus, by the Senate's decree, was standing in a place in the midst; Eusebius Bishop of Dorylæum made a request, that the Supplicatory Libell, which had by him been presented to the Emperour might be recited; which request he made in these expres words: I have been injured by Dioscorus; the Faith hath been injured: Flavianus the Bishop has been murdered; and together with me unjustly deposed by him. Do you give order, that my Supplicatory Libell may be read. Which thing therefore having been debated, the Libell was permitted to be read, the Contents whereof were these.

[a] In the fourth chapter of this book (where we have this same passage) these words [τῆς ὀπῆς τῶν ἀγαθῶν τῷ τῆς Ῥώμης ποιμανόντι χωρὶς] without the permission of him who governeth the Bishoprick of Rome,] occur not, neither in the Greek Text of Valesius's Edition, nor in that of Robert Stephens's; though Valesius takes notice of them in his version there. At this place they are inserted into both the now mentioned Greek Editions; and therefore we have rendred them here, but (with good reason) have omitted them at the said fourth chapter. This latter answer of the Roman Legates to the Senatours, seems obscure and unintelligible.

From Eusebius the meanest Bishop of Dorylæum, who speakes in defence of himself, of the Orthodox Faith, and of Flavianus of Blessed memory who was Bishop of Constantinople. [It is] the designe of your power, to make provision for all your Subjects, and to stretch forth an hand to all those who are injured: especially to them who are recounted amongst the Ecclesiasticks. And hereby you worship the Deity, by whom a power hath been given you to Rule and Govern * the world. In regard therefore the Faith of Christ and we have suffered many and grievous things, contrary to all reason and equity, from Dioscorus the most reverend Bishop of the great City Alexandria; we addresse to Your piety, entreating we may have Right done Us. Now, the businesse is this. At the Synod lately held in the Metropolis of the Ephesians, (would to God that Synod had never been held, that it might not have filled the world with mischiefs and disturbance!) that † Good man Dioscorus, disregarding the consideration of what is just, and [not respecting] the fear of God, (for he was of the same opinion, and entertained the same Sentiments with the vain-minded and Heretical Eutyches; but concealed it from many persons, as 'twas afterwards plainly evidenced by his own declaration:) † took an occasion from that accusation which I had brought against Eutyches a person of the same opinion with himself, and from that sentence pronounc't against the same Eutyches by Bishop Flavianus of Holy memory; [whereby] he assembled a multitude of disorderly and tumultuous persons: and having possest himself of power by money, as much as in him lay he hath weakened the pious Religion of the Orthodox, and has confirmed the ill opinion of the Monk Eutyches, which long since, even from the beginning, hath been condemned by the Holy Fathers. Whereas therefore, the matters are not small and triviall, which he has audaciously attempted, both against the Faith of Christ, and against Us, We fall at the feet of Your [Imperial] Majesty, and humbly beseech You, to order the said most Religious Bishop Dioscorus, to give in his answer to what is objected against him by us: to wit, by having the Monuments of the Acts, which he has made against us, read before the Holy Synod. From which [Acts] we are able to demonstrate, that even he himself is estranged from the Orthodox Faith, hath confirmed an Heresie full of impiety, has unjustly deposed us, and in a most grievous and injurious manner oppressed us: You sending your divine and adorable Mandates to the Holy and Oecumenicall Synod of Bishops most dear to God, [b] to the end that it may hear both us and the forementioned Dioscorus, and bring to the knowledge of Your Piety all that is transacted, according to that which shall please Your Immortall height. And if we shall obtain this, we will pour forth incessant prayers for your eternall Empire, most divine Emperours!

* Or, the things under the Sun.

† Spoken by way of Irony.

[b] In the incomparable Florentine M. S. this place is read thus: ἐφ' ᾧ τε ἠμᾶς καὶ τὸν θεοσεβέστατον Διοσκόρον διακοῦσαι, to the end that it may hear both us, &c. The reading in the Acts of the Chalcedon Councill is the same. Christophorson, and Sr Henry Savill at the margin of his copy, have mended it thus, ἐφ' ᾧ τε τὰ ἡμῶν καὶ τὰ, &c. to the end that it may hear our cause, and that of the forementioned Dioscorus. But I had rather write it ἐφ' ᾧ ἡμῶν τε καὶ τῶν, &c. Vales. In Robert Stephens the reading is ἐφ' ὧν τε ἡμῶν καὶ τῶν, &c. where also the word [διακοῦσαι] is wanting.

By the joynt request therefore of Dioscorus and Eusebius, the Acts of the Second Ephesine Synod were publickly recited: by which 'twas manifestly demonstrated, that Leo's Letter had not been read, and that, notwithstanding there had been an Interlocution once and twice concerning that matter. Wherefore, when Dioscorus was asked to declare the Cause hereof, his answer was, that he himself by an Interlocution [had given order] once and twice that that should be done; and he requested, that Juvenalis Bishop of Jerusalem, and Thalassius [Bishop] of the First Cæsarea in Cappadocia, might give a more manifest declaration of this matter. For [he said] that they had received an Authority [of presiding in the Synod] together with him. Juvenalis did indeed affirm, that when the [Emperours] Divine Letter * had been read in the first place, he made an Interlocution, [ordering] that [c] that [Letter] should be recited; but, that

* Or, had lead the way.

[c] Instead of [ἐκεῖνο, to him] doubtless the reading must be [ἐκεῖνο, that,] understand [τὸ θεῖον γράμμα, the divine Letter.] Which emendation is confirmed by the Acts of the Chalcedon Councill, pag. 52, and 53. Edit. Big. where these words occur. Gloriosissimi Judices & Amplissimus Senatus dixerunt, &c. The most Glorious Judges and the most noble Senate said: Let the most Blessed Bishop Juvenalis declare, why when the most Reverend Bishop Dioscorus made an Interlocution for the reciting of the Letter of the most holy Romish Arch-Bishop, that Letter was not read. Juvenalis the most Reverend Bishop of Jerusalem said: Johannes the Presbyter and Primicerius [chief] of the Notaries said, that he had in his hands the sacred Letters of the most Religious and most pious Emperours, and I answered that the Imperial Letters muſt be read. Further, the very words which Juvenalis had made uſe of in that ſecond Epheſine Synod, occur in the aboveſaid 52. pag. where the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod are recorded. Moreover, Nicephorus confirms our Emendation, in the laſt chapter of his 15th book, where he gives us a ſummary of the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, moſtly tranſcribed from Evagrius. I have been larger in my remarks upon theſe things, becauſe Chriſtophorſon, in the Rendition of this place, hath wandred far from the truth. By the way, you may obſerve the fraud committed in that ſecond Epheſine Synod. For, when Hilarius the Deacon, the Legate of the Apoſtolick See, had openly declared to the Biſhops who were preſent, that he had Pope Leo's Letter, and had required that it might be read in the Council: Johannes the Presbyter and Primicerius of the Notaries, aroſe and ſaid, that he had in his hands other Letters written from the Emperour to Dioſcorus. Then Juvenalis commanded, that thoſe Letters of the Emperour ſhould be read, no mention being made of Leo's Letter. You ſee therefore, that the reading of Leo's Letter was deſignedly impeded, by the fraud of Dioſcorus, who, inſtead of Leo's Epiſtle, cauſed the Emperour Theodoſius's Letter to be read in the Synod. Further, the Tellerian M. S. does confirm our Emendation; in which copy I found it written as I had conjectured. Valeſ.

[e] Inſtead of [πόθεν ἔν εἴπε, he ſaid, from whence therefore?] the reading in the Acts of the Chalcedon Council is better, (ſee pag. 583) in the Imperative-mood, to wit, thus, πόθεν ἔν εἰπὲ, declare therefore, from whence? Valeſ.

* In Binius, pag. 58, the reading is, ἢ μὲν τοῦ θεοῦ ἢ μονογενῆ, τὸν θεὸν λόγον, the only begotten Son of God, God the Word.

afterwards no mention was made of that * Epiſtle. But Thalaſſius ſaid, that he hindred not the reading of that Letter; and that he had not ſo much † Authority, as that he alone could Decree, that it ſhould ‖ be read. When therefore a further progreſs was made in the reading of the Acts, and ſome of the Biſhops found fault with ſome words as being falſe and forged; Stephanus Biſhop of the Epheſians was asked, what Notaries of his at that time had taken [thoſe words] in writing; his anſwer was, that Julianus (afterwards made Biſhop of Lebedus,) and Criſpinus were his Notaries: but, that Dioſcorus's Notaries would not permit * that to be done, but took hold of their fingers whilſt they were writing; in ſo much that they were in danger of undergoing moſt foul abuſes. Further, the ſame Stephanus † depoſed, that [himſelf and the other Biſhops] had ſubſcribed to Flavianus's depoſition in one and the ſame day. Hereto added Acacius Biſhop of Ariarathia, that all [of them] had ſubſcribed in a paper not written on, [and that they were compelled to it] by force and neceſſity, having been ſurrounded with innumerable miſchiefs, in regard Souldiers [Armed] with murdering ‖ weapons had encompaſſed them. Further, when another ſentence was read, Theodorus Biſhop of Claudiopolis ſaid, that no body uttered thoſe words. Moreover, upon a procedure in reading [the Acts, in this manner,] when [they came] to a certain [d] place wherein Eutyches had ſaid, [that he Anathematized] thoſe who ſhould affirm that the Fleſh of God and our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt had deſcended from Heaven: the Acts declared, that againſt theſe words Euſebius had ſaid, that thoſe were indeed condemned by Eutyches who ſhould ſay that Chriſt's fleſh had deſcended from Heaven, but that it was not added by him, whence the fleſh was. The ſame Acts added alſo, that Diogenes Biſhop of Cyzicum ſubjoyned [theſe words:] [e] declare therefore, from whence? and, that notwithſtanding they were not permitted to make any further inquiry into theſe things. Further, the ſame Acts do manifeſt, that Baſilius Biſhop of Seleucia in Iſauria, ſpake [theſe words:] I adore our one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, * the Son of God, the only God the Word, who after the Incarnation and Union, is known in two natures. And, that againſt theſe words the Egyptians cryed out: Let no man divide Him who is not to be parted, he ought not to call one Son two. But, that the Eaſterns exclaimed, Anathema to him who parts, Anathema to him who divides. 'Tis contained in the ſame Acts, that Eutyches was asked, whether he would affirm two Natures in Chriſt. And, that he anſwered, that he aſſerted Chriſt [to conſiſt] of two Natures before the Union: but after the Union, [he acknowledged but] one [Nature in him.] And, that Baſilius ſaid [theſe words;] unleſs you affirm two undivided and inconfuſed Natures after the Union, you aſſert a confuſion and a commixture. But if you add Incarnate and Inhumanate, and do underſtand Incarnation and Inhumanation in ſuch manner as Cyrillus doth, you affirm the ſame that we do. For, the divinity which [is] from [his] Father, is one thing; the humanity which is from [his] Mother, is another. When [f] they were interrogated, upon what account they had ſubſcribed to Flavianus's depoſition; the Acts declare that the Eaſterns cryed out, we have all ſinned, we do all crave pardon. Again further, the ſame Acts being read on, do manifeſt, that the Biſhops were queſtioned, for what reaſon they would not permit Euſebius to come in, when he deſired it. To which Dioſcorus made anſwer, that Elpidius brought the Commonitory; and, that he affirmed, that the Emperour Theodoſius had given order, that Euſebius ſhould not be ſuffered to come in. The Acts do manifeſt, that Juvenalis alſo ſaid the ſame words. But Thalaſſius ſaid, that he himſelf [g] had not authority. Which anſwers were diſallowed of by the Judges. For [they ſaid,] that this Apology was invalid [where a matter] of Faith is the ſubject of the Conference. After theſe things, the ſame Acts do declare, that Dioſcorus [h] made a complaint in theſe words: what Canons are now obſerved, whenas Theodoret is [ſuffered to] come in; And, that the Senatours made anſwer, that Theodoret was come in as an Accuſer. And when Dioſcorus ſubjoyned, that Theodoret ſate amongſt the Biſhops; the Senatours ſaid again, that Euſebius and Theodoret ſhould take the place of the Accuſers, in like manner as Dioſcorus had the place of the Accuſed allotted to him. When therefore all [the Acts] of the ſecond Epheſine Synod had been read, and the ſentence [of depoſition pronounc't] againſt Flavianus and Euſebius, had been likewiſe recited, as far as that * place, where [i] Hilarius the Deacon had ſaid, 'Tis contradicted: the Biſhops of the Eaſt and thoſe with them

* Or, expreſſion.

[f] In the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, only Baſilius is ſaid to have been queſtioned by the Judges and Senatours; and what anſwer he returned to their queſtion, is added there alſo, Notwithſtanding, Nicephorus confirms the vulgar reading, which is [ὧν ἐπυθόμεθα, when they were interrogated:] which if we will retain, it muſt be ſaid, that Baſilius and thoſe who were with him, were interrogated by the Judges. Valeſ.

[g] In the Rendition of this place, both Tranſlatours have erred. For Muſculus renders it thus: Thalaſſius verò dixit, non habere autoritatem ea quæ à principibus in hujuſmodi cauſis judicantur. But Thalaſſius ſaid, that thoſe things which are judged [or, determined] by the Princes in ſuch cauſes as theſe, have not authority. Chriſtophorſon has followed the ſame ſenſe alſo. Likewiſe Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlatour, hath fallen into the ſame miſtake. But, from the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, it is eaſie to confute this Rendition. For Thalaſſius being queſtioned by the Judges, makes this anſwer only, ἐξὸν ἔκ ἡμην δυσέντης, that is, all power and authority was not in me. For, although Juvenalis and Thalaſſius were ordered by the Emperour Theodoſius to preſide at the ſecond Epheſine Synod together with Dioſcorus, notwithſtanding in reality all the power was in Dioſcorus's hands. Further, the Judges condemned the Anſwer of Dioſcorus, Juvenalis, and Thalaſſius in theſe words, In a matter of faith this defence is not to be admitted. Valeſ.

[h] I agree with Chriſtophorſon and Sr Henry Savill; who inſtead of [πέμψαντος, was ſent for,] mended it thus [μέμψασθαι, made a complaint.] Which fault I found to have been frequently committed in the Manuſcript copies. Valeſ.

[i] This place muſt be corrected from the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 142. Where, after the Sentence of condemnation pronounc't by Dioſcorus againſt Flavianus and Euſebius, when Flavianus had ſaid, παρειτοῦμαί σε, that is, I refuſe you: Hilarius Deacon of the Church of Rome ſaid, κανὲ γέγραπται, 'tis contradicted. Which words are written out from the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod. Valeſ.

exclaimed, Anathema to Dioscorus: in this very hour [k] Christ hath deposed Dioscorus: Flavianus hath been deposed by Dioscorus: Holy Lord, do Thou revenge him, Orthodox Emperour, do you revenge Him! Many years to Leo: many years to the [l] Patriarch. Then, when the following words were read, which manifested, that all the then convened Bishops had agreed to the deposition of Flavianus and Eusebius; the most Glorious Judges made an Interlocution in these express words.

[k] Διόσκορος ὁ χριστὸς καθεῖλε. So 'tis also written in Nicephorus. But in the Acts of the Chalcedon Synod 'tis written far otherwise, to wit, after this manner: ταύτῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ καθεῖλε. ταύτῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ καθαιρείσθω. That is, in this very hour [Dioscorus] hath deposed: in this very hour let him be deposed. Which reading I approve of as being the better. But, as this place of Evagrius is to be corrected from the Acts of the Chalcedon-Council, so on the other hand, the Acts of the Chalcedon-Council are to be amended from our Evagrius. For, instead of these words which follow, ἄγε κύριε σὺ αὐτὸν ἐκδίκησον, Holy Lord do Thou revenge him; it must [in the Chalcedon-Acts] be written thus: Φλαβιανὸς παρὰ Διοσκόρου καθῃρέθη. ἄγε κύριε, &c. Flavianus hath been deposed by Dioscorus: Holy Lord, do Thou revenge him, Orthodox Emperour, &c. as it is in Evagrius and Nicephorus: and so the old Translatour of the Chalcedon-Councill seems to have read: for he renders it thus: Sancte domine, tu illum vindica: Catholice Imperator, Tu illum vindica, Holy Lord, do Thou revenge him: Catholick Emperour, do you revenge him. From which Version we conclude, that these words [Flavianus hath been deposed by Dioscorus] ought necessarily to precede. Otherwise, whither should these words [do Thou revenge him] be referred? Vales.

[l] Some body may make a query here, what Patriarch is to be understood at this place: My affirmation is that Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople is meant. Further, two things are remarkable here. The first is, that the orientall Bishops wish many years not to their own Patriarch, but to another. Secondly, that they term the Bishop of Constantinople simply and absolutely, the Patriarch, to wit, giving him this honour on account of the prerogative of his See. For, in the Constantinopolitane Synod, the second place was assigned to the See of Constantinople. Vales.

We perceive, that a more exact scrutiny concerning the Orthodox and Catholick Faith ought to be made to morrow, when the Synod will be more compleat and full. But, in regard Flavianus of Pious Memory, and Eusebius the most Religious Bishop of Dorylæum (from a search made into the Acts and Decrees, and also from their testimony by word of mouth who presided in the Synod then convened; who have confessed that they have erred, and have deposed them without cause, when they had in no wise erred in relation to the Faith:) have, as 'tis evidently known, been unjustly deposed: it appears to us (agreeable to that which is acceptable unto God,) to be just, (provided it shall please our most Divine and most Pious Lord,) that Dioscorus the most Religious Bishop of Alexandria, Juvenalis the most Religious Bishop of Jerusalem, Thalassius the most Religious Bishop of Cæsarea, Eusebius the most Religious Bishop of [m] Ancyra, Eustathius the most Religious Bishop of Berytus, and Basilius the most Religious Bishop of Seleucia in Isauria, which [Prelates] had power, and presided over the then Synod, should [n] lye under the very same punishment, being by [the sentence of] this sacred Synod according to the Canons estranged from the Episcopall dignity: all things which have been consequently done being made known to his most sacred Imperial Majesty.

[m] From the Acts of the Chalcedon-Councill, pag. 152. (where this Interlocution of the Judges is recorded,) Instead of Armenia, it must be made Ancyra. Vales.

[n] Instead of [ἐμπεσεῖν, fall from,] in the First Action of the Chalcedon-Councill, pag. 152, it is truer written thus ὑποπεσεῖν, lie under.] For 'tis referred to what went before, to wit, τῷ αὐτῷ ἐπιτιμίῳ, the very same punishment; and the same herewith is the reading in the fourth chapter of this book, where this Interlocution of the Judges occurs entire. In the fourth Action of the Chalcedon-Synod, pag. 217, the reading indeed is ἐμπεσεῖν: but there is a word added in the foregoing [clause,] in this manner, τῷ αὐτῷ ὑποκεῖναι ἐπιτιμίῳ, subjected to the same punishment. If we should retain the word ἐμπεσεῖν, then these words [ἀλλοτρίους γνωσθέντας, being estranged from] which follow, would be superfluous. Indeed, these two last mentioned words are wanting in the Tellerian and Florentine M.SS. and in Nicephorus. Vales.

After these words, the Easterns cryed out this [is] a just judgment: but the Bishops of Illyricum exclaimed, we have all sinned, let us all be vouchsafed pardon. And again, when the Easterns acclaimed, this is a just sentence: Christ hath deposed a Murderer, Christ hath revenged the Martyrs: the Senators made an Interlocution, that every one of the Bishops convened, should by himself * declare his own Faith; knowing for certain, that the most Divine Emperour did believe, according to that Exposition of the Faith of the three hundred and eighteen [Fathers, assembled] at Nice, and of the hundred and fifty Fathers [convened] ° at Constantinople; also according to the Epistles of the Holy Fathers, Gregorius, Basilius, Hilarius Athanasius, Ambrosius; and according to Cyrill's two Letters, which were recited at the First Synod at Ephesus: for, that the most Pious Leo Bishop of the Elder Rome, had deposed Eutyches according to the same Faith.

° In the excellent Florent. M. S. these words [at Constantinople] are wanting; nor do they occur in the Acts of the Chalcedon-Councill, as may be seen at pag. 152; Edit. Bin. Vales.

The First Session therefore having after this manner been ended, when the most Holy Bishops had come together [p] alone in order to another [Action,] Eusebius Bishop of Dorylæum presented Libells in defence of himself and Flavianus; wherein he accused Dioscorus as entertaining the same Sentiments with Eutyches, and because he had divested them of the Sacerdotall Function. He added also, that Dioscorus had inserted some words, which had not been spoken at the then convened Synod, into the Acts thereof; and moreover, that Dioscorus had procured that they should subscribe in blank papers. He requested further, that all the Acts of the second Ephesine Synod might be made null by the vote of [the Prelates who] were convened, that themselves might be restored to the Sacerdotall dignity, and that that nefarious opinion might be Anathematized. He requested also after the reading [of his Libell,] that his Adversary might be present. When this was by an Interlocution ordered to be done; Aëtius Arch-Deacon and Primicerius of the Notaries said, that he had gone to Dioscorus, as also to the others; and that Dioscorus had answered, that he was not permitted by his keepers to come to the Councill. By making another Interlocution it was ordered, that Dioscorus should be sought for before [the doors of] the Councill. And when he was not found, Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople made an Interlocution, that he ought to be sent for, and to be present in the Synod. Which having been done, the messengers sent to Dioscorus returned and said that he told them, I am under custody: let [my keepers] say, whether or no they will permit me to go [to the Councill.] And upon the messengers saying to him, that they had been sent to him, not to the Magistriani; they brought word, that

[p] In the third Action of the Chalcedon-Synod, only the Bishops met, nor were there any of the Secular Judges, or Senators, present in the Councill. For, in that Session the Faith was to be treated of: which that they should declare and set forth, the Bishops had before been invited by the most glorious Judges. But the Bishops for a long while refused to do that, saying that the Draught of the Nicene Creed was sufficient, which had been confirmed by the Constantinopolitane, and first Ephesine Synod. Nevertheless, at length they had yielded to the Judges request, and promised they would do it. Further, where the Faith is treated of, the Secular Judges have nothing to do. In the Third Action therefore, wherein the Faith was to be treated of, no Secular Judges were present. It is further to be remarked, that at this place Evagrius hath omitted the transactions of the Second Action. Evagrius therefore seems to have taken the Third Action for the Second. Which is confirmed by the Acts of this very Synod, pag. 177; where that seems to be the Second Meeting, or Action, which now is the Third. Vales.

that Dioſcorus had ſaid, I am ready to come to the Holy and Oecumenicall Synod; but I am hindred. Whereto Himerius added, that in their return from Dioſcorus, the [q] Aſſiſtant to the Maſter of the ſacred Offices met them, and that in company with him the Biſhops had gone again to Dioſcorus, and that he had ſome things concerning theſe matters which he had taken in [r] Notes. Which having been read, 'twas manifeſted that Dioſcorus had ſpoken theſe expreſs words. Having recollected my ſelf, and conſidered what is expedient [for me,] I anſwer thus.

[q] Βοηδὸς τῶ μαγίστρ. Langus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred it Boethus, as if that were a proper name. But Βοηδὸς is the name of an Office. For the Princeps officii magiſtri officiorum was ſo termed, who was of the Schole [or, Body] of the Agentes in Rebus; as we are informed from the Notitia Imperii Romani. Farther, this Aſſiſtant of the Maſter of the Offices, was by his proper name called Eleuſinius, as 'tis recorded in the third Action of the Chalcedon Synod. Valeſ.

[r] Ἐν σημείοις. In the Acts of the Chalcedon Councill, inſtead of theſe words, 'tis written, ἐν ἐκλήψει; which the old Tranſlatour hath rendred thus: Et certa locuti ſunt, quæ in exceptis habeo, And they have ſpoken ſome words, which I have in my Excepta [that is, in my account taken thereof in writing.] 'Tis certain, Himerius was a Notary and a Reader, ſent by the Councill (together with the Biſhops) to Dioſcorus, that he might take thoſe things in writing, which ſhould be ſaid on both ſides; for that was the Office of Notaries. The Biſhops, as often as they went to a Synod, were wont to carry each his Notary along with them, who were to take the matters tranſacted in the Synod in writing: to the end that, after the ending of the Synod, each Biſhop might carry a copy of the Acts into his own Country. Further, I approve highly of the old Tranſlatour's rendring σημεῖα excepta. Whence I am of opinion, that Origen's σημειώσεις ought in Latine to be termed Excepta. I know indeed, that Origen's σημειώσεις are by Ruſinus and Jerome commonly termed Excerpta, Excerptions; but my Sentiment is, that 'tis corruptly written, in regard they ought rather to be termed Excepta. In regard the moſt magnificent Judges who ſate in the Seſſion before this, have Decreed ſeverall things after many Interlocutions made by every one; and I am now cited to a Second Seſſion, to the end that the foreſaid [Decrees] may be voided and made null; 'tis my requeſt, that the moſt magnificent Judges and Sacred Senate, who were at the Former Seſſion, may be preſent now alſo, in order to a re-examination of the ſame matters. To whom Acacius, as 'tis manifeſtly related in the ſaid Acts, gave anſwer in theſe very words. The Holy and Great Synod have not commanded Your Sanctity therefore to be preſent, that thoſe things which have been tranſacted before the moſt Magnificent Judges and the Sacred Senate might be voided and made null: but [the Synod] hath ſent us, [with a command] that You ſhould come to the Seſſion, and that Your Sanctity ſhould not be abſent therefrom. To whom Dioſcorus returned this anſwer, (as the Acts declare;) You have told me even now, that Euſebius hath preſented Libells: I make a requeſt again, that my Cauſe may be examined before the Judges and Senate. Then, after other things of this nature, which are put into the Acts; thoſe were again ſent, who might perſwade Dioſcorus to be preſent at what was tranſacted. Which having been done, thoſe who had been ſent returned, and ſaid, that they had taken Dioſcorus's anſwer in Notes, which [Notes] do manifeſt, that he ſaid theſe words. I have already ſignified to Your piety, that I am afflicted with a diſtemper, and that 'tis my requeſt, that the moſt Magnificent Judges alſo and the Sacred Senate may now likewiſe be preſent at the Judgment of thoſe things which ſhall be inquired into: but in regard my diſtemper hath increaſed, upon that account I have made a delay. And the Acts do manifeſt that Cecropius ſaid unto Dioſcorus; that a little before he had not made the leaſt mention concerning his ſickneſs; and that therefore he ought to ſatisfie the Canons. To whom Dioſcorus made this return, I have ſaid once, that the Judges ought to be preſent. Then, that Ruffinus Biſhop of Samoſata ſaid unto Dioſcorus, that the * Agitations and Debates [in the Councill] were Canonicall, and that Dioſcorus, if he were preſent, might freely ſpeak what he ſhould have a mind to. And when Dioſcorus enquired, whether Juvenalis and Thalaſſius and Euſtathius were come [to the Synod,] [t] he anſwered, that that was nothing pertinent to the buſineſs. To which words the Acts due ſet forth, that Dioſcorus ſubjoyned theſe, that he had requeſted the Chriſt-loving Emperour, [that he would give order] that the Judges alſo might be preſent [in the Councill,] as likewiſe thoſe [Prelates] who together with him * had been Judges. And, that hereto the [Synod's] Meſſengers ſaid, that Euſebius had accuſed him only, and that all the reſt ought not to be preſent. And, that to theſe words Dioſcorus replied, that thoſe other perſons ought alſo to be preſent who had been judged together with him: for, that Euſebius had no private † Cauſe againſt him, but [a common one, to wit,] concerning thoſe things on account of which all of them had been judged. And again, when the [Synod's] Meſſengers perſiſted || in the ſame things, Dioſcorus made anſwer, what I have ſaid, I have ſaid once; nor have I any thing further to ſay. To which words [when declared to the Synod,] Euſebius [Biſhop] of Dorylæum ſaid, that he had [matter of accuſation] againſt Dioſcorus only, and againſt no perſon elſe: and he deſired that Dioſcorus might be cited in by a third Summons. [After this] Aëtius gave information, that ſome perſons who ſtiled themſelves Eccleſiaſticks, together with ſome others who were Laïcks, coming from the City Alexandria, had lately preſented Libells againſt Dioſcorus, and that theſe men were now ſtanding before [the doors of] the Councill, and * crying out. When therefore Theodorus, a Deacon of the Holy Church of Alexandria, had in the firſt place preſented [Libells;] and then Iſchyrio, who was a Deacon likewiſe; and after him Athanaſius a Presbyter and Cyrillus's ſiſters ſon; and laſtly Sophronius; in which [Libells] they accuſed Dioſcorus partly for Blaſphemies, and partly on account of bodily [damages] and [t] violent exaction of moneys: a third Citation is iſſued out, wherein Dioſcorus is admoniſhed to come [to the Synod.] The Meſſengers therefore appointed for this buſineſs, being returned, made report that Dioſcorus had ſaid [theſe words:] I have ſufficiently informed Your Piety; nor can I add any thing elſe thereto. Again, when the perſons ſent upon this account had continued to be very urgent in their perſwaſives to Dioſcorus [that he would come,] and he having always given the ſame anſwer; Paſchaſinus the Biſhop ſaid [theſe words.] Dioſcorus having now been thrice Summoned, hath not appeared, being prick't in

What Dioſcorus who hath been Biſhop of the Great City Alexandria has audaciouſly attempted againſt the Order of the Canons, and the Eccleſiaſtick Conſtitution; hath been made manifeſt, both by thoſe things which have already been enquired into at the Firſt Seſſion, and alſo from what hath been done this day. For this perſon, (to omit many other things,) making uſe of his own authority, uncanonically admitted to communion Eutyches, (a man that embraces the ſame Sentiments with himſelf, who had been depoſed canonically by his own Biſhop of Holy Memory, we mean our Father and Arch-Biſhop Flavianus;) before * his ſitting [in the Synod] at Epheſus together with the Biſhops beloved by God. The not reading of which Letter has filled the moſt Holy Churches over the whole world with ſcandalls and detriment. Nevertheleſs, although ſuch things as theſe have been audaciouſly attempted by him, [vv] yet we had ſome thoughts concerning the vouchſafing to him ſomething of compaſſion in relation to his former impious Fact, as alſo to the reſt of the Biſhops beloved by God, although they had not the ſame authority of judging that he was inveſted with.

But, in the Chalcedon-Acts, and in the fourth chapter of this book, (where this ſentence of condemnation occurs,) it is more truly written ἐπισκοπῶμεν, it was our deſign. But, by tranſpoſing the prepoſitions, I had rather write it thus, ἐπεσκοπῶμεν ἐπὶ τῆς, &c. we had conſidered in relation to, &c. which writing is far more elegant. Valeſ.

But in regard he has out-done his former iniquity by his * latter facts, (for he has audaciouſly pronounced an Excommunication againſt the moſt Holy and moſt Pious Leo Arch-Biſhop of Rome the Great; and moreover, (when Libells ſtuft with Crimes were preferred to the Holy and Great Synod againſt him,) having been canonically called once, twice, and thrice, by the Biſhops beloved of God, he obeyed not, to wit, being prick't by his own conſcience; [Laſtly,] he has illegally received [to Communion] thoſe, who have been juſtly depoſed by ſeverall Synods: [on theſe various accounts we ſay]) *he himſelf hath pronounced ſentence againſt himſelf, having many ways trampled under foot the Eccleſiaſtick Rules. When therefore theſe things had been confirmed by Anatolius, Maximus, and the reſt of the Biſhops, excepting thoſe [Prelates] who together with Dioſcorus had been depoſed by the Councill; a Relation concerning theſe [Tranſactions] was by the Synod written to [the Emperour] Marcianus, and by the ſame Synod a depoſition was ſent to Dioſcorus, the Contents whereof were theſe.

[y] Παντὸς ἐκκλησιαστικοῦ τάγματος. This word [τάγμα] is variouſly rendred by Tranſlatours. For Langus renders it Conſuetudinem, Cuſtome. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have tranſlated it thus; & ab omni Eccleſiaſtico Jure eſſe abalienatum, and are alienated from all Eccleſiaſtick Right. The Old Tranſlatour of the Chalcedon-Councill, pag. 214. renders it Functionem, Function; which, in my judgment, is the truer Verſion. In the Libell of Depoſition of the ſame Dioſcorus, which the Chalcedon-Synod ſent, almoſt in the very ſame words, to the Clergy-men of the Alexandrian Church who were then at Chalcedon, inſtead of τάγμα, it is βαθμὸν, Degree. In the ſentence of condemnation pronounced againſt the ſame Dioſcorus by the Legates of the Romiſh See, inſtead of this word, ἐνέργεια, Office, is made uſe of. Now, theſe words are therefore added by the Synod, that they might ſhew, that Dioſcorus was reduced to a Lack-communion. For he is not only ſaid to be diveſted of the Epiſcopall dignity, but is alſo removed from every Eccleſiaſtick Office: leaſt any one ſhould think him to be removed from the Epiſcopall Act: [or, acting as a Biſhop,] and thruſt down into the degree of the Presbyterate. For to do that, is ſacriledge, as 'tis ſaid in the fourth Action of the Chalcedon-Synod, pag. 247. Valeſ.

Then, having written concerning theſe things to the pious [z] Biſhops of the moſt Holy Church at Alexandria, and when the [a] Edict againſt Dioſcorus had been propoſed, this Seſſions was ended.

[z] Ἐπισκόπους τὸς ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ ἁγιωτάτης ἐκκλησίας. It ſhould (as it ſeems,) be written κληρικὸς, Clergy of the moſt Holy, &c. For Dioſcorus's Libell of Depoſition was ſent to the Clergy-men of the Alexandrian Church, who were then at Chalcedon, as may be ſeen in the Acts of the Chalcedon-Councill, pag. 214. Due order did require indeed, that Dioſcorus's Depoſition ſhould be declared by the Synod to the Biſhops of Egypt alſo. But the Biſhops of the Chalcedon-Councill were to perform that afterwards, in their Synodick Letter. At that time they had done ſufficient, in declaring Dioſcorus's Depoſition to the Alexandrian Eccleſiaſticks who were then at Chalcedon, to wit, to Eleemoſynus the Presbyter and Oeconomus [or, Steward,] and to Euthalius Arch-Deacon, and to the reſt of the Clergy. 'Tis certain, Evagrius's words do ſufficiently declare, that there is no mention here concerning the Biſhops of Egypt. For he calls them Biſhops of the Alexandrian Church: which appellation agrees not with the Biſhops of Egypt. Valeſ.

[a] In Nicephorus 'tis μεδέσμα. But in the Acts of the Chalcedon-Council, the reading is μεδέσμα. In the Tellerian M. S. I found it written μεδέσμα. Valeſ. And ſo 'tis in Robert Stephens's Edition.

Which having been read, the whole Synod cried out, in theſe words; this is the Faith of the* Orthodox: Thus we all believe, Pope Leo believes thus, Cyrillus believed thus, the Pope hath expounded it thus. And when there had been another Interlocution, that the Expoſition of the Faith [ſet forth] by the Hundred and fifty Holy Fathers might be recited alſo, that was likewiſe read. To which the Synod again cried out, and ſaid: This is the Faith of [us] all: This is the Faith of the Orthodox: Thus we all believe. [d] After whom Aetius the Arch-Deacon ſaid, that he had at hand the Epiſtle of the Divine Cyrillus to Neſtorius, which all [the Fathers] convened at Epheſus had confirmed by their own Subſcriptions; and that he had likewiſe another Letter of the ſame Cyrillus's, which had been written to Johannes [Biſhop] of Antioch, and which had likewiſe been confirmed: and his requeſt was, that both theſe Letters might be read. And after an Interlocution had been made concerning theſe [Letters,] they were both recited. Part of the Contents of the former Epiſtle run word for word thus.

Most part of [Cyrillus's] other Letter hath been recorded in our foregoing † Book. But there is a passage in it, which Johannes [Bishop] of the Antiochians had written [in his Letter, to which passage] Cyrillus hath || fully agreed: this passage runs thus. We confess the Holy Virgin to be Theotocos, because God The Word took Flesh from Her and was made man, and from that very Conception united to himself a Temple taken from Her. But we know, that those divine men do take the Evangelick and Apostolick Expressions [uttered] concerning the Lord, * sometimes in a common sense, as [spoken] of one person: † at other whiles [they] divide them, as [uttered] concerning two Natures. And, [that they have] delivered these [Expressions as] becoming God, according to the divinity of Christ: but those other [as] humble and mean, agreeable to the same persons humanity. To which words [Cyrillus] has subjoyned these. Having read these your Sacred Expressions, We find that We our selves embrace the same Sentiments. For, there is one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism. We have therefore glorified God the Saviour of all [men,] rejoycing mutually, that as well the Churches amongst us, as those with you, do profess a Faith that is agreeable, both to the divinely inspired Scriptures, and also to the Tradition of our Holy Fathers.

After the Reading hereof, those of this Synod cried out in these words: We do all believe thus; Pope Leo believes thus. Anathema to him that divides, and to him who confounds. This is the Faith of Leo the Arch-Bishop. Leo believes thus; Leo and Anatolius believe thus. We all believe thus. As Cyrillus, so we believe. The eternall memory of Cyrillus. As Cyrillus's Letters [f] are, so are our Sentiments. Thus we have believed, thus we do believe: Leo the Arch-Bishop thinks thus, thus he believes, thus he hath written. Then, an Interlocution having been made, that Leo's Letter might also be read; being rendred [into Greek,] it was recited: which [Letter] is extant in the Acts [of the Council.] After therefore the reading thereof, the Bishops exclaimed, This is the Faith of the Fathers, This is the Faith of the Apostles. We all believe thus, [g] we that are Orthodox do believe thus. Anathema to him who believes not thus. Peter by Leo hath uttered these words: The Apostles have taught thus: Leo hath taught piously and truly, Cyrillus has taught thus, Leo and Cyrillus have taught alike: Anathema to him who believes not thus: This is the true Faith, the Orthodox think thus, this is the Faith of the Fathers. Why were not these [words] read at Ephesus? Dioscorus hath concealed these [Expressions.] It is recorded in the same Acts, that when part of the [fore-mentioned] Letter of Leo was read, the Contents whereof were these, And in order to the * paying that due debt of our Nature, the divine Nature was united to a Nature passible, to the end that (for this was agreeable to our Remedies,) He being one and the same Mediatour of God and Men, the Man Christ Jesus, might be able to die by one, and might not be able to die by the other: the Illyrician and Palestine Bishops being in doubt as to this Expression, Aetius Arch-deacon of the most Holy Church of Constantinople, produced a passage of Cyrillus's, the Contents whereof are these: Again, in regard his own Body * by the grace of God, according as the Apostle Paul saith, hath tasted death [h] for every man, he himself is [therefore] said to have suffered death for us: not as if he had experienced death, as to what belongs to his own Nature; (For 'tis stupidity and extream madness, either to affirm, or think this:) but because (as I have even now said,) his Flesh tasted death. And again, as to an expression of Leo's Letter, which runs thus: For each Form acts with a communion of the other, that which is proper: to wit, The Word operates that which is The Word's; and the * Flesh performs that which is of the † Flesh: and the one of these shines with Miracles; but the other hath lain under injuries: the Illyrician and Palestine Bishops being in doubt, the same Aetius read a || Chapter of Cyrillus, the Contents whereof were these. Of the expressions [used concerning Christ,] some are most especially agreeable to God; again, others are agreeable to man. But a third sort possess a certain middle place, evidencing the Son of God, to be God and also at the same time Man. After this, when the foresaid Bishops doubted at another place of Leo's Epistle, which runs thus: For, although in our Lord Jesus Christ, [there is] one person of God and of man, nevertheless that is one thing whence there is in both a Community of Contumely, and that is another whence there is a Community of Glory. For from us he [has] humanity, which is less than the Father. But from the Father he has the divinity which is equall with his Father. Theodoret, after he had well considered this matter, said, that the Blessed Cyrillus had expresly spoken thus, in these words: And being made man, and loosing nothing that was his own, [i] he continued what he was, and the one dwelt in the other, that is, the divine Nature * in man. After this, when the Illustrious Judges enquired whether there were any person who as yet doubted, all answered, that no person made any further doubt. After whom, Atticus Bishop of Nicopolis requested, that a * Truce of some few days might be allowed them, to the end that with a sedate mind and undisturbed understanding such things might be decreed as were pleasing to God, and to the Holy Fathers. He desired also, that Cyrillus's Letter, written to Nestorius, might be delivered [to them,] in which Cyrillus intreats Nestorius, that he would give his assent to his twelve Heads, [k] *whereto all agreed. [i] In the Second Action of the Chalcedon-Council, this place of Cyrillus is written otherwise, thus: μεμάθηκε γὰρ ὅπερ ἦν. νοεῖται δὲ παντὸς ἕτερον ἐν ἑτέρῳ καλοκἀγαθὸν, τοῦτέστιν ἡ θεία φύσις ἐν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις. For he continued what he was: but 'tis altogether to be understood, that the one dwells in the other, that is the divine Nature in the humane. Valesius.

[k] There is an ambiguity in these words. For they may as well be referred to Cyrillus's twelve heads, of which he speaks just before, as to the requests of Atticus Bishop of Nicopolis; to which all the rest of the Bishops agreed, as we are informed in the Second Action of the Chalcedon-Council, about the end of it. Johannes Langus has followed the former sense. terlocution terlocution [had given order,] that an interval of five days might be allowed them, wherein they might have a meeting [and confer] [1] with Anatolius Prelate of Conſtantinople: all the Biſhops cryed out, and ſaid; We do believe thus: We all believe thus: as Leo, ſo we believe: no one of us doubts: We have all ſubſcribed. To which [exclamations the Judges] made an Interlocution in theſe expreſs words. There is no neceſſity that you ſhould all meet. But, in regard 'tis agreeable, that thoſe who doubt ſhould be confirmed, let the moſt pious Biſhop Anatolius chooſe out of their number who have ſubſcribed, ſuch perſons as he ſhall think fit to teach and inform thoſe that doubt. Whereto thoſe of the Synod ſubjoyned theſe Acclamations: We entreat [m] for the Fathers: [Let] the Fathers, who are of the ſame Sentiment with Leo, [be reſtored] to the Synod; The Fathers to the Synod: Theſe words to the Emperour: Theſe Supplications to The Orthodox, Theſe Supplications to Auguſta: We have all ſinned: Let us all be pardoned. But the Clergy of the Conſtantinopolitane Church exclaimed [in theſe words,] They are but few who cry out: The Synod ſays not this. After whom, the Eaſtern Biſhops cried out, The Egyptian to Baniſhment. But the Illyricians exclaimed: We entreat [you,] have mercy upon all. After whom the Eaſtern Biſhops cried out, The Egyptian to Baniſhment. And when the Illyricians had made the ſame requeſt which they had made before, the Clergy of Conſtantinople cried out: Dioſcorus to Baniſhment: The Egyptian to Exile: The Heretick to Baniſhment. Chriſt hath depoſed Dioſcorus. After whom, the Illyricians and thoſe Biſhops of their partie [exclaimed,] We have all ſinned; pardon all: Dioſcorus to the Synod, Dioſcorus to the Churches. And when ſuch like words as theſe had preceded, this Seſſion was ended. At the Seſſion after this, when the Senate had made an Interlocution, that the Decrees which had already been [n] given forth ſhould be recited, Conſtantinus the Secretary read theſe expreſs words out of a * Schedule.

[1] I aſſent to the Learned, who (inſtead of περὶ ἀνατολίου about Anatolius,) before us had mended it thus, παρὰ ἀνατολίου, with Anatolius. In Nicephorus the preposition is wanting, which nevertheleſs ſeems to me altogether neceſſary. Valeſ.

[m] In the excellent Florentine M. S. the reading is περὶ τῶν πατέρων, for, or, concerning the Fathers; which is better than παρὰ τῶν, &c. from the, &c. And the ſame with that firſt mentioned, is the reading in the Second Action of the Chalcedon-Councill. Further, who theſe Fathers ſhould be, for whom the Biſhops entreat, that they may be reſtored to the Synod, 'tis not difficult to gueſs. For they are theſe, Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Thalaſſius of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, Euſebius, Euſtathius, and Baſilius; who had been depoſed in the Firſt Action together with Dioſcorus, by an Interlocution of the Judges and Senatours. On account therefore of this depoſition which the Biſhops had approved of by their ſuffrages, theſe five Biſhops, were preſent neither at the Second nor Third Action, as 'tis apparent from the Catalogue of the Biſhops which is prefixt before thoſe Actions. Beſides, in the Third Action, when the Legates of the Apoſtolick See had pronounced a ſentence of depoſition againſt Dioſcorus, the reſt of the Biſhops confirmed it by their own ſubſcriptions: excepting theſe five, as Evagrius has truly obſerved above. In the Common Editions of the Chalcedon-Synod, pag. 212, the names even of theſe five Biſhops occur written alſo: but, out of order, and after all the other Biſhops. Whence it appears, that they had not ſubſcribed at ſuch time as the ſentence was pronounc't, but a long while after, when they had been reſtored, and had recovered their former dignity. Moreover, it may be manifeſtly concluded from what is ſaid above, that that is moſt true which I have already remark't, viz. that the Second Action of the Chalcedon Synod is by Evagrius taken for The Third, and The Third for The Second. But, which Copies are worthieſt to be believed, whether thoſe which Evagrius made uſe of, or them which we have now extant, 'tis not eaſie to pronounce. To me, the Copies made uſe of by Evagrius ſeem more certain. Firſt, on account of their Antiquity; for doubtleſs they were older than thoſe we now uſe. Secondly, by reaſon of their legitimate and true order of matters tranſacted. For, after an accurate Examination of Dioſcorus's Cauſe, and after the Interlocution of the Judges, who had pronounced him to have offended againſt the Canons, and that he was to be depoſed; all which was done in the Firſt Action: it remained, that Dioſcorus by a Canonicall Judgment of the Biſhops ſhould be condemned. Wherefore, that Action, wherein Dioſcorus was depoſed by the Biſhops by a Synodick Sentence, ought immediately to follow The Firſt Action. Therefore Evagrius and Nicephorus have rightly placed it in the ſecond place. A third reaſon is drawn from the Third Action it ſelf, pag. 177. where Dioſcorus is ſaid to have anſwered the Legates ſent to him from the Holy Synod, in this manner: Quoniam ante hæc in congregatione, &c. In regard before this the moſt magnificent Judges ſitting in the Convention, have determined ſome things, after a large Interlocution of every one of them, but now a ſecond meeting calls me out, in order to the nulling of what has been ſaid before. Nevertheleſs, that is in the way, which occurs at the cloſe of the Second Action, viz. that the Biſhops of Illyricum cried out thus, Dioſcorus to the Synod, Dioſcorus to the Churches. Which doubtleſs they would not have dared to ſay after Dioſcorus's depoſition to which themſelves had ſubſcribed. Therefore, the Second Action, where this Acclamation occurs, ought neceſſarily to precede The Third Action; in which Dioſcorus was Canonically depoſed. And this I think to be truer. Valeſ.

[n] Inſtead of [παρὰ δεδομένους τύπους, the due Decrees;] it muſt undoubtedly be παρὰ δεδομένους τύπους, the Decrees which had been given forth; which is the reading in Nicephorus. And this reading is confirmed by the fourth Action of the Chalcedon-Synod, pag. 218, &c. Valeſ.

* Or, Paper.

We perceive, that a more exact ſcrutiny concerning the Orthodox and Catholick Faith ought to be made to morrow, when the Synod will be more compleat and full. But, in regard Flavianus of Pious Memory, and the moſt Religious Biſhop Euſebius (from a ſearch made into the Acts and Decrees, and alſo from their teſtimony by word of mouth who preſided in the Synod then convened; who have confeſſed that they have erred, and have depoſed them without cauſe, when they had in no wiſe erred in the Faith:) have, as 'tis evidently known, been unjuſtly depoſed: it appears to us (agreeable to that which is acceptable unto God,) to be juſt, (provided it ſhall pleaſe our moſt Divine and moſt Pious Lord,) that Dioſcorus the moſt Religious Biſhop of Alexandria, Juvenalis the moſt Religious Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Thalaſſius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, Euſebius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Ancyra, Euſtathius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Berytus, and Baſilius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Seleucia in Iſauria, which [Prelates] had power, and preſided over the then Synod, ſhould lye under the very ſame puniſhment, [and] according to the Canons * be removed from the Epiſcopall dignity: all things which have been conſequently done being made known † to his moſt ſacred Imperial Majeſty.

Faith: as Leo, ſo we think. After this an Interlocution was made [by the Judges,] in theſe expreſs words: We have given a Relation concerning theſe things to our moſt divine and moſt pious Lord, and we expect the anſwer of his piety. But your Reverence ſhall render an account to God, as well concerning Dioſcorus who hath been depoſed by You, (his Imperiall Majeſty and we being ignorant thereof,) as [p] concerning thoſe [other] five perſons for whom you have entreated, and concerning all other matters which have been tranſacted in the Synod. [Hereupon they all] cried out, ſaying, God hath depoſed Dioſcorus: Dioſcorus hath been juſtly depoſed, Chriſt hath depoſed Dioſcorus. Then after theſe things, an anſwer being brought from Marcianus, which gave the Biſhops permiſſion to determine according to their own diſcretion concerning the perſons who had been depoſed, in ſuch manner as the Judges have declared by an Interlocution; [the Biſhops] made their requeſt, ſaying theſe expreſs words: We entreat that they may come in. [Let] thoſe of the ſame opinion [be reſtored] to the Synod: thoſe of the ſame Sentiments, to the Synod: thoſe who have ſubſcribed to Leo's Letter, to the Synod. Which perſons, after an Interlocution, were admitted into the number of the Synod. And after this, the Supplicatory Libells, which had been preſented by the Biſhops of the Ægyptick Diœceſis to the Emperour Marcianus, were read; wherein, beſides other matters theſe things were contained: Our Sentiments are the ſame with thoſe expoſitions which the Three hundred and eighteen [Holy Fathers] ſet forth at Nicæa, and [with thoſe embraced by] the bleſſed Athanaſius, and Cyrillus of Holy Memory: We Anathematize every Hereſie, that of Arius, that of Eunomius, of Manes, of Neſtorius, and that of thoſe who aſſert, that the Fleſh of our Lord is from heaven, and not from the Holy Theotocos, and Ever-Virgin Mary; * whom [we affirm] to be like to us all, [but] without ſin. Then, all [the Biſhops] preſent in the Synod cried out, ſaying: Why do they not Anathematize Eutyches's opinion? Let them ſubſcribe to Leo's Letter, and Anathematize Eutyches and his Opinions: Let them give their aſſent to Leo's Letter: they are deſirous to impoſe upon us and be gone. Hereto the Biſhops of Egypt returned anſwer, that there were many Biſhops in Egypt, and that 'twas impoſſible [for them] to repreſent the † perſons of thoſe who were abſent: and they requeſted, that the Synod would expect their Arch-Biſhop, to the end that (according as Cuſtome required,) they might follow his Opinion. For [they ſaid,] that if they ſhould do any thing before the || Election of their Arch-Biſhop, all perſons of the whole Egyptick Diœceſis *would fall upon them. But Nicephorus, perceiving this place to be corrupted, by adding a word made it good in this manner; ἀπὸ τῆς νῦν οἱ ἄρχοντες ἐκέλευσαν, &c. From this inſtant the Judges ordered, &c. Which emendation is contradicted by the Authority of the Acts, and contrary to Evagrius's mind. For the Secular Judges, who by the Emperour's order were preſent at the Synod, never Commanded that Leo's Letter ſhould be inſerted into the definition of the Faith; but only deſired that of the Biſhops: which nevertheleſs was denied them by the Biſhops, as 'tis apparent from the Fifth Action, pag. 250. Valeſ.

[t] Λέοντι πιστεύειν. The word [ἀκολουθοῦντας, agreeable to] muſt be underſtood. For the Biſhops did not make anſwer that they believed Leo, according as Chriſtophorſon renders it; but, that they believed with Leo [or, as Leo did believe,] as Langus and Muſculus have rightly rendred it. For thus they had acclaimed, as Leo does, ſo we believe; as it occurs in the fifth Action. Valeſ.

[u] In the Fifth Action of the Chalcedon-Councill, 'tis written adverbially, thus, ἀτρέπτως, καὶ ἀμερίστως, καὶ ἀσυγχύτως, inconvertibly, and indiviſibly, and inconfuſedly. Valeſ.

[vv] Before theſe, ſome words ſeem to be wanting in the Greek-Text, which from the Acts of the Chalcedon-Councill may be ſupplied after this manner: παρεκάλεσεν αὐτοὺς οἱ ἁγιώτατοι ἐστελθεῖν εἰς τὸ μαρτύριον, the Biſhops intreated them to go into the Oratory [of the Holy Euphemia's Church.] Further, the miſtake of Langus and Chriſtophorſon is to be taken notice of here; who have rendred μαρτύριον, the Church of the Holy Martyr Euphemia. The Synod of Chalcedon was indeed aſſembled in the Temple, or Church of Saint Euphemia. But, the Treaty, or Conference, concerning the Faith was held in the Oratory of the ſaid Church, according as the Emperour had given order in the Allocution which is recited in the Council, pag. 250. συνελθεῖν ἐν τῷ εὐκλινείῳ τῶν ἁγιωτάτων μαρτυρίων, to meet in the Oratory [or Quire] of the moſt Holy Church. For μαρτύριον [Martyrium] is taken for the Church, as it appears from the Third Action of the Chalcedon-Synod, where the Biſhops are ſaid to have met in the Martyrium of the moſt Holy and Victorious Martyr Euphemia, And in the other Actions of that Council, the ſame Biſhops are ſaid to have come together into the moſt holy church of the ſame Martyr. In regard therefore 'tis manifeſt, that the Oratory (wherein ſome few of the Biſhops met only, to treat concerning the Faith, together with Anatolius and the Deputies of the Romiſh See,) was part of Saint Euphemia's Church, it remains to be inquired, what part of the Church that was. Saint Euphemia's Church conſiſted of three ſpacious Edifices; the firſt whereof was an Atrium, or, Court. The ſecond, the Baſilica, [or, the Church it ſelf;] the third, the Altar built in form of a Cuppolo, as Evagrius tells us in the third chapter of this book. The Oratory therefore is the ſame with the Altar, which now a days we term the Choire, or, Quire. Nor has our Evagrius done right, in making uſe of μαρτύριον to ſignifie the Oratory; for the Emperour had not ordered the Biſhops to meet in the Martyrium, but in the Oratory of the Martyr, as we have now ſaid. Valeſ.

† Or, to the Divine heighth.

* Ordained, or, Conſtituted.

x Not a Metropoliticall Right or Priviledge, but the name of a Metropolis only, was given to the City of Chalcedon: for theſe are the words of the Emperour Marcianus's Law; Τὴν χαλκηδονέων πόλιν ἐν ᾗ τῆς ἁγίας πίστεως σύνοδος διεκρίθη μητροπόλεως ἔχειν πρεσβεῖα ἐθεσπίσαμεν, ὀνόματι μόνῳ ταύτην πιστεύοντες, σωζομένης δηλαδὴ τῇ νικομηδέων μητροπόλει τῆς ἰδίας ἀξιώματος; that is, We have Decreed, that the City of the Chalcedonenſians, wherein the Synod of the moſt Holy Faith was convened, ſhould have the priviledges of a Metropolis, honouring it with the name only, to wit, its proper dignity being preſerved to the Metropolis of the Nicomedians. But although the Emperour in theſe words ſeems to adorn only the City it ſelf of the Chalcedonenſians, with the Title of a Metropolis, yet that priviledge belongs even to the Church of the Chalcedonenſians alſo. From that time therefore the Biſhop of Chalcedon had the honour of a Metropolitane: but, had no Metropoliticall Right or Priviledge, becauſe the Emperour by this Law would have nothing diminiſhed from the dignity of the Biſhop of Nicomedia. The Biſhops of this very Councill have determined [or judged] the ſame thing in the Cauſe of the Biſhops of Nicomedia and Nicæa. For, whereas Nicæa by the Emperour's Reſcript had obtained the honour of a Metropolis, the Judges and Biſhops who were in the Councill made anſwer, that this honour had been given only to the City by the Emperours; nor could the Biſhop of Nicæa by this Law arrogate to himſelf a Metropoliticall Right or Priviledge; but was only preferred before the other Biſhops of the Province Bythinia: ſo that, he was accounted in the ſecond place after the Metropolitane, as may be ſeen in the Thirteenth Action. Further, what the Metropoliticall Rights and Priviledges were, we are informed from the Canons of the Nicene Councill; to wit, that the Ordinations of Provinciall Biſhops ſhould not be made without the Metropolitan's conſent: and that the Metropolitane Biſhop ſhould have a power of calling out the Provinciall Biſhops to a Councill of his own. Moreover, in the Florentine Manuſcript I found it written χαλκηδονέων, although in the Chalcedon-Councill it is always written χαλκηδονίων. Regularly it ſhould be written χαλκηδονιέων. But the Ancients ſeem to have ſaid χαλκηδονείων, as 'tis apparent from many places in the Chalcedon-Councill. Valeſ.

And

And the Emperour commanded the Biſhops to ſtay three or four days, and that every one ſhould propoſe [queſtions] concerning what he had a mind to, in the preſence of the Judges; and * that all things ſhould be ended by a convenient and fit determination. Thus this Convention was finiſhed. There was [y] another [Seſſion] alſo, wherein other Canons were made. And again, at another Seſſion, Juvenalis and Maximus made an agreement, and it ſeemed good, that the [Biſhop] of Antioch ſhould have the two Phœnicia's, and Arabia; and the [Biſhop] of Jeruſalem the three Paleſtines [Subject to his See.] And after an Interlocution of the Judges and Biſhops, they confirmed [this agreement.] And at the [z] ninth Seſſion Theodoret's Cauſe was diſcuſſed. Who had Anathematized Neſtorius, in theſe words; Anathema to Neſtorius, and to him who denies the Holy Virgin Mary to be Theotocos, and to him who divides the one Only-begotten Son into two Sons: moreover, I have ſubſcribed to the definition of the Faith, and to Leo's Epiſtle. After an Interlocution therefore made by them all, he recovered his own See. In another Seſſion, Ibas's Cauſe was examined, and thoſe things were read which had been tranſacted and pronounced againſt him; the Judges whereof were Photius Biſhop of Tyre, and Euſtathius Biſhop of Berytus. And Sentence was deferred to the following [Seſſion.] At the Eleventh Convention, when many of the Biſhops had voted [a] Ibas to [a] be reſtored to his Biſhoprick, ſome Biſhops oppoſed it, and ſaid, that his Accuſers were without, and they requeſted that they might be ordered to come in. Thoſe things therefore were read which had been tranſacted againſt Ibas. And when the Judges by an Interlocution had given order, that the Acts at Epheſus againſt Ibas ſhould be read; the Biſhops ſaid, that all things which had been done, at the Second Epheſine Synod, were void and null; except only the ordination of Maximus [Biſhop] of Antioch. And they made a requeſt to the Emperour concerning this matter, that by a Law he would decree, that nothing of thoſe things [which had been done] at Epheſus after the Firſt Synod (over which Cyrillus of Bleſſed memory, Prelate of Alexandria, had preſided;) ſhould be valid. And Ibas had his Biſhoprick adjudged to him. At another Action, the Cauſe of Baſſianus Biſhop of Epheſus was diſcuſſed; and 'twas Decreed, [b] that as well he, as Stephanus, ſhould be depoſed, and another Subſtituted in their room. And at another Seſſion, the ſame thing was put to the Vote and confirmed. In the Thirteenth Action, the Cauſe between Eunomius [Biſhop] of Nicomedia, and Anaſtaſius Biſhop of Nicæa was inquired into, who were at ſtrife amongſt themſelves concerning their own Cities. Moreover, there was a Fourteenth Action, wherein the Cauſe of [c] Sabinianus [the Biſhop] was examined. And in fine, it was determined, that the Conſtantinopolitane-See ſhould have * precedency immediately after that of Rome.

* Or, what was fitting ſhould be done.

[y] In Nicephorus, inſtead of [ἕτερα, other things,] it is righter thus, ἑτέρᾳ, with the accent in the laſt ſyllable ſave one; underſtand, συνόδῳ, Seſſion, or Convention. I wonder, that neither Muſculus nor Chriſtophorſon perceived this. Valeſ.

[z] Yes, in the Ninth Action, the Cauſe of Theodoret the Biſhop was judged, as Our Copies ſhow us. But the Copies of the Chalcedon Synod, which Evagrius made uſe of, ſeem to have been different from ours. For, as we have ſeen a little before, Evagrius reckons a Seventh Action, wherein other Canons were promulged. Which Action is at this day wanting in our Copies. Valeſ.

[a] Εἰς ἱερᾶς ἐῤῥ. In the Tenth Action of the Chalcedon-Councill, and in Nicephorus, the Præpoſition is wanting. But in the Florentine Manuſcript, I found it written ἐς ἱερέας; which is the ſame as if he ſhould have ſaid ἐν ἱερεῦσιν, among, or, of the number of the Biſhops. Valeſ. The reading in Robert Stephens is εἰς ἱερέα ἐῤῥ.

[b] The Biſhops Decreed, that as well Baſſianus, as Stephanus, ſhould be removed from the Biſhoprick of Epheſus, and that in their place another Biſhop ſhould be made; as may be ſeen in the Eleventh and Twelfth Action. This place of Evagrius therefore is to be made good thus: ἔδοξε χθῆναι μὲν αὐτὸν καὶ στέφανον, ἕτερον δὲ ἀντιχθῆναι, that as well he as Stephanus ſhould be ejected, or, depoſed, and another Subſtituted in their room. Valeſ.

* Or, ſhould be placed.

[c] Inſtead of Baſianus, it muſt be made Sabinianus, from the Acts of the Chalcedon-Councill. Of this Sabinianus Biſhop of the Perrenſes (which is a City in the Euphratenſian Province) Liberatus makes mention, in the twelfth Chapter of his Breviarium. Alſo, there is an Epiſtle of Theodoret's extant, written to this Sabinianus, which is reckoned the 126th amongſt his Epiſtles. Valeſ.

CHAP. I.

Concerning Zeno's Empire, and concerning his Life.

BUT Zeno, after the death of his own * Son, was inveſted with the ſole Adminiſtration of the Empire; ſuppoſing as it were that he could not be poſſeſt of the Dominion of the whole world, unleſs with [an uncontroulable] Liberty he might proſecute all manner of pleaſures which occurred: at his firſt entrance he yielded himſelf ſo wholly up to the attempts and allurements of Luſts, [a] that no filthy or flagitious Fact could put a reſtraint upon him: but in ſuch a manner he * wallowed in the commiſſion thereof, that he thought it vile and mean to commit theſe things in darkneſs and obſcurity: but [to perpetrate them] openly and in the ſight of all [was in his judgment] Royall and becoming only an Emperour. But, his Sentiments [in this matter] were ill and * abſolutely ſervile. [b] For an Emperour is not taken notice of for this, becauſe he Rules over others, but on this account, in regard in the firſt place he governeth and moderateth himſelf, permitting nothing that is extravagant or ill [c] to creep into himſelf: But continues [d] ſo impregnable againſt intemperance, that [he may ſeem to be] a living Image of Virtues, inſtructing his Subjects to an imitation [of Himſelf.] But he who has proſtituted himſelf to Pleaſures, by degrees is imprudently made the vileſt of Servants, and becomes a Captive not redeemable, * frequently changing his Maſters, like the unuſefulleſt ſort of Slaves. For innumerable pleaſures are made his Miſtreſſes, which can never have an end of their Train and Coherence, and of their ſucceeding one another: the pleaſure which is at hand never ſtopping, but becomes the Incentive and Preface of another; till ſuch time as any perſon, [e] really and truly made an Emperour [over himſelf,] can expell that turbulent and tumultuous Government of pleaſures, reigning in future, and not oppreſt with Tyranny: otherwiſe, continuing a Slave to his laſt breath, he muſt poſſeſs the infernall pit.

* Viz. Leo the Second; See book 2. chap. 17.

[a] In the moſt excellent Florentine M. S. at this place ſome Learned Scholiaſt had ſet theſe words; παπαὶ τῆς νυνὶ ὁμοιώτητος, Oh, the likeneſs to what it is now! Valeſ.

* Or, was converſant.

* Or, like thoſe of ſlaves.

[b] Ὅτι οὐκ ἐξ ὧν. In the Kings, Tellerian, and Florentine M. SS. and in Stephens's Edit. the adverb ὅτι is wanting, which Learned men had put in by conjecture, unhappily enough. But, I doubt not but it ſhould be written, ἃ χὸ ἐξ ὧν, &c. and have rendred it accordingly. Valeſ.

[c] Inſtead of [παρεισδῦναι, entrance,] in my judgment it ought to be made παρεισδύνειν to creep into: and this reading is confirmed by Nicephorus, book 16. chap. 1. Valeſ.

[d] Οὕτως δὲ ἀνάλωτος; I aſſent to the Learned, who have long ſince mended it thus, ὅπως δὲ ἀνάλωτος, &c. But continues ſo impregnable, &c. although the Manuſcript Copies vary not here. But Nicephorus, when he perceived this place to be corrupted, interpolated it after this manner: κἀντεῦθεν ἀνάλωτος, &c; whence he continues ſo impregnable, &c. Valeſ.

* Or, changing his frequent ſlaveries.

[e] Ἀυτοκράτωρ τις ὅπως γενόμενος, any perſon thus made an Emperour: doubtleſs it ſhould be ὄντως γενόμενος, really and truly made, &c; and ſo the reading is in Nicephorus. Valeſ.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Incurſions of the Barbarians, both in the Eaſt, and in the Weſt.

SUch a perſon was Zeno at the beginning [of his Government,] [a] a man of an intemperate and diſſolute life. But thoſe who were his Subjects,

[a] Ἐνδιαίτημα τὸν βίον. Chriſtophorſon underſtood not this phraſe, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For he has rendred it thus: Ad hunc modum Zeno in initio imperii ſui vitam inſtituit, After this manner Zeno at the beginning of his Empire ordered his life. Græcians take ἐνδιαίτημα βίου for a diſſolute and intemperate life. Which word does frequently occur in this ſenſe in Dion Coccetanus and others. Hence ἐνδιαίτησις is taken for Luxury and Delights, as Suidas atteſts. Further, the Greeks do term Diſſolute and Luxurious perſons thus, becauſe they are wont to obſerve no rule of living. So Dionyſius Halicarnaccenſis, in his fifth book, ſpeaking of a juſt King, ſays theſe words, μηδὲν ἐνδιαιτώμενον τῆς παλαίας, not at all receding from the Inſtitutions of his Anceſtours. Nicephorus therefore has rightly expounded this place of Evagrius thus, ἀῤῥυθμός τις καὶ ἀνάγωγος, καὶ τὸν βίον μᾶλλον ἐνδιαίτημενος, an incompoſed and diſorderly perſon, and moſt extravagantly diſſolute in his life. Valeſ.

jects, as * well in the Eaſtern as Weſtern parts, underwent moſt ſevere miſchiefs and afflictions: on this ſide the † Saracens ruined all things: on that, a multitude of the Hunni, heretofore termed the Maſſagetæ, made incurſions into Thracia, and paſſed the Danube; no body making a reſiſtance againſt them; Zeno himſelf alſo in a Barbarick manner [b] by force took away [from the Provincialls] what [the Barbarians] had left.

* Or, as well at the riſing as ſetting Sun.

† Or, the Barbarians inhabiting Tents.

[b] 'Tis ſtrange that neither Tranſlatour hath hit the ſence of this place. For Muſculus renders it thus: Zenone deinceps ad Barbaricum morem violenter abrepto, Zeno being from thenceforth violently hurried away to a Barbarick diſpoſition. But Chriſtophorſon Tranſlates it in this manner; Zeno vero reliquis etiam Imperii partibus per vim barbaro quodam more ac modo ſpoliatus eſt, But Zeno in the other parts of the Empire alſo by force committed ſpoils in a certain barbarous faſhion and manner. But had they conſulted Nicephorus, they might have had a right underſtanding of this place from him. For Nicephorus has explained theſe words of Evagrius thus: ὅσα δὲ τύλοις καλαμπάνελο, ζηνώνι φερὸς βίαν ἀφῃρέλο, ἀλλ' ἧττον ἢ οἱ βάρβαροι ἐτόνουν, that is, But whatever had been left by them [the Barbarians,] was forcibly taken away by Zeno, who infeſted [the Provinces] at no leſs rate than the Barbarians. Further, in the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. inſtead of φερὸς βίαν, the reading is φερὸς βίας, in the Plurall number, which ſeems to me more elegant. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

Concerning Baſiliſcus's Tyranny, and Zeno's Flight.

BUT When Baſiliſcus Verina's Brother made an Inſurrection againſt him, (For even his own Relations were enemies to Zeno, all perſons equally abominating his debauch't life;) he had not ſo much as a thought in him that was manly and couragious: (For wickedneſs is a cowardly thing, which breeds deſperation and deſpondency, and gives a ſufficient indication of an unmanlineſs of mind, from its being vanquiſhed by pleaſures:) but flies with all the haſt imaginable, and without a Battell yields ſo great an Empire to Baſiliſcus. He endured alſo a tedious [a] Siege [b] in the Country of the Iſaurians where he himſelf had been born, having his wife Ariadne with him, (who after [her huſbands flight] had left her mother,) and as many of his friends as had continued faithfull to him. Baſiliſcus therefore having thus encircled himſelf with the Crown of the Romans, and proclaimed his Son Marcus Cæſar, took a contrary courſe, both to Zeno, and to thoſe who had been Emperours before [Zeno.]

[a] Zeno having heard of Baſiliſcus's defection, ſtruck with fear, fled with his wife Ariadne into Iſauria, and betook himſelf to a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, the name whereof was Ubara: but afterwards, when Baſiliſcus had ſent Hillus and Trocondus with vaſt forces againſt him, he went to Teſſædes, or rather as Nicephorus ſays, to the City Seleucia, which was the Head City of all Iſauria. There he was a long while Beſieged by Hillus and Trocondus, as Theophanes relates in his Chronicon pag. 104. Cedrenus alſo and Nicephorus do affirm the ſame. But in Theophanes, the name Trocondus is corrupted. For the common Editions have it, Ἴλλυς καὶ σικόνδος, Hillus and Secundus, whereas it ſhould be Ἴλλυς καὶ Τροκόνδος, Trocondus, as it is rightly written in Nicephorus. Indeed the ſame Theophanes, pag. 106, terms him Procundus; which comes nearer to the true reading. This perſon was Brother to Hillus, and bore the Conſulate in the year of Chriſt 482, as it occurs in Marcellinus's Chronicon: but at length, when Hillus had ſet up for a Tyrant, Trocondus, who had been ſent by his Brother to get Forces, was taken by Johannes a Maſter of the Milice, and beheaded; as Theophanes, informs us pag. 112. Notwithſtanding, at that place of Theophanes the name Trocondus is likewiſe corrupted. Valeſ.

[b] Κατὰ τὴν ἄνω τῆς ἰσαύρων. The words are tranſpoſed; and are to be reſtored to their Priſtine order in this manner: κατὰ τὴν ἄνω ἰσαύρων χώραν, in the Country of the Iſaurians where he himſelf had been born: which words of Evagrius, Nicephorus has expreſt thus: τραλὸν δὲ ἀξιόμαχον ἐνῳκοδόμησε, εἰς πολιορκίαν ζηνῶνος ἔπεμπεν ἀνὰ τὴν ἰσαυείας σελεύκειαν· ἥπερ ἐτέτειχο εἰς φῶς ἀγαγῶσα τῶν, καὶ φυσάδα κατέκειτεν, And having gathered an Army fit for an Engagement, he ſent it to beſiege Zeno at Seleucia in Iſauria, Which Country had given Zeno Birth, and at that time hid the Fugitive. Valeſ.

CHAP. IV.

* Rejecting, or, aboliſhing.

[INduced thereto] * by an Embaſſy therefore of ſome perſons [ſent to him] from Alexandria, he recalls Timotheus from Exile, (who had been baniſhed eighteen years;) Acacius [at that time] adminiſtring the Biſhoprick of Conſtantinople. When therefore Timotheus was arrived at the Imperiall City, he perſwades Baſiliſcus || to ſend his Circular Letters to the Prelates in all places, and to Anathematize what had been done at Chalcedon, and Leo's Book. The † Contents of the Circular Letters run thus.

[a] 'Ἐκ πρεσβείας δὲ. Without doubt it muſt be written thus, ἐκ πρεσβείας, δή, by an Embaſſy therefore. Which though it may ſeem a ſmall and triviall emendation, is yet altogether neceſſary. In Nicephorus, 'tis δήθεν, to wit, or, therefore. Valeſ.

Betaking therefore after this manner abrogated, let them be wholly caſt out of the one and only Catholick and Apoſtolick Orthodox Church; in regard they alter the eternall and ſalutary* * Terms of the 318 Holy Fathers, and thoſe of the [150] Bleſſed Fathers who † have publiſhed expreſs Declarations [concerning] the Holy Ghoſt, [c] as likewiſe the [Terms] of thoſe at Epheſus. It ſhall therefore be lawfull for no perſon whatever, whether Prieſt or Laick, in any wiſe to tranſgreſs that moſt Divine Conſtitution of the Holy Creed. [Further,] together with all thoſe Innovations made at Chalcedon, againſt the Divine Creed, [We Decree] that their Hereſie ſhall be Anathematized, who deny that the only-begotten Son of God was really and truly incarnate and made man by the Holy Ghoſt, and of the Holy and ever-Virgin Mary the Theotocos, but in a falſe and monſtrous manner aſſert [that he took fleſh] either from Heaven, or imaginarily and in ſhew only and appearance; in fine, every Hereſie, and if there hath been any other Innovation made, at what time ſoever, in whatever manner, or place of the whole world, either in ſenſe and meaning, or in words,* [framed] in order to a tranſgreſſing the ſaid Divine Creed. But in regard 'tis the property of an Imperial providence, by a foreſeeing conſideration and inſpection liberally to diſtribute ſecurity to its Subjects, not only at the preſent, but for the future alſo; We Decree that the moſt Holy Biſhops in all places ſhall ſubſcribe to this Our Divine Circular Letter when * exhibited to them, and ſhall plainly declare, that they adhere ſolely to the Divine Creed of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers, which the Hundred and fifty Holy Fathers have ſince confirmed; in ſuch manner as thoſe moſt Holy Fathers afterwards convened at the Metropolis of the Epheſians have definitively Decreed, to wit, [d] that we ought only to follow the Divine Creed of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers, in regard it is the Boundary and Limit of the Faith: Anathematizing what ever hath at Chalcedon been made the ſtumbling-block of the Orthodox Laity, and wholly ejecting it out of the Churches, as being become the impediment of the [e] univerſall and our own [private] felicity. But whoſoever after theſe our Divine Syllables (which, we believe, are promulged agreeable to [the mind of] God, in regard they procure an Union to God's Holy Churches, wiſht-for and deſired by all men;) ſhall at any time attempt to produce, or ſo much as to name, either by way of diſpute, or in their teaching, or writings, at what time, in what manner or place ſoever, the Innovation which hath been made at Chalcedon againſt the Faith; our command is, that ſuch perſons as theſe (in regard they are the Occaſioners of Diſquietude and Tumult to all God's Holy Churches and to every one of our Subjects, and are enemies to God and to our ſafety, according to thoſe Laws promulged long before our time by Theodoſius of Bleſſed and Divine Memory, againſt this manner of * improbity, which [Laws] we have ſubjoyned to this Our Divine Circular Letter;) if they be Biſhops or Clergymen, ſhall be depoſed: but if Monks, or Laicks they † *ſhall be lyable to Baniſhment, to a Confiſcation of all their Goods, and to the exſtreameſt puniſhments. [b] There is indeed extant a Conſtitution of the Emperour Conſtantine's, wherein the Dogmaticall Books of Arius are ordered to be burnt; which Conſtitution occurs at pag. 221. of our Socrates. Nevertheleſs, the Emperour Baſiliſcus ſeems here to mean another Law, which had been promulged by Conſtantine againſt all Hereticks in generall. But that Law hath periſhed by the injury of time. Yet part of it is ſtill remaining in Euſebius, in the Third Book of his Life of Conſtantine, Chap. 64, and 66. But, there are two Conſtitutions extant of Theodoſius Junior's, concerning the burning of Neſtorius's books. The former of which makes mention of the Law of Conſtantine of Bleſſed Memory againſt Arius's impious books. Further, theſe Conſtitutions of Theodoſius occur in the third part of the Epheſine Councill. Baſiliſcus had ſubjoyned theſe Laws of Theodoſius to his own Circular Edict, as 'tis hereafter atteſted. Valeſ.

[c] Κατὰ τῶν ἐφεσίων. At this place Nicephorus has rightly added two words, in this manner; κὴ ἅγ κτ τῶν ἐφεσίων. But I affirm that a third word is to be added, thus; κὴ τὰ ἅγ κτ τῶν ἐφεσίων. For the word [ὅεια, terms] is underſtood; which occurs in the foregoing Clauſes. Valeſ.

[d] Ὅτι δὺ μόνω, &c In Nicephorus 'tis truer written thus, ὅτι δεῖ μόνω, &c. that we ought only to follow, &c. which reading Chriſtopherſon and Sr Henry Savil have embraced. A little after this, where the reading before was, ὡς ὅεσν πίςεως, as the Boundary and Limit of the Faith; from the Florent. and Tellerian M. SS. I have made it, εἰς ὅεσν πίςεως, in regard it is, &c. as 'tis in Nicephorus. Valeſ.

[e] Τῇ ὁικυμδύμ κὴ ὠυεῤῥρᾳ εὐπραξίᾳ. In the Tellerian M. S. and in Nicephorus, I found it written, τῇ ὁικυμδυικῇ, of the univerſall, &c. Valeſ.

CHAP. V.

Concerning thoſe perſons who conſented to Baſiliſcus's Circular Letters, and rejected the Synod [of Chalcedon.]

AS therefore 'tis related by Zacharias the Rhetorician, Timotheus, newly returned from Exile (as I have ſaid,) gave his conſent to theſe Circular Letters: as did likewiſe Peter Biſhop of Antioch, ſurnamed Fullo*, who together with Timotheus was preſent at the Imperial [City Conſtantinople.] Theſe things having been performed in this manner, † they Vote that Paulus alſo ſhould recover the Archiepiſcopall Chair of Epheſus. Further, [the ſame Zacharias] affirms, that Anaſtaſius, who had ſucceeded

* Or, The Fuller.

† See chap. 6. note (4.)

ceeded Juvenalis [in the See] of Jeruſalem, ſubſcribed the ſame Circular Letters, as likewiſe very many others: inſomuch that they were in number about Five hundred, who condemned Leo's * Letter, and the Chalcedon Synod. [The ſame Authour] [a] does alſo ſome where record the Supplicatory Libell preſented by the Biſhops of Aſia [b] convened at Epheſus, to Baſiliſcus; part of the Contents of which [Libell] run thus.

* Or, Tome.

[a] Καὶ πε ἡ δέησιν ἐγγεγρῶ. Doubtleſs it muſt be made ἐγγεγράφει, does record; which I admire Tranſlatours perceived not. Zacharias is underſtood, who in his Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtory had recorded this Libell entire, which the Biſhops of Aſia, convened at Epheſus, had ſent to the Emperour Baſiliſcus. Valeſ.

[b] Concerning this Epheſine Councill, which was held in the times of the Emperour Baſiliſcus, Baronius in his Annalls, at the year of Chriſt 476, writes very ſlightly and negligently: remarking this only, that it was celebrated by the Eutychians. But he mentions neither upon what account it was aſſembled, nor what was tranſacted therein: it is our office therefore, by our care and diligence to ſupply what he has omitted. After the Circular Letters ſent forth by the Emperour Baſiliſcus againſt the Chalcedon-Councill, Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, the only perſon of the Patriarchs ſubject to the Eaſtern Empire, refuſed ſubſcribing to theſe Letters, nor would ever endure to expunge the Chalcedon Synod out of the Eccleſiaſticall Tables. Moreover, the Monks of Conſtantinople reſolutely oppoſed Baſiliſcus. Laſtly, the Conſtantinopolitane populacy began to be moſt grievouſly tumultuous, threatning to fire the City and the Pallace, if the Emperour ſhould perſiſt to put a force upon Acacius and the Catholicks. Baſiliſcus, terrified hereat, flies from the Imperial City; took from the Conſtantinopolitane Church their Rights and Priviledges, and forbad the Senators to ſpeak to [or ſalute] Acacius. But afterwards, when he heard that Zeno was on his return out of Iſauria; being ſtricken with fear, he came into the Church together with his wife and children; and excuſing himſelf to Acacius and the Clergy of the Imperiall City, reſtored their Rights to the Conſtantinopolitan Church, and ſet forth his Anti-Circular [that is, Letters contrary to his Circular] Letters: thus Theodorus Lector informs us, Book 1. The Eutychians therefore, (when they ſaw Acacius contend with ſo much fierceneſs for the confirmation of the Chalcedon-Synod; and that not only the Monaſteries, but the people alſo of the Imperial City, and other Prieſts every where, were excited by Acacius againſt Baſiliſcus;) convened a Councill of Biſhops of their own party in the City Epheſus: in which Councill they condemned and depoſed both Acacius, and ſome other Biſhops who embraced the ſame Sentiments with him: and then they entreated the Emperour Baſiliſcus, that he would perſiſt in his former opinion, and would not promulge a Conſtitution Contrary to his own Circular Letters. In the ſame Synod, Paulus is ordained Biſhop of Epheſus by the Biſhops of the ſame Province, and the Patriarchicall priviledge is reſtored to the Epheſine See, as our Evagrius relates in the ſixth chapter of this book. Further, this Epheſine Councill was held on the year of Chriſt 477, after the Conſulate of Baſiliſcus and Armatus. Which I gather from hence, becauſe this Synod was aſſembled a little before Baſiliſcus promulged his Anti-Circular Letters. Now Baſiliſcus publiſhed thoſe Letters on that year I have mentioned; when he underſtood that Zeno was returning out of Iſauria with an Army; as I have obſerved above out of Theodorus Lector. Indeed, the Aſian Biſhops ſeem to intimate this in their Letter to Baſiliſcus, in theſe words: μήδεν ἧν ἕτερον πρὸς τὰ θεῖα ὑμῶν ἐγκύκλια προσλαβόντες θελήσητε, Be pleaſed therefore to publiſh nothing contrary to your Divine Circular Letters. Moreover, Timotheus Ælurus ſeems to have preſided at this Councill. For he came to Epheſus in the Reign of Baſiliſcus, and ſeated Paulus in his Epiſcopal Chair, as Evagrius relates from Zacharias. Nor is it likely, that Acacius Patriarch of Conſtantinople ſhould have been depoſed by any other perſon than the Alexandrian Biſhop, who held the dignity of a Patriarch equall to Acacius. For who can believe that the Conſtantinopolitan Biſhop was depoſed by the Biſhops of Aſia, who long before this, from the times of John Chryſoſtome, were ſubject to the Biſhops of Conſtantinople? Valeſ.

To the moſt Pious in all things, and the Lovers of Chriſt, our Lords Baſiliſcus and Marcus, perpetual Victors, [c] Auguſti. And after ſome words, You have always ſeemed (Moſt pious and Chriſt-Loving Emperours!) to be divers ways aſſaulted, together with the Faith which is hated and oppoſed. And after other words.

[c] Marcus was firſt created Ceſar by his Father Baſiliſcus, as Marcellinus relates in his Chronicon, Theophanes, and others. 'Tis certain, in Baſiliſcus's Circular Letters he is only termed the moſt noble Ceſar. But afterwards he was ſtyled Auguſtus by his Father, as this Letter of the Biſhops of the Epheſine Councill doth inform us. Alſo, in the Anti-Circular Letter of Baſiliſcus, the ſame Marcus is named Emperour with his Father. The Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle is miſtaken therefore, who relates that Baſiliſcus, as ſoon as he was proclaimed Emperour, crowned his Son Marcus Emperour. Candidus ſays truer, in the ſecond book of his Hiſtory, in Photius. Valeſ.

[d] Ἀλαζονικῇ πομπείᾳ, with a proud revenge: the reading in Nicephorus is the ſame. Where Johannes Langus renders πομπείαν, revenge. But I am of opinion, that by a ſmall change this place is thus to be reſtored; ἀλαζονικῇ τινὶ μωρίᾳ, with a certain arrogant folly. Valeſ.

[e] Ἐλαθέρεν πῶ ὑμετέρεν εὐσέβειαν, &c. Chriſtophorſon read ἡμετέρων, our piety; contrary to the Faith and Authority of all Copies, and without any ſenſe. Beſides, he has rendred the following words very badly. Whence it hapned, that Baronius, who every where follows Chriſtophorſon's Verſion, could in no wiſe underſtand the tranſactions of this Epheſine Councill. So great a hindrance is an ill Rendition. Nor has Johannes Langus tranſlated this Clauſe more happily. For he hath rendred it thus: Atteſtamur coram Salvatore Noſtro Jeſu Chriſto, &c. We atteſt before our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, that Your piety is free and innocent. From which we requeſt, that a Juſt and Canonical and Eccleſiaſtick Sentence of Condemnation and Depoſition may be pronounc'd againſt them, and eſpecially againſt him who hath been many ways found out to have adminiſtred the Biſhoprick in the Imperial City impiouſly. But the Biſhops of Aſia do not ſay this: but requeſt of the Emperours Baſiliſcus and Marcus, that they would not communicate any more with Acacius and the other Biſhops whom they themſelves had condemned and depoſed by an Eccleſiaſtick Sentence: For this is the import of theſe words, ἐλαθέραν πῶ ὑμετέραν εὐσέβειαν ἐξ) δεόμεθα τῆς ἐπενεχθείσης, &c; which are to be written in one entire Clauſe, without any diſtinction. But Tranſlatours, following Nicephorus, and the Edition of Robert Stephens, have placed a diſtinction after the word ἐξ), which led them into a miſtake. Valeſ.

* In this Edition of Valeſius's, 'tis κολάζεώς, abuſe: it is, I ſuppoſe, an errour of the Preſs; put inſtead of κολακείας, condemnation; which is the reading in Stephens's Edition.

[Further,] the ſame Zacharias writes word for word thus. As ſoon as the Circular and Imperial Letters were publiſhed, thoſe perſons in the Imperial [City] [f] who were diſtempered with Eutyches's Opinion and followed a Monaſtick life, [f] Οἱ πῶ ϑυλυχᾶς φανλασίαν νοσῶνλες. Tranſlatours underſtood not theſe words of Zacharias Rhetor. Nor does Nicephorus ſeem to have underſtood them. For, inſtead of them, he has ſubſtituted theſe; οἱ τὰ ϑυλυχᾶς φανλαζόμενοι, thoſe who imagine [or, conceive] Eutyches Tenets.] By φανλασίαν [Phantaſie,] or, [Imagination,] Zacharias means the opinion of Eutyches, who aſſerted, that the fleſh of Chriſt was not true nor conſubſtantiall with us, but Phantaſticall or imaginary; as may be ſeen in the Acts of the Chalcedon Councill. Hence the Epiſtles of Avitus Biſhop of Vienna, wherein he confutes Eutyches's Errour, have this Title, Contra phantaſma, againſt the Phantaſme; as Sirmondus atteſts. Further, from this place it may be gathered, that Zacharias Rhetor was not an Eutychian, as Baronius thought at the year of Chriſt 476. For he would never have expreſt himſelf thus, had he been a follower of Eutyches's Sect. It muſt therefore either be ſaid, that theſe are not the words of Zacharias Rhetor, (which notwithſtanding Evagrius affirms;) or elſe, that he was not an Eutychianiſt. See chap. 14. Valeſ.

ſuppoſing they had met with Timotheus as with ſome unexpected gain, and hoping to reap a great advantage to themſelves from the Circular Letters; in great haſt betook themſelves to Timotheus. And when they had been convinced by him, that the Word of God was of the ſame ſubſtance with us according to the fleſh, but Conſubſtantiall to the Father in relation to the Deity, they went back [to their own homes.]

CHAP. VI.

That Timotheus Ælurus recovered the [Biſhoprick] of Alexandria, and having reſtored the priviledge of a Patriarchate to the [Church] of Epheſus, Anathematized the Chalcedon-Synod.

THE ſame [Zacharias] ſays, that Timotheus leaving the Imperial [City Conſtantinople,] arrived at Epheſus, and [there] * placed [a] Paulus in the Archi-Epiſcopall See of the Epheſians. This [Paulus] had long before this been ordained by the Biſhops of that Province, [b] agreeable to the more ancient uſage: but had been ejected out of his See. Timotheus alſo reſtored to the Epheſine Church the [c] Patriarchicall priviledge, which the Synod of Chalcedon had deprived it of, as I have ſaid. Removing from thence, he comes to Alexandria, and perſiſted to requeſt thoſe who came to him, to Anathematize the Synod of Chalcedon. Nevertheleſs, many others of his own Faction receded from him (as 'tis related by the ſame Zacharias,) as did likewiſe Theodotus one of thoſe that had been ordained at Joppa by * Theodoſius, who was made Biſhop of Jeruſalem by ſome perſons, at ſuch time as Juvenalis went to Conſtantinople.

[a] Timotheus Ælurus and Petrus Fullo, together with other Biſhops, being a little before this aſſembled at Conſtantinople, had Decreed that this Paulus ſhould be reſtored to the See of Epheſus, out of which he had been ejected. For theſe are Evagrius's words at the fifth chapter of this book, ψηφίζονται καὶ παῦλον τὸν τῆς ἐφεσίων ἀρχιερατικὸν ὑπελθεῖν θρόνον, they Vote that Paulus alſo ſhould recover the Archiepiſcopall Chair of Epheſus. Which place Chriſtophorſon has not rendred truly, in this manner; His rebus ita conſtitutis Paulus ad ſedem Archiepiſcopatûs Epheſiani capeſſendam deligitur, Theſe things having been thus conſtituted, Paulus is choſen to take the Archiepiſcopall See of Epheſus. For Paulus was not elected by Ælurus and Petrus Fullo at Conſtantinople, that he ſhould take the Epheſine-See: but having been expelled out of the See of Epheſus, he came to Conſtantinople: where a Councill of Eutychianiſts being convened, it was Decreed that he ſhould recover the Archiepiſcopate of the City Epheſus. In the fifth chapter of this book, the reading in the vulgar Editions was, ἐπελθεῖν θρόνου, Come into the Chair. But from the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. I have mended it, ὑπελθεῖν, enter upon. Yet I had rather add a preposition, and write it thus, ἐπαγελθεῖν return to, recover, or, re-enter upon. Valeſ.

[b] Ἀνὰ τὸ ἀρχαιοτέρου συνήθειαν. I had rather make it κατὰ τὸ, &c. agreeable to, &c. Further, what Zacharias ſays here is moſt true, to wit, that it was the ancienter uſage, that the Biſhop of Epheſus ſhould be ordained by the Biſhops of his own Province. For, from S[t] Timothy who was the firſt Biſhop of the Epheſians, untill Caſtinus, and Heraclides, whom John Chryſoſtome ordained, all the Biſhops of the Epheſians were ordained in the ſame City by the Biſhops of that Province, as 'tis apparent from the Eleventh Action of the Chalcedon-Councill. Valeſ.

[c] Zacharias does here call the Patriarchicall priviledge the Right of Primacy, or the priviledge of Ordaining Metropolitanes. For in this the Patriarchicall priviledge did properly conſiſt, as I have obſerved in my Little Book concerning the interpretation of the Sixth Canon of the Nicene Councill, which is publiſhed at the cloſe of Our Socrates. Now whereas Zacharias, or rather Evagrius, adds, that this priviledge had been taken away from the See of Epheſus by the Chalcedon Synod; he means the Sixteenth Action of the Chalcedon-Synod; wherein it was Decreed, that the Conſtantinopolitane Biſhops ſhould Ordain Metropolitanes in the Aſian Diœceſis. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

That the Monks having raiſed a Sedition by the perſwaſion of Acacius, Baſiliſcus was put into a fear, and wrote and promulged Circular Letters contrary to thoſe he had publiſhed before.

[THE ſame Zacharias] relates likewiſe, that Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople [a] was extreamly troubled at theſe things, and that he incited the Monks and Populacy of the Imperial [City] againſt Baſiliſcus, as being an Heretick. And, that Baſiliſcus, at length * renounced his Circular Letters, and wrote a Conſtitution, that what had been ſurreptitiouſly [and raſhly] done, ſhould be wholly vacated and made null; and, that he ſent abroad Letters contrary to his former Circular Letters, wherein he confirmed the Synod at Chalcedon. And theſe Anti-Circular-Letters (as he terms them,) Zacharias has omitted, who hath written his whole Hiſtory with partiality and in favour to his own party. But the Contents of them run word for word thus.

[a] Πεεπαθήσασα. I had conjectured long ſince, that it ſhould be περιαθήσασα, was extreamly troubled. The Tellerian M. S. has at length confirmed this my conjecture; wherein I found it written περιαθήσασα. Valeſ.

* Or, Denyed; that is, repealed, or revoak'd.

Baſiliſcus's Anti-Circular-Letter.

Emperours Cæſars, Baſiliſcus and Marcus. We Decree, that the Apoſtolick and Orthodox Faith (which originally and from the beginning hath flouriſhed in the Catholick Churches, which hath obtained even untill our Empire, which doth now obtain under our Empire, and which ought forever to obtain, into which we have been baptized, and which we believe;) ſhall only continue inviolate and unſhaken, and ſhall for ever be prevalent in all the Catholick and Apoſtolick Churches of the Orthodox; and, that nothing elſe ſhall be required. For this reaſon therefore We command, that all things which have been done on account of the Faith or Eccleſiaſtick * Diſcipline under our Empire, whether they be Circular Letters, or other [Letters,] or what ever elſe, ſhall be void and null: Neſtorius and Eutyches, and every other Hereſie, and all thoſe who embrace the ſame Sentiments with them, being Anathematized. And ['tis our will,] that concerning this Subject, neither any Synod ſhould be convened, nor any other queſtion [ſtarted:] but, that theſe things ſhould continue firm and unſhaken. Moreover, [We command,] [b] that thoſe Provinces (the Ordination whereof the Chair of this Imperiall and Glorious City hath had,) ſhall be reſtored to the moſt pious and moſt Holy Patriarch and Arch-Biſhop Acacius: to wit, the moſt pious Biſhops that now are, continuing in their own Sees; [yet ſo] that after their deaths no prejudice from this buſineſs may ariſe to the Right of Ordination [belonging to] the Holy Chair of this Imperial and famous City. Now, * it is dubious to no perſon, that this our Divine Decree has the force of a Divine Conſtitution. And theſe things proceeded in this manner.

* Or, Conſtitution,

* Or, It has been dubious.

[b] When by the Emperour Baſiliſcus's Circular Letters, the Chalcedon-Synod had been wholly abrogated, the priviledges of the Conſtantinopolitan See which had been eſtabliſhed in that Councill, ſeemed to have been taken away by that ſame Sanction. By which thing Acacius was chiefly moved, and uſed his utmoſt endeavour, that the Emperour Baſiliſcus ſhould revoak his own Conſtitution. Beſides, in the Epheſine Synod, the Patriarchicall priviledge had been reſtored to the See of Epheſus by Timotheus Ælurus, as we have ſeen seen before. Which having been done, the Asian Diœceſis, the ordinations whereof had been given to the Biſhop of Conſtantinople by the Decree of the Chalcedon-Synod, was taken away from that See. There was therefore need of a new Conſtitution, whereby its Rights and Priviledges might be reſtored to the Conſtantinopolitane See. This therefore the Emperour Baſiliſcus now performs, by the publication of theſe his Anti-Circular-Letters. Theodorus Lector does likewiſe atteſt the ſame, in his firſt Book Collectan. about the cloſe thereof. Valeſ.

BUT Zeno having (as 'tis reported) [ſeen in his ſleep] the Holy [a] Proto-Martyr Thecla, famous for her many Conflicts, who incited him, and made him a promiſe that his Empire ſhould be reſtored to him; marched his Army towards Byzantium. And having with gifts, corrupted thoſe who beſieged him, he drives out Baſiliſcus who had held the Empire two years; and delivers him to the enemy after he had made his eſcape to the Holy Rails [of the Altar.] On this account Zeno dedicated a ſpatious Church, eminent for its * ſplendidneſs and beauty, to the Proto-Martyr Thecla, at Seleucia ſcituate in the Country of Iſauria, and beautified it with many and Imperial Sacred gifts, which are preſerved till theſe our times. Further, Baſiliſcus is ſent into the Region of the Cappadocians, † in order to his being put to death: but he is [b] ſlain in that Station named [c] Acuſus, together with his wife and children. And Zeno makes a Law, which abrogates what had been conſtituted by the Tyrant Baſiliſcus in his Circular Letters. Then alſo Petrus ſurnamed Fullo is driven from the Church of the Antiochians; and Paulus from that of the Epheſians.

[a] The Greeks who delight much in Epithets, are wont to grace each Saint with proper and peculiar Titles. Thus they commonly term Thecla the Apoſtle and Proto-Martyr. They call her an Apoſtle, becauſe, like an Apoſtle, ſhe had preacht the Faith of Chriſt in many places: and they ſtyle her Proto-Martyr, in regard as Stephen was the firſt Martyr of Chriſt amongſt men, ſo was ſhe the firſt amongſt women; as Baſilius Seleucienſis does atteſt in his firſt book concerning the Life and Miracles of the bleſſed Thecla. She is called Thecla by way of contraction, inſtead of Theoclia. For thus the ſame Baſilius does frequently term her. Valeſ.

* Or, Excellency.

† Or, being about to die.

[b] Ἀποσφάττεται. With Evagrius agrees Malchus in the firſt book of his Byzantine Hiſtory, and Candidus Iſaurus in the ſecond book of his Hiſtories; both which Authours relate, that Baſiliſcus was killed by the ſword. But the other Hiſtorians tell us, that he dyed by hunger and cold, together with his wife and children. This diſagreement of Writers in reference to Baſiliſcus's death, is taken notice of by Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag. 107. Valeſ.

[c] Ἐν ἀκυσῷ. So alſo the name of this Station is written in Nicephorus. But Cedrenus and Theophanes term it Cucuſus. Marcellinus and the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle call it Leminis and Limnæ, a Caſtrum [or, Caſtle] of Cappadocia, into which Baſiliſcus was thruſt together with his wife and children; and the gate of one of the Towers, wherein he was incloſed, being ſtop't up, he periſhed there by hunger and cold. Valeſ.

CHAP. IX.

That after Baſiliſcus's death, the Biſhops of Aſia, that they might appeaſe Acacius, ſent him a Penitentiary-Libell, [craving pardon] for their offence in rejecting the Synod of Chalcedon.

[IN the Interim,] the Biſhops of Aſia, in order to their appeaſing Acacius, excuſed themſelves, and craved pardon, ſending a Penitentiary-Libell [to him,] wherein they affirmed, that they had ſubſcribed to the Circular-Letters by force and conſtraint, not voluntarily; and they ſwore, that the thing was ſo, and that they had not believed, nor did believe otherwiſe than agreeable to the Synod at Chalcedon. The * purport of their Letters is this. The Epiſtle, or Petition, ſent to Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, from the Biſhops of Aſia. To Acacius the moſt Holy and moſt Pious Patriarch of the moſt Holy Church at the Imperial [City] Conſtantinople New Rome. And after other words. [a] He hath arrived amongſt us and does what is right and fitting; who alſo ſhall fill your place. And after a few words. By theſe Libells we ſignifie to you, that we have ſubſcribed, not according to the intent of our minds, but by force and conſtraint, giving our conſent thereto in words and Letters, but not in heart. For by [the aſſiſtance of] [b] your acceptable interceſſions, together with the aſſent of the Deity, we believe in ſuch manner as we have received from thoſe Three hundred and eighteen Luminaries of the world, and from the Hundred and fifty Holy Fathers. Beſides, [we believe] thoſe matters alſo, which have been pioufly and rightly determined at Chalcedon by the Holy Fathers convened there. Further, whether Zacharias the Rhetorician has calumniated theſe [Biſhops of Aſia,] or whether they themſelves have lyed, in averring that they ſubſcribed involuntarily, I cannot affirm.

* Or, ſorte.

[a] ἐρχεται ἐφ' ἡμᾶς. Chriſtophorſon and Sr Henry Savil have mended it thus ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, amongſt you, without any thing of ſenſe. Nicephorus, 'tis certain, confirms, the vulgar reading, viz. amongſt us. But in the next words which follow, it ought to be made ὑμέτερον τόπον, your place, inſtead of ἡμέτερον τόπον, our place. Johannes Langus perceived this before us, who has rendred this paſſage tranſcribed out of Evagrius thus, Reſtè ſanè ad nos venit, qui locum etiam veſtrum obtinebit. He hath indeed come rightly unto us, who ſhall alſo poſſeſs your place. By which words the Biſhops of Aſia mean the Legate, which Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople had ſent to them, to wit a Presbyter or a Deacon of the Conſtantinopolitane Church. But if any one had rather, with Chriſtophorſon, read ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, amongſt you; we muſt underſtand it of the Legate which the Biſhops of Aſia had ſent to Acacius, that he might preſent the Libell of ſatisfaction to him. And this I think is truer. Valeſ.

[b] Inſtead of [ἡμῶν, our] doubtleſs it muſt be [ὑμῶν, your,] as the reading is in Nicephorus. From whom an amendment muſt be made a little after this, thus, σῳ δόγματι, by dividing the words, which were erroneouſly made one word. Each emendation is confirmed by the Tellerian Manuſcript. Concerning thoſe who governed the Biſhoprick of Antioch.

[a] AFter therefore Peter [was ejected,] Stephanus aſſumes the Chair of Antioch: whom the children of the Antiochians ſlew with reeds, which were made ſharp like to Darts, as Johannes the Rhetorician has related. But after Stephanus, the Government of that ſame See was committed to Calendion, who excited thoſe that came to him to Anathematize Timotheus, together with Baſiliſcus's Circular Letters.

[a] After Petrus Fullo, Johannes Apamenus was Biſhop of Antioch. He being ejected after 3 months, Stephanus was put into his place, as Theophanes relates in his Cronicon, page 107: to which Writer agrees Gelaſius in Geſtis de nomine Acacii, and Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 18. Pope Felix has mentioned the ſame Johannes, in the Sentence of Condemnation which he dictated againſt Acacius, and in the Epiſtle which in the name of the Roman Synod he wrote to all the Presbyters and Archimandrites in Conſtantinople and Bithynia. Valeſ.

That the Emperour Zeno took a reſolution of perſecuting Ælurus: but by reaſon of his age he had compaſſion on him and let him alone. And how after Ælurus's death, Petrus Mongus was ordained by the Alexandrians. But Timotheus, Proterius's ſucceſſour, by the order of the Emperour, obtained the Chair of the Alexandrians.

MOreover, Zeno was reſolved to have expelled Timotheus out of Alexandria: but underſtanding from ſome perſons that he was now very aged, and would ſoon * go the way of all men, he † altered his reſolution. And not long after [Timotheus] paid the common debt [of Nature:] whereupon [a] thoſe of Alexandria by their own authority elect Petrus, ſurnamed Mongus, Biſhop. Which, when it came to Zeno's hearing, diſturbed him extreamly. Wherefore Zeno [b] puniſhed Petrus with death: but he recalled Timotheus [Salophaciolus,] Proterius's ſucceſſour, who then lived at Canopus on account of a Sedition raiſed by the people. Timotheus therefore by the Emperour's order recovered his own See.

* Or, enter the Inn, or, houſe of all men.

† Or, forbad.

[a] Οἱ τῆς ἀλεξανδρέων ἐπίσκοποι, &c. the Biſhops of Alexandria elect, &c. I had rather write ἐπίσκοπον, and ſo reade the whole clauſe thus, ᾧ πέλεν ἀυθεντίᾳ προχειρίζονται σφῶν οἱ τῆς ἀλεξανδρέων ἐπίσκοπον; whereupon thoſe of Alexandria by their own authority elect Petrus ſurnamed Mongus Biſhop: and I am of opinion that Evagrius wrote thus. 'Tis certain, theſe words οἱ τῆς ἀλεξανδρέων ἐπίσκοποι cannot be ſpoken of the ſuffragan Biſhops. Beſides, Petrus Mongus was ordained but by one Biſhop, as 'tis related in Geſtis de nomine Acacii, and in Acacius's Epiſtle to Pope Simplicius. Valeſ.

[b] Ζημίαν προξέλιμησε. I doubt not but it ſhould be written προσέλιμησε, puniſhed. For προσιμᾶν ſignifies mulctare, to puniſh. Whence προσιμον imports Puniſhment, as Suidas atteſts. But προξιμᾶν (which is the reading in Robert Stephens's Edition) ſignifies quite another thing. Nicephorus having found this fault in his Copy, expunged the Preposition, and worded this place of Evagrius thus, τὸν μὲν ψηφισαμένης θανάτῳ ζημίᾳ ἐτίμα, that is, He puniſhed thoſe who had elected [Petrus Mongus Biſhop] with a capitall puniſhment. And yet Evagrius does not ſay ſo. For he relates, that Mongus himſelf was condemned by Zeno, not the Biſhops who had choſen Mongus. 'Tis apparent therefore that Nicephorus had read thus in our Evagrius; ᾧ τὸν μὲν ὁ ζήνων θανάτῳ ζημίαν προσετίμησε, wherefore Zeno puniſhed thoſe with death; and that he underſtood it as ſpoken of the Hereticall Biſhops who had elected Mongus. Doubtleſs, the Biſhops who had choſen Mongus deſerved a ſorer puniſhment than Mongus himſelf, who was elected by them. For they had done that on their own authority, without the Emperours advice and direction: whenas it had been cuſtomary, by reaſon of the largneſs of the City Alexandria, that the Biſhop thereof ſhould not be elected, unleſs the Emperour's mind were firſt known. Beſides, they had preſumed to elect another Biſhop when the See was not void, but whilſt Timotheus Salophaciolus as yet ſurvived. Whereupon the Seditions and Diviſions, which ſeemed to have been extinguiſhed by the death of Timotheus Ælurus, were rekindled. For theſe reaſons, thoſe Biſhops were to be puniſhed with a capitall puniſhment, rather than Mongus. Nevertheleſs, in my judgment neither is true. For Mongus was puniſhed only with baniſhment. But the Biſhops who had ordained him, are ordered to be puniſhed by Anthemius the Auguſtalis; as Liberatus affirms in his Breviary, chap. 16. Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Johannes who obtained the Preſidency over the Alexandrian Church after Timotheus, and how Zeno outed him in regard he had forſworn himſelf, and reſtored the Chair of Alexandria to Petrus Mongus.

[a] I am of the ſame mind with Chriſtopherſon and Sr Henry Savil, who inſtead of [ἐκ βολῆς δὲ ἐνίων] have mended it thus, ἐκ βυλῆς δὲ ἐνίων, but by the advice of ſome perſons: which amendment is confirmed by Nicephorus and the Tellerian Manuſcript. Moreover, Liberatus in his Breviarium chap. 16, affirms that Johannes the Oeconomus [or, Steward] was ſent to Conſtantinople on a far different account. For he ſays, that Timotheus Salophaciolus, after he had recovered his Epiſcopall Chair by the Decree of Zeno Auguſtus, ſent ſome Eccleſiaſticks to Conſtantinople, amongſt whom was Johannes the Oeconomus, who might give the Emperour thanks for his own reſtitution. They alſo made a requeſt to the Emperour at the ſame time, that if any thing ſhould happen to Timotheus otherwiſe than well, no other perſon but a Catholick might be put into his See by the Clergy and people of Alexandria; as we are informed in Geſtis de nomine Acacii. Which thing Zeno in his anſwer to Salophaciolus's advices, ordered to be done by a Letter written to the Alexandrian Clergy; as Felix atteſteth in his firſt Epiſtle to Acacius, and Gelaſius in Geſtis de nomine Acacii. Further, in the Florentine Manuſcript, at the Margin here, theſe words occur, περὶ ἰωάννυ τῦ ταβεννησιώτυ, concerning Johannes Tabenneſiota. 'Tis certain, this Johannes is termed Tabenneſiota by Theophanes alſo in his Chronicon, becauſe he had been a Monk in the Monaſtery of the Tabennenſes at Canopus, where Timotheus Salophaciolus had likewiſe formerly followed a Monaſtick life and diſcipline; as Theophanes relates. Valeſ.

[a] BUT by the advice of ſome perſons, Johannes a Presbyter, [b] appointed to be the Steward of the venerable Church of the Holy Forerunner and Baptiſt John, makes a journey to the Imperial City [Conſtantinople,] being ſent on an Embaſſage [to make an addreſs to the Emperour,] that if it ſhould happen that their Biſhop ſhould die, the Inhabitants of Alexandria might have a [c] liberty of Electing one to preſide over their Church whom they ſhould have a mind to. This perſon, as Zacharias affirms, was by the Emperour diſcovered to have a deſign of procuring the Biſhoprick for himſelf. And when he had oblieged himſelf by oaths, that he would never ſeek to get the Alexandrian Chair, he returned into his own Country. But the Emperour promulged a Law, that after Timotheus's death, that perſon ſhould be Biſhop whom the Clergy and * people [of Alexandria] ſhould Elect. Timotheus having ended his life not long after, this Johannes (as

[b] Οἰκονόμειν τέλασμόν τε τὸν ναὸν ἰωάννυ. Victor Thunonenſis in his Chronicon, and Liberatus in his Breviary term this Johannes barely and ſimply Oeconomus. But in the Geſta de nomine Acacii he is ſtyled the Oeconomus of Timotheus Catholicus. Why therefore does Evagrius (or rather Zacharias, out of whom Evagrius took it,) ſay here, that Johannes was Oeconomus of Saint John's Church? For he was not Steward of this Church only; but he lookt after the revenues and money of all the Churches which were under the Biſhop of Alexandria, as Liberatus informs us in his ſixteenth chapter, in theſe words: Porro Johannes ex Oeconomo amicus factus eſt Hillo Magiſtro; qui cum reliquis deſcendit Alexandriam. Factuſque eſt iterum Oeconomus, habens cauſas omnium Eccleſiarum. Further Johannes of an Oeconomus is made a friend to Hillus the Magiſter; who together with the reſt went down to Alexandria. And he is made Steward again [or, the ſecond time,] having all the Cauſes of the Churches. Inſtead of [habens cauſas omnium Eccleſiarum,] I think it ſhould be habens gazas omnium Eccleſiarum, having the treaſure or riches of all the Churches. This emendation, Liberatus's following words do confirm, which run thus: Qui multa & pretioſa xenia direxit Hillo Magiſtro, &c. Who directed [or ſent] many and thoſe pretious preſents to Hillus the Magiſter, &c. Or muſt it be ſaid that the Church of Saint John Baptiſt was then the Greateſt Church of Alexandria? Indeed, heretofore the Greater Church of Alexandria was termed the Cæſarea, as I have obſerved at Socrates. But 'tis poſſible, that the Church of Saint John, which had been built there by Theodoſius after the demoliſhment of the Serapium, might become the Greater Church, the Epiſcopall Chair being removed thither. Concerning this Church of Saint John Baptiſt, Ruſinus ſpeaks in chap. 27. of his ſecond Book Eccleſ. Hiſtor. And in the following chapter he adds concerning the Reliques of Saint John Baptiſt, that in the time of Athanaſius they were brought to Alexandria. To which afterwards, the Serapium [or, Serapis's Temple] being demoliſhed, Golden houſes (that I may uſe Ruſinus's words, which are Aureæ Tectæ,) were erected in the reign of Theodoſius. 'Tis certain in this Church of Saint John, the Patriarch of Alexandria performed the Religious aſſembles, as Theophanes informs us concerning Dioſcorus, pag. 139. Valeſ.

* Or, Comonality.

[c] The power therefore of Electing their Biſhops had been taken from the Clergy and people of the City Alexandria, and the Emperour had removed the priviledge of nominating the Biſhop of Alexandria to himſelf, as 'tis apparent from this place. Which, we deny not, was done by force and againſt the Eccleſiaſtick Laws. Nevertheleſs, the Roman Emperours not without reaſon challenged that power to themſelves after the murder of Proterius the Alexandrian Biſhop, in regard the City of Alexandria, by its own inclination prone to Seditions, had ſeverall times raiſed vehement diſturbances in the Election of Biſhops. Valeſ.

Which when the Emperour underſtood, he ordered him to be Ejected. And by the perſwaſion of ſome perſons, the Emperour wrote an Exhortatory Edict to the Alexandrians, which he termed his * Henoticon; and ordered, that the Chair of Alexandria ſhould be reſtored to Petrus, provided he would ſubſcribe to His Henoticon, and receive thoſe of Proterius's party to communion.

[d] Καὶ ὃς τὰ ὠμοσμένα τῷ βασιλεῖ ἀλοήσας. In the excellent Florentine M. S. I found it written thus; ὃς τὰ ὠμοσμένα, &c; and we have rendred it accordingly.

Further, concerning this oath, wherein Johannes Tabenneſiota had formerly bound himſelf in the Emperours preſence, that he would never climb up into the Alexandrian See, Pope Simplicius ſpeaks in his 17th Epiſtle to Acacius. Liberatus alſo atteſts the ſame, in his Breviary, chap. 17. Valeſ.

[a] Τοῦτο τῷ ὁικονομίαν. To wit, Zeno's uniting Edict, which a little before Evagrius has termed a συγκρώνησις. And 'tis therefore called a συγκρώνησις here and hereafter by Evagrius, becauſe the Emperour in that Edict ſpeaks to all the Clergy and Laity, and by Preaching as it were, exhorts them, like a Prieſt, to embrace unity. But, 'tis termed an ὁικονομία for this reaſon, becauſe by a wholeſome Diſpenſation (as at the firſt bluſh it appears,) it invites all Catholicks to one and the ſame Communion, the mention of the Chalcedon Synod being ſuppreſſed. Further, this Edict of Zeno bore date on the year of Chriſt 482; Trocondus and Severinus being Conſuls, as Baronius writes. Which is evidently confirmed by Victor Tunonenſis in his Chronicon. Valeſ.

THis Diſpoſition, which had been made by the advice of Acacius Biſhop of the Imperial City, [b] Pergamius, who was conſtituted Præfect of Egypt carries along with him. He being arrived at Alexandria, and finding Johannes fled, held a conference with Petrus, and perſwades him to admit of Zeno's Exhortatory Edict, and moreover [to receive] thoſe who had diſſented from him. He admits therefore of the forementioned Exhortatory Edict, and ſubſcribes to it. He promiſes alſo that he would receive thoſe who were of the contrary party. Wherefore not long after this when a publick Feſtivity was celebrated at Alexandria, and all perſons by a generall conſent agreed to that termed Zeno's Henoticon, Petrus likewiſe admitted [to communion] thoſe of Proterius's party. And having made an Exhortatory Oration to the people in the Church, he recited Zeno's Exhortatory Edict alſo, the Contents whereof were theſe.

[b] Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 17, relates that Pergamius was not Præfect of Egypt, but Dux [or Commander of the Milice:] his words are theſe; Acacius perſuaſit Zenoni, &c. Acacius perſwaded Zeno, that he ſhould write to Apollonius the Auguſtalis, and to Pergamius the Dux, that they ſhould drive Johannes out of the Alexandrian See, as having ſeized it contrary to his own oath which he had given in the Imperial City; and that they ſhould give their aſſiſtance to Petrus Mongus, that he might continue in that See. [a] Facundus Hermianenſis citing this Edict of Zeno's in his twelfth book, reads θεοσεβέσι, to the Orthodox Biſhops. For the words are theſe: Flavius Zeno Pius, Victor, Triumphator, Maximus, always Auguſtus, to the Orthodox Biſhops, &c. Then Facundus finds fault with that term Orthodox, and expreſſes his anger againſt it in many words; that the Emperour ſhould not be afraid of giving the title of Orthodox to a company of Hereticks who had no head. Further, this Edict of Zeno was promulged in the year of Chriſt 482, as Baronius has recorded. Valeſ.

But the reading in our Copies is better; For ſoon after it follows, ἀναθεματίζομεν, we Anathematize. Valeſ.

[f] Καὶ γνησίους ὑμᾶς υἱοὺς. That which ſe-quently happens in theſe books of Evagrius, occurs here alſo, to wit, that ᾧ is put in ſtead of ὡς. 'Tis certain Liberatus reads ὡς here, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For thus he renders it: Sanctiſſima namque Mater Noſtra Eccleſia, &c. For our moſt Holy Mother the Church, as being the perſon who hath begotten you, from a long time expects to embrace Her Sons, and earneſtly deſires to hear your ſweet voice. Nor did Facundus read otherwiſe, in his twelfth book. For thus his Verſion runs: Sancta enim Mater Noſtra Eccleſia, &c. For our Holy Mother the Church receives you as Her own Sons. Embrace her. For She deſires after a long time to hear Your ſweet Voice. Moreover, Nicephorus has it written, ᾧ ὡς γνησίους. Further, from the forecited paſſages 'tis apparent, that Facundus and Liberatus in Zeno's Edict had read μήτηρ ἡμῶν, Our Mother; which reading I am moſt pleaſed with. Beſides, Facundus read ἀσπάζεσθε, Embrace Ye Her; not as 'tis commonly read, ἀσπάζεσθαι, to embrace. Which reading nevertheleſs is intolerable. Laſtly, Liberatus ſeems to have read ἐκ τῆς χρονίας, from a long time; not ᾧ τῆς χρονίας, and after a long time. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

That Johannes [Biſhop] of Alexandria coming to Rome, perſwades Simplicius to write to Zeno concerning what had hapned; [and what] Zeno [wrote back in anſwer to him.]

BUT Johannes, of whom we have made mention * before, after he had fled from Alexandria, [a] arrives at the Senior Rome: and there raiſed diſturbances, affirming that he had been ejected out of his own Chair, on account of his defending Leo's * Dogmata, and the Chalcedon Synod: and, that another was ſubſtituted in his Room, who was an enemy to thoſe Dogmata. Hereat Simplicius Biſhop of the Elder Rome was troubled, and wrote to Zeno; whereto Zeno returned anſwer, accuſing Johannes of Perjury, and [affirming] that on that account, and for no other reaſon, he had been Ejected out of his Biſhoprick.

* Chap. 11.

[a] Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 18, ſays, that Johannes being driven from the See of Alexandria, came firſt to Antioch: and after he had gotten Letters of Interceſſion from Calendion Patriarch of Antioch, came to Rome, and appealed to Simplicius Biſhop of Rome, as the Bleſſed Athanaſius had alſo done before. But in the Geſta de Nomine Acacii, which in my judgment were written by Pope Gelaſius, he is ſaid to have requeſted the Refuge only of the Roman Church, in ſuch manner as his predeceſſours had done. Which I think is truer. For Johannes appealed not from any Eccleſiaſtick Judicature to Simplicius, in regard he had not been expelled out of his own See by the ſentence of a Synod, but by force: nor did he preſent a Libell to Pope Simplicius, but to Felix his Succeſſour, as we ſhall ſee afterwards. Valeſ.

* Opinions, or, Decrees.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning Calendion [Biſhop] of Antioch, and that he was condemned to be baniſhed on account of the friendſhip he was ſuſpected [to have held] with Illus and Leontius; alſo, that Petrus Fullo entred into an Union with Mongus, and with the [Biſhops] of Conſtantinople and Jeruſalem.

MOreover, Calendion Biſhop of Antioch wrote [Letters] to the Emperour Zeno, and to Acacius Prelate of Conſtantinople, wherein he termed Petrus an [a] Adulterer; affirming that when he was at Alexandria, he had Anathematized the Chalcedon Synod.

[a] So alſo Pope Simplicius, in his Epiſtle to Acacius, terms Petrus Moggus; as Liberatus atteſts in his Breviary, chap. 18. To wit, becauſe he had invaded the Alexandrian Church, whileſt Timotheus Salophaciolus, who had been legally ordained, was alive. Valeſ.

Some

Some time afterwards, Calendion is condemned to be baniſhed into Oaſis, being ſuppoſed to have [b] favoured [c] Illus, Leontius, and Pamprepius, in relation to a Tyranny raiſed by them againſt Zeno. But Petrus Fullo, who [had been Biſhop of Antioch,] before [d] Calendion and Stephanus, as I have ſaid, recovered his own [Chair.] Who both ſubſcribed to Zeno's Henoticon, [e] and alſo ſent Synodicall Letters to Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria.

[b] That this was the pretext of condemning Calendion, is atteſted by Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 18. But the true cauſe of his being condemned and depoſed, was this, becauſe he would defend the Chalcedon Synod, nor would acquieſce in Zeno's Edict. Liberatus's words are theſe: Interea Calendion Archiepiſcopus Antiochenus deponitur, &c. In the interim Calendion Arch-Biſhop of Antioch is depoſed. Being accuſed in publick as having been undutifull [indevotus, without devotion] to his Prince, drawing in the people into a Rebellion with Illus: but ſecretly, becauſe he would not keep himſelf from the Communion both of Pope Felix and Johannes. Gelaſius alſo in his thirteenth Epiſtle to the Dardani, ſays, that Calendion was therefore Ejected by Zeno, becauſe he had razed His name out of the Dypticks, and inſtead thereof put in Leontius's. Valeſ.

[c] Ἰλλᾶ. In the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. I found it written ἴλλω. This is the Illus, by Country an Iſaurian, in dignity Magiſter Officiorum [Maſter of the Offices,] as Marcellinus tells us in his Chronicon: who after he had been in great favour with the Emperour, at length was incenſed againſt him, for what reaſon I know not, and together with Leontius ingaged himſelf in a Tyranny in the Eaſt, on the year of Chriſt 484, as Marcellinus records; or rather 483. as Baronius has rightly obſerved. Further, this Illus is by Candidus Iſaurus and by Damaſcius in the Life of Iſidorus the Philoſopher, always called ἴλλος, with the accent in the laſt Syllable. So 'tis alſo written in Suidas: ἴλλῳ, ſays he, ὄνομα κύριον ὃς ἦν μάγιστρος ζήνωνος. ὁ δὲ ἴλλος. εὑρὸν δὲ ἴλλος τὴ φθορέα ἐπρέμασεν ἐπὶ διδύμε ξύλε. So that place of Suidas is to be read. Valeſ.

[d] Petrus Fullo was Ejected out of the See of Antioch a little after the return of Zeno Auguſtus, on the year after the Conſulate of Baſiliſcus and Armatus. One Johannes, whom Petrus had ordained [Biſhop] of Apamia, invaded his See, as I obſerved before at chap. 10, note (a.) He having been Ejected, an Oriental Synod ordained Stephanus, as Theophanes tells us in his Chronicon. This Stephanus, when he had governed the See of Antioch about 2 years ſpace, was moſt barbarouſly murdered by Hereticks in the Church, on the year of Chriſt 479, after the Conſulate of the moſt famous Illus; as Baronius has rightly obſerved from Pope Simplicius's Epiſtles. Zeno being highly incenſed on account of this murther, ſent ſome perſons to Antioch, who might revenge this Fact and puniſh the Authours of the Sedition. Moreover, to avoid Tumults, he commanded Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, to ordain a Biſhop of Antioch in the Imperial City. And this thing, done on account of preſerving the Eccleſiaſtick Peace, as well the Emperour as Acacius excuſed to Pope Simplicius, promiſing that in future the ordination of the Prelate of Antioch ſhould be made by the Comprovinciall Biſhops, according to the Preſcripts of the Canons. Stephanus Junior therefore is ordained by Acacius, and after he had ſate three years, Calendion is created Biſhop in his ſtead by an Oriental Synod, in the Conſulate of Trocundus and Severinus, on the year of Chriſt 482; as Baronius has learnedly obſerved from Pope Simplicius's Epiſtle. Theophanes does indeed affirm, that Calendion was ordained by Acacius at Conſtantinople, by the Emperour Zeno's order. Theophanes's opinion ſeems to be confirmed by Candidus in the third book of his Hiſtory; whoſe words are theſe: ὡς πέτρε τὸ δυσεβὲς τὰς τῆς ἀναβολῆς παρέσυρ[illegible] ἐκκλησίας καλενδίωνα ζήνων ὁ βασιλεὺς εἰς τὸ ἱερᾶς ἀντιοχείας ἀπέσαλκε, in like manner as the Emperour Zeno, when the impious Petrus diſturbed the Churches of the Eaſt, ſent Calendion to be conſecrated [Biſhop] of Antioch. Beſides, in the Geſta de nomine Acacii, 'tis in expreſs words written, that Calendion was ordained by Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. Simplicius alſo affirms the ſame in the cited Epiſtle, if we weigh his words more attentively. For, what elſe is the meaning of theſe words: Antiocheni exordium Sacerdotis quâ ratione ſcrius fuerit. Indicatum, quamvis minimè nos latere potuerit, tamen & ipſe vel Synodus ejus indicavit. Quod ſicut non optavimus fieri, ita faciles excuſationi quam neceſſitas fecit extitimus; quia quod voluntarium non eſt, non poteſt vocari in reatum. &c. For what guilt, what neceſſity was to be excuſed before Simplicius, unleſs Acacius had ordained Calendion at Conſtantinople contrary to the Eccleſiaſtick Laws? But now, what the ſame Theophanes adds concerning Johannes Codonatus, who was ordained Biſhop by the Antiochians knowing nothing of the Ordination made at Conſtantinople, and whom Calendion afterwards removed to the See of Tyre: I fear Theophanes is miſtaken herein. For, not Calendion, but Acacius removed Johannes to the See of Tyre; as 'tis atteſted by Pope Felix in the Libell of Condemnation of Acacius, and by Gelaſius, and Liberatus. Valeſ.

[e] Καὶ συνοδικοὶς δὲ πρὸς τερον. Doubtleſs it muſt be written, καὶ συνοδικοὶς δὲ πρὸς πέτρον τὸν τῆς ἀλεξανδρέων ἐκκλησίας, and alſo ſent Synodical Letters to Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria. Thus Nicephorus read, and yet Chriſtophorſon, and Sr Henry Savil at the Margin of his Copy, mend it very ſimply, thus, πρὸς πρεσβύτερον, to Proterius. For Proterius was dead long before this. 'Tis manifeſt from Pope Gelaſius's Epiſtles, that Petrus Fullo held communion with Petrus Mongus. Valeſ.

Acacius alſo Biſhop of Conſtantinople entred into a Communion with the [f] ſame [Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria:] as did likewiſe Martyrius Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who ſent his Synodicall Letters to the ſame Petrus. After this, [g] ſome perſons ſeparated themſelves from Petrus's communion: ſo that from that time Petrus Anathematized the Synod of Chalcedon publickly. Which news coming to the hearing of Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, troubled him [not a little.] Acacius therefore cauſed ſome perſons to be ſent, who might enquire into the truth hereof. Whom Petrus being deſirous fully to ſatisfie, that no ſuch thing had been done by him, * framed Acts, wherein ſome perſons affirmed, that to their knowledge no ſuch thing [h] had been done by Petrus.

[f] To wit, with Petrus Mongus. For with him, after the Ejection of Johannes Tabennenſiota, Acacius held communion, and received from, and ſent to him Synodicall Letters, as Liberatus informs us. But Acacius never held communion with Petrus Fullo: yea, he was wont to boaſt, that he had never been joyned in communion with him: whereas yet, by this that he communicated with Petrus Mongus who maintained a communion with Petrus Fullo, Acacius himſelf alſo might hold communion with Fullo; as Pope Gelaſius ſays in his Epiſtle to the Orientalls, which was firſt publiſhed by Jacobus Syrmondus. Valeſ.

[g] Evagrius gives no reaſon, why theſe men ſeparated themſelves from the communion of Petrus Mongus. Beſides, Liberatus in his Breviary chap. 18, does relate this matter very obſcurely, in theſe words: Igitur Petrus Mongus ab Abbate Ammone & Johanne Epiſcopo Magileos, &c. Therefore Petrus Mongus having undergone Wars from the Abbot Ammon and Johannes the Biſhop of Magilis, and from the Abbots of the Monks of the Lower Egypt, and a Sedition having been raiſed againſt him in the Cathedral Caſarea as 'tis called, [or, as 'tis reported;] anathematized the Chalcedon Synod, and Pope Leo's Tome. And theſe things he did, after he had written to Acacius and Simplicius that he held communion with them and with the Holy Synod. And theſe matters having been in this manner performed, ſome perſons departed from Petrus's communion, and declared [them] to the Roman Biſhop at Rome. Which words, in themſelves obſcure enough, are in my judgment to be explained thus. Petrus Mongus, after he had been reſtored to the Alexandrian See upon Johannes's Ejection, at firſt uſed diſſimulation, and ſent Synodicall Letters to Acacius and Simplicius, wherein he affirmed that he held communion with the Synod of Chalcedon. He alſo admitted thoſe to communion who were of Timotheus Salophaciolus's party, as Liberatus atteſts. But afterwards, when he had been vexed by the Eutychian Monks on acccount of this diſſimulation, he anathematized the Chalcedon-Synod publickly in the Church. Valeſ.

[h] Τεθεφθαι, had been written: in my judgment it ſhould be πεπραχθαι had been done. And ſo Nicephorus read, book 16. chap. 13. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning thoſe things written by Petrus to Acacius who had embraced the Chalcedon-Synod.

[FOR] This Petrus, [a] in regard he was a perſon that could cloath himſelf in any dreſs, of a mind mutable and crafty, and one that could conform to the times; perſiſted not in the leaſt in one and the ſame opinion. But ſometimes he Anathematized the Chalcedon-Synod; at others retracted, and embraced that Counſill with all Suffrages. He wrote a Letter therefore to Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, the Contents whereof run word for word thus:

[a] Πέτρος ὁ σκύθρωπος. I have mended this place thus [ὡς κόθορνος, in regard he was a perſon that could cloath himſelf in any dreſs,] partly from Nicephorus, and partly by the authority of the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. Further, concerning this wavering and fraudulent humour of Petrus's, we have the atteſtation of Liberatus in theſe words: Sed permanſit Petrus in Epiſcopatu, &c. But Peter continued in his Biſhoprick, and wrote to Acacius, that he was a Communicator of [or, held Communion with] the Synod, and deceived the Alexandrians, becauſe he would not communicate with the Synod: ſo that ſome Eccleſiaſticks who were his Communicators, ſome Monks and Laicks, perceiving his Fallaciouſneſs, ſeparated themſelves from his communion. And holding ſeparate aſſemblies, would not endure to communicate with his name. Valeſ.

The

The moſt high God will reward your Holineſs, [b] for thoſe great Labours and Troubles, which for ſo many years ſpace you [have undergone,] conſerving and defending the Faith of the Holy Fathers, which by uninterrupted Preaching you have confirmed. In which Faith we have found the Creed alſo of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers rightly and orderly placed, in which Creed we were heretofore Baptized, and which we have and do believe: which Creed the Hundred and fifty holy Fathers aſſembled at Conſtantinople have confirmed. You therefore without intermiſſion leading all men the way, have united the holy Church of God, and by the weightieſt and moſt convincing inſtances and arguments have perſwaded us, that nothing contrary hereto hath been done in the moſt holy and Oecumenicall Synod convened at Chalcedon, which agrees with, and hath confirmed the determinations of the holy Fathers at Nicæa. For, having found nothing of any Innovation therein, we have given our abſolute and perfect aſſent thereto, and believed it. But we underſtand, that certain Monks, envying our Fraternity, have conveyed ſome Calumnies to your holy ears; which could not readily induce your Holineſs to be incenſed [againſt us.] And in the firſt place [they affirm,] [c] that we have removed the Reliques of our Father of holy Memory the bleſſed Arch-Biſhop Timotheus, to ſome other place. Which Fact is neither acceptable to God, nor agreeable to the Laws. Then they paſs to another [crime,] which is inconſiſtent with it ſelf, and much worſe than the former. For, how could we Anathematize the holy Synod held at Chalcedon, which we have believed and confirmed? But you are not ignorant, nor is it concealed from Your piety, how great the Heat and Levity of the people amongſt us is, as alſo [that] of the Monks who are deſirous of change and Innovation. Who having entred into a Conſult together with ſome malevolent perſons that have ſevered themſelves from the Church, attempt to draw the people after them. But, by the aſſiſtance of Your prayers, [d] we have found a way how to cure [this miſchief,] without doing any prejudice to the holy Synod of Chalcedon; for we have been certainly informed, that nothing new hath been done there. And in order to the perſwaſion and * ſatisfaction of the more ſimple, we have taken care that the ſame thing ſhould be ſaid by [e] thoſe who hold Aſſemblies together with us. And to [f] this buſineſs, after I had been wholly intent upon it, I ſoon put a ſtop. Further, I do ſignifie to your Sanctity, that even at this very inſtant the Monks ceaſe not, who ſow * Tares, intermixing ſome perſons amongſt themſelves, who never dwelt in [g] Monaſteries, [as] inſtruments [of Sedition;] and run up and down ſcattering various Rumours againſt Us, and † againſt the Peace of Chriſt's Church, and permitting us to perform nothing Canonically and in a manner befitting God's Holy Catholick Church: making it their buſineſs, that the people committed to our care ſhould rule over, rather than obey us; [in fine,] * they attempt the doing of whatever [actions] are unſeemly [in the ſight] of God. But we are confident, that Your Sanctity will give the Moſt divine Lord of the world an account of all things, and will take care, that [ſuch an] Order ſhall be iſſued forth to them from His Serenity, as may be neceſſary in relation to the Eccleſiaſtick Peace, and befitting God and the Emperour: ſo that all perſons may acquieſce in what [ſhall be eſtabliſhed.].

[b] Τῆς τε πόνων. It muſt doubtleſs be ὑπὲρ τε πόνων, for thoſe great Labours. Inſtead of ἀμείψητον, it muſt be ἀμείψεσθ', as it is in the Tellerian Manuſcript, and in Nicephorus. Valeſ.

[c] Mongus ſays, this Crime was objected againſt him, that he had removed the Reliques of Timotheus Salophaciolus into another place. But he neither excuſes that Fact, nor denies it: reſting ſatisfied only in ſaying this, that that Fact was impious in the preſence of God and men. For humane Laws do ſeverely puniſh the diſturbers of Sepulchers. 'Tis certain, Victor Tunonenſis in his Chronicon writes thus concerning Mongus: Poſt Conſulatum Zenonis tertium, &c. After Zeno's third Conſulate, ——He condemns the Chalcedon Synod out of the Pulpit before the people. He takes the names of Proterius and Timotheus Salophaciolus out of the Eccleſiaſtick Dypticks, and writes therein thoſe of Dioſcorus and Ælurus, who had murdered Proterius: and having caſt Timotheus Salophaciolus's body out of the Church, he threw it into a deſert place without the City. Liberatus alſo atteſts the ſame in his Breviary, chap. 18, in theſe words: ——Sed & Petrum Alexandrinum, &c.——Moreover Petrus Alexandrinus anathematizing the Chalcedon Synod and Pope Leo's Tome, who having expunged the names of Proterius and Timotheus Catholicus out of the Dypticks, inſerted thoſe of Dioſcorus and Ælurus: who took the body of the ſame Timotheus Catholicus out of the earth, and caſt it forth, who had been buried amongſt the Catholick Biſhops, Acacius has in a ſtrange manner praiſed him, concerning whom he had remembred before, that himſelf had related ſo great crimes. Laſtly, Pope Felix in the Sentence of condemnation againſt Acacius, does expreſly confirm this very thing. So that now there can be no further doubt of the truth of this fact. Valeſ.

[d] Ἔσχεθήμεθα λόγου. Tranſlatours have rendred this place variouſly. For Muſculus tranſlates it thus; Libellum conſideratè concinnavimus, we have with conſideration compoſed a Libell. Chriſtophorſon, in this manner; Literas haſce excogitavimus, quæ huic malo remedio ſint, We have found out theſe Letters, which may be a remedy for this miſchief. But Johannes Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlatour, has rendred it thus: Re deliberatâ, rationem quæ mederi malo imminenti poſſet, invenimus; having conſidered the buſineſs, we found out a way, which might cure the imminent evill. Of theſe three Renditions, the ſecond is wholly to be rejected; but the firſt and third are tolerable. Nevertheleſs, it ſeems to me more fit, to render λόγον the Oration, or, Speech to the people, which Petrus made in the Church at ſuch time as he ordered the Eccleſiaſtick Acts to be made up before Acacius's Legates; concerning which Acts Evagrius has ſpoken before, at the cloſe of the foregoing chapter. Valeſ.

* Or, Defence.

[e] Τὰς ὁπαδωλόγους ἡμῖν. Johannes Langus renders this place thus: Fecimus ut ab iis qui nobiſcum conventus agunt, iſta dicerentur, We have cauſed, that theſe things ſhould be ſaid by thoſe, who hold Aſſemblies with us. Muſculus interprets it in this manner: Eos qui ad nos venerunt, hoc ipſum dicere fecimus; We have made thoſe, who have come to us, ſay the ſame thing. Chriſtophorſon's Tranſlation runs thus: Tumultus illi qui nobiſcum unà accerſebantur, pro defenſione idem ipſum dicerent, effecimus, And alſo we have procured, that they who were ſent for together with us, ſhould for a defence ſay the very ſame thing. They thought therefore, that the word ὁπαδωλόγους ſignified no other thing, than συνελθόντας. But by the term ὁπαδωλόγους, 'tis my judgment that the Eccleſiaſticks and Laicks of Timotheus Salophaciolus's party are underſtood, who by the order of Zeno Auguſtus were aſſociated and joyned to Petrus Mongus. For the Emperour Zeno, by the perſwaſion and advice of Acacius, had written to Apollonius the Auguſtalis, and Pergamius the Dux, that they ſhould Eject Johannes Talaia, and inſtall Petrus, Provided he would admit of the Henoticon, and receive [to Communion] the Clergy of Timotheus Catholicus; as Liberatus relates in his Breviarie, chap. 18. Zeno had likewiſe written Letters to Petrus Mongus, wherein he ordered him, that he ſhould give reception to the Clergy of Timotheus's party, who were of the ſame opinion with himſelf; as the ſame Liberatus affirms in theſe words: Et quidem Petrus intronizatur ab omnibus, &c, And Petrus is Inſtalled by all perſons. 'Tis written from the Emperour, that he ſhould receive thoſe that agreed with him who had been of Timotheus Catholicus's party. That is, as well the Clergy, as Laity, who were willing to agree to Zeno's Edict. When therefore Petrus Mongus made up his Eccleſiaſtick Acts, wherewith he would prove to Acacius that he had never condemned the Chalcedon-Synod; he made uſe of theſe perſons as witneſſes, and cauſed them to confirm this with their own Teſtimony, that the Chalcedon-Synod had never been condemned by Petrus. Further, their Teſtimony ſeemed worthy to be credited, becauſe they had been of Timotheus Catholicus's party, who had always defended the Chalcedon-Synod. See the cloſe of the ſixteenth Chapter. Pope Felix ſpeaks concerning theſe very perſons in the Sentence of Condemnation againſt Acacius; where his words are theſe: Quid enim ſunt aliud, qui poſt obitum ſanctæ memoriæ Timothei, ad Eccleſiam ſub Petro redeunt, &c. For what are they elſe, who after the death of Timotheus of holy memory, return to the Church under Petrus, &c. Valeſ.

[f] That is, that Crime which by ſome ill-minded perſons was objected againſt me: to wit, that the Chalcedon-Synod is rejected and condemned by me. Valeſ.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVIII.

In what manner Johannes [Biſhop] of Alexandria perſwades Felix Pope of Rome, to ſend a Depoſition to Acacius [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople.

[IN the interim] Johannes having fled to Rome, [deſiſted not from] troubling Felix, who had ſucceeded Simplicius in the Biſhoprick of Rome, about thoſe things done by Petrus; and [at length] prevails [ſo far,] as Zacharias affirms, that a Depoſition was ſent from Felix himſelf to Acacius, on account of his holding a Communion with Petrus. Which Depoſition, in regard it was a thing done [a] contrary to the Preſcript of the Canons, as the ſame Zacharias has related; (for ſome of thoſe perſons who lead a Monaſtick life in that termed the Monaſtery of the * Acœmeti, delivered it;) Acacius would not admit of, nor acknowledge. And theſe things have indeed [in this manner] been written by Zacharias: but he ſeems to me, to have had no exact knowledge of the matters at that time tranſacted; but, to have given us a very lame, maimed, and imperfect account; to wit, thoſe things only which he had from report and Hear-ſay. I my ſelf therefore will give an accurate Narrative of that whole Tranſaction. [b] Libells having been preſented to Felix by Johannes againſt Acacius, becauſe he illegally held Communion with Petrus, and on account of other things done by him contrary to the Canons; the Biſhops Vitalis and Miſenus are ſent [c] from Felix to [the Emperour] Zeno, [with theſe requeſts,] that the Synod at Chalcedon might be confirmed, that Petrus might be expelled [from his See] as being an Heretick, and that Acacius ſhould be ſent to Felix, to give an account of thoſe matters, whereof Johannes (of whom we have made frequent mention) might accuſe him.

[a] In the Condemnation and Depoſition of Acacius, the Greeks found fault chiefly with two things. Firſt, becauſe he had not been condemned and depoſed in a Synod; but only Pope Felix had prefixt his own name before the ſentence of Depoſition. The other thing was, becauſe Acacius having been neither convicted nor examined according to the Eccleſiaſtick Canons, had received a Sentence of Condemnation. To the former Objection thoſe of the Church of Rome returned this anſwer: that there was no need of a new Synod for the condemning of Acacius. For all Followers and Communicators [that is, thoſe that held Communion] with Hereticks, who had heretofore been condemned by a ſpecial ſentence, are to be underſtood as condemned together with the ſame Hereticks. So ſays Pope Gelaſius in his Epiſtle to the Orientalls (which was firſt publiſhed by Jacobus Syrmondus,) in the Geſta de nomine Acacii. I know what anſwer is given by Baronius at the year of Chriſt 484, chap. 21: to wit, that Gelaſius ſpeaks concerning an Oecumenicall Synod. But by Baronius's favour, this anſwer is not ſatisfactory. For the Greeks in this affair made no difference between a Generall and a particular Councill. But in generall they affirmed, that Acacius had been condemned in no Synod particularly convened upon his account. For thus Pope Gelaſius writes in the forementioned Epiſtle, ſpeaking to the Orientalls in theſe words: An de uno dolet Acacio, quod ſpeciali Synodo non fuerit confutatus, &c. Are you troubled about one Acacius, becauſe he has not been confuted in a ſpeciall Synod; whenas he himſelf in his own Letters hath detected his own Crime; nor having already voluntarily confeſſed, ought he to be heard; and are you not troubled about ſo great Catholick Prelates without any examination ſecluded? Pope Gelaſius confeſſes ingenuouſly, that Acacius had been convicted and heard in no ſpeciall Synod. 'Tis certain, neither of thoſe two Roman Synods, wherein Acacius was condemned, were convened upon his account. For the former was Aſſembled on the account of Vitalis and Miſenus the Legates of the Apoſtolick See: wherein Vitalis and Miſenus were indeed condemned: but Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria and Acacius, were only reprehended and by the by reproved, as Evagrius tells us a little after this. But the Latter Synod was aſſembled on the account of the Antiochian Church, on the ſame year, as Pope Felix informs us in his Synodick Letter to all the Presbyters and Archimandrites at Conſtantinople and throughout Bithynia. In which Synod Petrus Biſhop of Antioch was indeed chiefly and moſt eſpecially condemned; who having Ejected Calendion, had invaded the Antiochian See. But Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria and Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, were only condemned as the Aſſociates and Communicators of the ſame Petrus; as the ſubſcription annext to the ſame Letter doth declare [in theſe words:] Candidus Tiburtinæ Civitatis Epiſcopus, &c. I Candidus Biſhop of the Tiburtine City, following the authority of the Apoſtolick See, Set forth by the Catholick deliberation of us all, according to the State of the Church; pronouncing an Anathema to Petrus the Invader of the Alexandrian Church, and to Acacius ſometime of the Conſtantinopolitane Church, alſo to Petrus [Biſhop] of Antioch, who have heretofore been rightly and deſervedly ſeparated from the Epiſcopall [dignity] and number of Chriſtians, and to all their followers, have ſubſcribed, &c. But whereas the Greeks complained that Pope Felix had prefixt his own name only before that ſentence; Felix, in the forecited Letter, anſwers this Objection thus, in theſe words: Unde nunc cauſâ Antiochenæ Eccleſiæ apud B. Petrum Apoſtolum collecti, &c. Whence being at this preſent convened before the Bleſſed Apoſtle Peter on account of the Antiochian Church, we have again haſtned to ſhew your love the uſage which has always obtained amongſt us. As often as the Lords the Prelates are convened within Italy on account of Eccleſiaſtick Cauſes, eſpecially of Faith, an uſage is retained, that the Succeſſour of the Prelates of the Apoſtolick See, in the name [or, perſon] of all the Prelates of all Italy, agreeable to the Care of all the Churches appertaining to them, ſhould conſtitute all things. Pope Julius had ſaid the ſame long before Felix, in his Letter to the Orientalls, which Athanaſius records in his Apologetick. But now, as to the Second Objection of the Eaſterns, concerning Acacius's being condemned without any examination; that is ſufficiently anſwered by Pope Gelaſius in his Epiſtle to the Orientalls, the words whereof we have produced above. Valeſ.

* That is, the Monks who did not ſleep.

[b] Some time before this, Johannes Tabennenſiota (after he had been Ejected out of his See,) had come to Rome, and had made his caſe known to Pope Simplicius. But he had not preſented a Libell to him; but had only perſwaded him, that he would write to Acacius in defence of his Cauſe. Which thing Pope Simplicius performed with a ready and willing mind. But Acacius, having received Simplicius's Letters, returned anſwer, that he in no wiſe acknow edged Johannes Biſhop of Alexandria: but, had received Petrus Mongus to communion by order of the Emperour Zeno. At which Letters Simplicius being highly incenſed, wrote back, that Acacius had not done what was regular and orderly, in that he had received Petrus to Communion, who ſtood condemned by the common ſentence of them both. And when Johannes was preparing to offer a Libell to the Pope, containing various Crimes againſt Acacius; in the interim Simplicius was prevented by death, before Acacius had given anſwer to his laſt Letters. as Liberatus tells us in his Breviarium. But after Felix had been put into Simplicius's place, Johannes preſented that Libell to Pope Felix, which he had before made ready to offer to Simplicius. Who forthwith ſent a Libell of Citation to Acacius by the Biſhops Vitalis and Miſenus, ordering him to come to Rome immediately, and give in his anſwer before the Apoſtolick See, to the Libell of Johannes the Biſhop; as 'tis recorded in the Geſta de nomine Acacii, and in the Libell of Citation tranſmitted to Acacius. ——— Valeſ.

[c] Πρὸς τὸν φίλικα ἐπὶ τὸν ζήνωνα. The words are tranſpoſed, which I reſtore thus; τέλλονται ἐπὶ τὸν φίλικα πρὸς τὸν ζήνωνα; are ſent from Felix to [the Emperour] Zeno. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning Cyrillus Governour of the Monaſtery of the Acœmeti, how he ſent ſome perſons to Felix at Rome, inciting him to revenge what had been committed againſt the Faith.

[a] BUT before their arrivall at the Imperial City, Cyrillus Governour of thoſe [Monks] termed the [b] Acœmeti, ſends [ſome perſons] to Felix, complaining of his ſlackneſs, in regard ſo great offences were committed againſt the true Faith. Felix therefore writes to Miſenus and thoſe who accompanied him, [ordering them] to do nothing before they ſhould have had a conference with Cyrillus, and might be informed from him what was to be done.

[a] Πρὶν ἢ δὲ τούτοις φθάσαι τὴν βασιλείαν. Nicephorus has excellently well explained this place of Evagrius, in theſe words:

πρὶν δὲ βιτάλιον καὶ μισηνὸν τοὺς ἐκ ῥώμης ἥκοντας φθάσαι τὴν βασιλεύουσαν, &c. But before Vitalis and Miſenus, coming from Rome, had arrived at the Imperial City, &c. In Evagrius therefore it muſt be written thus; πρὶν δὲ τούτοις φθάναι τὴν βασίλειον. For ſo Evagrius does uſually call Conſtantinople; as hereafter, at chap. 25. Valeſ.

[b] There were two Monaſteries at Conſtantinople which were termed [the Monaſteries] of the Acœmeti, to wit, [the Monaſtery] of Baſſianus, and that of Dius. They had taken the name of Baſſianus and of Dius from their Founders. But they had the appellation of Acœmeti [or, Acœmitæ,] given them, becauſe they celebrated the Divine praiſes night and day, ſucceeding one another by turns: in ſo much that they ſeemed not to ſleep. So heretofore in the Gallia's, a continuall praiſing of God is ſaid to have been kept up in ſome Monaſteries. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning what Felix wrote to Zeno, and Zeno to Felix.

THere were diſpatcht to them other [a] Commonitories alſo from Felix; who likewiſe wrote Letters to Zeno, both concerning the Chalcedon Synod, and alſo about the Perſecution in Africa [which had been raiſed] by Onorichus. Beſides, he wrote to Acacius. The Emperour Zeno returned an anſwer to Felix, [wherein he told him] that Johannes had given him trouble in vain, becauſe * he had ſworn that he would in no wiſe at any time ſue for Admiſſion to the See of Alexandria; but, that afterwards he had diſregarded his oath, and committed all manner of ſacriledge: and, that Petrus had not been ordained raſhly and without an exquiſite tryall and examination, but with his own hand had ſubſcribed, that he embraced the Faith of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers heretofore convened at Nicæa; which Faith the Holy Synod at Chalcedon alſo had [approved of, and] followed. The expreſs words [of Zeno's Letter] are theſe: You ought to be moſt undoubtedly aſſured, that both Our Piety, and the forementioned moſt Holy Petrus, and all the moſt Holy Churches, do Embrace and Revere the moſt Holy Synod of the [b] Chalcedonians, which hath fully agreed with the Faith in the Synod of the Nicæans.

[a] Ὑπομνηστικά. Nicephorus ſuppoſed that theſe Commonitoria (for ſo the Latines term them, which the Grecks call ὑπομνηστικά,) were written to the Emperour Zeno. But Evagrius ſays they were written to Vitalis and Miſenus the Legates of the Apoſtolick See. 'Tis certain, Commonitories were wont to be ſent to Embaſſadours and ſuch like perſons, but not to the Roman Emperour. For they were as it were Orders and Inſtructions which publick Miniſters ought ſtudiouſly to obſerve. Valeſ.

* That is, Johannes.

[b] Καλχηδονέων. In the excellent Florent. M.S. I found it written καλχηδυνέων: and ſo alſo the ſame Manuſcript Copy has it written in other places, as I have remarked before. Indeed, the ancient Coyns do confirm this writing of this word, as does likewiſe the Author of the Etymologicon in the word καλχηδών. Valeſ.

[c] There are alſo extant in the ſame Acts the Letters, both from the forementioned Cyrillus, and from other Archimandrites of the Imperiall City; and alſo [thoſe] from the Biſhops and Clergy of the Egyptick Diœceſis, [written] to Felix, againſt Petrus as being an Heretick, and againſt thoſe who communicated with him. Further, when the [Monks] belonging to the Monaſtery of the Acœmeti were come to Felix, [d] they accuſed Miſenus and thoſe that accompanied him, becauſe till their arrivall at Byzantium, [the name of] Petrus had in ſecret been recited in the Sacred Diptycks; but, that ſtom that time till now it was recited publickly; and therefore, that Miſenus and thoſe who accompanied him had held communion [with Petrus.]

[c] Ἐμφέρεσθαι τοῖς τε πεπερασμένοις. I agree with Sr Henry Savil, who in his Copy hath mended it thus, ἐμφέρεσθαι τοῖς τε τοῖς πεπερασμένοις, There are alſo extant in the ſame Acts. But I can in no wiſe approve of Chriſtophorſon's Verſion, who has rendred this place thus: Extant Præterea in Actis ejuſdem Concilii, &c. There are moreover extant in the Acts of the ſame Councill, &c. For Evagrius makes no mention here of any Councill, only takes a view of the Collection of Letters, which belonged to Acacius's Cauſe. Chriſtophorſon thought, (becauſe he ſaw mention was made of Acts by Evagrius,) that it followed immediately, that theſe things were tranſacted in a Councill. But the matter is not always ſo. For whatever things were done in any affair, may ſimply be called Acts, although no Councill or judiciary proceedings intervened. Valeſ.

[d] Οἱ καὶ διήλεγξαν. The Article οἱ is to be expunged; which is not acknowledged by Nicephorus. Valeſ.

The Letter likewiſe of the Egyptians affirmed the ſame things [with what I have related] concerning Petrus; and further alſo, that Johannes being a perſon Orthodox, had been legally Ordained; but, that Petrus was Ordained only by [e] two Biſhops, who maintained the ſame ill opinion with himſelf: and, that immediately after Johannes's flight, all manner of puniſhments had been inflicted on the Orthodox. And, that Acacius had had information of all theſe things by ſome perſons who had made a journey to him [from Alexandria] to the Imperiall City; and [laſtly,] that Acacius was found to be Petrus's favourer and Aſſiſtant in all things.

[e] All other Authours relate, that Mongus was ordained by one Biſhop, and he an Heretick. So ſays Acacius in his Letter to Pope Simplicius, and Felix in his Synodick Epiſtle to all the Monks and Archimandrites at Conſtantinople and in Bythinia. The ſame is likewiſe atteſted by Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag. 107; and by Gelaſius in the Geſta de nomine Acacii. Yet Liberatus affirms Petrus was ordained by more Biſhops than one, although he expreſſes not their number. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

That Symeones a Monk belonging to the Monaſtery of the Acœmeti went to Rome, and accuſed thoſe Biſhops ſent from the Romans to Conſtantinople as having held Communion with Hereticks; and, that theſe Legates, and thoſe perſons who held Communion with Petrus, were depoſed by the Romans.

THeſe [accuſations] were much increaſed by Symeones one of thoſe Monks termed the Acœmeti, who was ſent [to Rome] from Cyrillus. For this perſon accuſed Miſenus and Vitalis for having communicated with Hereticks; [he averred] that the name of Petrus was publickly recited in the Sacred Diptycks, and that by this means many of the ſimpler ſort were impoſed upon by Hereticks, who affirmed that Petrus was received [to communion] even by the See of Rome. Symeones added likwiſe, that when ſeverall queſtions [were propoſed,] Miſenus and his companions would not allow of a conference with any perſon that was Orthodox, or make a delivery of Letters to them, or take an exact ſcrutiny of any thing that was audaciouſly attempted againſt the true Faith. Silvanus a Preſbyter (one that had converſed with Miſenus and Vitalis at Conſtantinople,) was likewiſe brought in, who confirmed what had been ſaid by the Monks. Moreover, Acacius's [a] Letter to Simplicius was read, [wherein Acacius] affirmed, that Petrus had been long ſince Depoſed, and that he was a Son of Night. And on theſe accounts Miſenus and Vitalis were removed from the Sacerdotall Function, and ſeparated from the undefiled Communion; the whole Synod having given their Vote in theſe expreſs words. The Church of the Romans doth not receive [to Communion] the Heretick Petrus, who hath long ſince been both condemned by the Vote of the Sacred Chair, and alſo Excommunicated and Anathematized. Againſt whom (though nothing elſe were objected, yet) even this would be ſufficient, that having been ordained by Hereticks, he could not preſide over the Orthodox. This alſo was contained [in the ſaid Sentence:] [b] But, that Acacius [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople deſerves a ſevere reproof, the thing it ſelf has demonſtrated; becauſe in his Letter to Simplicius he has termed Petrus an Heretick, but at this preſent hath not detected

[a] This Letter of Acacius's is extant, ſet forth in Latine amongſt the Epiſtles of Pope Simplicius. The ſame Letter is mentioned in Pope Felix's Epiſtle, which contains Acacius's Sentence of Depoſition. Valeſ.

[b] Ἀγαχίου δὲ τοῦ τῆς. We have added the particle δὲ But, from the detected it to the Emperour: for he ought, if he had loved Zeno, to have done this: but he loves the Emperour with a greater ardency of affection, [c] than he has for the Faith. But let us reduce our Relation to the [d] following Series of affairs. There is extant an Epistle of Acacius's, [written] to the Bishops in Egypt, and to the Ecclesiasticks and Monks, and to the whole body of the Laity; wherein he has attempted to repair and make up the Schism which had hapned. Concerning which affair he wrote also to Petrus Bishop of Alexandria.

Florentine Manuscript; which particle casts a great light upon this place.

In the same Florentine Manuscript at the side of these words, this Scholion was written: ὃ λέγει ἀτὸ ἐνταῦθα τέως τεθνῶς τὸν Ἀκάκιον ὑπὸ τῆ ῥώμη κατεψηφίσθαι. Θεόδωρος δὲ μάλιστα ἡ ὁ πάλιξ Βασίλειος τεθνῶς αὐτὸ φασί. That is, This Author does not say here expresly, that Acacius was deposed by the [Bishop] of Rome: but Theodorus and Basilius Cilix do manifestly affirm this. Nicephorus (book 16. chap. 17.) attests the same concerning Basilius Cilix. Further, Our Evagrius is undeservedly reproved by that Scholiast, because at this place he speaks nothing of Acacius's deposition. Evagrius does here relate all things that were transacted in the Roman Synod, which was convened in the year of Christ 484 against Vitalis and Misenus Legates of the Apostolick See. In that Synod Vitalis and Misenus were indeed deprived of the honour of the Priesthood. But Acacius was only reprehended and rebuked, as 'tis apparent from the Decree of the Synod, here recorded by Evagrius. After this, Felix sent his Synodick Letters to Acacius; wherein these words occurred: Peccasti, ne adjicias, & de prioribus supplica, You have offended, make no addition, and supplicate for [your] former [failings.] After receipt of which Letters, when Acacius still stood out, and committed Facts worse than the former; Pope Felix (the Bishops being a second time convened,) promulged a sentence of deposition against Acacius, and directed it to Acacius, by Tutus Defensor of the Roman Church; which [sentence] begins thus: Multarum transgressionum reperiris obnoxius, You are found guilty of many transgressions. That these things were transacted in this manner, Pope Felix informs us in his Synodick Letter to the Presbyters and Archimandrites at Constantinople and throughout Bythinia. For, after he had written concerning Vitalis and Misenus, and concerning Acacius, who were condemned in the Roman Synod; he adds these words: Post illam sententiam quæ in Acacium perturbatorem totius Orientis Ecclesiæ dicta est, &c. After that sentence which hath been pronounced against Acacius the disturber of the whole Eastern Church, being now also convened, we have added to these Letters, &c. And a little after: Unde nunc causâ Antiochenæ Ecclesiæ, &c. Wherefore being at this present convened in the presence of the blessed Apostle Peter on account of the Antiochian Church, we do again hasten to declare to Your love the Custom which hath always obtained amongst us. From which words it appears, that this Letter was written by Felix, in the name of the third Roman Synod, which had been assembled on account of the Antiochian Church; which, after Calendion was ejected, Petrus Fullo had invaded. In this Synod therefore Felix had dictated the sentence against Acacius, (which begins thus; Multarum transgressionum reperiris obnoxius, You are found guilty of many Transgressions;) and had transmitted it to Acacius, by Tutus the Defensor. Nor can any one say, that that sentence was pronounc't before in the Second Roman Synod, at such time as Vitalis and Misenus were condemned; but was sent a little afterwards by Felix, by the Order of the Third Roman Synod. For Evagrius refutes this, who does not say, that the sentence of deposition was pronounc't against Acacius in that Roman Synod wherein Vitalis and Misenus were condemned. Besides, Liberatus in his Breviarium (chap. 18.) does manifestly declare, that that Sentence of Deposition against Acacius was pronounced long after the Condemnation of Vitalis and Misenus. For hear what Liberatus says: Redeunt aliquando Legati. Sed præcesserant Monachi, &c. At length the Legates return. But the Monks had gone before, who in a grievous manner accused them of Treachery. Having been forthwith heard and convicted from those Letters which they had brought, they are removed from their own places. And after some few words: Ubi ergo ad plenum detectus est Acacius Hæreticus, &c. When therefore the Heretick Acacius was fully detected, Pope Felix put these words in his Synodick Letters: you have offended, make no addition, and supplicate for [your] former [failings.] Acacius having received these Letters, persists in the same mind, neither receding from Petrus's Communion, nor yet perswading him openly to embrace the Chalcedon Synod and the Tome of Pope Leo. Pope Felix understanding this, sent a writing of Condemnation to Acacius by Tutus the Defensor; the beginning whereof is this. You are found guilty of many Transgressions. Valesius.

[c] Καὶ πῶ πίστιν ἀσαπῶ. In the Florentine and Tellerian M.SS. and in Nicephorus, the reading is, ὃ πῶ πίστιν ἀσαπᾶ, Loves not the Faith. But it would be better written thus; ἢ πῶ πίστιν ἀσαπῶ. Thus Christophorson seems to have read, and so we have rendred it. At the Clause immediately foregoing, instead of [Δεον εἴπερ ἠσάπα τὸν ξήνωνα τῦτο πρᾶξαι. For he ought, if he had loved Zeno, to have done this;] I would rather read thus: εἴπερ ἠσάπα πῶ πίστιν μᾶλλον ἢ τὸν ζήνωνα, &c. Whereas, if he had loved the Faith rather than Zeno, he ought to have done this. Valesius.

[d] After the Roman Synod which was convened on the account of Vitalis and Misenus, and wherein Vitalis and Misenus had been condemned; but Petrus and Acacius were only reproved and rebuked; it was consequent that Evagrius should have spoken concerning the Sentence of Deposition pronounced against Acacius and sent to Constantinople by Tutus the Defensor. And yet Evagrius has not done this here. Whereof two reasons may be assigned. For, either this was done by Evagrius in reverence to the Constantinopolitan See: or else, because Evagrius had related that before from Zacharias Rhetor; as may be seen in the eighteenth Chapter. What therefore he had declared there, he look't upon as superfluous to repeat at this place. Valesius.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning the disturbances at Alexandria, and in several [other] places, on account of the Synod at Chalcedon.

THE Schism therefore increasing at Alexandria, Petrus (after he had [a] again Anathematized Leo's Epistle, and the Acts of the Chalcedon Synod, and those persons who would not embrace the writings of Dioscorus and Timotheus;) perswaded some of the Bishops and Archimandrites to communicate with himself. And because he could not induce others [to do the same,] he drove most of them from their own Monasteries. For which reasons [b] Nephalius made a journey to the Imperial City, and gave Zeno an account of these matters. Whereat Zeno was sorely troubled, and sends Cosmas, one of his own Protectors, [to Alexandria;] who gave forth many and great Menaces against Petrus on account of [procuring an] Unity, in regard by his own roughness he had raised a great dissention. But Cosmas, when nothing succeeded according to his wish and design, returned to the Imperial City, having only restored the Ejected Monks to their own Monasteries. Again therefore the Emperour sends Arsenius, whom he had preferred to be Prefect of Egypt and Dux of the Companies of the Militia. He being arrived at Alexandria in company with Nephalius, made a speech concerning Unity. But when he could not perswade [them to it,] he sent some of them to the Imperial City. Moreover, many disputes were held before Zeno concerning the Synod at Chalcedon: but nothing was brought to effect, because Zeno did not * wholly assent to the Synod at Chalcedon.

[a] I have made good this place from the Florentine M.S. in this manner, λεοντ& αὖθις ἀναθεματίσας, after he had again Anathematized, &c. For Petrus Mongus condemned not the Chalcedon Synod together with Leo's Epistle, once, but oftner. Valesius.

[b] Liberatus makes mention of this Abbot Nephalius, in his Breviarium, chap. 18. Valesius.

* Or, Fully.

CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning Fravita and Euphemius [Bishops] of Constantinople; and concerning Athanasius and Johannes [Bishops] of Alexandria: also concerning Palladius and Flavianus [Prelates] of Antioch; and concerning some other persons.

BUT Acacius [Bishop] of Constantinople having [a] in this interim gone the common way [of mankind,] Fravita succeeded him in his Bi-

[a] Ἐν τῶτῳ. I had rather make it, ἐν τάτῳ, in this interim. Further, 'tis to be observed, that Evagrius does in the first place relate Acacius's death. For, of those three Schismaticks who rent in sunder the Oriental Church, (to wit, Acacius Bishop of Constantinople, Petrus of Alexandria, and Petrus of Antioch;) the first that departed out of this life (says Evagrius,) was Acacius; then Petrus [Bishop] of Alexandria, who was termed Mongus; and last laſt of all died Petrus Fullo. But Victor Thunonenſis in his Chronicon relates, that the firſt that died of thoſe three I have mentioned, was Petrus [Biſhop] of Antioch. For his words are theſe: Poſt Conſulatum ſecundum Longini, &c. After Longinus's ſecond Conſulate, Petrus [Biſhop] of Antioch dies under condemnation, and in his place Calendion is ordained. But the Eaſtern Biſhops, as perſons ignorant, conſecrate Johannes ſurnamed Codonatus Biſhop over the ſaid Antiochian Church, to whom ſucceeded Petrus the Heretick. This was the year of Chriſt 488; Dynamius and Sifidius being Conſuls. But on the year following, wherein Probinus and Euſebius were Conſuls, the ſame Victor Thunonenſis records Acacius's death in theſe words: Euſebio V. C. Coſ. Acacius Conſtantinopolitanus Epiſcopus ſub damnatione moritur, &c. The moſt famous perſonage Euſebius being Conſul, Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople dies under Condemnation, and in his room Flavita is ordained Biſhop; to whom (he dying in the third month of his Promotion,) Euphemius Keeper of the Decrees of the Chalcedon Synod was ſucceſſour in the Biſhoprick. And on the next year, Longinus and Fauſtus being the ſecond time Conſuls, the ſame Victor relates, that Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria died under Condemnation. But Baronius, in his Eccleſiaſtick Annalls, relates indeed the death of theſe three Schiſmaticks in the ſame Order with Victor Thunonenſis, but not on the ſame year. For he ſays, that Petrus Fullo died on the year of our Lord's Nativity 486. And, that Acacius died two years after, that is, on the year of Chriſt 488: But in Mongus's death he agrees exactly with Victor. But I had rather follow Victor's opinion, who places Fullo's death on the year of Chriſt 488. For Calendion was created Biſhop of Antioch on the year of our Lord's Nativity 482, as 'tis manifeſt from Pope Simplicius's Epiſtle; and in regard he held that Biſhoprick four years, as Theophanes does atteſt; it muſt neceſſarily be ſaid that Petrus Fullo, who on Calendion's being ejected was put into his place, had poſſeſſion of the See of Antioch on the year of Chriſt 486. But who can believe that Petrus Fullo, who committed ſo many and ſuch notorious Facts during the time of his Epiſcopate, ſhould have died a few months after his promotion? Petrus Fullo therefore died not on the year of Chriſt 486, as Baronius thought. But this argument is with eaſe refuted; for 'tis grounded barely on Theophanes's authority, who attributes four years to Calendion's ſitting Biſhop. But Calendion ſate Biſhop during the ſpace of one year only. For he was ejected by the treachery of his Ordainer Acacius, a little after the Roman Synod, on the year of Chriſt 483; as we are informed from Pope Felix's Letter to all the Presbyters and Archimandrites at Conſtantinople and throughout Bithynia, and from the Author of the Geſta de nomine Acacii. But Theophanes and Cedrenus are notoriouſly miſtaken, who relate that Petrus Fullo departed this life after Petrus Mongus. Whom Pope Gelaſius has refuted, in his Epiſtle to the Orientalls, who does atteſt that of thoſe two, Petrus Fullo died firſt. Valeſ.

[b] Theophanes relates, that Fravita wrote Synodick Letters to Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria, wherein he denyed that he communicated with Felix Biſhop of Rome. And on the other hand, that he ſent Synodick Letters to Felix, wherein he declared to him, that he had no ſociety of communion with Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria. Theophanes aſſignes only three months continuance in his Biſhoprick to the ſame Fravita; as does likewiſe Victor Thunonenſis; and not four, as Evagrius affirms in this chapter. Valeſ.

ſhoprick. And when this Fravita [b] had ſent Synodick Letters to Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria, Petrus on his part returned him anſwer in the like Letters wherein he affirmed the ſame things [with what I have mentioned] concerning the Acts at Chalcedon. Moreover, after Fravita's departure out of this life, (for he ſate Biſhop four months only;) Euphemius was ordained Biſhop in his room. He receives the Synodick Letters, which Petrus had written to Fravita: and having found therein an Anathema againſt the Acts at Chalcedon, was mightily diſturbed, and ſevered himſelf from Petrus's Communion. Both theſe [Prelates] Letters are extant, as well that from Fravita to Petrus, as that from Petrus to Fravita; which, by reaſon of their prolixity, I have omitted. When therefore Euphemius and Petrus were about to contend one with another, and to convene Synods one againſt the other; Petrus is prevented by death, and Athanaſius ſucceeds him in his Chair. He attempted to unite the diſſenting perſons; but could not effect it, the diſagreeing parties being divided into [c] various opinions.

[c] There were at Alexandria two ſorts of Hereticks; to wit, the Dioſcoritæ, and the Eſaiani: concerning whom Liberatus ſpeaks in his Breviary. The Dioſcoritæ wholly condemned and anathematized the Chalcedon Synod. But the Eſaiani, following Zeno's Edict [that is, His Henoticon,] did not indeed in any wiſe admit that Synod; yet they pronounc't not an Anathema againſt it. Valeſ.

This Athanaſius having after this ſent Synodick Letters to Palladius Succeſſour to [d] Petrus in the Biſhoprick of Antioch, did the ſame [that Petrus had done] in relation to the Synod at Chalcedon. The very ſame was likewiſe performed by Johannes, who after Athanaſius ſucceeded in the Alexandrian Chair. And after the death of Palladius Prelate of the Church at Antioch, when Flavianus had ſucceeded him in his Chair, Solomon a Presbyter of Antioch is ſent by him to Alexandria, who carried * his Synodick Letters, and requeſted Johannes's Letters in anſwer to Flavianus. But after this Johannes, another Johannes ſucceeds in the Chair of Alexandria. And theſe things proceeded in the ſame manner [I have mentioned] † till the beginning of [the Emperour] Anaſtaſius's Reign. For he ejected Euphemius [out of his Biſhoprick.] Which [tranſactions] I was neceſſitated to joyn together in one continued Series, both for perſpicuitie's ſake, and alſo that they might with more celerity be underſtood.

[d] Evagrius ſays not expreſly, on what year Petrus Biſhop of Antioch died; nor can it be gathered from his words, that he died after Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria. Yea, rather the contrary may be extracted from Evagrius's words. For, if Petrus Biſhop of Antioch had ſurvived Petrus Alexandrinus, doubtleſs Athanaſius, who ſucceeded Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria, would have ſent his Synodick Letters to Petrus Biſhop of Antioch. For theſe Synodick Letters were wont to be ſent by the Patriarchs at the very beginning of their Patriarchate. In regard therefore Athanaſius ſent his Synodick Letters to Palladius Biſhop of Antioch, it appears from thence, that Petrus Antiochenus died long before Petrus Alexandrinus. Further, concerning Athanaſius's Synodick Letters, Liberatus in his Breviarium ſays theſe words: Non poſt multum tempus, &c. No long time after dies alſo Petrus Mongus as Alexandria, and after him Athanaſius is ordained in that See: who himſelf alſo communicated with the Conſtantinopolitan, Antiochian, and Hieroſolymitane Church in the Edict. CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning the ſlaughter of Armatus, who was kinſman to the Empreſs Verina.

BUT Zeno, by the perſwaſion of Illus, ſlew Armatus alſo, who was the Empreſs Verina's kinſman, whom, when ſent [againſt him] by Baſiliſcus, Zeno had [a] enſnared with gifts, and, inſtead of being an Enemy, had made him a Friend and an Auxiliary. He alſo creates his Son Baſiliſcus, Cæſar, at the City Nicæa. But when he was come to Byzantium, he ſlays Armatus by Treachery. But he makes his Son Baſiliſcus, inſtead of being a Cæſar, a Presbyter. Who was afterwards promoted to the Epiſcopall dignity.

miſed, that as ſoon as he had recovered the Empire, he would make Armatus perpetuall Magiſter [or, Maſter,] of the preſent Militia; and his Son Baſiliſcus, Cæſar, and his own Aſſeſſour; as Theophanes tells us in his Chronicon. pag 107. Whoſe words, becauſe they are corrupted, nor could be underſtood by the Tranſlatour, I will annex here. Ἀλλὰ δώρεαις τοῖς ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, καὶ ὅτι οὐ σὺν πολλῇ τυφλωθείς, καὶ ὑποχέσει διαδόχῳ στρατηλείας, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ βασιλίσκον χειροτονῆσαι ποιῆσαι καὶ συγκάθεδρον αὐτῷ, σὺν αὐτῷ καὶ βασιλίσκῳ ἐπαναλῦσαι. That is, But he alſo (as it frequently [happens,]) being blinded with gifts [ſent] from Zeno, and with a promiſe of the perpetuall Maſterſhip of the Milice, and that Zeno would make his Son Baſiliſcus, Cæſar, and his Aſſeſſour; returned with Zeno againſt Baſiliſcus. I write therefore, καὶ ὑποχέσει διαδόχῳ στρατηλατείας, and with a promiſe of the perpetuall Maſterſhip of the Milice. Theophanes terms the perpetuall power of Maſter of the Milice διάδοχον στρατηλατείαν. The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle does fully confirm our Emendation. For he writes, that Zeno had made a promiſe to Armatus, that he would grant to him the Magiſteriall power of the preſent Milice as long as he ſhould live. Suidas relates much concerning this Armatus, in the word ἀρμάτων; which ſeem to have been taken out of Damaſcius in the Life of Hiſydorus the Philoſopher. Concerning the Rebellion of * Theodoricus the Scythian; and concerning the ſame perſon's death.

* Or, Theuderichus.

THeoderichus, by Nation a Scythian, made an inſurrection alſo againſt Zeno: and having gathered together his own Forces in the [Country] of the Thracians, undertakes an Expedition againſt † him. And when he had ruined all the Countries before him, as far as the mouth of Pontus, he wanted but little of taking the Imperial City it ſelf; [and had ſeized it,] had not ſome of his Greateſt Confidents, induced thereto [by gifts,] entred into a Conſult || about taking him off. Being informed therefore of this ill deſign of his own friends againſt him, he marched back; and not long after this is numbred amongſt thoſe departed this life. Moreover, I will declare the manner of his death, which hapned thus. [a] A Javelin fitted with a loop of leather to caſt it with, was hung up before his Tent, agreeable to the mode of the Barbarians. Having therefore a mind to exerciſe his body, he ordered his horſe to be brought to him. And it being not cuſtomary with him to make uſe of a [b] Strator, he mounted his horſe without any help. But the horſe, being a beaſt unmanaged and fiery, before Theodoricus had beſtridden him and ſetled himſelf, riſes with his fore-feet, and began to go forwards upright on his hinder feet only. So that Theodoricus ſtriving with his horſe, and not daring to [c] curb him with the Bridle, leaſt he ſhould fall backwards upon him, nor yet being firmly ſeated in his Saddle, was toſſed this way and that way, and thrown upon the point [of his Javelin.] Which ran obliquely into him, and wounded his ſide. Being conveyed from thence therefore to his bed, and having continued alive ſome few days, he died of that wound.

† Zeno.

|| Or, To kill him.

[a] Δόρυ ἀμπυκλημένον. In the expoſition of this word Tranſlatours have been miſtaken. Langus renders it Haſtam expeditam, a Javelin fitted up and in readineſs. Muſculus, according to his own uſage, having not a Latine word ready at hand, retained the Greek one. But Chriſtophorſon has rendred it worſt of all, thus, Haſtam cuſpide biſidâ, a Javelin with a double point. I have tranſlated it Haſtam amentatam, a Javelin fitted with a loop of leather to caſt it with. For ἀγκύλη is the ſame with Amentum; to wit, the thong wherewith Darts or Javelins were bound about, that they might be caſt againſt the Enemy. The Old Gloſſes out of the Library of Petrus Daniel quoted by Turnebus, explain it thus: Amentum, corrigia lanceæ, quæ etiam anſula eſt ad jactum, that is, Amentum, the Latchets of a Launce, which is alſo a little handle to caſt it. Where anſula is the ſame with ἀγκύλη, to wit, that whereby a Dart is held that it may be thrown. Heſychius expounds ἀμπυκλίδες thus, τὸ ἐνεῖραι τοῦ ἀγκύλους τῇ ἀγκύλῃ τῆς ἀκοντίου. Τίθεται δὲ καὶ ὅτι τὸ ἕτοιμον εἴη, to fit [or claſp together] the fingers about the leather-latchet of a miſſile weapon. 'Tis likewiſe uſed *to ſignifie, to be ready. So Æſchylus made uſe of this phraſe, ἀγκυλωτοὺ κοπάδας, ſounds made by the laſhings of leather-thongs, [See Heſychius, in the word κόπαδος:] a Metaphor taken ἀπὸ τῶν δορατίων, ἅπερ ἀγκυλὰς καὶ μασάγκυλα ἐκάλουν, from thoſe Javelins, which they termed amentata [that is, fitted with loops of leather to fling them with;] as Euſtathius tells us, at the Second Book of the Iliads. Now, there was a double uſe of the Amentum. For, it conduced both to the holding of the Dart, and alſo that it might be thrown againſt the Enemy with a greater force. Valeſ.

[b] Ἀναβολῆ δὲ ἐκ εἰωθὼς χρῆσθαι. In the incomparable Florentine M. S. I found it plainly written ἀναβολεῖ, as Learned men had conjectured the reading ſhould be. Now, ἀναβολεὺς is the ſame with him whom the Latines term a Strator, who is wont to liſt his Maſter on horſe-back; as Suidas atteſts: in which Author there is a paſſage extant of an ancient Writer, who ſays theſe words concerning King Maſſaniſſa, ὁ δὲ μασσανίσσης γηραιὸς ἵππῳ χωρὶς ἀναβολέως ἐπέβαινε, But this Maſſaniſſa when he was old mounted his horſe without a Strator. Where Suidas ſeems to have taken the word ἀναβολεὺς for a Scale which we vulgarly term a Stirrop. Valeſ.

[c] Ἀναστειζειν. I think it muſt be made ἀναστειρίζειν, as 'tis in the Tellerian M. S. For ſo the Analogy requires it ſhould; as from πεῖρα is derived πειρίζειν. Suidas expounds ἀναστειρίζειν thus, ἀνθέλκειν, ἀναχαλινῶν, to pull back, to curb. But Nicephorus, inſtead of this word, made uſe of ἀναστέλλειν, to repreſs, or, to draw back. Further, the death of Theodoricus hapned on the year of Chriſt 481, as Marcellinus in his Chronicon atteſts, in theſe words: Placidio ſolo Coſſ. Theodoricus Triarii filius Rex Gothorum, &c. Placidius being Conſul alone Theodoricus Triarius's Son King of the Goths, taking his Forces [along with him] as far as Anaplum, arrives at the diſtance of four miles from the City; but having done no harm to any of the Romans, returned forthwith. Further, haſtning into Illyricum, whileſt he was going between the moving Carriages of his own Army, he is wounded and ſtriken thorow with the point of a dart lying upon one of the Wagons, [occaſioned] by the motion of his own horſe who ſtarted; and dies. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVI.

Concerning Marcianus's Inſurrection, and what hapned in Relation to him.

[a] AFter theſe things, Marcianus (the Son of Anthemius who had been Emperour of Rome, a kinſman by mariage to Leo Zeno's predeceſſour in the Empire; for he had married Leontia Leo's younger daughter;) having diſagreed with Zeno, made an attempt to ſet up for a Tyrant. And a ſharp engagement happning about the Pallace, wherein many fell on either ſide; Marcianus routs his oppoſers. And [by that attack] had poſſeſt himſelf of the Pallace, had he not let that opportunity ſlip, by deferring that action till the morrow. For, Opportunity is a ſwift-wing'd Bird, and, whilſt ſhe flies at your feet, may peradventure be taken. But after ſhe has avoided your hands, on a ſudden ſhe mounts on high, and derides thoſe who purſue her, not ſuffering her ſelf to be catcht by them in future. On which account therefore * Statuaries and Painters make her hair long before, but ſhave the hinder part of her head to the very ſkin: with great prudence intimating thereby, that as long as Opportunity is behind, ſhe may be perhaps laid hold on by her long hair: but being got before, ſhe makes a perfect eſcape, not having any thing whereby ſhe may be taken hold of by the Purſuer. Which very thing at that time befell Marcianus, who loſt that opportunity which was ſeaſonably offered him, and was not in future able to recover it. For, on the morrow he was betrayed by his own party; and having been wholly deſerted, fled to the Church of the Divine Apoſtles. Whence he was drawn out by force, and baniſht to Cæſarea a City of the Cappadocians. Where keeping company with ſome Monks, he was afterwards found out to deſign a private eſcape. On which account he was by the Emperour ſent to Tarſus of Cilicia, and having had his hair ſhorn, is ordained a Presbyter. Theſe Tranſactions are with great elegancy written by Euſtathius the Syrian.

[a] Theophanes relates this commotion of Marcianus's (in like manner as our Evagrius does,) ſoon after the death of Theodoricus the Son of Triarius. But Malchus diſſents, in his Byzantine Hiſtory. For he tells us, that Theodoricus Triarius having heard of Marcianus's Sedition, forthwith drew together vaſt Forces, and marched towards Conſtantinople; pretending to give the Emperour aſſiſtance; but in reality, that he might make himſelf maſter of the Imperial City. Malchus's words, if any one be deſirous of reading them, occur at pag. 86 of the King's Edition. Further, Procopius Marcianus's brother, after Marcianus was taken, and his Tyranny ſuppreſt, fled into Græcia to Theodoricus. And when Zeno ſent an Embaſſy requiring him to be delivered up to himſelf, he could never prevail to get that done by Theodoricus; as Canlidus ſays, in his Second Book; and Malchus, in the book now cited. CHAP. XXVII.

Concerning the Tyranny of Illus and Leontius.

THE ſame Euſtathius relates, that Zeno framed innumerable deſignes and intreagues, even againſt Verina his own mother in Law; and, that after theſe things, he baniſht her into the Country of the Cilicians: but, that afterwards, when Illus's Tyranny broke out, Verina removed to that termed the Caſtle of Papirius, and there ended her life. Moreover, the ſame Euſtathius hath written the Affairs of Illus with much Eloquence; how, having been treacherouſly laid wait for by Zeno, he made his eſcape; and, in what manner Zeno delivered up that perſon [to Illus] to be put to death, whom he had ordered to murder Illus; [paying him with] the loſs of his head, which reward Zeno gave him for his unſucceſsfullneſs in that attempt. Illus alſo was declared Maſter of the Oriental Milice by Zeno, who made it his buſineſs to conceal [thoſe treacherous deſignes he had framed againſt Illus.] But Illus, having taken into an aſſociation with himſelf Leontius, and one Marſus a perſon eminent and skilfull, and Pamprepius; went into the Eaſtern parts. Then [the ſaid Euſtathius relates] Leontius's being proclaimed Emperour, which was done at Tarſus of Cilicia; and alſo, what theſe perſons got by their Tyranny; Theodoricus (a perſon by original extract a Goth, and who was a man of eminency amongſt the Romans,) being ſent againſt them, with an Army conſiſting partly of Romans and partly of Barbarians. The ſame Euſtathius does very ingeniouſly deſcribe the ſlaughter of theſe perſons, which in a cruell manner was effected by Zeno's order, [he repaying them with this reward] for their Benevolence [they had ſhown] to himſelf: and, that Theodoricus, [a] made ſenſible of Zeno's treacherous deſignes [againſt himſelf,] departed to the Seniour Rome: (But others affirm, [b] that [Theodoricus made this journey into Italy] by Zeno's perſwaſion:) and having vanquiſhed Odoacer in an Engagement, made himſelf Maſter of Rome, and aſſumed to himſelf the name [only] of King.

[a] Τῆς ϛυλῆς διδεδιμένῳ ζήνωνϛ, made ſenſible of Zeno's intent. In the Florent. M.S. 'tis truer written, thus, τῆς ὀπϛυλῆς, &c. made ſenſible of Zeno's treacherous deſignes, &c. Valeſ.

[b] Ὡς ϗ ὑποδύκαι ζήνωνϛ. Tranſlatours ſaw not the meaning of this place; they were deceived by an ill punctation. But, by placing a middle diſtinction after theſe words, I have caſt a light upon this paſſage. For Evagrius ſays, two reaſons were brought, which had moved Theodoricus to go into Italy. The firſt was becauſe Zeno plotted againſt him. The ſecond is aſſigned in theſe words, But others affirm that, &c. Indeed, in the Excerpta of that old Author, which I publiſhed long ſince at the end of Amm. Marcellinus, Theodoricus is ſaid to have gone into Italy with the conſent of Zeno. For theſe are the words there, at pag. 479; Zeno recompenſans beneficiis Theodoricum, &c. Zeno recompenſing Theodoricus with gifts, whom he made Patricius and Conſul. giving him much; and ſending him into Italy, made an agreement with him, that if Odoachar ſhould be vanquiſhed, for the merit of his own labours, he ſhould only reign before, in his room whileſt he ſhould live. [Loco ejus dum adviveret, in his room whileſt he ſhould live; ſo 'tis worded in this note of Valeſius's here: but in the forementioned Excerpta of the old Authour, the reading is, loco ejus dum adveniret, in his room whileſt he ſhould come.] Jordanes does alſo atteſt the ſame in his Geticks, and in his Book de Succeſſione Regnorum. Concerning Mammianus, and the * Structures [built by] him.

* Or, Works.

JOhannes the Rhetorician relates, that during the Reign of Zeno, one Mammianus, from being a Sedentary Mechanick, became an eminent perſon, and arrived at the Senatorian Order; and, that this Mammianus built that Edifice termed The [a] Antiphorum in the Suburb Daphne, (which place had before had Vines in it, and was fit for Tillage;) oppoſite to the publick Bath; wherein is erected a Brazen Statue, [with this Inſcription,] MAMMIANUS A LOVER OF THE CITY. [The ſame Johannes adds,] that he raiſed two Royall Porticus's in the City, for building very magnificent, and beautified with the ſplendour and brightneſs of Stones. And, that between the two Royall Porticus's, The Tetrapylum a middle Edifice was erected by him, moſt exquiſitely adorned with Columns and * Praſs. I my ſelf have ſeen the Royall Porticus's, which, together with their name, do ſtill retain the Remains of their former Beauty; their flour being paved with Proconneſian Marble. But, the [reſt of the] Building has nothing of excellency. For, by reaſon of thoſe Calamities which have befaln them, they have of late been repair'd, [b] nothing being added that might beautifie them. But, of The Tetrapylum erected by Mammianus we have not found ſo much as the very * Foundation.

[a] So a certain Building ſeems to be termed, which ſerved inſtead of a Forum. Evagrius ſays, this Edifice was in the Daphnenſian Suburb, over againſt [or, oppoſite to] the publick Bath. For that is the import of theſe words, ἐυθὺ τὸ δημοσίε βαλανείε. Muſculus renders ἐυθὺ, recta ad publicum Balneum, ſtraightforth to the publick Bath. Which I approve not of: for ἐυθὺ is the ſame with κάθεναντιον, oppoſite; as Suidas atteſts. Now, in the Antiforum (ſays Evagrius,) Mammianus's Statue was erected. Whence it is apparent, that The Antiforum was the ſame with what I have ſaid above. For Statues were wont to be erected in the Forum. Valeſ.

Concerning Zeno's Death, and the Proclaiming Anaſtaſius Emperour.

FUrther, Zeno dying Childleſs, of a diſeaſe [termed] an Epilepſie, after the ſeventeenth year of his Empire; his brother Longinus, who had arrived at great power, entertained an hope, that he ſhould inveſt himſelf with the Empire. But he proved unſucceſsfull in his deſires. For Ariadne encircled Anaſtaſius with the [Imperial] Crown, who had not yet arrived at the Senatorian Order, but was inrolled in that termed * The Schole of the Silentiarii. Moreover, Euſtathius relates, that from the beginning of Diocletian's Empire to Zeno's death and the Proclaiming of Anaſtaſius, there paſſed Two hundred and ſeven years: from the † Empire of Auguſtus, Five hundred thirty two years and ſeven months: from the Reign of Alexander the Macedonian Eight hundred thirty two years, and likewiſe ſeven months: from the Reign of the Romans and Romulus, One thouſand fifty two years, and moreover ſeven months: from the deſtruction of Troy, One thouſand ſix hundred eighty and ſix years, with ſeven months. CHAP. XXX.

Concerning the Emperour Anastasius; and how, because he would not innovate any thing in relation to the Ecclesiastick Constitution, the Churches over the whole world were filled with infinite disturbances: and many of the Bishops for that reason were ejected.

[FUrther,] This Anastasius, being a person very [a] studious to promote Peace, would permit no innovation whatever to be made, especially in relation to the Ecclesiastick Constitution: and took all imaginable Courses, both that the most Holy Churches might continue undisturbed, and also that every person subject to his Government might enjoy a profound Peace; all Animosity and Contention being far removed both from the Ecclesiastick, and from the Civill State of affairs. The Synod therefore at Chalcedon was in these times, neither publickly asserted in the most Holy Churches, nor yet wholly rejected: but every one of the Prelates acted according to that Sentiment they had embraced. [b] And some of them courageously defended what had been expounded in that Synod, nor would they recede even from one syllable of it's determinations, or admit of the alteration of one Letter: but with much confidence *separated from, and would in no wise endure to communicate with those, who admitted not of that Synod's Decrees. But others, not only embraced not the Synod at Chalcedon and the determinations made by it; but also Anathematized it, together with Leo's Epistle. Othersome stifly adhered to Zeno's Henoticon; [which they did] notwithstanding their disagreement amongst themselves concerning the one or the two Natures: these being imposed upon by the [c] composure of the Letters; and those having a greater inclination to Peace and Unity. In so much that the Churches of the whole world were divided into private Factions, nor would the Prelates hold Communion one with another. Hence hapned many * Dissentions both in the East, and in the Western parts, and throughout Africa; neither the Eastern Bishops keeping up a Society and Amity with the Western or those of Africa, nor yet on the other hand these with the Eastern Prelates. Moreover, the matter proceeded to an higher Degree of absurdity. For, neither did the Eastern Prelates hold a Communion amongst their own selves; nor [would] those who governed the [Episcopall] Chairs of Europe or Africa [cherish a communion one with another,] much less with Strangers and Forreiners. Which when the Emperour Anastasius perceived, he ejected those Bishops who made any Innovation, out of the Church; where-ever he found any such person, either crying up the Synod of Chalcedon contrary to the usage in those places, or else Anathematizing it. He ejected therefore out of the Imperial City, in the first place Euphemius, as we have related * before, and then Macedonius; after whom Timotheus was made [Bishop.] Flavianus also [was by him ejected] out of Antioch.

[a] How Anastasius was affected towards Ecclesiastick affairs, and in what manner he behaved himself in the administration thereof, Liberatus, in his Breviary chap. 18. informs us in these words: Ascenderunt quidam & adversantium, &c. Some persons both of those who were against him, and of them who communicated with him, went up to Anastasius. And whilst they had a debate before the Emperour, some proposing that the Synod should be Anathematized, and so they would communicate; but others, being more calm, were for adding those things in the Uniting Edict, which might satisfie these who had communicated with Petrus: The Emperour considering that if he should make an addition to the Edict, he might raise a disturbance in the Church, and that, to Anathematize the Synod was impossible; perswaded them that the Uniting Edict was sufficient that they might communicate mutually with one another, as the rest of the Bishops of the Churches did. And when they would not obey to perform these things, he dismissed them without their having obtained any thing. From which words you see, that the Emperour Anastasius wholly followed Zeno's Edict, nor would besides innovate any thing. Vales.

[c] Τῇ συνθήκῃ γεγραμμάτων. Johannes Langus seems to understand the Emperour Zeno's Letters concerning the uniting of the Churches. For thus he renders it: ii quidem Litteris insidiose compositis per fraudem decepti, those being through fraud deceived by the Letters craftily composed. Which sense Christophorson has likewise followed. Indeed, this place of Evagrius can't be otherwise explained. For he brings two reasons, why some persons would not acquiesce in Zeno's Edict. He says therefore, that some were deceived by that flattering Oration of the Emperour, which was composed to perswade. But, that others, allured with a desire of the peace and repose of the Churches, had acquiesced in this Edict. Vales.

The Letter of the Monks of Palestine to Alcison concerning Xenaias and some other persons.

NOw, concerning Macedonius and Flavianus, the Monks in Palestine, in their Letter to [a] Alcison, say word for word thus: But, [b] Petrus being dead, they were again divided amongst themselves; and Alexandria and Egypt and Libya continued within their own Communion. The rest of the East likewise held a Communion separate from others, [c] in regard the Westerns refused communicating with them on any terms, unless to their Anathematizing of Nestorius, Eutyches, and Dioscorus, they would add Petrus Mongus also, and Acacius. The Churches therefore over the whole world being in this posture, the genuine [followers] of Dioscorus and Eutyches *were reduced to the smallest number imaginable. And when they were now just a-*alone. Marcellinus mentions him in his Chronicon, who Alcissus. See Baronius at the year of Christ 516. Vales.

[a] This Alcison was Bishop of Nicopolis, (which is the Metropolis of Old Epirus;) one of the chief defenders of the Chalcedon Synod. He died in the year of Christ 516, Petrus being Consul terms him

[b] In regard there were two Petrus's at one and the same time, the one Bishop of Alexandria, the other of Antioch; 'tis uncertain which of these two is here meant. But it seems more probable, that Petrus of Alexandria should be meant here; because the Monks of Palestine do immediately speak of Alexandria, of Egypt, and of Libya. Yet, this meaning is hindred by what is objected by the same Monks; to wit, that after Petrus's death Egypt held a separate communion, and that the Orientals were disjoyned from their communion. For Petrus Alexandrinus was succeeded by Athanasius, who wrote Synodick Letters to Palladius Bishop of Antioch, and was joyned in a communion with him, as I have observed above from Evagrius and Liberatus. But again, if we should say that Petrus of Antioch were meant at this place, there would be the same difficulty. But, answer may be made, that the Monks do speak here, not of the Patriarchs themselves, but of a whole Diœcesis, and of the greatest part of the Bishops. 'Tis certain, after Petrus Alexandrinus's death, the Eastern Bishops desired the communion of the Church of Rome; as 'tis apparent from Pope Gelasius's Letter to the Orientalls. Vales.

[c] Τῶν δυτικῶν ἀνεχομένων. A negative particle is doubtless to be added, in this manner, τῶν δυτικῶν μὴ ἀνεχομένων, in regard the Westerns refused; which is the reading in Nicephorus and in the Tellerian M. S. Vales.

bout vaniſhing in ſuch a manner as not to appear any more in the world, One [d] Xenaias, [a perſon agreeable to his name] truly a ſtranger from God, (on what deſign we know not, nor what the grudge was which he would revenge upon Flavianus, but) under a pretext of the Faith, as moſt do ſay, begins to move againſt Flavianus, and to calumniate him as a Neſtorian. But when Flavianus had Anathematized Neſtorius together with his opinion, Xenaias paſſes from Neſtorius [e] to Dioſcorus, and to Theodorus, and Theodoret, Ibas, [f] and Cyrus, and Eutherius, and Johannes, and we know not to what perſons elſe, nor whence he had gathered them. Some of whom had in reality been Aſſerters of Neſtorius's Sentiments: but others of them, ſuſpected to have been [Neſtorius's followers,] had Anathematized him, and had ended their lives in the Communion of the Church. Unleſs (ſays [Xenaias to Flavianus]) you will Anathematize all theſe perſons who are diſtempered with Neſtorius's Tenets, you are an Embracer of Neſtorius's Sentiments, although you ſhould Anathematize him a thouſand times, together with his Opinion. By Letters alſo he excites the Favourers of Dioſcorus and Eutyches, perſwading them to aſſiſt himſelf againſt Flavianus, and to require him not to Anathematize the Synod, but the forementioned perſons [only.] When Flavianus the Biſhop had made a long and ſtout reſiſtance againſt theſe men, and againſt others who together with Xenaias combined againſt him, to wit, one [g] Eluſinus Biſhop of the Second Cappadocia, Nicias [Biſhop] of Laodicea in Syria, and others from other places; (to relate the Cauſes of which perſons * hatred againſt Flavianus, longs not to us, but to others:) at length [Flavianus] ſuppoſing [h] they would not be quiet in behalfe of theſe perſons, yielded to their contentious humour: and having in writing Anathematized the foreſaid perſons, ſent [his Libell] to the Emperour: For they had incenſed him againſt Flavianus, as being an Aſſertour of Neſtorius's Opinion. But Xenaias not ſatisfied even herewith, required again of Flavianus, that he ſhould Anathematize the Synod it ſelf, and thoſe who aſſerted two natures in the Lord [Chriſt,] one of the Fleſh, another of the Deity. Which when Flavianus had refuſed to do, Xenaias accuſed him again, as being a Neſtorian. After many debates in reference to this matter, when the [i] Patriarch had drawn up an Expoſition of the Faith, wherein he profeſt that he embraced the Synod as to what related to the Depoſition of Neſtorius and Eutyches, but not as to its definition and doctrine of the Faith; they renewed their Accuſations againſt him, as if he were a ſecret favourer of Neſtorius's Sentiments, unleſs he would add an Anathematiſm againſt the Synod it ſelf alſo, and againſt thoſe who aſſerted two Natures in our Lord, one of the Fleſh, another of the Deity. Moreover, by their many fraudulent words and expreſſions, they induced the [k] Iſauri alſo to embrace their own Opinion. And having drawn up a Writing concerning the Faith, wherein they Anathematized the Synod together with thoſe who affirmed two Natures, or Proprieties [in Chriſt;] they withdrew themſelves from a Communion with Flavianus and Macedonius; and enter into ſociety with others, who had ſubſcribed to their Writing. During this interim, they entreated the Biſhop of Jeruſalem alſo, that he would draw up in writing the Form of his own Faith. Which he having ſet forth, ſent it to the Emperour by the followers of Dioſcorus. [l] And that [Copy of it] which they produce, does indeed contain an Anathematiſm of thoſe who aſſert two Natures. But, the Biſhop of Jeruſalem himſelf affirms, that it has been adulterated by them, and produces another without any ſuch Anathematiſm. Nor, need this ſeem a wonder. For they have frequently corrupted the Books of the Fathers. And by [falſe] Titles have aſcribed many of Apollinaris's Books, to Athanaſius, to Gregorius Thaumaturgus, and to [m] Julius. By which [Books] eſpecially, they have induced many perſons to [embrace] their own impiety. Further, they requeſted of Macedonius a Writing concerning his own Faith. Who ſet forth an Expoſition thereof, affirming that he knew no other Faith ſave that of the Three hundred and eighteen, and hundred and fifty [Holy Fathers;] and he Anathematizes Neſtorius and Eutyches, and thoſe who aſſert two Sons, or two Chriſts, or who divide the Natures: [n] but has made no mention of the Epheſine Synod which depoſed Neſtorius, nor of that at Chalcedon

[d] They derive Xenaias's name from the Greek word ξένος, which ſignifies a ſtranger, or, an extraneous perſon.

This Xenaias was Biſhop of Hierapolis, ordained by Petrus Fullo; he was by another name called Philoxenus. Concerning this peſtiferous perſon, Theophanes, Cedrenus, Nicephorus, and others, have related much. Valeſ.

[e] I doubt not but the name of Dioſcorus is by miſtake put here inſtead of the name Diodorus. For Xenaias, an Enemy of the Chalcedon Synod, would not have Anathematized Dioſcorus, but Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus, and the reſt. So, 'tis certain, Victor Tunonenſis [tells us] in his Chronicon. Johanne Gibbo (ſays he) Coſſ. Anaſtaſius Imp. Flaviano, &c. When Johannes Gibbus was Conſul, the Emperour Anaſtaſius, Flavianus being Prelate of Antioch, and Philoxenus Biſhop of Hierapolis, convenes a Synod at Conſtantinople; and perſwades them to pronounce an Anathema againſt Diodorus of Tarſus, and Theodorus of Mopſueſtia together with their writings, [alſo, againſt] Theodoret of Cyrus, Ibas of Edeſſa, Andreas, Eucherius, Quirus and Johannes, Biſhops, and againſt all others who aſſerted two Natures in Chriſt, and two Forms, and who confeſſed not one of the Trinity to have been Crucified, together with Leo Biſhop of Rome and his Tome, and together with the Chalcedon Synod. Theophanes confirms the ſame in his Chronicon, pag. 131. Valeſ.

[f] Καὶ κύρου καὶ εὐθερίου. Victor Tunonenſis in his Chronicon terms them Quirus and Eucherius, as we ſaw in the foregoing note; where Quirus is put for Cyrus, in ſuch manner as in St Ambroſius's Epiſtles, Quinegius is put for Cinegius. Further, Nicephorus has at this place ſubſtituted the name Eleutherius, inſtead of Eutherius. Valeſ.

[g] This Eleuſinas [or, Eleuſinius] is mentioned by Liberatus in his Breviary chap. 19, in theſe words, ſpeaking of Severus: Ita ut ob hoc ſcriberet, &c. So that on this account he would write, even to Flavianus himſelf, as 'tis ſignified in his own Epiſtles, and to Maronas Lector, and to Eleuſinus and Euthrecius Biſhops, and to Oecumenius Scholaſticus of Iſauria. The ſame perſon is mentioned by Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag. 128 of the King's Edition; whoſe words Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius has rendred thus: Anaſtaſius quiete potitus à prælijs, Macedonium Patriarcham avertere ab orthodoxâ fide ſatagebat. Multi autem Epiſcoporum Anaſtaſio gratiam præſtantes, Chalcedonenſi reſiſtebant Concilio, quorum primus erat Eleuſius Saſimenſis. Theophanes's words in Greek are theſe; ὧν πρῶτος ἦν ἐλεύσιος σασίμων. But it muſt be written, ἐλδοσίνιος ὁ σασίμων, which is the reading in the Vatican Copy. Indeed, the Monks of Paleſtine do affirm, that this Eleuſinius was Biſhop of the Second Cappadocia. Now, Saſima is a City of Cappadocia Secunda, (whereof Gregorius Nazianzenus was heretofore Biſhop;) as the Old Notitiæ do inform us, and eſpecially Hieroclis. Valeſ.

[h] Διὰ τύλας εἰρηνεύειν. It ſhould, as I think, be written εἰρηνεύσειν; or rather, a Negative particle is to be added, in this manner; νομίσας διὰ τύλας μὴ εἰρηνεύειν αὐτόν; and we have rendred it accordingly. Nor do I doubt but Evagrius wrote it thus. But Antiquaries [that is, Tranſcribers of Books,] writing haſtily, omitted the Negative particle at this place. Further, by τύτους, theſe perſons, he means Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus, Theodorus of Mopſueſtia, Theodoret, and the reſt mentioned above. See Theophanes pag. 131. Valeſ.

[i] Flavianus Biſhop of Antioch is meant. Which I ſhould not have remarked, had there not been a fault in Chriſtophorſon's Verſion. Valeſ.

[k] Τὸς ἰσαυρείας. In Nicephorus 'tis righter, thus, ἰσαύρους, the Iſauri. Valeſ.

[l] Ὅπερ δὲ τοῦ μὴ προσδέχεσθαι. A conjunction ſeems neceſſary to be added here, in this manner; ἀλλ' ὅπερ μὴ δὲ τοῦ, &c. And that [Copy of it] which they produce. Valeſ.

[m] See Leontius de ſectis, in the eighth Action. Where he tells us, that the Acephali attributed ſome Epiſtles to Julius Biſhop of Rome, which in reality were Apollinaris's. Valeſ.

[n] So indeed Macedonius behaved himſelf in the beginning of his Epiſcopate, whileſt he was willing to gratifie the Emperour Anaſtaſius, by whom he had been promoted to the Patriarchate. Therefore, many of the Antient Writers have related, that Macedonius at the beginning had ſubſcribed to Zeno's Henoticon. So, 'tis certain, Theodorus Lector affirms, whom Baronius has cauſeleſsly reproved on that account. For Liberatus relates the ſame in his Breviary chap. 18; where he ſpeaks concerning Johannes Hemula Biſhop of Alexandria;——and a little after that, where he mentions Johannes Nicæota, Hemula's ſucceſſour. Victor Tunonenſis in his Chronicon writes thus concerning Macedonius: Anaſtaſio Aug. Coſ. &c. In the Conſulate of Anaſtaſius Auguſtus, Macedonius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, a Synod being convened, condemns thoſe who embraced the Decrees of the Chalcedon Synod, and ſuch as defend [the Sentiments] of Neſtorius and Eutyches. Laſtly, Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag. 120, does wholly agree with Theodorus Lector. Valeſ.

wherein Eutiches had been depoſed. Whereat the ° Monaſteries about Conſtantinople were highly offended, and ſeparated from the Communion of Macedonius the Biſhop. In the mean while, Xenaias and P Dioſcorus having brought over many of the Biſhops to their own party, became intollerable; and raiſed Tumults againſt thoſe who refuſed to Anathematize [the Synod.] And againſt ſuch as would not in the end yield to them, they framed many ſtratagems, and cauſed them to be caſt into Exile. In this manner therefore, they baniſh Macedonius, and q Johannes Biſhop of Paltum, and Flavianus. Theſe are the Contents of the foreſaid Letter.

° He means the Monaſteries of Dius, and Baſſianus, and of the Acœmeti [or, ſleepleſs Monks,] and of Matrona; who had ſeparated themſelves from the communion of Macedonius, and [the Monaſteries] of thoſe who had ſubſcribed Zeno's Henoticon, as Theophanes tells us in his Chronicon pag. 122. Valeſ.

P This, as I think, is Dioſcorus Junior, who ſucceeded Johannes Nicæota in the Biſhoprick of Alexandria. Baronius places his ordination on the year of Chriſt 516, five years after Macedonius's baniſhment. To whom agrees Theophanes in his Chronicon. But Liberatus contradicts it, who relates Dioſcorus's ordination before the depoſition of Macedonius. And this Evagrius confirms here. But, after a more accurate examination of the matter, Dioſcorus Junior can't be meant here. For Macedonius was ejected out of his Biſhoprick on the year of Chriſt 511, as 'tis manifeſt from Marcellinus; and in his room was ſubſtituted Timotheus, who forthwith wrote Synodick Letters to Johannes Nicæota Biſhop of Alexandria; as Liberatus and Theophanes do atteſt. Whereas therefore Dioſcorus Junior ſucceeded Nicæota, he muſt neceſſarily begin his Preſidency after Macedonius's depoſition. Wherefore, another Dioſcorus is meant here. And perhaps, in ſtead of Dioſcorus, it muſt be written Soterichus. Valeſ.

q Concerning this Johannes, Victor Tunnonenſis in his Chronicon writes thus: Theodoro Viro C. Coſ. Julianus Boſtrenus, &c. The moſt famous Theodorus being Conſul, Julianus of Boſtri, and Johannes of Paltum voluntarily left their own Churches, and others are put into their places. But Marcellinus in his Chronicon relates that in the Conſulate of Paulus and Muſſianus, on the year of Chriſt 512. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning the Expulſion of Macedonius [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople, and of Flavianus [Biſhop] of Antioch.

But, there were other things which ſecretly [a] wrung Anaſtaſius. For when Ariadne had taken a reſolution to cloath Anaſtaſius with the Imperial purple; Euphemius, who preſided over the Archi-Epiſcopal Chair [of Conſtantinople,] would on no terms give his conſent, till ſuch time as Anaſtaſius had delivered to him a Caution [or, Contract,] in writing, written with his own hand, and [confirmed] with great Oaths, that he would preſerve the Faith entire, and introduce no Innovation into Gods Holy Church, if he ſhould obtain the Imperial Scepter. Which paper Euphemius delivered to Macedonius who was intruſted with the cuſtody of the Sacred Veſſells. Euphemius had done theſe things on this account, becauſe Anaſtaſius was by many perſons thought to be addicted to the Manichean Hereſie. After Macedonius therefore had aſcended the Epiſcopal Throne, Anaſtaſius was deſirous of having his own Caution reſtored to him, ſaying it would be a reproach to the Empire, if the forementioned Obligatory-Inſtrument ſhould be kept [laid up in the Church.] Againſt which when Macedonius made a reſolute oppoſition, and affirmed that he would not betray the Faith; the Emperour [Anaſtaſius] framed all imaginable deſignes againſt him, reſolving to eject him out of his [Epiſcopal] Chair. Certain Boyes therefore who were ſlanderers, were produced, who falſly accuſed both themſelves, and Macedonius of a filthy and unclean act. But, when it was found, that Macedonius was deprived of his Genitalls, they betook themſelves to other Arts and Deſignes; till at length, by the advices and perſwaſions of Celer Maſter of the Offices at Court, Macedonius withdrew privately from his [Epiſcopal] Chair. But in the Expulſion of Flavianus, they have added other things. For we have received information from ſome very aged perſons, who perfectly remembred what ever had hapned during Flavianus's being Biſhop; which perſons do affirm, that thoſe Monks [who dwelt] in that Country termed [b] Cynegica, and whatever other [Monks] inhabited the firſt Provinces of the Syrians, perſwaded thereto by [c] Xenaias, a man [by Extract a Perſian;] (Which Xenaias was Biſhop of Hierapolis a City near to [Antioch,] and by a Greek name he was termed Philoxenus:) flock't together, and in a tumultuous and very diſorderly manner made an irruption into the City [Antioch,] where they would compell Flavianus to Anathematize the Chalcedon Synod and Leo's Epiſtle. Whereat Flavianus being extreamly troubled, and the Monks preſſing on with great violence; the populacy of the City made an Inſurrection, and ſlew a great many of the Monks; in ſo much that a vaſt number of them had the [River] Orontes for their Tomb, their bodies being buried in its waves. There hapned another thing alſo, not much inferiour to this. For, the Monks of Syria Cœle (which is now termed Syria Secunda,) having a mighty affection for Flavianus, becauſe he had lead a Monaſtick life in a certain Monaſtery which was ſituate in a * Country named Tilmognus; came to Antioch, with a reſolution to defend Flavianus: ſo that at that time alſo ſome, and thoſe no ſmall [miſchievous accidents] hapned. Whether therefore on account of the former [Tumult,] or by reaſon of [that diſorder we have mentioned] in the ſecond place, or for both, Flavianus is ejected and baniſhed to Petra, [a Town] ſituate in the utmoſt confines of The Paleſtines.

[a] Τὰ δὲ συμμάχουτα. There is a fault in the word συμμάχουλα. Nicephorus (book 16. chap. 26.) writing out this paſſage of Evagrius, makes uſe of the word πλήγουλα, ſtroke, or, wounded. But I am for treading in the footſteps of the ordinary reading; and therefore think it is to be reſtored thus, σωμάζουλα, wrung, or, choak't; after which manner Chriſtophorſon ſeems to have read. In the Tellerian M.S. the reading is, τὰ δὲ γὲ συμμάχουλα. Valeſ.

[b] Nicephorus (book 16. chap. 27,) thought there was a Monaſtery ſo named from one Cynegius its Founder. But it ſeems likelier to me, that a Country of Syria was ſo termed, wherein there were many Monaſteries. Valeſ.

[c] Ὑπὸ ξενάια ἀνδρὶ. The laſt word muſt be expunged, being ſuperfluous; how it crept into this place, I know not. If we have a mind to retain this word, the reading muſt be thus, ἀνδρὸς πέρσου, a man by extract a Perſian. For 'tis referred to the Participle πεισθέντες, perſwaded. Xenaias was indeed by Nation a Perſian, as Theophanes, Nicephorus, and others do atteſt. Valeſ.

* Field, or, Village.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Concerning Severus Biſhop of Antioch.

Flavianus therefore having been ejected, Severus is preferred to the Epiſcopal Throne of Antioch, on the [a] five Hundredth fifty firſt

[a] This was the year of Chriſt 513. For the firſt year of the Antiochians precedes the vulgar Æra of our Lords Nativity 48. years. Severus therefore entred upon the Biſhoprick of Antioch on the year of Chriſt 513, in the month November, in the ſixth Indiction. So Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon: Indict. 6. Clementino & Probo Coſſ. &c. In the ſixth Indition, Clementinus and Probus being Conſuls, Severus a worſhipper of Eutyches's perfidiouſneſs, by the deſire of Anaſtaſius Cæſar, poſſeſſed the See of the Prelate Flavianus, and of a Monk was made a Biſhop. Valeſ.

year of Antioch's being * ſtyled a free City, in the month Dius, it being the Sixth Indiction of the [b] Cycle then [current ;] but at this preſent time wherein we write, it is the Six hundredth fourty firſt year. This Severus had Sozopolis for the place of his Nativity, which is one of the Cities of the Province Piſidia. He had formerly imployed himſelf in the ſtudy of the Law at Berytus. But, having afterwards ſoon left * thoſe ſtudies, when he had received holy Baptiſm in the ſacred Temple of the divine Martyr Leontius who is honoured at Tripolis a City of the [c] Maritime Phœnice, he betook himſelf to a Monaſtick life in a [d] certain Monaſterie ſituate in the mid way between the ſmall City Gaza and that little Town termed Majuma.

* See book 2. chap. 12. note (a.)

[b] Τῷ πενταδὶ κύκλῳ. Chriſtophorſon omitted theſe words in his Verſion. The meaning of them is this ; on the ſixth year of the Indictional Circle which then was. For, an Indiction is a Circle of fifteen years, after the ending whereof, another Circle begins of as many years. Evagrius terms the partition of the Circle of fifteen years, ὀπινέμησιν τοῦ κύκλου, which the Latines call Indictionem, an Indiction. But, whereas Evagrius ſays, that Severus was ordained on the month Dius, that is, November ; that muſt neceſſarily have been done in the ſeaventh Indiction. For a new Indiction was begun on the month September. Evagrius has expreſſed himſelf in the ſame manner before, at book 2. chap. 12 ; where he ſays theſe words concerning the Earthquake, which hapned at Antioch in the times of Leo Auguſtus ; ἀνὰ πῶ ἐνδεκάτῳ ὀπινέμησιν τοῦ κύκλου, on the eleventh partition of the Cycle, that is, on the eleventh year of the partition of the Circle. So, in the thirteenth Edict of Juſtinian ; μέχρι τῆς δευτέρας ὀπινεμήσεως τοῦ παρωχηκότος κύκλου. untill the ſecond partition of the paſt Cycle. Valeſ.

[c] There was a twofold Phœnice ; the one termed Maritima [becauſe it lay by the Sea-coaſt ;] in Greek called παράλος, or, παραλία : the Metropolis whereof was Tyre. The other named Libanenſis, the head City whereof was Emeſa ; as the Old Notitiæ do inform us. In the Maritime Phœnice was the moſt famous City Tripolis. In that City, as Evagrius does here atteſt, the Martyr Leontius was honoured. This is the Leontius, of whom mention is made in the Menologie, at the eighteenth day of the month July. The Monks, in their Libell preſented to the Patriarch Menas, (which Libell is recorded in the fifth Action of the Conſtantinop. Synod ſub Mena,) do atteſt, that Severus was baptized in this Martyrs Church. Valeſ.

[d] Liberatus in his Breviary chap. 19, writes thus concerning Severus : Is enim Severus cum ſedaret prius in Monaſterio, &c. For this Severus, when he formerly lived [or, ſate] in the Monaſterie, admitted not of Zeno's Edict, nor [received to communion] Petrus Mongus. After this, living in the Monaſtery of the Abbot Romanus, and of Mamas who preſided after him, he was from thence ſent to reſide as Apocriſarius [that is, Legate] at Conſtantinople : and becomes one of their number, who were of Petrus Mongus's [party.] This Relation of Liberatus's is far different from that of Evagrius. For, Evagrius ſays, that at firſt Severus was a Monk in a Monaſtery which was between Majuma and Gaza. And this is confirmed by Theophanes alſo. But, that afterwards he reſided [or, ſate] in the Monaſtery of the Abbot Nephalius ; which was in Egypt, as Evagrius tells us in the two and twentieth chapter of this book. Out of which Monaſtery Severus being driven, came (ſays he) to Conſtantinople. But, Liberatus relates, that Severus ſate indeed in two Monaſteries : but atteſts, that he was not ejected out of any Monaſtery, but, was made Apocriſarius. But, whoſe Apocriſarius he was, he ſays not. I am of opinion, that he was the Apocriſarius of the Monks of the Eaſt, who were of the ſame Sect with himſelf. So Theonas is termed the Apocriſarius of the Monaſteries in Paleſtine, in the firſt Action of the Conſtantinopolitan Synod under Menas. And that Evagrius confirms here. Valeſ.

In which place [c] Petrus the Iberian alſo, who had been Biſhop of the ſame Gaza, and was baniſhed together with Timotheus Ælurus, * had exerciſed a Monaſtick life, and had left himſelf a famous name. Further, Severus [on a time] ingages in a diſpute with Nephalius, who formerly had been of the ſame † Sentiment with him concerning the one Nature [of Chriſt ;] but had afterwards united himſelf to to the Defenders of the Chalcedon Synod, and to thoſe who aſſerted two Natures in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. By this Nephalius therefore, and thoſe who were of his party, [Severus] is driven out of his own Monaſtery, together with ſeverall others who held the ſame opinion with himſelf. From whence he went to the Imperial City, under the notion of an Embaſſadour, in defence both of himſelf, and thoſe who had been ejected with him. And there he becomes known to the Emperour Anaſtaſius, as He hath related at large who wrote Severus's Life. Moreover, the ſame Severus, in the [f] Synodick Letters which he wrote, has in expreſs words Anathematized the Chalcedon Synod. Concerning which matter, [the Monks of Paleſtine] in their Letter to Alciſon, ſay theſe words. [g] The Synodick Letters of Timotheus now [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople, have indeed been approved and admitted of here in Paleſtine : but the depoſition of Macedonius and Flavianus, hath not been allowed of ; nor yet Severus's Synodick Letters. [h] But, thoſe perſons who brought them hither, were diſgracefully and contumeliouſly uſed, agreeable to their deſerts, and betook themſelves to their heels ; [i] the populacy of the City and the Monks having made an Inſurrection againſt them. In this poſture was Paleſtine. [k] But, of thoſe who were ſubject to [the See of] Antioch, ſome, induced thereto by fraud, were prevailed upon ; of which number is Marinus Biſhop of Berytus.

[f] He means the Synodick Letters which Severus wrote to Timotheus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and to Johannes Nicæota Biſhop of Alexandria. For Liberatus (in his Breviary, chap. 19,) informs us, that Severus held communion with theſe Prelates. Indeed, Theophanes (in his Chronicon, pag 135,) relates, that Timotheus, when he would have inſerted Severus's name into the Dyptichs, was hindred by the people of Conſtantinople. Valeſ.

[g] Theophanes caſts a great light upon this place. He writes (pag. 135,) that Timotheus ſent his Synodick Letters, and the depoſition of Macedonius, to all the Biſhops, that they might ſubſcribe to them : and, that the weaker perſons amongſt them, afraid of the Emperour, ſubſcribed to each Libell. But, that thoſe who were of a mind more ſtout and couragious, would ſubſcribe to neither. Further, that ſome, taking a middle way, ſubſcribed to Timotheus's Synodick Letters, but would in no wiſe ſubſcribe to the depoſition of Macedonius. Amongſt theſe perſons therefore who took the middle way, were the Biſhops of Paleſtine, as the Monks do atteſt here in their Letter to Alciſon. Valeſ.

[h] Ἀλλὰ καὶ οἰκοδομήσαντες. Without doubt the reading muſt be, ὁι κομίσαντες, thoſe perſons who brought them ; as it is in Nicephorus. In which Author alſo, the reading is fuller by one word ; thus, ὁι κομίσαντες ἐνταῦθα, Thoſe perſons who brought them hither. Beſides, in the Tellerian Manuſcript I found it plainly written, ὁι κομίσαντες, &c. Valeſ.

[i] In Nicephorus, this place is otherwiſe diſtinguiſhed, to wit, in this manner : ἔφυγον τῆς πόλεως ἐπ' αὐτοῦ τὸ δῆμος τε καὶ τῶν μοναχῶν κινηθέντων, Fled out of the City : the populacy and Monks having made an Inſurrection againſt them. Which diſtinction I like beſt. Valeſ.

[k] Τῶν δὲ ὑπ' ἀντιοχείαν. Nicephorus words it thus, ἐν ἀντιοχείᾳ, in Antioch ; which I like not. For the Monks of Paleſtine do not ſpeak of Antioch here, but of the Biſhops who were ſubject to the See of Antioch. For, having before ſpoken concerning the affairs of Paleſtine, which were ſubject to the Patriarch of Jeruſalem, they now paſs to the Biſhops of the Eaſt, who were under the Juriſdiction of the Patriarch of Antioch ; and in the firſt place they name Marinus Biſhop of Berytus, which was a City of Phœnice. Now, Phœnice was under the diſpoſe of the Antiochian Patriarch, according as it had been agreed in the Chalcedon Synod between Maximus Biſhop of Antioch, and Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem. Valeſ.

But others, by force and * compulſion gave their aſſent to Severus's Synodick Letters, wherein was contained an Anathematiſm, both of the Synod, and of the reſt who had aſſerted two Natures or proprieties in our Lord, one of the Fleſh, another of the Deity. Some, when through neceſſity they had given their aſſent, afterwards altered their minds, and revoak't [it :] of which number are the Biſhops ſubject to Apamia. Others wholly refuſed to aſſent ; of which number are Julianus [Biſhop] of Boſtri, and Epiphanius of Tyre, and ſome others, as they ſay, Biſhops. But, the Iſaurians, now come to themſelves, condemn themſelves for their former miſtake : Moreover, they Ana-

* Or, Neceſſity.

[c] Concerning this Petrus Iberus, Evagrius has ſpoken already, at chap. 8, book 2. There is mention made of the ſame Petrus, in The Libell of the Monks to the Patriarch Menas, which is recorded in the fifth Action of the Conſtantinopolitane Synod under Menas. Valeſ.

* Διὰ πολλῶν αὐτὸς ἦλθε σκαμμάτων, had paſſed through the ſame exerciſes ; [to wit, of a Monaſtick life.]

† Or, party.
